COLLE, Charles, secretary to the duke of Orleans, died at Paris, 2d Nov. 1783, aged 75. He was distinguished as a comic writer; but though he occasionally possessed all the vigor and elegance of genuine wit, and correct description, he yet wants delicacy, and that cautious regard for morals, so essential in public exhibitions. He was of that society of jovial companions known under the name of Caveau. His song on the capture of Portmahon procured him a pension of 600 livres. His works are collected in 3 vols. 12mo. under the title of theatre de societé. His best plays are, Truth in wine—Dupius and Defronais—and Partie de chasse de Henri IV. from which our Miller of Mansfield is borrowed.

COLLEGE, Stephen, the protestant joiner, was condemned at Oxford as guilty of a conspiracy against Charles II. upon the testimony of a worthless informer, and he suffered death, strongly asserting his innocence, 1681. He was in his character a respectable man and an ingenious mechanic, and his daughter was made sempstress to king William, with a salary of £300 a year.

COLLEONE, Bartholomew, a native of Bergamo, descended from a noble family. He followed the fortunes of de Montone, and of Joan queen of Naples and afterwards entered into the service of the Venetians, and defeated Nicolas Piccinino. He was next in the service of Visconti, and then of Francis Sforza, for whom he defeated the French army at the battle of Fiescati. After serving so many different masters, and every where carrying victory in his train, he again entered into the service of the Venetians. He died 1475, and his memory was honored with an equestrian statue, by the gratitude of the senate. He united to the great merits of a warrior, the amiable character of the patron of learning, and the friend of religion and virtue.

COLLET, Peter, a French ecclesiastic of Ternay, who died 1770, aged 73. He is author of theologia moralis universalis, 17 vols. 8o.—institutions theologice ad usum seminarian. 7 vols. 12mo.—the life of Vincent de St. Paul, 2 vols. 4to.—lives of Bourdon and de la Croix, &c.

COLLET, Philibert, a French advocate, author of treatises on excommunications, tithes, usury, alms, &c. a volume on the statutes and customs of Bresse—two letters on Tournefort's history of plants—and a catalogue of the plants in the neighbourhood of Dijon, &c. He died 1718.

COLLETET, William, a French academician, who died at Paris 10th Feb. 1659, aged 61. He was one of the five authors whom Richelieu selected to write for the theatres; but though liberally patronised by him, he refused to alter his verses according to his suggestions. He was four times married; but his extravagance was so great, that he died in great indigence. His works were published 1653, in 12mo.

COLLIER, Jeremy, an English divine, born at Stow-Qu, Cambridgeshire, 23d Sept. 1650. He was educated under his father, master of Ipswich school, and afterwards entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. 1676. He resided for six years on his rectory of Ampton near Bury, Suffolk, when he resigned it, and settled in London, where he became lecturer of Gray's-inn. At the revolution he was for a while silenced; but his attack on a pamphlet by Dr. Gilbert Burnet, drew upon him the resentment of the court, and he was sent to Newgate, from which, however, he was liberated without trial. He continued still as a writer to abuse the revolution, for which he was again persecuted, and sent to the king's bench prison, but released by the intercession of some of his friends. In 1696 Collier attended Friend and Perkins, two persons who were executed for their concern in the assassination plot, and by absolving them in the most solemn manner, and by his imposing his hand upon them, he exposed himself to the censures of the clergy, and was accused of insulting the civil and ecclesiastical government. Instead of putting in bail, Collier absconded, and was outlawed till the day of his death. In his retirement he not only defended his conduct, but began to acquire greater celebrity by his pen. He wrote his essays on moral subjects, and afterwards his view of the immorality of the English stage, a work which engaged him in perpetual contention with the wits and poets of the age. The severity of his attack, and the justness and force of his arguments were such, that a reformation actually took place, in the language of pieces represented on the stage, and though Vanbrugh and Congreve ridiculed his assaults, yet Dryden had the good sense and honesty of acknowledging the propriety of his remarks, and of publishing his own repentance for the licentiousness of his muse. His historical dictionary, chiefly compiled from Moreri, made its appearance in 1701, and the fourth volume of it in 1721. He afterwards published in 2 vols. fol. an ecclesiastical history of Great Britain, valuable for the various documents and extensive information which it contains. In 1713 Collier was consecrated a bishop by Hickey, who had himself been consecrated suffragan of Thetford, by the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. He was in consequence of his sedentary life greatly afflicted with the stone, of which he died 26th April 1726, aged 76. He was buried in St. Pancras church-yard. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote several treatises on controversial and ecclesiastical subjects, and assisted some of his friends in the completion of their publications. He was deservedly admired as a man of independent spirit, as a writer of great learning and genius, and as a divine of genuine piety.

COLLINGS, John, one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference in the reign of Charles II. died 1690, aged 67. He distinguished himself as a critic and divine. His weaver's pocket book was much admired. He was ejected as a nonconformist from St. Stephen's, Norwich, where he had been minister 44 years. He assisted Poole in his annotations.

COLLINS, John, an eminent accomptant and mathematician, son of a nonconforming divine, was born at Wood Eaton near Oxford, March 1624. He was engaged with a bookseller, and afterwards with Mar, a clerk of the kitchen to Charles prince of Wales, a man who was particularly fond of mathematics, and who constructed those sun-dials which adorned the prince's gardens. Thus early initiated to the knowledge of mathematics he further improved himself, during the seven years which he spent in the sea service, and at his return assumed the profession of an accomptant, and published some valuable works on mathematical and geometrical subjects. He was a member of the royal society, whose memoirs he enriched by many valuable communications. He was made accomptant to the royal fishery company, and was so highly respected for his knowledge of figures, that the lord chancellor Shaftesbury often consulted him, and referred to his final decision, the settlement of difficult and intricate accounts. He died of a consumption, in consequence of drinking, after a hot day's journey, too large a quantity of cider, November 10th 1683. He was the intimate correspondent of the illustrious men of his times, of Newton, Wallis, Barrow, Gregory, Flamsteed, Leibnitz, Townley &c. Twenty-five years after his death his writings fell into the hands of the learned William Jones of the royal society. He was of a strong and inventive genius, he first projected the manner of dividing the meridian line on the nautical chart, a problem of the first importance to navigation; and he began to shorten the method of computation by logarithms, which was completed by Halley. His "commercium epistolarum" appeared in 4to. 1712.

COLLINS, Anthony, was born at Heston near Hounslow, 21st June 67, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, under the tuition of Hare afterwards bishop of Chichester. He entered at the Temple, but disliking the study of the law, he applied himself to the general pursuit of literature. He now became the friend of the learned, and gained the confidence of Locke, who corresponded with him, and at his death left a letter for him, full of the warmest confidence and affection. He was the best part of his life engaged in controversies, which proved him to be more inclined to scepticism and infidelity, than to support the christian religion, as an impartial and disinterested enquirer after truth. His chief works were, priestcraft in perfection,—an essay on the 39 articles of the church of England,—vindication of the divine attributes,—discourse of free thinking,—philosophical enquiry concerning human liberty,—scheme of literal prophecy,—a discourse on the grounds and reasons of the christian religion, in two parts, a work which excited general attention, and whose tenets were in a short space of time combated by not less than 35 antagonists, among whom appear the respectable names of Whitton, Chandler, Clarke, Ashley Sykes, and Sherlock. Collins twice visited Holland, but never penetrated farther on the continent. He retired in 1715 to Essex, where he acted as a magistrate, and deserved the public gratitude, by the benevolence and integrity with which he managed the affairs of the county as treasurer of its funds. He was long afflicted with the stone, of which he died December 13th, 1729. He acknowledged in his last moments that the true catholic religion is to love God and to love man, and he earnestly advised those that stood around him to observe that, as the awful warning of a dying man.

COLLINS, Arthur, a learned and indefatigable antiquary, whose knowledge of genealogy and labors of research are sufficiently proved in his valuable work called the peerage of England, in 8 vols. which has passed through several editions, and has been further improved by Longmate.

COLLINS, Samuel, an English physician who studied at Padua, and was graduated at Oxford, in 1659. He wrote the present state of Russia 1671, 8vo. besides a book of anatomy in folio. He was censor of the college of physicians 1707.

COLLINS, William, a poet of great eminence, son of a hatter, born at Chichester, December 25th, 1720. He was educated at Winchester-school, but being superannuated, and thus prevented from entering at New college, he became a member of Queen's college, and was afterwards elected demy of Magdalen 1741. During his residence at Oxford, he published his oriental eclogues, which are so deservedly admired for simplicity, richness of description, and unaffected tenderness. In 1744, he left Oxford and came to London, panting after fame, with few resources, and too wavering in his plans to execute any regular work. At this time he published proposals for an history of the revival of learning, of which probably not a single line was ever written. He was now known to Dr. Johnson, who with his friendship shared his poverty, and was privy to his distresses, and dangerous escapes. The death of his uncle, colonel Martin, and a legacy of 1000l soon however enabled him to live more respectable; but the acquisition of independence unfortunately did not advance the literary labors of the poet, who no sooner found himself enabled to study, than he was assailed by greater calamities than poverty, the calamities of disease and insanity. That so able a writer, and so sublime a poet, should be incapacitated to give flow to the pure streams of genius and elegant conception is a melancholy loss to mankind. For a time he endeavored to disperse the clouds which hung threatening over his reason by travelling into France, but he returned, and after being some time confined in a house of lunatics, and afterwards attended by the care of his sister, he fell a victim to his intellectual malady, at Chichester in 1756. When he was visited at Islington by Johnson, he was found in his retirement with a book in his hand, which his friend out of curiosity examined to see what companion a man of letters had chosen. I have but one book, said Collins, but that is the best. It was a common English testament, such as children carry to school. In his last illness, Collins expressed to his friend Dr. Warton, his disapprobation of his oriental eclogues. His odes though very sublime, especially that on the passions, are however often obscure, his lines are clogged with clusters of consonants, and he too much affected the obsolete, when it was not worthy of revival.

COLLINSON, Peter, an eminent botanist, born in the parish of Stavely near Kendal, Westmoreland. He had an early and strong partiality for natural history, and the great naturalists and many literary characters of the age were soon in the number of his intimate friends; such as Derham, Woodward, Dale, Sloane, Lloyd, and others. In 1728, he became fellow of the Royal Society, whose memoirs he greatly enriched by his own enquiries, and his valuable correspondence with foreigners, especially Benjamin Franklin, Cadwallader Colden, and the famous Linnæus. To his zeal and improvements we are indebted for the many trees and shrubs transplanted from the western hemisphere and other countries, which adorn our gardens and plantations. He was elected fellow of the antiquarian society in 1737. In private life he was of amiable manners, very communicative, and of a very benevolent heart. He was attacked while on a visit to his friend lord Petre with a retention of urine, which medical assistance could not remove, and which shortly proved fatal 11th August 1768, in his 75th year.

COLLIUS, Francis, doctor of the Ambrosian college at Milan, died in 1640, at an advanced age. He wrote a famous treatise, de animabus paganorum, in two vols. 4to. in which, amidst bold and curious conjectures, he decrees decrees salvation to the sages of Greece, the midwives of Egypt, Socrates, &c. while he denounces damnation on Pythagoras, Aristotle, and others. His book de sanguine Christi is equally curious and singular.

COLLOT, Germain, a French surgeon, famous for his skill in cutting for the stone. He died 1656.

COLLOT D'HERBOIS, J.M. a player, who exhibited with little success on the theatres of Geneva, the Hague, and Lyons. The hisses and disapprobation which attended his appearance at Lyons, made him vow vengeance on that unfortunate city, and as he had represented the character of tyrant on the stage to the best advantage, he was soon to exhibit it in real life when admitted member of the convention, and sent as deputy to punish its revolt. Invested with absolute power against the devoted Lyonese, he seemed determined to destroy every vestige of their city, not only the walls were battered down with cannon shot, but the unfortunate inhabitants were slaughtered with insulting cruelty, and not less than 209 perished in one evening. Collot thus stained with blood, and deservedly called the tiger, returned to Paris to become the worthy associate of Robespierre. He voted for the abolition of monarchy, and the death of Lewis, because that unfortunate monarch had refused to appoint him his minister; but when his friend Robespierre was accused, he changed sides, and as president of the convention, he exerted all his influence to procure his condemnation. This minister of iniquity was afterwards himself condemned 1795 to be deported to Cayenne, where he endeavoured to excite an insurrection of the blacks. He died in confinement November 1796. As an orator he had some powers of eloquence, which were fatally exerted in the convention and among the Jacobins; but as a dramatic writer he acquired little celebrity. The best of his pieces is an imitation of the Spanish play of Calderon, which he called the Payfan magistrat.

COLLUTHUS, a priest of Alexandria. He maintained that God was not the author of the wicked, nor of the misfortunes which afflict human life. He usurped the episcopal authority, but was condemned as a heretic by the council of Alexandria 324.

COLMAN, George, an English writer, born about the year 1733 at Florence, where his father was British resident at the grand duke's court. His mother was sister of lady Bath. He was educated at Westminster and Christ church Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. He early displayed those shining talents which promised future reputation, and ensured him the friendship of the wits of the time, of Lloyd, Bonnel Thornton, Churchill, and others. While at Oxford he published with Thornton the Connoisseur in weekly numbers, from 31st January 1754 to September 30th 1756. He entered at Lincoln's-inn, under the patronage of lord Bath, but though called to the bar, the profession of the law was less congenial to his taste and feelings than the pursuit of the muses. From writing fugitive pieces of poetry, he soon applied himself to dramatic composition. His Polly Honeycomb was acted at Drury-lane in 1760 with great success, and the next year his Jealous Wife divided the general applause with Murphy's Way to keep him, and Macklin's Married Libertine. The death of lord Bath in 1764 left him in the independent enjoyment of a comfortable annuity; and his income was further increased upon the decease of general Pulteney in 1767. He purchased of Beard in 1768, with Harris, Powel, and Rutherford, the property of Covent-garden theatre, but he soon parted with his share in consequence of some private dispute with his fellow patentees. Soon after, he purchased of Foote, for an annuity, the Hay-market theatre, and with great judgement and much advantage to himself and to the public, he continued the management of that house till the time of his death, and thus introduced to the admiration and patronage of the kingdom many actors of merit and respectability. In 1790 he was attacked by a stroke of the palsy, which not only deprived him nearly of the use of one of his sides, but brought on alarming symptoms of mental derangement. He was removed to Paddington under proper management, and died 14th August 1794. Besides the comedies already mentioned, the best of Colman's plays are the Clandestine marriage, the English merchant, the Oxonian in town, the Man of business, Epicene, the Spanish barber, Suicide, the Separate maintenance, the Manager in distress, &c. He evinced his abilities as a scholar and as a critic, by his respectable translation of Terence's comedies, and of Horace's art of poetry.

COLUCCI, Angelo, a native of Jesi in Italy, descended from a noble family, who assumed the learned name of Angelus Colotius Bassus. He settled at Rome, where he distinguished himself by his noble collection of books. He was made made bishop of Nocera, by Leo X. and governor of Ascoli by Clement VII. He wrote Latin poems of some merit, but his Italian verses express little excellence. He died at Rome 1549, aged 82. He was the revivor and patron of the Roman academy.

COLOGNE, Peter de, a native of Ghent, educated at Paris and at Geneva, where he became the friend of Calvin and of Beza. He went to Metz, and afterwards settled at Heidelberg, where he died in the early part of life. He vindicated the protestants against the bishop of Metz, and wrote also on the eucharist.

COLOMBIERE, Claude de la, a famous Jesuit, born near Lyons. He was an eloquent preacher, and for two years delivered his discourses with great popularity and effect before James II. of England, but on suspicion of conspiracy, he was banished from England, and died at Paris, in the Charolois; 15th February 1682, aged 41. He is particularly known as the inventor of the Solemnity of the heart of Jesus, which had however been before introduced by Thomas Goodwin, president of Magdalen college Oxford. The novelty of this improper act of devotion soon engaged the attention of the pious, and under the influence of pretended visions and miracles it soon gained a great number of partisans and zealous apostles. The better sense of mankind, however, and the return of genuine piety, soon dispelled these fanatical tenets. The sermons of Colombiere were published at Lyons in 1757, 6 vols. 12mo. He wrote besides some moral reflections, and spiritual letters.

COLOMIES, or COLOMESIUS, Paul, a French protestant, born at Rochelle in 1638. He travelled through Europe, and at the solicitation of Isaac Vossius, he visited visited England, where he was ordained and made Lambeth librarian. He died in London in 1692. He wrote Gallia Orientalis,—Hispania & Italia Orientalis,—theologorum presbyterianorum, Icon.—bibliothèque choisie, besides critical works, &c.

COLONI, Adam and Adrian, two Dutch historical painters, called the old and the young. Adam died in London 1685, and his son 1701, aged 33.

COLONNA, Fabio, a botanist, born at Naples 1567. He devoted his time not only to natural history, but to the languages, to music, the law, and all the polite arts. His works, especially on botany, are very valuable. He wrote plantarum & piscium, historia, 4to,—stirpium rariorum descriptio, 4to,—dissertation on the glosopetra, 4to, on American plants, fol.—dissertation on the porpora, 4to. He was the first who gave distinct names to the petals and the leaves of flowers, a judicious arrangement afterwards adopted by Tournefort. The musical instrument called pentachordon is of his invention. He lived to his eightieth year.

COLONNA, Francisco Maria Pompeo, a French philosopher, whose chief work is the natural history of the universe 1734, 4 vols. 12mo. He perished in the fire which destroyed his house at Paris 1726.

COLONNA, Prospero, son of Anthony prince of Salerno, assisted, in company with his relation Fabricio, Charles VIII. of France in the conquest of Naples; but afterwards he exerted his influence and his military powers to reconquer it for the house of Arragon. He was made prisoner at the battle of Villa Franca 1515; but when restored to liberty by the French, he renewed the war with astonishing vigor, and after gaining the battle of la Bicoque, he was enabled to relieve Milan, in 1522. This distinguished warrior died 1523, aged 71.

COLONNA, Pompeo, nephew of Prospero, was brought up to the church, and made bishop of Rieti, and a cardinal, though his inclinations tended to the military profession. Ever restless and dissatisfied, he raised an insurrection at Rome on the reported death of Julius II. 1512, and, with his accomplice Savillo, he seized the capitol; but, though pardoned, and restored to his ecclesiastical honors, he again, in 1526, engaged in another conspiracy to seize the chief power, and to put the pope to death. This perfidious conduct, which brought misery on the Romans, by the sacking of the city by the constable Bourbon, was not punished as it deserved, but Colonna, whose intrigues assisted the pope's escape from the castle of St. Angelo, was again pardoned, raised to new honors, and made viceroy of Naples. He died 1532, author of a poem de virtutibus mulierum.

COLONNA, Francis, a Venetian, who, in consequence of disappointed love in his courtship of Lucretia Lelia, became author of a curious work called Hypnerotomachia di Polyphilo, printed by Aldus 1499, and translated into French 1561. He was afterwards of the order of St. Dominic, and died 1527.

COLONNA, Vittoria, daughter of Fabricio duke of Paliano, was born at Marino 1490, and married, 1507, the marquis of Pescara. In 1525, on her husband's death, she retired to a monastery, and died at Rome 1547. Her elegant poems have often been printed, and are deservedly admired.

COLONNA, Mark Antonio, duke of Paliano, distinguished himself so much in the defeat of the Turks at the battle of Lepanto, 1571, that the pope permitted him to enter Rome in a triumphal procession. He was afterwards made constable of Naples, and viceroy of Sicily; and died 1584.

COLONNA, Ascanio, son of the preceding, was made a cardinal, and showed his learning and the powers of his eloquence in the defence of the pope in his dispute with the Venetians. He died at Rome 1608.

COLONNA, John, a noble Italian, sent as papal legate to the christian army in Palestine. He was made prisoner by the Saracens, and cruelly condemned to be sawn in two; but the fortitude with which he bore the insults of his enemies disarmed their vengeance, and procured his liberty. He died 1245.

COLONNA, Giles, an Augustin monk, bishop of Bourges. He was a learned man, and a theological professor, and he wrote some works in philosophy and divinity, and died at Avignon 1316.

COLONNA, Fabricio, son of the duke of Amalfi, was a celebrated warrior against the Ursini. He was constable of Naples, and was made prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, 1512. He died 1520.

COLRANE, Henry Hare, lord, born at Blechingley, in Surrey, 10th May 1693, was educated at Enfield, and Corpus Christi, Oxford. He was well skilled in the learned languages, and displayed his poetical talents by his musarum oblatio ad reginam, a poem inserted in the Musæ Anglicanæ. He travelled three times through Europe; and in his second tour was attended by the well known Conyers Middleton. He made a noble collection of prints and drawings of antiquities abroad, which were munificently presented after his decease to his college. He died at Bath 4th August 1749, and was buried at Tottenham. His books and prints on English antiquities were sold at his death, and bought for the antiquarian society.

COLSTON, Edward, an English philanthropist, born at Bristol, November 2, 1636. He greatly increased his property by his commercial connections with Spain; and the produce of his honest industry he benevolently disposed to charitable purposes. He built alms-houses in Bristol, which he endowed with an income of £282; and besides the erection of a school for 40 boys, he founded, at the expence of £11,000, the hospital of St. Augustin, for a master, usher, and 100 boys, for whose maintenance he appropriated an annual income of above £138. Besides this, he gave many other munificent donations, especially £6000 for the improvement of sixty small livings. He was not only charitable, but he possessed great meekness of temper, joined to exemplary temperance and sincere piety. It was his practice never to bestow his charity on beggars, but rather on poor housekeepers, and on sick and decayed persons. He died at Mortlake, in Surrey, 11th October 1721, aged 85, and was buried at All-saints church, Bristol, where a monument records his virtues and charitable benefactions.

COLUMBUS, Christopher, celebrated as the discoverer of a new continent, was born, 1442, at Genoa, son of a woolcomber. He was early inured to the labors of the sea; and in his great fondness for navigation, he made himself himself perfect in geometry, astronomy, and cosmography. After trading in various parts of the Mediterranean he settled at Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was established; and here he married the daughter of a master of a vessel who had been engaged in plans of discovery, whose charts and observations he perused; and he increased his knowledge of maritime affairs by several voyages to the Canaries and the coast of Africa. Thus guided by experience, and encouraged by the correspondence of Paul Foscanelli, a learned Florentine, he became persuaded that a continent must exist in the western ocean. He presented his plans to the Genoese republic, and afterwards to the king of Portugal; but instead of patronage and encouragement, he met in both applications with coldness and indifference. At the court of Spain, Ferdinand and Isabella showed him greater attention; and after many delays and objections, which his zeal and earnestness successfully combated and removed, he was at last permitted to sail in quest of unknown regions. On the 6th of September 1492 he left Gomera, with three small ships, and on the 12th of October, after sailing in a westerly direction, he discovered some islands, and landed at Guana bay, in the Lucca islands. After visiting and taking possession of the islands of Cuba and Hispaniola, he returned to Spain, which, after a passage of fifty days, he reached in May 1493. These discoveries astonished and pleased the Spanish monarch. Columbus was declared admiral of the Indies, ennobled, and permitted to return to the new world with a large fleet. In his second voyage he discovered Jamaica and other islands; and on his return to Europe, 8th June 1496, he was enabled to silence the malicious insinuations which envy had spread concerning his views, and the importance of the new world. In May 1498 he made a third voyage, and discovered Paria, on the continent; but so violent were his enemies, that, in spite of his services, his rank, and authority, he was sent to Spain in irons in October 1500: but the monarch liberated him from captivity, and from every ignominious imputation. He again visited the new world, and died soon after his return, at Valladolid, 20th May 1506. His remains, by the king's command, were magnificently buried at Seville, where this short epitaph records his merits: "Columbus gave Castile and Leon a new world." Important as the services of this great man are to the world, it is melancholy to record the ingratitude of posterity, and to behold an extensive continent, the discovery of which ought to have been immortalized in the appellation of Columbia, bear the insignificant name of Americus Vespucius, one of those obscure individuals who followed, in fearful imitation, the track of the first heroic discoverer. The life of Columbus was written by Ferdinand, one of his sons, who embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and died 1530, leaving a valuable library to the cathedral of Seville. —Another son, called Diego, inherited all his father's honors.

COLUMBUS, Bartholomew, brother to Christopher, was ingenious in his drawing of spheres and sea-charts. It is said that he was deputed by his brother to come to solicit the king of England, but that his voyage was delayed by falling into the hands of pirates; and when at last the English monarch accepted his proposals, and promised support and encouragement to his brother, he found that the plan had already been adopted by Ferdinand of Castile. Bartholomew shared the honors and the dangers of his brother's discoveries; and he was the founder of the town of St. Domingo. He died 1514, very rich.

COLUMBUS, Realdus, an Italian anatomical writer, born at Cremona. He died at Rome 1577. It is said that his works are composed from the compositions of Vesalius, his master, and predecessor in the anatomical chair of Padua, whose discoveries he freely appropriated to himself. His Latin is very elegant. His opinions on the blood nearly approached Harvey's discovery of the circulation.

COLUMELLA, a Spaniard, who resided at Rome under Claudius, and wrote some books on trees and agriculture.

COLUMNA, Guy, a native of Messina in Sicily, who accompanied Edward I. to England, and wrote a chronicle in 36 books, besides a history of the siege of Troy, in Latin, 1477, in 4to. The last edition is at Naples, 1655.

COLUTHUS, a Greek, author of a poem on the rape of Helen, in the 6th century.

COLVIUS, Andrew, a native of Dort, who went in the suite of the Dutch ambassador to Venice, where he gained the intimacy of Father Paul, and translated into Latin his treatise on the inquisition. He wrote also some elegant poetry, and made a valuable collection of books and curiosities, of which a catalogue was printed 1655. He died 1671, aged 77. —His son Nicholas was like himself a learned and eloquent divine. He died 1717.

COLWILL, Alexander, was born near St. Andrew's, Fifeshire, and educated at Edinburgh, of which he became principal, in 1662. Besides some tracts, he wrote the Scotch Hudibras, after the manner of Butler, a ludicrous poem, which severely ridiculed the presbyterians, and which is still admired in Scotland. He died at Edinburgh 1676, aged 58.

COMBESIS, Francis, a Dominican, known as the learned editor of several of the Greek fathers—of five Greek historians, as a supplement to the Byzantine history, &c. He died 1679.

COMBER, Thomas, an English divine, born at Westerham, Kent, 1645. He was educated at Sidney Sussex college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and he was created D.D. by the archbishop of Canterbury. He was made dean of Durham in the room of Dr. Granville, 1691, and was chaplain to the princess Anne of Denmark and to William and Mary. He died 25th November 1669, and was buried at Stonegrave, Yorkshire. He wrote some divinity tracts, particularly discourses on baptism, catechism, and confirmation, and on the liturgy of the church of England, &c.

COMBER, Thomas, a fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became D.D. He was born at Shermanbury, Suffex, and educated at Horsham school. He was made dean of Carlisle August 1630, and master of his college the following year. He was in 1642 deprived of all his preferments, and imprisoned. He died at Cambridge February 1653. He wrote a vindication of the divine right of tithes, against Selden.

COMENIUS, John Amor, a protestant, eminent as a divine and grammarian. He was born in Moravia in 1592. After

After being pastor at Fulnec, and also presiding over a school there, he fled upon the invasion of his county by the Spaniards, and came to Lesna in Poland, where he maintained himself by teaching grammar, and where he published his Janua linguarum, a small book, which, it is said, acquired so much celebrity, that it was translated into 12 European languages. His fame as a grammarian, was now so universally spread, that he was honorably invited by the Swedes, and by the English parliament, to reform the public schools of the kingdom. In compliance with these requests he visited England in 1641, but the civil wars thwarted his expectations, and made his stay unnecessary. The next year he accepted the invitations of the Swedes, by whom he was respectfully treated. For four years he was engaged at Elbing in laying down plans for the promotion of general instruction, and his recommendations were publicly approved. He afterwards visited Sigismund Ragotzki, prince of Transylvania, and gave him rules for the better regulation of the schools of his country, and on his return to Lesna, he had the misfortune to see the city reduced to ashes by the Poles, and his books and manuscripts destroyed. From Lesna he fled to Silesia, thence to Brandenburg, afterwards to Hamburg, and lastly to Amsterdam, where he ended his days 1671, aged 80. Besides his Janua, he wrote Panosophia prodromus—a new method of teaching—unius necessarii, &c. The last years of his life, however, were disgraced by visionary schemes, and attempts at prophecy. He pretended to foretell the beginning of the millennium, which he placed in 1672 or 1673, a gross absurdity, which his death prevented him from witnessing. It would have been a happy circumstance if he had been the only sufferer in his prophetic dreams, many of the Moravians were weak enough to believe him, and they were severely persecuted, after the destruction of Lesna, and the protestants of Poland also drew upon themselves the hatred and jealousy of the catholics. Comenius, in his last illness, was visited by the celebrated madam Bourignon, who had embraced his tenets, and considered him as more than mortal.

COME NATALIS or NATAL CONTI, a native of Milan, whose Greek and Latin poems appeared at Venice 1550, and his mythologia five explicationes fabularum, a very useful mythological work, 1564. He died about 1590.

COMIERS, Claude, canon of Embrun, was professor of mathematics at Paris, and died 1693. He wrote on comets, on spectacles, on prophecies, on speech, in an elegant and interesting style.

COMINES, Philip de, an excellent historian of Flanders. His noble birth and great acquirements soon recommended him to the notice of Charles duke of Burgundy, and afterwards to that of Lewis XI. of France. Patronised by the monarch, he grew into power and consequence, and as ambassador, he served his court with fidelity and dispatch. After the death of Lewis, he was stripped of his honors, the next successor Charles VIII. viewed him with the prejudice and malevolence of a foreigner, and he was imprisoned at Loches; but though his enemies were so powerful and numerous, that no advocate would presume to plead his cause, he defended himself with the energy and effort of innocence, and after addressing his judges in an eloquent speech of two hours, he was, after three years' confinement, discharged. He died at his house at Argenton 1509, aged 64, and was buried in the church of the Augustines at Paris. Comines, though well acquainted with modern languages, was yet no deep scholar. The memoirs of his own times, however, which he left, are very valuable for the historical details which they give, during 34 years' of the affairs of the house of Burgundy, and of Lewis XI. and Charles VIII of France, with anecdotes of the various transactions which at that time took place in England, and on the continent. His impartiality is universally acknowledged, and the respect which he shows to the English nation, entitles him to the praises which Dryden bestows upon him, in ranking him with Thucydides and Tacitus, for the acuteness of his judgement, and the great knowledge of men, manners and politics, which he has displayed. His works were edited by Fresnoy, 4 vols. 4to. 1747, and have been translated by Uvedale into English, 2 vols 8vo.

COMMANDINUS, Frederic, an Italian mathematician, descended from a noble family at Urbino, where he was born 1509. Besides great knowledge of mathematics, he was well versed in Greek literature, and translated Archimedes, Apollonius Pergæus, Ptolemy, Euclid, Aristarchus, &c. besides some original compositions on the centre of gravity, on clocks, &c. He was greatly patronised by the duke of Urbino, and died 1575.

COMMELIN, Jerome, an eminent French printer, born at Douay. He settled at Geneva, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died 1598. He printed among other fathers, the works of Chrysostom, 4 vols. fol. an excellent edition. The mark he prefixed to his editions, was truth sitting in a chair.

COMMENDONE, John Francis, a native of Venice, who, at the early age of 10, wrote Latin verses, and so recommended himself by his learning, that he became chamberlain to Julius III, and was employed in various embassies, and made bishop by Paul IV. Pius IV. raised him to the rank of cardinal, and employed him as his nuncio in Poland; and he was afterwards legate at the diet of Augsberg, against the Lutherans. He wrote various Latin poems and letters, and died at Padua 1584, aged 60.

COMMERSON, Philibert, botanist to the French king, was born at Chatillon les Dombes, near Bourg in Bresse, 1727. When residing as physician at Montpellier, he showed his fondness for botany to so improper a degree, that he plundered even the king's garden, to enrich his collections. He was recommended by Linnæus to the queen of Sweden to complete her collection of rare fishes, and consequently wrote his ichthyology in 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides a dictionary and bibliography on writers of natural history, and the martyrology of botany, containing the lives of those who had lost their life in pursuit of natural curiosities, to which his own life was to be added. His abilities recommended him to the ministry as a proper person to accompany Bougainville round the world, and he embarked in 1766, and highly distinguished himself by the labor and success of his researches. He died at the isle of France in 1773, leaving to the king's cabinet all his collection, amounting to 200 volumes in folio, besides the contents of 32 cases, cases, containing great treasures, selected during his voyage. He mentions discovering a nation of dwarfs of $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet high in the interior parts of Madagascar.

COMMIRE, John, a Jesuit born at Amboise. He wrote Latin in so elegant a style, that his fables are esteemed equal to those of Phædrus. He died at Paris 1702, aged 77. His poems appeared two vols 12mo. 1754.

COMMODI, Andrea, a Florentine painter who died 1638, aged 73. His Lucifer and associates fallen from heaven, painted for Paul V. was much admired.

COMMODIANUS of Gaza, a Christian poet of the fourth century, author of Institutions, a sort of composition neither elegant nor valuable.

COMMODUS, Lucius Aurelius Antoninus, succeeded his father Antoninus as emperor of Rome 180. After a series of dissipation, cruelty, and every profligacy, he was poisoned by Marcia his concubine 192.

COMPTÉ, Lewis le, a French Jesuit, who went in 1685 to China as a missionary. He published an interesting account of his mission on his return to Europe, and died at Bourdeaux 1729.

COMPTON, Spencer, son of the first earl of Northampton, was master of the robes to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles I. and accompanied him to Spain. When Charles succeeded to the throne, Compton loyally supported his measures, and attended him in his expedition against the Scots. When the royal standard was set up at Nottingham, he was among the truest of his friends. At the battle of Hopton-heath near Stafford, March 19th 1643, he was encompassed by the enemy, and when after deeds of valor, he was offered quarter, he boldly declared he would not receive it from the hands of rebels and rogues, upon which he was slain with a blow of an halbert on the head. He was buried in All-hallows church, Derby. He left six sons and two daughters by Mary daughter of sir Francis Beaumont.

COMPTON, Henry, a prelate, youngest son of Spencer, just mentioned. He was born in 1632. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and after three years' residence he set off, in 1652, on his travels. At the restoration he obtained a cornetcy in a regiment of horse, but he afterwards studied divinity at Cambridge, where he became M. A. Soon after entering into orders he obtained the rectory of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, a canonry at Christ-church, and the mastership of St. Cross hospital near Winchester. In 1674, he was made bishop of Oxford, and the next year succeeded to the see of London. In this elevated situation he was entrusted with the education of the princesses Mary and Anne, and the strong attachment which they showed to the protestant religion, is honorably attributed to the wholesome instructions of the learned prelate. He labored assiduously to reconcile the dissenters to the tenets of the church, and he most ably resisted the claims and the doctrines of the catholics. His zeal as a protestant prelate displeased James II. and therefore he removed him from the privy council, and on his refusing to suspend Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, from his ecclesiastical office, he was summoned before Jefferys and a commission, and arbitrarily deprived of all his episcopal functions. This violence on the part of the king was noticed by Mary and by William prince of Orange, and at last James, afraid of the consequences of his conduct, consented to restore the bishop to his offices. Compton however received with fullness the reparation offered to his episcopal dignity, and when the kingdom was invaded by William, he warmly espoused his cause, and conducted the princess Anne to Nottingham, to prevent her being conveyed to France. With all the ardor of a friend, and the zeal of a partizan, he congratulated William on his landing, and supported his claims to the throne in the house of lords, and at last consecrated him, and fixed the crown on his head. Every step however which he pursued was tinged with moderation, but because he wished the reconciliation of the dissenters, and opposed the prosecution of Sacheverell, he has been branded with the epithets of a weak and bigoted partizan. He died at the age of 81, July 7th, 1713, and was buried in Fulham church yard. He was an eminent divine as well as an able statesman, strongly attached to the constitution, and displaying the sincerity of his profession by a pious and exemplary life. He wrote some theological tracts, justly esteemed for soundness of doctrine, and for moderation, and was a great encourager of botany, as the patron of Ray, Plukenet, and other naturalists. His garden was much admired for his fine collection of exotics.

CONANT, John, D.D. an English divine, was born at Yeaterton, Devon, 18th October 1608, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. During the civil wars he left the university, but in 1649 he was unanimously elected rector of his college; he was also divinity professor, and in 1657 was admitted vice chancellor. At the restoration he appeared in London, at the head of the university, to congratulate the king; but though he assisted at the Savoy as one of the commissioners, he refused to comply with the act of uniformity, and was consequently deprived of all his preferments in 1662. He was afterwards readmitted into the bosom of the church 1670, being ordained by Reynolds bishop of Norwich, whose daughter he had married, and by whom he had six sons and six daughters. He was soon after made minister of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, which he exchanged for Allsaints in Northampton, a place to which he was strongly attached. He became archdeacon of Norwich 1676, and in 1681 had a prebend in the church of Worcester. In 1686 he had the misfortune to lose his eyesight, and died seven years after, 12th March 1693, and was buried in his church, Northampton. He was a man of great piety, of extensive learning, and of singular modesty. Six volumes of his sermons have been published.

CONCA, Sebastian, a painter born at Gaeta. He died 1761, aged 82. His pieces were much esteemed and many of them are in the possession of the king of Naples.

CONCANEN, Matthew, a native of Ireland, bred to the law. He came to London as a literary adventurer, and he gained a livelihood and some reputation by writing in support of the measures of the ministry. His attack upon Pope procured him a respectable place in the Dunciad; but the patronage of the duke of Newcastle advanced him to the lucrative office of attorney-general for Jamaica. In this appointment, for 17 years, he conducted himself with all the integrity and honor of a man of virtue, and after acquiring a respectable and independent fortune, he returned to England, with the flattering intention of spending the rest of his life in Ireland. He fell however into a rapid consumption, and died at London 22d Jan. 1749. He wrote Wexford-wells a play, besides some songs, in the Musical miscellany, and a well-known letter addressed to Warburton.

CONCINA, Daniel, a Dominican of Venice, celebrated as an eloquent preacher, and as a man of abilities, often consulted by Benedict XIV. He was author of a system of christian theology 2 vols. 4to.—and other pieces on practical and casuistical subjects, and died at Venice 1756, aged 70.

CONCINI, better known by the name of marshal d'Ancre, was a Florentine, and came to France in the suite of Mary de Medicis wife of Henry the great. By his intrigues and those of his wife Eleonora Galigay, he became from a gentleman of the bed-chamber, a marquis, and a marshal of France. The enemies which his elevation and his pride procured contrived his ruin, Lewis XIII. was prevailed upon to get rid of this dangerous favorite, and Concini was shot by Vitry and his accomplices on the Louvre bridge, 24th April 1617, and his body was ignominiously insulted by the populace. His wife also lost her head, and his son was declared incapable to hold any office in the kingdom. When his wife was accused of witchcraft, in influencing the mind of the queen, she said, her magic was only the influence of a great mind over a weak one.

CONDAMINE, Charles Marie de la, born at Paris 1701, was knight of St. Lazare, and member of several learned academies. He early travelled to the eastern parts of the world, and in 1736 he was chosen with Godin to go to Peru, to determine the figure of the earth at the equator. On his return he visited Rome, and was, by the dispensation of the pope, permitted at the age of 55 to marry his niece. He died 4th Feb. 1774, in consequence of an operation for the removal of a hernia. He was a man of great eminence as a mathematician, though his fondness of flattery rendered him too often regardless of the solid praise which should belong to a man of merit, modesty. He was acquainted with many learned persons, and perhaps more from ostentation than the real wish to advance the cause of science. His works are, distance of the tropics—relation of a voyage to America—observations, &c. on the inoculation of the small-pox—on education—tracts through Italy—measure of the three first degrees of the meridian.

CONDE', Lewis first duke of, son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, was distinguished for his valor at the battle of St. Quintin, and afterwards for his intrigues, as the leader of the rebellious Hugonots. Active and vigilant during the civil wars of that period, he was wounded at the battle of Dreux, and seven years after fell at that of Jarnac 1569, aged 39. His memoirs of his own times appeared after his death, and possess merit. The best edition is that of 1743, 6 vols. 4to.

CONDE', Henry prince of, was known in the court of Henry IV. of France, by whose influence he became a catholic. He was sent to the bastille in 1616, and liberated three years after. The death of Lewis XIII. restored him to public favor; he became minister to the regent, and displayed his valor and his abilities in the service of his country, and died at Paris 1646, aged 58.

CONDE', Lewis prince of, duke of Enghein, son of the preceding, deserved the name of the great. He was born at Paris 1621, and Richelieu observed in his earliest years his promising abilities, and foretold his future greatness as a general and as a man. Though but 22 he defeated the Spaniards at the famous battle of Rocroi, and after taking Thionville and other fortified towns, he entered Germany as a conqueror. His attempts afterwards upon Lerida in Catalonia proved abortive, but in Flanders he acquired fresh honors, by the defeat of the imperialists, and the submission of an extensive tract of country. In the civil wars of France, he espoused the cause of the court, though afterwards he opposed the views of Mazarine, and, of the monarchy, and, in the spirit of indignation and unyielding pride, he entered into the service of the Spaniards in Flanders against his country. The peace of the Pyrenees, 1659, reconciled him to his country, and enabled him to atone for the injuries which his desertion had inflicted on his honor and France. He was afterwards employed against the prince of Orange; but though wounded at the passage of the Rhine, he completed the conquest of Franche-comté, and spread terror into Germany, after the resignation of Turenne. He died of the gout at Fontainebleau 1686, aged 65, leaving two sons by his wife, who was the niece of cardinal Richelieu.

CONDE', Henry Julius de, prince of, son of the great Condé, distinguished himself under his father, at the passage of the Rhine, and at the battle of Senef. He was a liberal patron of men of letters, and died 1709, aged 66.

CONDER, John D. D. was born in Cambridgeshire 1714, and was educated as a dissenter. He was a minister of a congregation at Cambridge, and afterwards kept a school at Mile-end, and in 1761 succeeded to the meeting on the Pavement, Moorfields. He died 1781, aged 67. He printed several sermons, besides an essay on the importance of the clerical character.

CONDILLAC, Stephen Bonnot de, of the French academy, born at Grenoble, was preceptor to the infant son of the duke of Parma. He died at Flux near Baugenci, 2d Aug. 1780, of a putrid fever. He was a man of great erudition, strong sense, and austere manners. He wrote in 3 vols. 12mo. essay on the origin of human sciences—on animals—on the sensations, &c.—besides a course of study for the instruction of his pupils in 16 vols. 12mo—and commerce and government considered in their mutual relations, &c. 12mo. These volumes display great philanthropy, though often they are devoid of warmth and vivacity. He is accused by some of favoring the principles of the materialists.

CONDORCET, John Anthony Nicholas Caritat, marquis of, one of the founders of the French republic, was born 17th Sept. 1743, at Ribemont in Picardy, of a noble family. He preferred the pursuits of literature to the military profession, and studied mathematics and belles letters at the college of Navarre, and at the age of 21 he gained the applauses of the learned, by his ingenious memoir on the calcul differentiel, which was received by the academy of Paris with marked approbation. He afterwards became the friend of d'Alembert, and of Voltaire, and corresponded with the king of Prussia, and when made secretary of the academy of sciences, he distinguished tinguished himself by the spirited eulogies which he pronounced on the meritorious services of his departed brethren. In the constituent assembly he was made governor to the dauphin; but his zeal in favor of republican principles overpowered the respect which he owed to majesty, and though patronised by Lewis XVI. he ventured to recommend the abolition of monarchy, and the triumph of liberty. But though hostile to the monarchy, he showed some compassion for the king, and opposed his violent trial; but his measures were viewed with jealousy by Robespierre and his party, and he was regarded as a hypocrite, who, under the mask of moderation and philosophy, aspired at the sovereign power. He was therefore condemned 28th July, 1793, as one of the Girondists, and for a while concealed himself at Paris, but afterwards sought refuge at the house of a friend in the country. His friend unfortunately was absent, and he was obliged to hide himself for several nights in some quarries, till hunger forced him to seek relief in a neighbouring tavern. His long beard, squalid appearance, and the voracious appetite with which he devoured the bread placed before him, rendered him suspected, he was arrested, and might have escaped under the character of a distressed servant, but a Horace found in his pocket, proved him to be a man of education, and of consequence. On the morrow the gaoler found him dead, a sacrifice either to excessive fatigue and continued want, or to poison, 28th March, 1794. In his character, Condorcet was weak but ambitious, fond of novelty, and, in pursuit of imaginary happiness, little attentive to the feelings of humanity, the calls of virtue, and the precepts of christianity. He was, according to d'Alembert, a volcano covered with snow. His writings were respectable. Besides a sketch of the progress of the human mind—a treatise on arithmetick—a tract on calculation, and on the problem of the three bodies—analytical affairs, &c. he wrote eulogies on Bernoulli, d'Alembert, Euler, Jussieu, Buffon, and others, which possessed great merit, though that on Voltaire is considered as turgid and insignificant. His publications were 26 in number.

CONDREN, Charles de, a doctor of the Sorbonne, priest of the congregation of the oratory, and confessor of the duke of Orleans, is known for his influence in producing a reconciliation between the king and Orleans. Satisfied with a life of privacy, and the humble dignity of general of his order, he nobly refused a bishopric and the hat of a cardinal, and died 1641. His discourses, letters, &c. have appeared in 2 vols 12mo.

CONFUCIUS or CONG-FU-TZE, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, born at Chanping, of a noble family, about 550 B.C. At the age of three he lost his father, but his education was honorably superintended by the kind care of his grandfather, and his wisdom and abilities displayed themselves with such advantage, that he became the prime minister of the kingdom of Lu. His labors were ardently directed to the reformation of manners, but the dissipation of the king, who attached himself to several concubines, displeased him, and he indignantly resigned his offices, and retired to privacy, and the cultivation of philosophical pursuits. So extensively spread was his reputation, that he was frequented by above 3000 disciples, whom his examples and precepts formed to virtue and morality.

He taught his disciples that the first duties were to serve, obey, and fear God, to love their neighbour as themselves, and to curb their passions to the guidance of reason. Thus deservedly respected and beloved, Confucius selected ten of his pupils, to whom he communicated the vast resources of his mind, and all the precepts which might render and preserve them happy in the possession of wisdom and virtue. He returned afterwards to the kingdom of Lu, where he died aged 73. The king no sooner heard of his death, than he exclaimed, "that the gods had removed him from the earth, because they wished to punish her inhabitants." His memory was honored in the most solemn manner, he was regarded as a departed saint, and public edifices were raised to celebrate his services to mankind. His books on morals have been translated into French, and they possess excellent rules for virtue and morality. He married, when young, but though he lost his wife some years after, he disdained to follow the example of his countrymen, who kept concubines. His descendants are still revered in China, and are regarded as mandarins of the first order of the kingdom.

CONGREVE, William, an English dramatic writer, born in Staffordshire, 1672. He was educated at Kilkenny school, and Dublin college, whence many have supposed him to be a native of Ireland. After the revolution he came to London, and entered at the middle temple, but soon relinquished the profession for the cultivation of the muses. His first production was "Incognita, or love and duty reconciled," a novel of some merit, though the composition of a youth of 17. His first play was the Old Bachelor in 1693, which was revised and applauded by Dryden, and deservedly recommended the author to the patronage of lord Halifax, by whose influence he became commissioner for licensing hackney coaches, and held other offices worth £600 a year. The next year appeared his Double Dealer, but with not so much popularity. On the death of queen Mary, Congreve wrote a delicate and much admired pastoral, called the Mourning muse of Alexis, and in 1695 he produced his popular comedy of Love for Love, and the same year, an ode on the taking of Namur. The next production was the Mourning Bride, a tragedy, which was first acted in Lincoln's-inn fields' theatre, and was universally applauded. The reputation of Congreve, but more particularly the licentiousness of his plays, drew upon him the censures of Jeremy Collier the zealous reformer of the stage, and though Congreve defended himself, yet truth must own the charge of immorality too well established to be refuted. Though dissatisfied with the public cry raised against him, yet he produced another comedy, The way of the world, which was condemned by the critics of the times, but nevertheless possesses great merit. Though he now withdrew from public life as an author, his friends were occasionally complimented with his able assistance, he wrote epilogues, and assisted Dryden in his Virgil, and contributed the whole of Juvenal's 11th satire. The last 20 years of his life, Congreve spent in ease and retirement. He was at last afflicted severely with the gout, which together with a bruise he received in being overturned in his chariot, hastened his death. He died in Surry-street, Strand, 19th January 1729, and was buried with great solemnity.

in Westminster-abbey, where a monument was erected to his honor by Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough. Congreve enjoyed in his time much of what can render life agreeable, easy, and happy. His appointments and the secretaryship of Jamaica yielded him not less than 1200*l.* a year, and with an easy and independent fortune he was flattered with the friendship of the great and of the learned, and had Dryden, Steele, and Pope, among his most devoted admirers. He died very rich, the fruit of his great but not unbecoming economy. His comedies, says Johnson, are the works of a mind replete with imagery and quick in combination, though of his miscellaneous poetry little can be said that is favorable. Voltaire, who knew and admired him, says, that he raised the glory of English comedy to a greater height than any writer before or after him; but his grand defect was entertaining too mean an idea of the character of an author, though to that he was indebted totally for his fame and fortune.

CONNOR, Bernard, a physician, born in the county of Kerry, 1666. As his friends were catholics, he was not regularly educated in Ireland, but in 1686 he went over to France, and at Montpellier and Paris, distinguished himself for his assiduity, and his great knowledge of anatomy and chemistry. He afterwards travelled through Germany as the tutor of the two sons of the chancellor of Poland, and on his arrival at Warsaw, recommended himself so much by his skill in the knowledge and cure of diseases, that he became physician to the king, John Sobieski. After collecting much valuable information on the natural history and other curiosities of Poland, he left Warsaw in 1694, as physician in the suite of the king's daughter, who was going to espouse the duke of Bavaria at Brussels, and from Holland, he came to England in 1695. He now began to read lectures on anatomy, chemistry, and physic at Oxford, and acquired such celebrity that he was elected into the royal society and the college of physicians. He also delivered lectures in London and Cambridge with equal success, but his evangelium medici, divided into 16 sections, published in 1697, drew upon him the imputation of irreligion and even atheism, and though he probably intended no attack upon revelation, the work deserves censure for its scepticism. On the death of Sobieski, and the tumults which a Polish election generally produced, Connor was induced to gratify the public curiosity by the publication of his history of Poland in two vols. which, though finished with more rapidity than correctness, contains many valuable and interesting particulars concerning that now ill fated kingdom. Whilst in the enjoyment of public celebrity and rising eminence, Connor was attacked with a fever, which quickly carried him off, October 1698, in his 32d year. Though born and educated a catholic he embraced the doctrines of the church of England, and died in her communion. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Hayley, rector of St. Giles in the fields, where his remains were deposited.

CONON, an Athenian general defeated by Lyfander. He afterwards defeated the Spartans, and was reconciled to his countrymen. He was betrayed to Tiribazus, and put to death 393 B.C.

CONON, an astronomer of Samos, the friend of Archimedes. He flattered Ptolemy by saying that the hair of queen Berenice was become a constellation in the heavens.

CONRAD I. count of Franconia, and king of Germany 912. He opposed the Huns who had invaded Germany, at the solicitation of Arnoul duke of Bavaria, and at last purchased their retreat with a sum of money and a yearly tribute, and died 918.

CONRAD II. son of Herman duke of Franconia, was made king of Germany 1024, and crowned emperor at Rome 3 years after. He was successful against his opponents, and added to his dominions the kingdom of Burgundy according to the will of king Rodolphus. He died 1039.

CONRAD III. son of Frederic of Suabia, was duke of Franconia, and elected emperor of Germany. Though violently opposed in his elevation, he had the good fortune to disperse or reconcile his enemies, and afterwards went to the crusades against the Saracens. As the Greeks had poisoned the fountains in the holy land, he nearly lost his whole army, and with difficulty returned to Europe. He died at Bamberg, 1152.

CONRAD IV. duke of Suabia, succeeded his father Frederic II. as emperor 1250. His elevation was opposed by Innocent IV. who claimed the high privilege of disposing of crowns and kingdoms, upon which he invaded Italy, and took Capua, Naples, and other places. His victories would soon have dispossessed the ambitious pope of his dominions, but he died suddenly, and as it is suspected of poison, 1254.

CONRADIN or CONRAD, son of the fourth Conrad, was only three years old when his father died. His uncle Mainfroi became his regent in the kingdom of Naples, but pope Urban IV. bestowed the crown to Charles of Anjou, who defeated his youthful rival 1268, and soon after beheaded him at Naples, when only sixteen years old.

CONRART, Valentin, secretary to the French king's council, was born at Paris 1603, and died September 23, 1675. To his taste, his influence, and his love for literature, the French ascribe the origin of their French academy, of which he is deservedly styled the father, as her first learned men held their first meetings in his house from 1629 to 1634. Though Conrart knew nothing of Greek, and little of Latin, he yet published some pieces not entitled however to great merit. He owes his celebrity to the affability of his manners, the goodness of his heart, the hospitable asylum which he gave to men of learning, and especially his being regarded as the founder of the academy.

CONRI, Florence, a Franciscan friar, born in Connaught, Ireland, but educated in Spain. Philip III. sent him under the title of titular bishop of Tuam, to his native country, that he might reconcile the disaffected Irish to the prospects of a Spanish invasion. His perfidious schemes were however defeated, and he returned to Madrid, where he died 1629. He was author of the mirror of the christian life,—an Irish catechism, Louvain 1626; besides some Latin pieces on Augustine, &c.

CONRINGIUS, Hermannus, professor of the law, was born at Norden in Frisia 1606, and died at Helmstadt, where he was professor of physic and politics, and senior of the university, in 1681. He was well skilled in history as well as law, and enjoyed the friendship of some of of the princes of Germany. His works, which are chiefly on law and history, were printed at Brunswick in six vols. folio: 1731.

CONSTANT, David, a native of Lausanne, and there professor of philosophy, Greek, and divinity. He wrote an abridgment of politics,—on the passage of the Israelites through the red sea,—on Lot's wife,—the bush of Moses,—the brazen serpent,—a system of theology, &c.—besides editions of the classics. He died at Lausanne 1733, aged 95.

CONSTANTIN, Robert, professor of physic, and belles lettres at Caen university, where he was born, died of a pleurisy in 1605, aged 103, after enjoying to the last all the faculties of his mind and body. His knowledge of Greek was very extensive, as his learned works fully evince, especially his valuable Lexicon Greek and Latin. He wrote besides three books on Greek and Latin antiquities,—a dictionary of abstruse Latin words,—a thesaurus rerum, &c. utriusque linguæ.

CONSTANTINE the great, a Roman emperor after his father Constantius. He was an able general, a sagacious politician, and a benevolent prince. He is chiefly celebrated for the building of Constantinople on the site of old Byzantium, and for being the first emperor who embraced christianity. He died 337, aged 66.

CONSTANTINE II. son of the great Constantine, was born at Arles, and became after his father's death master of Spain, Gaul, and Britain. He made war against his brother Constans, and was slain at Aquileia 340.

CONSTANTINE III. son of Constantius II. was surnamed Pogonatus, or the bearded, and was crowned emperor 668. He was successful against the Saracens, who besieged Constantinople, and he destroyed their ships with the Greek fire. Though valiant he was ambitious and intriguing. He avenged his father's murder, but he showed himself wantonly cruel by the murder of his brothers Tiberius and Heraclius, who had been raised by the army to a share of the imperial power. He condemned the heresy of the monothelites in a council at Constantinople, and died 685.

CONSTANTINE IV. CAPRONYMUS, succeeded his father Leo the Isaurian 752, and displayed his zeal against image worship. He defeated the Saracens, and Artavasdes his brother-in-law, who had made an insurrection against him, but he was afterwards routed by the Bulgarians, though in another battle he regained the victory. He died 775.

CONSTANTINE V. succeeded his father Leo IV. in 780, though only ten years old, under the guardianship of his mother Irene. He had the good success to thwart his mother's schemes, who wished to make herself sole sovereign; but during an invasion of the Bulgarians, he was defeated, and was deprived not only of his power, but of his eyes, by the order of his cruel mother 792. He died some years after in obscurity.

CONSTANTINE VII. PORPHYROGENITUS, son of Leo the wife, was born 905, and ascended the throne at the age of seven, under the guardianship of his mother Zoe. When of age he showed himself valiant and active, he defeated the Lombards in Italy, and drove the Turks by threats and by money from the borders of his empire. He was afterwards governed by his wife Helena, who oppressed the people and rendered herself odious. He was poisoned by his son Romanus 959. He was a learned man, and wrote the life of Basilus the Macedonian,—the geography of the empire,—a treatise on the affairs of the empire,—de re rusticâ, &c.

CONSTANTINE IX. son of Romanus, succeeded to the throne with his brother Basil II. after John Zimisces, 976. He died 1028.

CONSTANTINE X. MONOMACHUS or GLADIATOR, a Greek, who married Zoe, daughter of Constantine IX. and ascended the throne 1042. Insurrection and a Turkish war were the striking features of his reign. He died 1054.

CONSTANTINE XI. or DUCAS, was adopted as successor by Isaac Comnenus 1059. His reign was turbulent and unhappy in consequence of the invasion of the Scythians, and the destruction of some of his cities by an earthquake. He died 1067.

CONSTANTINE XIII. son of John Paleologus, succeeded his brother John in 1448. He possessed bravery, and honorably fell in the defence of Constantinople when besieged and taken by the Turks 1453. In him ended the Greek empire.

CONSTANTINE, Flavius Julius, a private soldier, who by intrigue and great success invested himself with the imperial purple in Britain, and added Gaul and Spain to his dominions by his arms. He was besieged at Arles, where he had fixed his residence, by Constantius the lieutenant of Honorius, and when reduced to extremity he offered to surrender provided his life was spared. The conditions were accepted but inhumanly violated. He was put to death, and also his son, 411.

CONSTANTINE, a native of Syria, raised to the papal chair 708. He travelled into the east, and died 715. The antipope who opposed Stephen III. bore also this name. He was driven from Rome and died in a monastery.

CONSTANTINE, of Carthage in Africa, was a physician of the 11th century. He travelled into the east where he resided 30 years. He is supposed to be the first who brought the Arabian and Greek physic into Italy. After his return to Carthage he went to settle at Reggio, and at last became a monk of Monte Casino. His works appeared at Basil 1539, in folio.

CONSTANTIUS, Chlorus, father of the great Constantine, was made colleague to Galerius on Dioclesian's abdication. He died at York 306.

CONSTANTIUS, Flavius Julius, the second son of the great Constantine, succeeded with his two brothers Constans and Constantine to the empire of Rome. He defeated Magnentius who had murdered his brother Constans and became sole emperor. He died 361.

CONTARINI, Gaspard, a native of Venice, engaged in various embassies, and made a cardinal 1538, and sent as legate to the council of Trent 1541. He wrote some Latin treatises on the immortality of the soul—the seven sacraments,—against Luther—on the office of pope, &c.—with great elegance and spirit, and died at Bologna 1542.

CONTARINI GIOVANNI, a Venetian painter, who died 1605, aged 56. He was eminent in his profession and a great imitator of Titian.

CONTARINI, Vincent, professor of eloquence at Padua, died in his native town, Venice, 1617, aged 40. The most most known of his learned works are de re frumentaria, de militari Romanorum stipendio variae lectiones, &c. in 4to.

CONTE, Jaolino del, a Florentine portrait painter, patronised by pope Paul III. He died 1598, aged 88.

CONTI, Guilio di, an Italian poet who died at Rimini about the middle of the 16th century. His poems are greatly esteemed, they were collected and published Venice 1592, in 4to. Florence 1715, and Verona 1753, in 4to.

CONTI, abbé Anthony, a noble Venetian, who died 1749, aged 71. By the extent of his travels he not only formed a numerous acquaintance with the learned of every country, but he greatly improved the powers of his mind. He is author of some tragedies, and of some poems which abound more with metaphysics than poetical elegance. His works in verse and prose were published at Venice two vols. 4to. 1739, and another 1756. During his visit to England, Conti became acquainted with Newton, and long esteemed and venerated the abilities and friendship of that great man.

CONTI, Armand de Bourbon prince of, quitted the church for a military life, and warmly espoused the party of the insurgents against his brother the great Condé, during the civil wars of France. These two hostile brothers were both together sent prisoners to Vincennes by Mazarine. Conti was made in 1654 governor of Guienne, commander of the armies in Catalonia, and governor of Languedoc 1662. He wrote in French, treatises on the duties of the great,—on comedies and plays &c.—on the duties of provincial governors—&c.—three vols. 12mo. Paris 1667. He died 1668.

CONTI, Francis Lewis de Bourbon, son of the preceding, distinguished himself at the siege of Luxemburg, in the campaign in Hungary, at the battles of Steinkerk, Fleurus and Nerwinde. He was elected king of Poland 1697, but soon supplanted by the elector of Saxony. He died at Paris 1709, aged 45. His grandson Lewis Francis was distinguished in the wars of Italy and Flanders, and died at Paris, 2d August 1776, aged 59.

CONTO-PERTANA, Don Joseph, a Portuguese poet, of great merit, and inferior only to Camoens. His Quitterie la Sainte, is a valuable epic poem. He died at Lisbon 1735.

CONYBEARE, John, a learned English prelate, born at Pinhoe, near Exeter, 31st January 1692. He was educated at Exeter grammar college, and Exeter college, of which he became fellow, and afterwards tutor. In 1730 he was appointed rector of his college, and on the same year he published, by the advice of bishop Gibson, an answer to Tindal's christianity as old as the creation, which proved him to be not only a great champion in the cause of revelation, but an able and acute scholar, and sound divine. In 1732 he was appointed dean of Christ church, and in 1750 he succeeded Butler in the see of Bristol. He did not however long enjoy this new dignity, as he was a great martyr to the gout, under which he at last sunk 13th July 1755. He was buried in Bristol cathedral. Two volumes of his excellent sermons were published after his death.

COOK, James, a celebrated navigator, born at Marton in Cleveland, near Great Ayton, Yorkshire, and christened 3d November 1728. His father was a poor cottager, who afterwards was employed as a hind or upper servant on the farms of Thomas Skottowe esquire at Great Ayton, where his son was engaged in the labor of the plough till the age of 13, when he acquired some knowledge of arithmetic and figures at the village school. At the age of 17 young Cook was bound apprentice for four years to a grocer at Snaith, but his fondness for the sea overturned his father's plans, and after one year and a half's service the indentures were cancelled by the kindness of his master, and in July 1746 he was bound for three years in the service of Mr. Walker a ship owner at Whitby. He was thus engaged to the great satisfaction of his employer in the coasting and coal trade, till 1752, when he was made mate of one of Walker's vessels, and the next year he quitted his master's service, though he was offered the command of one of his ships, and entered on board the Eagle, a king's frigate of 28 or 30 guns, being desirous, as he said, "to try his fortune that way." Between 1753 and 1760, when he received a lieutenant's commission, he was successfully employed in improving himself and storing his mind with that knowledge of navigation and mathematics, which he afterwards displayed in so remarkable a degree. The skill, firmness, and ability which he showed while employed in America and on the Jamaica station, recommended him, not only to the notice of sir William Burnaby the commander, but to the approbation of the admiralty, and when in 1767 the royal society insisted on the propriety of observing the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, from some of the islands of the pacific ocean, lieutenant Cook was appointed to command the ship Endeavour in that new and distant expedition. He was in consequence raised to the rank of captain, and sailed down the river on the 30th July, accompanied in this important voyage by sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Solander, and Mr. Green. On the 13th April 1769, he reached Otaheite, where the observations were directed to be made, and after remaining there till 13th July, he set sail for New Zealand, and after discovering several islands he reached Batavia 10th October 1770. After losing many of his men in this horrid climate, where he was obliged to remain till the 27th December for the repairs of his ship, he proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope, and anchored in the Downs on the 12th June, after an absence of nearly three years. The great abilities which captain Cook had evinced in this expedition recommended him to the command of the two ships intended to explore the coasts of the supposed southern hemisphere. On the 9th of April 1772 he sailed from Deptford on board the Resolution with captain Furneaux, who had the command of the other ship, the Adventure. They reached the Cape of Good Hope 30th October, and leaving it on the 22d November they proceeded towards the south, in pursuit of discovery. The vast fields of ice which however presented themselves in those southern latitudes, and the imminent dangers to which they hourly exposed the ships, convinced the captain that no land was to be found, and that further attempts were not only useless but perilous, and therefore on the 17th January 1773, he sailed towards the south sea, and on the 21st March 1774 returned to the Cape, and reached England on the 14th of July. During this dangerous voyage of three years and 18 days,

18 days, the captain lost only one man in his crew of 118, though he navigated in various climates from 52 degrees north to 71 degrees south. The discoveries of islands in the southern seas had now engaged the attention of the nation, and another project was formed to find out a northwest passage, and thus unite the great pacific ocean with the north of the atlantic. On this occasion Cook, again eager to serve his country and advance the knowledge of geography, bid adieu to his domestic comforts, and a third time with ardent zeal embarked to surround the world. He set sail in the Discovery in July 1776, and after visiting several of the islands of the pacific ocean, he penetrated towards the north, explored the unknown coasts of western America, and turned back only when his further progress was impeded by vast fields and floating islands of ice. Unable, in consequence of the advanced season, to go further, he visited the Sandwich islands, and stopped at Owyhee, where he unfortunately lost his life. During the night the Indians carried away the Discovery's cutter, and Cook, determined to recover it, adopted the same measures which on similar occasions he had successfully pursued, and he seized the king of the island, to confine him on board his ship till restoration of the vessel was made. In the struggle which took place, the captain and his men were assailed by the Indians, who viewed with resentment the captivity of their monarch, and before he could reach the boat Cook received a severe blow on the head which brought him to the ground, and unable alone to resist a multitude of savage foes, while his men in the boat and on the shore seemed intent in defending themselves, he was overpowered by the strokes of his assailants. His body was treated with savage barbarity, and a few bones were recovered which his mourning and disconsolate companions committed to the deep. This melancholy event happened on the 14th February 1779. The account of the death of this worthy navigator was received with general sorrow. The services which he had rendered his country, the humanity which he had always showed in his intercourse with the Indians, and the benevolence and concern with which he watched over the health of his men, duly entitled him to universal respect. Soon after his departure the royal society voted him a golden medal, with the most honorable and most deserved testimony of their esteem and gratitude; and though he had not the happiness to receive, before his death, this proof of public affection, yet posterity views and records with admiration and reverence the homage due to the merits of a great and a good man. Cook left by his wife, who long survived him, several children. On the widow the king bestowed a pension of 200l. and on each of the children 25l. a reward scarce adequate to the many and immortal services of the father. Cook, though cradled in poverty, yet improved himself by diligence and assiduous labor. He possessed great natural abilities, and they were not abused; but reading, meditation and severe application rendered them not only respectable but shining. Of his first voyage the account was compiled by Dr. Hawkesworth, perhaps not with sufficient justice. George Forster son of Dr. Forster, was the narrator of the second voyage, and as he had shared the adventures of the naval hero, his relation must be considered not only as accurate but very interesting. Among the compilers of the last voyage men of ability and reputation are mentioned, especially Dr. Douglas bishop of Salisbury, captain King who was one of the officers in the expedition, and Mr. Anderson. The principal islands discovered by Cook were New Caledonia, New Georgia, Sandwich-land, and other less important places, and thus by his labors and perseverance he established the non-existence of a southern continent and the impracticability of a northern passage between the pacific and atlantic oceans.

Cooke, sir Anthony, was born at Gidding-hall, Essex, about 1506. As his name is not mentioned by Wood, it is probable that he was educated at Cambridge. He so distinguished himself by his learning, and the respectability of his character, that he was thought worthy to preside over the education of the young king, Edward VI. In Mary's reign he lived in exile; but he returned under Elizabeth, and died at his seat 1576. His daughters were all happy in their matrimonial connections. Mildred married lord Burleigh; Anne, sir Nicholas Bacon; Elizabeth, sir John Russel, son of the earl of Bedford; and Catharine, sir Henry Killigrew.

Cooke, Robert, was born at Beeston, Yorkshire, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, where he became proctor of the university. He was an able divine and a good scholar, well skilled in the knowledge of ecclesiastical history. He retired upon the vicarage of Leeds, in Yorkshire, and died in 1614.

Cooke, Thomas, a poet, born at Braintree, Essex, about 1707, and educated at Felsted school. In his 19th year he edited Andrew Marvel's works, and, by an elegant dedication, introduced himself to the knowledge and patronage of lord Pembroke, who not only esteemed him, but even assisted him with valuable notes in his translation of Hesiod, published in 1728. Cooke translated besides, Terence, and Cicero de natura deorum, and the Amphitryon of Plautus. He wrote also five or six pieces for the stage, which, however, gained him neither fame nor money. He was concerned with Mottley in writing Penelope, a farce, which being considered as throwing ridicule on Pope's Odyssey, just then published, greatly irritated the poet, who in consequence of this gave Cooke a respectable place in the Dunciad. Cooke died very poor, about 1750. Some memoirs of him were published by the late sir Joseph Mawbey, in the Gentleman's magazine.

COOPER, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, was born 22d July 1621, at Winton St. Giles's, Dorsetshire. He studied for two years at Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Lincoln's-inn, where for some time he applied himself to the law. He was member for Tewkesbury in the parliament of 1640; and at the beginning of the civil wars he seemed inclined to favor the side of the king. He however retired in disgust from Oxford, and soon after took a commission in the parliamentary army. In 1645 he was sheriff for Norfolk, and the next year for Wilts; and he afterwards, as member of the house of commons, had the boldness to charge Cromwell with tyranny and arbitrary government. The opposition which he had manifested against the usurpation rendered him a fit person to solicit the king's return, and he accordingly was one of the twelve who carried the invitation of the commons. On the restoration, his services services were rewarded with a peerage, he was sworn a privy counsellor, and made chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the lords of the treasury. In 1672 he was raised to the dignity of lord chancellor; which, however, he resigned the following year, by the intrigues of his enemies, and especially of James duke of York. From a partizan of the court, he now became a violent opponent; and the eloquence of his speeches, and the firmness of his conduct, had such effect, that the earl of Danby was unable to carry the test bill, and other measures, through parliament, which the government recommended; and a prorogation followed. On the meeting again of parliament, Shaftesbury, with others, insisted that the house was dissolved; and so offended was the king, that he sent him, together with Buckingham, Salisbury, and Wharton, to the Tower, where he remained for thirteen months. When set at liberty his opposition did not cease; and at last a change of ministry placed him at the head of the council board. This triumph was short. The duke of York was so enraged at the measures which Shaftesbury had pursued in recommending the exclusion bill, that he not only procured his dismissal from office, but obtained his being committed, for high treason, to the Tower. After four months' confinement he was tried, and acquitted; but so sensible was he of the power and injustice of his enemies, that he fled from their persecution, in 1682, and reached Holland, where he proposed to end his days in peace and retirement. His days, however, were shortened by the attack of the gout, which fell on his stomach. He died 22d January 1683, aged 62. His remains were conveyed to Winborne, where a handsome monument, erected by his great-grandson, records his character. Shaftesbury was a man of no steady principles, of great ambition, and little political fidelity. Charles II. who not only said, but bore with great good humour, sallies of raillery, once talking to him of his amours, told him, "I believe, Shaftesbury, thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions." "May it please your majesty," replied Shaftesbury, with a grave face, "of a subject, I believe I am." At which the merry king laughed heartily. Shaftesbury at one time aspired to the dignity of king of Poland; and in consequence of his fickleness in his political connections, he was not improperly called Shiftsbury, and not Shaftesbury. He married three wives. By the second only he had issue; an only son, Anthony, born 1651, January 16, who was the father of the personage next to be mentioned.

COOPER, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, known as the author of the Characteristics, was born February 26, 1671, at Exeter-house, London. He was educated under the eye of his grandfather, who placed about him a person who was well versed in the learned languages, so that at the age of 11 he could read Latin and Greek with great ease and fluency. In 1686 he began his travels, and highly improved himself in Italy and France in the acquisition of every polite accomplishment. He was member for Poole in the parliament of 1694; but he declined sitting at the succeeding election, on account of his health. He then passed over into Holland, where, under an assumed name, in the company of le Clerc, Bayle, and other ingenious men, he spent a year, in the most perfect friendship and all the ease of literary intercourse. On his return into England he succeeded to the earldom of Shaftesbury; but he valued little the acquisition of a seat in the house of lords, where he seldom appeared. The enthusiastic extravagance of the French prophets about this time began to engage the attention of the nation; and Shaftesbury, who dreaded the evils of persecution, published his letter concerning enthusiasm, addressed to lord Somers. In 1709 he married a daughter of Thomas Ewer esq. of Lee, Herts, by whom he had one son. The precarious state of his health, which was always delicate, induced him to remove to a warmer climate; and after being about a year in Italy, he died at Naples, 4th February 1713. The 3 volumes of his Characteristics were the only works which he wished to present to the public, of which the most correct edition is that of 1713. His name, however, in literature was so respectable, that his letters to a young man in the university were, in 1716, presented to the public; and in 1721 Toland also published letters from lord Shaftesbury to Robert Moleworth esq. As a philosopher lord Shaftesbury gained high reputation; but his principles were warmly combated by able and indefatigable opponents. Leaving the purer principles of christian doctrine, he, in his admiration for the learning and language of the ancients, regarded the character and the precepts of Socrates and Democritus as more than human, and while he considered man as a political being, under the guidance of a providence, whose government excludes general evil and disorder, he disregarded the important doctrines of revelation and atonement.

COOPER, Maurice Ashley, brother to the author of the Characteristics, translated the Cyropædia, addressed to his sister, the mother of Mr. Harris of Salisbury. This work appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1728, soon after his death, and was highly esteemed, so that a third edition of it was printed in 1770.

COOPER, Thomas, a learned English prelate, born at Oxford 1517, and educated at Magdalen college school. He was elected fellow of the college in 1540. In 1546 he quitted his fellowship, and began to study physic, apprehensive, it is said, of the persecution of queen Mary, as after her death he returned to divinity, and took his degree of D.D. 1567. He was dean of Christ-church about this time, and two years after dean of Gloucester, and the next year, 1570, bishop of Lincoln. In 1584, he was translated to Winchester. When bishop of Lincoln, he had been active against those public exercises called prophesyings, which tended so much to introduce puritanism, and now at Winchester he was equally zealous against the catholics, who were both numerous and powerful. He died at Winchester April 1694, and was buried in the cathedral. He has been greatly commended by Wood, Harrington, and others, for his great learning, eloquence, gravity, and holiness of life. His writings are, chronicles from the 17th year after Christ to 1560—thesaurus linguæ Romanæ et Britannicæ, a work highly patronized by queen Elizabeth—and dictionarum historicum poeticum, &c.—an exposition of the chapters read in the Sunday service—admonition to the people of England—besides sermons, &c.

COOPER, Samuel, an English painter, born in London 1609. He was bred under his uncle Hoskins, but he gained so much from the works of Vandyck, that he was called Vandyck in little. His chief excellence was in the representation of the features of the head. His works were highly esteemed on the continent; and he was intimately acquainted with the most celebrated painters of his age abroad. The king of France paid great attention to him when at Paris; but he could not obtain his Oliver Cromwell, though he offered £150 for it. His best pieces were, O. Cromwell and one Swingfield. He died in London 1672, aged 63, and was buried in St. Pancras' church. His elder brother, Alexander, was equally known as a limner. He went over to Sweden, and became painter to queen Christina.

COOPER, John Gilbert, esq. born at Thurganton, Nottinghamshire, was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He married miss Wright, daughter of the recorder of Leicester, and resided on his family seat, where he died April 1769, after a long and tedious illness, arising from the stone. His chief work is his life of Socrates, in which he was assisted by his friend Mr. Jackson of Leicester. He wrote besides remarks on Warburton's edition of Pope's works, and translated the Ver Ver of Gresset. His other works are, letters on taste,—a father's advice to his son,—some papers in "the world,"—and some fugitive pieces in Dodsley's collection.

COOPER, Miles, Dr. minister of the episcopal chapel, Edinburgh, was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and became president of the college of New York. He died at Edinburgh 1st May 1785. He published a volume of poems, besides a sermon preached at Oxford in 1777, on the origin of civil government.

COOTE, sir Eyre, an English general, born in 1726. He devoted himself to the profession of arms, and served in the king's troops in the rebellion of 1745. In 1754 he left Ireland, for India, where he distinguished himself at the reduction of Hughley and Chandanagore, at the battle of Plassey, and the siege of Pondicherry. This last place, after an obstinate siege, though defended by Lally, yielded to the English, and thus fell the French power in the east. The services of colonel Coote were handsomely acknowledged by the East India company, who voted him a diamond-hilted sword, value £700. In 1770 he was appointed commander in chief in the company's settlements; but resigned the office in consequence of a dispute with the governor at Madras. On his return to England he was invested with the order of the bath, and made governor of Fort St. George in Scotland; and on the death of general Clavering he went again to the east as commander in chief. In July 1781 he, with only 10,000 men, defeated Hyder's army, consisting of 150,000 men, and obtained further successes over this active and formidable enemy. The weak state of sir Eyre's health did not prevent his taking the field again, in 1783; but he sunk under his complaints, and, two days after his arrival at Madras, he died 26th April 1783. His remains were brought to England, and buried in Rockwood church, Hants, 14th September 1784. The East India Company have erected a monument to his memory in Westminster abbey.

COOTWICH, John, a doctor of laws, of Utrecht, known for his travels into the East, and for the account of it which he published, called travels into Jerusalem and Syria, in Latin, 4to. 1619, containing many curious particulars.

COPERNICUS, Nicholas, a celebrated astronomer, born at Thorn, in Prussia, 19th January 1472. He studied the learned languages at home, and applied to philosophy and physic at Cracovia. In his 23d year he set out for Italy, in search of knowledge; and so great was his reputation, that on his arrival at Rome he was appointed professor of mathematics. After some years' absence he returned home, and began to apply the vast knowledge which he possessed to the examination and correction of the Ptolemaic system, then universally adopted and followed. The opinions of preceding philosophers were weighed with accuracy and judgment; but of all the systems of ancient times none pleased the illustrious mathematician so much as that of Pythagoras, for its beauty, simplicity, and ease. In his 35th year, Copernicus bent all the powers of his mind to this intricate subject; and after twenty years' laborious study, the cycles and epicycles of former astronomers were removed from the machine of the universe, and the sun was nobly and independently placed in the center, to illumine and govern the whole. But though convinced of the truth of his hypothesis, the philosopher yet dreaded the bigotry and persecution of the times. His work lay long concealed, till the importunities of his friends prevailed upon him to publish; but a few hours after the first copy was brought to him, he was seized with a violent effusion of blood, which terminated his life 24th May 1543, in his 70th year. This truly great man, who to the extensive knowledge of a comprehensive mind united the mild virtues and the innocence of private life, was canon of Worms; an appointment which he obtained from his mother's brother, Wazelerodius, the bishop of the place. Copernicus was not only a mathematician, but a painter, and it is said that by the help of a looking-glass he drew an excellent picture of himself.

COPPA, Cavalier, a disciple and imitator of Guido, who died 1665, aged 70.

COQ, Peter le, a French ecclesiastic, born at Ifs, near Caen, 29th March 1728. He became superior of the Eudistes, and remarkable for his piety, learning, and modesty. He wrote letters on ecclesiastical discipline, 12mo.—treatise on funds—on different kinds of property—on the usury of commercial loans, &c. He died of a paralytic stroke, 1st September 1777.

COQUES, Gonzalo, a Flemish painter, who died 1684, aged 66. He successfully imitated Vandyck, and particularly excelled in historical conversations. He acquired both riches and reputation, and his pieces in his lifetime were eagerly sought by the princes of Germany, and by Charles I. A very remarkable clearness of color appeared in the heads and hands of his pictures.

CORAM, captain Thomas, was born about 1668, and bred to the sea. From seeing many children exposed, his humanity prompted him to relieve them; and to him we are indebted for the Foundling hospital, for which, after seventeen years' benevolent attention, he obtained a charter. His charitable views were extended to America: he established a place for the education of Indian girls, and thus paved the way for a reconciliation between the natives and the settlers. His disregard for private economy, whilst engaged in public good, at last reduced his circumstances so much, that he lived on the benevolent contributions of his his friends, at the head of whom appeared Frederic prince of Wales. He died in London 20th March 1751, aged 84, and was, according to his desire, buried in the Foundling chapel.

CORAS, John de, a native of Realmont, who became public professor of law at Toulouse at the age of 18. He was afterwards professor at Angers, Orleans, Paris, Padua, and Ferrara, and then returned to Toulouse, and became counsellor of the parliament, and chancellor to the queen of Navarre. He was imprisoned for his adherence to the protestant religion, and orders were sent from the king to put him to death; but while the parliament resisted the arbitrary mandate, some assassins broke into the prison, and murdered him, with above 200 other prisoners, 1572. He wrote various works on civil law, which were published together, Lyons, 1558, 2 vols. fol.

CORAS, James de, author of the life of the preceding, was a native of Toulouse, and author of Jonah and Nineveh penitent, a poem, of little merit. He died 1677. His works appeared in 1665, 12mo.

CORBET, John, a native of Gloucester, educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He obtained the living of Bramshot, in Hampshire, from which he was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity. He died of the stone, in London, 1680. He is author of an historical relation of the military government of Gloucester during the rebellion, 4to. besides self-employment in secret, 12mo. 1681, a work of merit. He was a zealous nonconformist, and had once, at Chichester, a warm debate with bishop Gunning, on conformity, which ended without mutual conviction.

CORBET, Richard, an English poet and divine, born at Ewell, in Surrey, and educated at Westminster school and Christ church, Oxford, of which he became dean, in 1620, by the favor of king James. In 1629 he was made bishop of Oxford, and in 1632 translated to Norwich. He died 28th July 1635, and was buried in the cathedral of Norwich. After his death, his poems were published, under the title of Poetica stromata, 1648, 8vo. and another edition 1672, 12mo.

CORBULO, Domitius, a Roman general, who carried arms against the Parthians, and placed Tigranes on the Armenian throne. He destroyed himself when he heard that Nero, envious of his glory, had ordered his assassination, A.D. 67.

CORDAY D'ARMANS, Mary Anne Charlotte, a native of St. Saturnin, near Seez, in Normandy, of respectable parents. She was brought up at Caen, where her beauty and accomplishments were seen and admired by Belfunce, the major of a regiment quartered in the town. The death of this worthy favorite, who was murdered by some assassins, excited the vengeance of the youthful heroine, and when she saw her lover branded with the name of conspirator, in a paper published by Marat, she hastened to Paris, determined to sacrifice to her resentment the man who had so shamefully abused the object of her affections, and had defended the condemnation of the deputies of merit and virtue in the convention. She was refused admittance at the house of Marat; but she obtained it by writing a letter, in which she informed him that she wished to disclose some secret of importance; and while the tyrant was engaged in conversation with her, she stabbed him to the heart, and he fell at her feet.

Undismayed, and glorying in the deed, she refused to fly, and was dragged to the abbaye, and then to the revolutionary tribunal, where she heard the sentence of condemnation with tranquil composure. The serenity and dignity of her features were so commanding, as she walked to the scaffold, that Adam Lux, a deputy from Mayenne, captivated by her beauty, requested of the bloody tribunal to follow her to death; and he had the singular satisfaction of expiring by the same guillotine. Charlotte suffered July 1793. She was 24 years and 9 months old; and it is said that by the female line she was descended from Peter Corneille.

CORDEMOI, Geraud de, a French academician, and a great partizan of Descartes' system. He was reader to the dauphin; and died 8th October 1684, at an advanced age. He wrote a general history of France, during the two first races of kings, besides some metaphysical and other tracts, 4to. His son Lewis Geraud was abbot of Femieres monastery. He wrote some controversial pieces, and assisted his father in his history of France. He died 1722.

CORDUS, Aulus Gremontius, a Roman, author of a history of the civil wars of Rome, much commended by Tacitus and Seneca. He destroyed himself when he heard that Sejanus meditated his death, by a false accusation before Tiberius.

CORDUS, Euricius, a German physician and poet, who died at Bremen 24th December 1535. He was intimate with Erasmus and other learned men. His Latin poems appeared at Leyden 1623, in 8vo. He wrote also botanologia, and some medical treatises.

CORDUS, Valerius, son of the preceding, was born at Hesse Cassel 1515. He devoted himself to the learned languages, but particularly to the study of botany. He traversed the mountains in Germany, and visited Padua, Pisa, and Florence; but receiving a dreadful kick from a horse, he died in consequence of it, at Rome, 1554, aged 29. He published remarks on Dioscorides, 1561, fol.—historia stirpium, 2 vols. fol.—dispensator. pharmacor. omnium, 12mo. He was as respectable in private as in public life.

CORELLI, Arcangelo, a famous musician, born at Fusignano, near Bologna, in 1653. He preferred secular to ecclesiastical music, and was so fond of the violin, that he was considered as the first performer on it in the world. After visiting the north of Europe, and receiving the applauses which his merit deserved, in the German courts, after five years' absence, he returned to Rome, where he was patronized by cardinal Ottoboni. He died at Rome 1713, aged nearly 60, and was buried in the Pantheon. He left his property, amounting to about £6000, and his large collection of pictures, to his great patron, who, with becoming benevolence, bestowed all the money on the relations of the deceased. Corelli is considered as the author of new and original harmonies, in a stile noble, elegant, and pathetic.

CORINNA, a Greek poetess, called the Lyric muse, from her obtaining five times the prize over Pindar.

CORIO, Bernardine, an historian of Milan, born in 1460. He was employed by Lewis Sforza to write the history of his country; but when the Milanese was over-run by the French, and himself taken prisoner, he died of grief, in 1500. His history is much esteemed. The best edition edition is that of Paris, 1646, 4to. His nephew Charles wrote a "portrait of the city of Milan."

CORIOIANUS, Caius Marcius, a celebrated Roman general, who, when disgraced by his countrymen, fled to Tullus king of the Volsci, whose armies he led against Rome. His wife and mother interfered, and at their request he marched back; in consequence of which he was murdered by Tullus, B.C. 488.

CORNARIUS, or HAGUENBOT, John, a German physician, born at Zwickow, in Saxony. He early distinguished himself as a scholar; and when a licentiate in medicine, he rejected the prescriptions of the Arabian physicians, and restored the mode practised by the Greeks. He was fifteen years engaged in translating the works of Hippocrates, Ætius, &c. He practised with great success at Frankfort, Marburg, Jena, &c. and died of an apoplexy 1558, aged 58. He wrote some medical tracts, besides translating some of the fathers.

CORNARO, Lewis, a noble Venetian, known for his great age. He died at Padua 1565, more than 100 years old. He wrote a treatise on the advantages of a temperate life, in his 81st year; and in this valuable little book he ingeniously confesses the irregularities of his younger years, and recommends to his youthful inquirers, at whose request he had undertaken the work, the practice of regularity and temperance, by which he enjoyed all the comforts of lively spirits and uninterrupted health. In his reformed mode of living, he never took more than 12 ounces of food and 14 of wine. He wrote besides a treatise on waters, especially the Lagunes, near Venice. His wife nearly equalled him in longevity.

CORNARO, Helena Lucretia, a learned Venetian lady, who was educated at the university of Padua, where she took her degrees, and was made a doctor, and received the title of unalterable. At Rome she was admitted at the university, and was intitled the humble. She made a vow of perpetual celibacy, that she might with more intense application devote herself to literary pursuits; and so great was the reputation of her learning, that the most illustrious characters who travelled through Venice were more anxious to see her than all the curiosities of the city. Her great application brought on infirmity and disease, and hastened her death, which happened in 1685, in her 38th year. Her death was recorded by poetical effusions from the learned of Europe, and a magnificent funeral solemnity was performed in her honor at Rome. An eloquent oration was also pronounced, in which she was celebrated as triumphing over three monsters, pride, luxury, and ignorance. She wrote nothing, though capable to instruct and improve mankind by her pen.

CORNAZZANI, Anthony, a native of Placentia, in the 15th century. He wrote the lives of the Virgin Mary and Jesus Christ, in verse, besides sonnets, of some merit; and died at Ferrara.

CORNEILLE, Peter, a celebrated French poet, born at Rouen, June 6, 1606. He was brought up to the bar; but he soon abandoned it as a profession not congenial to his genius. His first play was Melite, a comedy, which originated in an affair of gallantry; but so great was its popularity, during those degenerate days of the French age, that Corneille was encouraged to contribute more liberally to the public amusement. His next piece was Medea, a tragedy; and, after many others, appeared the Cid, in 1637, his chef d'œuvre, a tragedy, which drew against him the persecution and obloquy of rival wits and unsuccessful poets, among whom was even cardinal Richelieu himself, though he had granted a pension to the author. Corneille was chosen member of the French academy in 1647; and he died 1684, aged 79. He was a man of great merit in private life, liberal, humane, and devout, and rather of a melancholy turn of mind. His poetical works are among the sublimest effusions of the French muse.

CORNEILLE, Thomas, a French poet, brother to the preceding. He was member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions. Though inferior to his brother, yet his plays possessed merit. They were published with those of his brother, Paris, 1758, in 11 vols. 12mo. He translated also Ovid's metamorphoses, and some of the epistles,—and wrote remarks on Vaugelas—a dictionary of arts, 2 vols. fol.—an universal geographical dictionary, 3 vols. folio. He died at Andeli 1709, aged 84.

CORNEILLE, Michael, a painter, born at Paris 1642. He was honored, in consequence of obtaining a prize, with the king's pension, and travelled to Rome, where he greatly improved himself. He studied particularly the antique, in which he equalled the Caracci. He was, however, deficient in coloring. On his return to Paris he was made professor of the academy, and his pencil was employed in adorning the noble edifices of Versailles and Trianon. He died at Paris 1708. His brother, John Baptist, was also an eminent artist, and member of the academy.

CORNELIA, a Roman lady, daughter of the elder Scipio Africanus, and wife of Sempronius Gracchus. She devoted herself to the education of her two sons, Tiberius and Caius, who alone survived of the twelve children she had had; and when they were sacrificed to the public resentment she bore their loss with Spartan fortitude.

CORNELISZ, Lucas, a painter of Leyden, who became chief painter to Henry VIII. of England. The portraits of the constables of Queenborough-castle, by him, from Edward III. to his time, are preserved at Penshurst, in Kent.

CORNELISZ, James, a Dutch painter, of the 16th century. His picture on the descent from the cross, preserved in the old church, Amsterdam, is much admired.

CORNELISZ, Cornelius, of Haerlem, was eminent as a painter. His deluge is much celebrated.

CORNELIUS, bishop of Rome, after Fabian, 251, in opposition to Novatian. This produced a schism; but under the persecution of Gallus, Cornelius was banished, and died soon after, 252.

CORNETO, Adrian, an Italian ecclesiastic, sent as legate by Innocent VII. to Henry VII. who bestowed on him the bishoprics of Hereford and Bath and Wells. He afterwards was employed as legate in France, and was made a cardinal by Alexander VI. The pope, who knew and dreaded his abilities, determined to poison him at a supper; but fell himself a victim to his own diabolical purposes. Corneto left Rome on the succession of Julius II.

Julius II. but though recalled by Leo X. he again soon after went into exile, where he died. He was author of a learned treatise de sermone latino—& de verâ philosophiâ—a poem on the chace, &c. and deserves to be mentioned with respect, as one of the zealous restorers of the purity of the Latin language.

CORNUTUS, a grammarian and philosopher of merit, tutor to the poet Persius. He was put to death by Nero, A.D. 44.

CORNWALLIS, fr Charles, second son of sir W. Cornwallis, was a man of superior abilities, employed by James I. as his ambassador in Spain. He wrote the life of Henry prince of Wales, to whom he had been secretary; and died about 1630. His son William wrote some essays, printed 1632, 8vo.

CORNWALLIS, Charles marquis, an English general, born 31st December 1738. He early devoted himself to the military profession, and in 1758 obtained a captain's commission in the light infantry. In 1761 he became aid-de-camp to the marquis of Granby, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and went to Germany till the conclusion of the campaign. He succeeded in 1762 his father in the earldom of Cornwallis, and three years after was made aid-de-camp to the king, and one of the lords of the bed chamber. He obtained the 33d regiment of foot in 1766, and two years after married miss Jones, a lady of large fortune, who died of a broken heart, when unable to dissuade him from his attendance in the campaigns against the Americans. In the new world he displayed great spirit; but whilst he labored for the subjection of the rebellious colonies, he treated the people with humanity. The seizure of Philadelphia by his forces was followed by the reduction of South Carolina, and by the defeat of general Gates, with an inferior force; but these advantages were tarnished by the surrender of the whole army at York-town, 1781, to the united forces of America and France. Though this event proved so disastrous to the British interests in America, lord Cornwallis was never blamed for want of courage, prudence, or sagacity; but the gallant conduct he had at all times shown in this unfortunate war recommended him to the ministry, in 1790, as the fittest person to fill the government of British India. The fall of Bengalore was quickly followed by the defeat of Tippoo, who at last consented to make peace with the conquerors, by yielding a great part of his dominions, and by putting his two sons into the hand of the general, in proof of his sincerity. Lord Cornwallis, after a mild and vigorous administration in India, returned to Europe, and was for his services created a marquis, and made master-general of the ordnance. His next employment was in the civil and military government of Ireland, where he had the felicity to destroy rebellion, to capture an invading enemy in the very bosom of the country, and, by the wisest and most temperate measures, to restore confidence and harmony, where distrust, mutual hatred, and secret violence, had long reigned with impunity. After completing the union between the two kingdoms, lord Cornwallis returned to England, soon to negotiate the short-lived peace of Amiens. In 1805 he was prevailed upon to accept again the government of India, where the strong and pacific measures of his former administration were so much required. He was no sooner arrived at Calcutta than, without recovering from the effects of his voyage, he set out on a visit to the northern provinces, where his presence was necessary. Confinement in a boat, without regular exercise, and the heat of the weather, produced such debility that he was at last obliged to stop at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares, above 1000 miles above Calcutta, where he expired 5th October 1805. His remains were interred at Ghazepore, and every mark of respect paid to his memory, not only by the British, but by the natives of India, who regarded him as a humane and benevolent governor. His lordship left a son and a daughter.

CORONEL, Paul, a native of Segovia, professor at Salamanca. His great abilities were employed by cardinal Ximenes in the publication of his polyglott bible. He died about 1524.

CORONELLI, Vincent, a Venetian geographer, made, in 1685, cosmographer to the French king. He founded an academy of cosmography at Venice, where he died 1718. He published above 400 geographical charts, &c. and other works, much valued.

CORRADINI, Peter Marcellinus, a learned civilian and cardinal, born at Sezza, in 1658. He was the favorite of pope Clement XI. and wrote a curious work, vetus Latium profanum et sacrum, 2 vols. fol. and a history of Sezza, in 4to. He died at Rome 1743.

CORRADUS, Sebastian, a grammarian and professor of belles lettres of Bologna, died 1556. He wrote quæsturâ que Ciceronis vita refertur,—& de linguâ Latinâ.

CORREGIO, Antonio da, a celebrated painter, born at Corregio, a town near Modena. Vid. ALLEGRI.

CORROZET, Giles, a bookseller, who died at Paris 15th June, 1568, aged 58. He wrote various things, which possessed merit.

CORSINI, Edward, a monk, born at Fanano 1702. He died of an apoplexy at Pisa in 1765, where he was professor of philosophy. He was a man of great erudition and of astonishing perseverance. He published some valuable works in criticism, philology, and literature; the chief are, philosophical and mathematical institutions, 6 vols. 8vo.—a course of geometrical elements, 2 vols. 8vo.—the fasti of the archons of Athens, 4 vols. 4to.—a course of metaphysics—the history of the university of Pisa—dissertation on the games of Greece, &c.

CORT, Cornelius, an eminent engraver, born at Hoorn, in Holland, 1536. He travelled into Italy, and at Venice saw and assisted the celebrated Titian. He settled at Rome, where he died 1578, aged 42. His engravings are excellent, the very best ever produced in Holland. They amount, according to Marolles, to 151.

CORTESI, William, a French painter, born at Franche Comté. He studied at Rome, and was employed and liberally rewarded by Alexander VIII. He died 1679, aged 51.

CORTESI, Giovanna, a paintress of Florence, who died 1736, aged 66. Her miniatures are greatly admired.

CORTEZ, Ferdinand, the conqueror of Mexico, was born of a respectable family at Medellin in Estramadura 1485. He quitted the study of belles lettres, and of the law, for the profession of arms, and, fired with the adventurous spirit which animated his country, he in 1504 went

went to Hispaniola where one of his relations was governor. In an expedition to Cuba in 1511, he displayed such bravery, that Velasquez the governor entrusted him with the command of the fleet which was destined to make new discoveries on the continent. On the 18th November 1518 the new commander set sail from San-Jago, in Cuba, with 11 small vessels, on board of which were embarked 617 men, soldiers and sailors, with 18 horses and 10 field pieces, but only 13 firelocks. With this small force he landed at Tabasco, which he took after a dreadful slaughter of the inhabitants, and afterwards advancing to St. Juan de Ulva, he was met by the ambassadors of Montezuma, the king of Mexico, who by entreaties and presents earnestly solicited him to cease from his enterprize, and not penetrate into the country. Cortez knew the terror which his arms inspired; the fire of his artillery was compared to the thunder of the heavens, the horses on which the Spaniards rushed to the battle were unknown and irresistible monsters, and the huge vessels which, floating on the bosom of the ocean, had brought these strangers, were all such extraordinary objects in the eyes of the terrified and superstitious Indians, that the Spaniards were regarded as more than human beings. After building a small fort at Vera-Cruz, and burning his ships that he might inspire his followers with confidence, Cortez advanced through the provinces to the capital of Mexico, supported by the co-operation of the Zempoallans and other tribes which were dissatisfied with the government of Montezuma. With only 500 men badly armed, and 15 horses, he defeated the Tlascalans, who presumed to dispute his progress, and after rewarding the hospitality of the inhabitants of Cholula with rapine and slaughter, the conqueror presented himself at the gates of Mexico. He was received with great pomp and every mark of friendship by Montezuma, but though treated with confidence, Cortez acted with duplicity, and seizing the person of the unsuspecting monarch, he compelled him in the rigor of confinement to acknowledge himself the vassal of the crown of Spain. Thus absolute in Mexico, Cortez soon heard that Velasquez, jealous of his glory, had sent an expedition under Narvaez, to bring him back in chains to Cuba; but no ways dismayed at the intelligence, he left one of his officers, Alvarado, governor of the capital, and hastened back to Vera Cruz. With the sagacity of an intrepid soldier he surprised and defeated Narvaez, and by his conciliating conduct he had the art to convert his enemies into friends, and to return to Mexico supported by those who had come to destroy his hopes. During his absence Alvarado had been guilty of excesses towards the natives, and instead of submission Cortez found the most determined hostility. Unable by force or by persuasion to quell the tumult, he caused Montezuma, arrayed in his royal robes, to appear before his incensed subjects, but the Mexicans disregarded the interference of their captive monarch, who during the battle received a mortal wound. Yielding to the storm the Spaniards retired from Mexico, and though they had lost the half of their little army they determined on revenge. On his way towards Tlascala, Cortez was met by a large army of the natives, whom he defeated with dreadful slaughter at Otumba, and after recruiting his forces with 550 infantry and 40 horses and a number of allies from Tlascala, and other neighbouring towns, he marched back to Mexico, December 1520. The conquest of Texcoco, the second city of the empire, was followed by the siege of Mexico, which the new sovereign Guatimozin, the nephew of Montezuma, a brave prince, ably defended. The artillery of the Spaniards however prevailed over the feeble weapons of the Indians, and after three months' resistance, Guatimozin was seized in a canoe as he attempted to escape on the lake, and his captivity was followed by the fall of the capital, and the destruction of the Mexican empire. Above 200,000 Indians made their immediate submission to those few bold adventurers; but they were not satisfied with the immense treasures of the plundered city, and the unfortunate monarch was exposed to tortures, that he might confess where the hidden riches of Montezuma were deposited. It was at this dreadful moment when the monarch lay exposed with one of his ministers to the fury of burning coals, that he heard the cry which the poignancy of his sufferings, and not the wish of making a discovery, extorted from his favorite, and looking at him with an air of upbraiding indignation, he exclaimed "what! am I on a bed of roses." Guatimozin was saved from the flames to be shot by his inhuman persecutors, with some of his ministers, on a charge of conspiracy. Master of a populous and opulent empire, Cortez, though cruel and avaricious began to display the character of a prudent and beneficent governor. Mexico which had been destroyed during the siege rose from ruins, and in 1529 assumed the form of the noblest of European cities. But while these successes enlarged the dominions of Spain, the conqueror was an object of envy at home, and he was soon recalled to give an account of his conduct, and after enduring for a while the resentment of his enemies, he had the good fortune to procure the favor of his sovereign, and a grant of new and enlarged powers. When he pressed to Charles V. for an audience, and was asked who he was, the bold adventurer replied, "I am the man who has given you more provinces than your father left you towns." Besides the dignity of marquis, the conqueror of Mexico received the grant of large domains in New Spain, and after visiting his conquests in 1530, and continuing there some years, he returned to Europe, and died in his native country, second December 1554, aged 63. He left several legitimate children, and some besides by his two Indian mistresses, one of whom was a daughter of Montezuma. Great and heroic as the character of Cortez appears, he deserves the execration of posterity for the cruelties which he exercised on the inoffensive natives. It was not only on pretence of extorting their riches that these wretched men were exposed to persecution and death, but the most cruel methods were pursued to convert them to christianity by men who in every action of their life violated the precepts of the gospel. On one occasion sixty caciques and above 400 leading men were committed to the flames, and so horrid were the practices of these fierce conquerors, that as they expired, the Indians indignantly rejected the promises of another and a happier life, when they heard that the regions of paradise were to contain their unfeeling murderers. The best account of the conquests of Cortez, is by Antonio de Solis in Spanish, translated into French two vols. 12mo. 1775, and into English.

CORTEZI, Paul, a learned Italian, born 1465, at St. Geminiano in Tuscany. He was a great patron of literature and learned men, and died bishop of Urbino, 1510, aged 45. He wrote a dialogue on the learned men of Italy, besides other ingenious treatises.

CORTI, Matthew, a native of Pavia, where he was professor of physic, and afterwards at Pisa and Padua. His celebrity recommended him to Clement VII. who appointed him his physician, and after his death, he retired to Bologna, from whence he settled at Pisa, where he died 1544, aged 69. He wrote treatises, de curandis febribus—de venæ sectione, in aliis affectibus & pleuritide, and other works.

CORTICELLI, Salvatore, a monk of Bologna, professor of the belles lettres in St Paul's college there, fellow of the Crusca academy, and provincial of the Barnabite order. Among other works, he published his Italian grammar in 1745, which was universally approved, and particularly noticed by Benedict XIV. his fellow townsman, who observed, in a letter to him, that it was a wonder their native city should speak Italian so ill, and yet teach it so well. He died about 1770.

CORYATE, Thomas, son of a clergyman, born at Odcombe, Somersetshire, 1577, became known for his extravagancies. He studied for three years at Glocester-hall, Oxford, and then was taken into the family of Henry prince of Wales, where he was the whetstone of the wits of those times. In 1608 he travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, &c. and on his return, published an account of his adventures, which he called, Crudities, in 4to. The work was recommended by the verses of Ben Jonson, Harrington, Inigo Jones, Donne, Drayton, and others, and so pleased was the author with his success, that he determined to spend ten years in the visiting of foreign countries. With this intention, he set out in 1612, and after visiting Constantinople, the coasts of Asia Minor, Egypt, and all the Levant, he advanced far into Persia, and the dominions of the great mogul. He was attacked at Surat in the East Indies, by a flux, which carried him off 1617. Coryate was not devoid of understanding; but his affectation, and his great self consequence, exposed him to the ridicule of the wits of the age, and turned the best intentions into levity and contempt. It is unknown what became of his notes and papers. During his absence, some letters, &c. were published as from him, but no regular account of his adventures, in his last travels, has appeared before the public.

COSIERS, John, a painter, born at Antwerp 1603. He was patronised by many crowned heads, and his historical pieces deserved universal commendation.

COSIMO, Andrew and Peter, Italian painters, of whom the first excelled in the claro-obscuro, and the other in ludicrous pieces. Peter died 1521, aged 80, of a paralytic stroke. He was a singular character, very irascible, and very superstitious. He had for his pupils del Sarto and de Sangallo.

COSIN, John, an English prelate, born in Norwich 30th Nov. 1594, and educated at the free school there, and at Caius college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was patronised by Overall, bishop of Lichfield, and after his death by Neal, bishop of Durham, who gave him a prebend, and the rich rectory of Branspeth. His collection of private devotions, drawn up at the request of Charles I. as well as his frequent intercourse with Laud, drew upon him the censures of the puritans, who loudly exclaimed against his popish principles. In 1628 he took his degree of D.D. and in 1634 he was elected master of Peterhouse, and in 1640 he was made dean of Peterborough. The same year a complaint was made against him, in the house of commons, by Smart, a man whom he with others had ejected from his prebend at Durham, for preaching a seditious sermon, and in consequence of this, he was deprived by a vote of the house, of all his ecclesiastical preferments, and 2 years after expelled from the mastership of Peterhouse, because his persecutors suspected him of popish innovations. Upon this he left the kingdom, and during the civil wars resided at Paris, where he officiated as a protestant minister, and was assisted by a small pension from queen Henrietta. At the restoration he was replaced into all his preferments, and the same year raised to the see of Durham. In this elevated situation he employed himself in repairing and beautifying the cathedral and the palace, and in erecting schools and hospitals for the most benevolent purposes. Besides the large endowment which he settled, it is known, that this humane prelate, during the 11 years in which he was at Durham, spent not less than £2000 a year in charitable and pious uses. He died of a pectoral dropfy, 15th Jan. 1672, aged 78, and was buried in the chapel of Bishops' Auland. He left many legacies for charitable purposes by his will. He had one son and four daughters, and he had the misfortune to see his son, in consequence of his education among the Jesuits at Paris, turn catholic; and though he attempted to reclaim him, and even disinherited him, if he persevered in his religious tenets, he never succeeded. The various books which he wrote display much learning, solid judgement, and extensive information. Though he was falsely accused of being a papist, yet he was the friend of magnificence and pomp in the outside of religion, and like all the adherents of Laud's principles, he dwelt much on vain and insignificant ceremonies.

COSME, John Basillac, a feillant friar, who, however, followed his father's profession of surgeon, and became eminent as a lithotomist. His instrument for dividing the neck of the bladder, of which he gave an interesting account in the journal des Savans for 1748, though once much approved by the faculty, is now neglected. His forceps for breaking stones in the bladder was once in general use; and so great was his celebrity as an operator, that the surgeons, through mere jealousy, prevailed upon the French king to banish him. He died at Paris 18th July 1786, aged 79.

COSMO I. son of John de Medici, was born in 1519. When his cousin Alexander was murdered, he had the art to procure his election to the supreme authority of the state; and he behaved with such firmness and sagacity, that all the conspiracies formed against his person and government by the seditious of Florence proved abortive. He assisted the emperor, in 1553, in the reduction of Sienna, which was annexed to his own territories by Philip II. and, in 1569, he was raised by the pope Pius V. to the sovereign title of grand duke of Tuscany. Cosmo, thus successful abroad, and the judicious patron of literature, ture, in the re-establishment of the university of Pisa, and in the promotion of the arts, found himself unhappy in his family. His son John, who was a cardinal, and a man of merit, was, in a hunting party, secretly stabbed by his brother Garcia, who pretended ignorance of the foul deed. The father suspected the inhuman son; and when he confessed it, he, overpowered by a fit of passion, stabbed him with the same dagger which had robbed him of his other son. This tragic scene so affected the mother that she died a few days after, a victim to silent overwhelming grief. Cosmo died 1574, and left several children to uphold the sovereign power which he had so firmly established in Florence.

Cosmo II, grandson of the first Cosmo, succeeded his father Ferdinand, 1609, and during his reign displayed the virtues of a benevolent prince, eager to advance the happiness of his people, to cultivate literature, and promote the fine arts. He died 1621.

Cosmo III. succeeded his father Ferdinand II. as grand duke of Tuscany, 1670. He married the daughter of the duke of Orleans, from whom he was afterwards divorced; and he annexed to his other dignities, with the consent of the emperor and of the pope, the title of royal highness. He is represented as so superstitious that he took orders, at the Roman jubilee, for the privilege of saluting the handkerchief which, according to monkish traditions, our Saviour gave to Veronica, impressed with his own image. Cosmo was, like the princes of his house, a liberal patron of letters, and particularly attached to the study of chemistry. He was one of the richest sovereigns of Europe, and died 1723, after a happy reign of 54 years. His son and successor, John Gaston, died 1737, without issue; and the sovereignty of Florence descended to the queen of Spain, as sprung from the second Cosmo; and she exchanged it with France for the kingdom of the two Sicilies, which was bestowed on her son don Carlos.

COSNAC, Daniel de, a native of Limousin, noticed by the prince of Conti, and raised by his interest to the see of Valence, and afterwards to that of Aix, and other ecclesiastical honors. He died at Aix 1708, aged 81. Though a man of great abilities, he was very deformed in his person.

COSPEAU, Philip, a French prelate, born at Hainaut. He was very eloquent in the pulpit, and substituted to the quotations from the classics more appropriate texts from the bible. He died 1646, aged 78, author of some theological tracts.

COSSART, Gabriel, a native of Pontoise, who died at Paris 18th September 1674, aged 59. He was a Jesuit, and assisted Labbe in his grand collection of councils, which appeared in 1672, in 18 vols. fol. He wrote besides, poetry, &c.

COSSE, Charles de, marshal de Brissac, a celebrated French general, born at Anjou, of a noble family, of Neapolitan descent. He devoted himself to the profession of arms, and distinguished himself in the wars of Italy and Piedmont, and at the siege of Perpignan 1541. His services were noticed and acknowledged by the French king, who sent him as ambassador to Charles V. and afterwards made him, in 1550, marshal of the kingdom, governor of Piedmont, and grand master of the artillery. His valor and sagacity as a general were so conspicuous, that several princes and nobles placed themselves under him as in a school of honor, where the tactics of war, and the evolutions of campaigns, could best be learned. He died at Paris 31st December 1563, aged 57. He was a man of such honor and integrity, that when the government refused to pay the debts contracted by the army, he sold part of his estates to satisfy the just demand.

COSTANZO, Angelo di, born at Naples 1507, after 53 years of perseverance and labor, published an history of his native city in Italian, folio. He was also a poet of some consequence, and his sonnets and other pieces were collected at Venice 1752, in 12mo. He died at a very advanced age, about the year 1590.

COSTA, Christopher, a Portuguese, native of Africa, who devoted himself to botany, and in his travels in Asia was seized by some of the uncivilized natives, and long detained in slavery. On his return to Europe he published an account of Indian plants, &c. translated into Latin by Clusius, &c.

COSTA, Emanuel, a Portuguese lawyer, professor at Salamanca, 1550. His works were published 2 vols. fol.

COSTA, John, professor of the law at Cahors, wrote some notes on Justinian's institutes, and died at Cahors, 13th Aug. 1637.

COSTA, Margaret, an Italian poetess, who published her works at Paris, which she dedicated to cardinal Mazarin.

COSTARD, George, an English scholar, born about 1710. He was fellow and tutor of Wadham college, and in 1764 he obtained the vicarage of Twickenham from the chancellor Northington. He died January 1782, and his books and oriental MSS. were sold by auction, the following March. He wrote 15 different treatises chiefly on astronomical subjects, and on the book of Job. They are enumerated in Nichols' anecdotes of Bowyer, and prove him to have been a man of great learning and extensive information.

COSTE, Peter, a native of Uzez, who fled to England on account of his religion, and died at Paris 1747, at an advanced age. He translated Locke's essay on the human understanding, and on the reasonableness of christianity, and Newton's optics, into French, and wrote besides, the life of the great Condé,—notes on Fontaine's fables and on Montaigne's essays,—and a defence of Bruyère.

COSTER, Lawrence, an inhabitant of Haerlem, supposed by the Dutch to be the inventor of printing, about the year 1430. The best authorities however support that the art of printing was first invented at Mayence, though Meerman of Rotterdam, with great ingenuity and erudition, maintains the claims of his countryman. Coster died 1440.

COSTHA, Ben Luca, a christian philosopher of Balbec in Syria; in the 250th year of the hegira. He translated several Greek books into Arabic, and wrote some original works on physic, astronomy, and mathematics, of which Casiri in his biblioth. arab. de l'escurial has given a catalogue.

COTA, Rodriguez, a native of Toledo, whose tragic-comedia de Calisto & Melibœa has appeared in Latin and French translations. He flourished 1560.

COTELERIUS,

COTELERIUS, John Baptist, a learned Frenchman, born at Nîmes 1627. He very early displayed great abilities, in the knowledge of the learned languages, and at the age of 12 was able to construe the new testament in Greek and the old in Hebrew, with great ease, at the first opening of the book. He was professor of Greek, and member of the Sorbonne. He published the works of all the fathers who lived in the apostolic age, with a new translation and learned notes, 2 vols. fol. 1672. He published besides, monumenta ecclesiæ Græcæ, of which he only completed three volumes before his death. His great application had undermined his constitution, so that he was snatched away, by an inflammatory disorder in his breast, in his 50th year, 10th August 1686. Besides extensive learning, he possessed the amiable virtues of private life; he was modest, unassuming, and devoid of all pride and affectation.

COTES, Roger, an English mathematician and astronomer, born at Burbach, Leicestershire, 10th July 1682. At Leicester school and St. Paul's, London, he was well initiated in classical literature, and at Trinity college, Cambridge, he began early to display that fondness for mathematics which in his earlier years had appeared in his family. He became, in 1705, fellow of his college, and had the tuition of the sons of the marquis of Kent, to whom he was related. In 1706 he was made Plumian professor of astronomy, and in 1713 took orders, and that same year, at the recommendation of Bentley, published Newton's mathematica principia, with the improvements of the author, to which he prefixed an excellent preface. He increased further his astronomical reputation, by his description of the great fiery meteor seen March 16, 1716. This great and rising genius died at the age of 33, on the 5th June 1716, to the regret of the university, and of every lover of science and goodness. He was buried in Trinity chapel. His harmonia mensurarum was published in 1722, 4to. by his successor, Dr. Robert Smith, and also, by the same, his valuable hydrostatical and pneumatical lectures, in 1737.

COTES, Francis, an English painter in oil and crayons. He was pupil to Knapton; and died 1770, aged 45.

COTIN, Charles, a French writer, who died at Paris 1682. He was member of the French academy, was an eloquent preacher, a good scholar, and a respectable prose writer and poet. He is known, however, more for the severity of Boileau and Molier's satires against him, than for his own excellence.

COTOLENDI, Charles, a native of Aix or Avignon, was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and respectable as an author. He translated the Spanish history of Persia into French, 2 vols. 12mo.—the life of Columbus—the life of de Sales—besides dissertations on the works of St. Evremond, and the life of the dukes of Montmorenci.

COTTA, John, a Latin poet, born near Verona. He was made prisoner by the French at the battle of Ghiara d'Adda, in 1509. He died 1511, at Viterbo, of a pestilential fever, aged 28. His epigrams and orations are printed in the carmina quinque poetarum, Venice, 1548, 4to.

COTTE, Robert de, an architect, born at Paris 1657. He was elected director of the royal academy of architeature, and made architect to the king, and intendant of the royal gardens, edifices, &c. His genius was advantageously displayed in adorning the public buildings of Paris, the palaces of Versailles and St. Denys, and the colonade of the Trianon. The chief beauties of his works were lightness, elegance, and delicacy. He died at Paris 1735, and was succeeded by his son, Julius Robert, who was equally ingenious.

COTTEREL, sir Charles, groom-porter to James I. and master of the requests to Charles II. He was well skilled in modern languages, and possessed all the manners and accomplishments of a gentleman. He resigned his office of master of the ceremonies to the king, to his son Charles Lodowick. During the exile of his royal master, he translated Cassandra, the famed romance, and was also concerned in the translation of Davila's civil wars of France.

COTTINGTON, Francis lord, chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury, in the reign of Charles I. was an able minister, and employed for some time as an ambassador in Spain. On the breaking out of the civil wars he left his country for Spain, where he died, at Valladolid, about 1651, aged 77. In his political character he displayed great dissimulation, with all the formal solemnity which he had imbibed at the Spanish court.

COTTON, or COTON, Peter, a Jesuit, born 1564, at Neronde, near the Loire, early distinguished for his zeal in converting heretics, and for his eloquence in the pulpit. He became confessor to Henry IV. of France, and possessed so much of his confidence that it was a public expression, that the king was good, but that he had cotton in his ears. Cotton refused an archbishopric and a cardinal's hat, which his master's partiality offered him. After Henry's death, he was confessor to Lewis XIII. but he soon left the court, and retired into the country. He died 19th March 1626, aged 63. He wrote some sermons, besides controversial and divinity tracts.

COTTON, sir Robert Bruce, an eminent English antiquary, born at Denton, Huntingdonshire, 22d June 1570. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then removed to London, where he became a member of the antiquarian society, and soon distinguished himself for his zeal in the search of antiquities. He was knighted by James I. and so high was his reputation for learning, information, and integrity, that not only the most leading men of the times consulted him on affairs of state, but the king himself employed his pen on several occasions. At James's request, he vindicated the character of Mary queen of Scots, he also examined what punishment should be inflicted on papists, and defended the ecclesiastical institution against the innovations of the puritans. On the creation of baronets, in 1611, by James, sir Robert Cotton appeared as the thirty-sixth in the new dignity. But though such a favorite with the court, he, in the succeeding reign, joined the commons in the cry for the redress of grievances, though he recommended mild and gentle measures, which, in establishing the privileges of the people, might not endanger the safety of the sovereign. In 1629, sir Robert became an object of persecution to the court. A manuscript, "which," it is said, laid down a plan how the kings of England might oppress the liberties of their subjects, and for ever enslave them and their posterity," was lent out of his library, and being in a surreptitious copy laid before the privy council, produced his arrest and confinement in the Tower, and the seizure of his valuable library. Sir Robert with difficulty extricated himself from the virulence of his persecutors; but he still felt the indignities offered to his person and character; and the treatment he received in some degree undermined his constitution, and broke his heart. He died of a fever, at Westminster, 6th May 1631, aged upwards of 60 years. Sir Robert was not only an able antiquarian, but the friend and patron of men of learning; and to his munificence, his able assistance, and valuable communications, Knollis, sir Walter Raleigh, sir Francis Bacon, Selden, Speed, Camden, and other respectable authors, have with gratitude acknowledged themselves indebted. Though distinguished as a man of letters, and a skilful antiquarian, sir Robert is particularly entitled to the admiration of posterity for the valuable library which now remains for the information of the public, an immortal proof of his munificence and indefatigable zeal in the cause of science and of mankind. That his pursuits were directed to such objects is a happy circumstance for the public. In his time, the many records and important manuscripts which had been plundered from the dissolved monasteries were scattered with profane indifference, and some friendly hand was wanted to collect and preserve them for the information of the learned. This valuable collection, improved still by his son sir Thomas and by his grandson sir John, was, after being removed in various places, at last deposited in the British museum in 1753.

COTTON, Charles, born in Staffordshire, of a respectable family, became known for his burlesque verses and ludicrous poetry, in the reign of Charles and James II. He translated, with great spirit and success, Montaigne's essays, which he inscribed to lord Halifax, a nobleman who highly valued the performance, which he had the capacity and the good sense to appreciate. Cotton published the wonders of the peak in Derbyshire—Virgil travestied—Lucian burlesqued; of which poems an edition was printed in 1751. He died about the time of the revolution, but the exact year is unknown.

COTYS, a king of Thrace, in the age of Alexander, died about 356 B.C.—Another, who favored the cause of Pompey.—Another, who lived in the age of Augustus, and to whom Ovid addressed one of his elegies. His son bore the same name, and exchanged Thrace for the kingdom of Armenia, A.D. 83.

COUDRETTE, Christopher, a French ecclesiastic, strongly attached to the partisans of the Port Royal and to Bourcier, against the Jesuits, by whom he had been educated. He opposed, with great ability, the papal bull unigenitus, for which he was sent to the Bastille for twelve months, in 1738. He died at Paris 4th August 1774. He wrote memoires sur le formulaire, 2 vols. 12mo.—histoire & analyse du livre de l'action de Dieu, &c. His chief work is the history of the Jesuits, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1761, to which he added a supplement of 2 vols. 1764.

COVEL, John an English divine, born at Honingshearth,

Suffolk, 1638, and educated at St. Edmundsbury and Christ college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was chaplain to the embassy at Constantinople, where he continued for seven years. On his return home, 1679, he took his degree of D.D. and was chosen Margaret preacher of divinity. The next year he was presented to the living of Littlebury, in Essex, and in 1687 made chancellor of York, and the next year master of Christ college, Cambridge. He died in 1722, aged 85. During his residence at the Porte, he devoted himself to the examination of the ancient and present state of the Greek church; and he gave to the world, a few years before his death, a curious and useful publication on the subject, in folio.

COVERDALE, Miles, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge. From a friar he became a protestant at the reformation, and was made bishop of Exeter by Edward VI. During the persecuting reign of Mary, he was ejected from his see, and permitted to go into exile, at the interference of the king of Denmark. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, he returned, but he declined to reassume his bishopric, as his principles were now puritanical. He afterwards received the living of St. Magnus, London, from which he was ejected for nonconformity. He died poor, but respected, 20th May 1567, aged 81. He assisted William Tindal in the English version of the bible published in 1537, and corrected it afterwards in the edition of 1540, with notes.

COULON, Lewis, a French priest, who left the Jesuits' society in 1640. He died 1664. His geographical works are greatly esteemed, especially his historical treatise of all the rivers in France, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote besides, lexicon Homericum, and some historical performances, &c.

COUPERIN, Francis, a Frenchman, organist of the chapel of Lewis XIV. He was much admired for his execution on the harpichord. He died 1733, leaving two daughters, who were equally eminent as musicians. His two brothers, Lewis and Charles, were also good performers. He wrote some pieces for the harpichord, in 4 vols. fol.

COUPLET, Philip, a Jesuit, of Malines, who went as missionary to China in 1659, and returned in 1680. He died on his second voyage to the same place, 1693. He wrote some works in the Chinese language and in Latin. His Confucius Sinarum philosophus, 1687, folio, is a valuable and curious work, in which the history of China, the manners and religion of the inhabitants, are ably treated.

COURAYER, Peter Francis, a French divine, born at Vernon, Normandy, 1681. While canon and librarian of St. Genevieve, Paris, he, after some correspondence with archbishop Wake, published his "defence of English ordinations," printed in Holland, 1727. This book exposed him to the persecution of the catholics; so that he took refuge in England, where the university of Oxford granted him a doctor's degree, and the crown settled a pension upon him. He died in 1776, after two days' illness, at the age of 95, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey. He died in the faith of the catholic church, though at Ealing, where he sometimes resided, he attended the English service regularly, declaring he received great satisfaction in the prayers of the the church. He wrote several things, all in French. Those best known are, Paul's history of the council of Trent, 2 vols. fol. dedicated to queen Caroline, who raised his pension from £100 to £200,—Sleidan's history of the reformation. After his death appeared his declaration of his last sentiments, &c.

COURCELLES, Stephen de, a native of Geneva, divinity professor at Amsterdam, after Episcopius, whose works he published, with a life prefixed. He died 1658, aged 72, author of various divinity tracts, published by Daniel Elzevir, 1 vol. fol. 1675.

COURT DE GEBELIN, Anthony, a native of Nîmes, for some time protestant minister at Lausanne, and afterwards superintendant of one of the museums of Paris. He wrote monde primitif, compared with the monde moderne, in 9 vols. 4to. a work of merit and great erudition. He wrote besides, the history of the war des Cevennes, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. He was a strong advocate for animal magnetism, which exposed him much to ridicule. He died at Paris 13th May 1784, aged 59.

COURTANVAUX, Francis Cesar marquis de, a French nobleman, who distinguished himself in the wars of Bohemia and Bavaria, under his uncle, the duke of Noailles. He was also eminent as a philosopher and as an ingenious mechanic, and deserved by his valuable communications a place in the academy of sciences. He died 1781, aged 63.

COURTEN, William, son of a taylor at Meninx, in the Netherlands, escaped with difficulty from the tyranny and persecution of Olivarez duke of Alva, and in 1568 reached London, where he settled his family. Their business was the making of French hoods, which were in those days in great reputation, so that, by industry, the Courten family increased their connections and property, and at the death of the father and mother, which happened about the end of Elizabeth's reign or the beginning of James I. they were opulent and respectable merchants in the trade of silk and fine linen. In the year 1631, their returns are averaged at £150,000 a-year; and so highly respected was the family, that William and Peter received the honor of knighthood. Under the activity and able management of sir William, the concerns of the company were greatly increased, so that not only the commerce of the nation was extended, but even the king's dignity supported, as it is said, that by their loans to James I. and to Charles I. the firm of Courten had a claim upon the crown of not less than £200,000. The extensive concerns of this extraordinary family were, however, lessened by the intrigues of lord Carlisle, who seized, as a grant from the crown, the island of Barbadoes, where sir William had settled a factory, as on a place which had been discovered by his own ships, and been protected at his own expence. His property likewise suffered some years after by the murder of his factors at Amboyna, in the Spice islands, by the Dutch, and by the total loss of his property in that part of the world. Though thus persecuted by the frowns of fortune, he yet engaged with new ardor in the Chinese trade; but the loss of two ships richly laden completed his disasters, and reduced him to poverty. He survived not long this heavy loss. He died 1636, about the beginning of May, aged 64, and was buried in the church of St. Andrew Hubbard.

COURTEN, William, the last male descendant of the family just mentioned, was born in Fenchurch parish, London, 28th March 1642. It is supposed that he lost his father and mother before he was 14 years old; but though his father, in consequence of his insolvency, left the kingdom, in 1643, and never again saw his son, yet he was, it is imagined, carefully educated under the eye of those many rich, independent, and noble relatives which remained to him in England. He early began to travel, and displayed a great genius for natural history, which he much improved by a residence at Montpellier. In this delightful spot, so congenial to his studies, he cultivated the acquaintance of learned men, particularly of Tournefort and of sir Hans Sloane. When of age, he returned to London, to pursue his claims to the shattered wreck of the fortune of his family, and, in improving his income, also to render more comfortable his sister, who had lived upon only £30 a-year. During his minority, a person of the name of George Carew had obtained letters of administration, and now he sued for the restitution of his property; but the arts of the usurper, who was a lawyer and a courtier, prevailed over the simplicity of the petitioner. Carew prevailed in his intrigues, and Courten not only gave up all claims to his paternal estates for an unknown compensation, which he acknowledged to receive, not de jure, but ex gratia, but he exchanged his family name, and, under the appellation of William Charleton, he retired from England to his favorite Montpellier. How long he staid on the continent is not exactly known. After his return to England he lived for fourteen or fifteen years in chambers at the Temple, and died at Kensington Gravel-pits, March 26, 1702, aged 63. The partiality which Mr. Courten shewed to natural history was not employed in frivolous pursuits, or unavailing researches. He began early to make a collection of whatever was curious, important, and remarkable, in medallic and antiquarian history; and not less than 38 vols. in fol. and 8 in 4to. remain as proofs of his great industry and indefatigable attention. His curious collection, after being about fifty years in the possession of his executor and residuary legatee, was purchased, in 1763, for the use of the public, and deposited in the British Museum. It is singular, that though to his industry and perseverance the nation is indebted for so valuable an acquisition, no mention was made of him as the first and most scientific collector. The sum paid by the public was £20,000, which equals scarce the value of the coins and precious stones. Besides those learned friends already mentioned, Courten was intimate with the great Locke.

COURTILZ, Garien de, fleur de Sandras, born at Paris 1644, where he died 6th May 1712. He was in the army, and was some time in Holland, and on his return was confined in the Bastille for his political works, and remained there nine years. He was author of different works, the best known of which are his life of Coligni—the conduct of France since the peace of Nimeguen—history of the Dutch war—political testament of Colbert—the life of Turenne—annals of Paris and of the court in 1697-8.

COURTIVRON, Gaspard marquis de, a native of Dijon, who died 4th October 1785, aged 70, known as a soldier and a scholar. He was wounded in the campaigns of Bavaria, while exerting himself to save the life of marshal Saxe; and he afterwards devoted himself to literature. He wrote a treatise on optics, 4to. 1752, and some other works.

COURTNEY, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was the fourth son of Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonshire, by Margaret, grand-daughter of Edward I. He was educated at Oxford, and, though possessed of abilities, owed his elevation in the church to the consequence of his family. When 28, he was made bishop of Hereford, and afterwards translated to London, where he summoned before him the great Wickliffe, in St. Paul's cathedral, 1377. The bold reformer was on this occasion attended by his friends John of Gaunt and lord Percy, who, in supporting his tenets, treated the prelate with such asperity, that a tumult was excited among the citizens of London. Courtney was made chancellor 1381, and afterwards raised to the see of Canterbury. He was a violent persecutor of the Wickliffites, and condemned their tenets in a synod. He died at Maidstone 1396, aged 55.

COURTOIS, James, a native of Franche-Compté, eminent as a painter, and called le Bourgnignon. He studied under his father, who was also a painter; and in the French campaigns of Italy he employed himself in delineating the battles in which he had been present. His merits were noticed and patronised by Guido and by Albano; and he afterwards settled at Florence, where he married a painter's daughter. The sudden death of his wife, of whom he was known to be very jealous, threw upon him the false accusation of having murdered her; in consequence of which calumny he entered into the order of the Jesuits. He died 1676, aged 55.

COURTOIS, William, brother of the preceding, was the pupil of Peter de Cortona, and was patronized by Alexander VII. His pieces were much admired, especially his battle of Joshua. He died 1673, aged 45, in consequence of taking improper quack medicines for the gout.

COUSIN, John, a French painter, born at Succy, near Sens, well skilled in mathematics. He wrote on geometry and perspective, and chiefly excelled in painting on glass. Many beautiful specimens of his skill in painting exist in the churches of Sens and Paris, and especially in St. Gervase's church. For his eminence, he is called great. He was a favorite with four kings; Henry II. Francis II. Charles IX. and Henry III. He was living in 1689; but the time of his death is uncertain.

COUSTON, Nicholas, sculptor to the French king, was born at Lyons, and died at Paris 1st May 1733, aged 75, member of the academies of painting and sculpture. He possessed great genius, and a very delicate taste. His pieces adorn the palaces of Paris, Versailles, and Marly. His Commodus in the character of Hercules is particularly admired.

COUSTON, William, brother to the preceding, director of the academy of painting and sculpture, died at Paris 22d February 1746, aged 69. He was distinguished as an able sculptor. He had a brother of the same name, who died at Paris, 1746, aged 68, whose works were the mausoleum of Dubois, and two groupes of horses, at Marly.

COUSTON, William, son of the last mentioned, improved himself by studying the arts at Rome. He was rising into employment, and had just finished the mausoleum of the dauphin, deposited in the cathedral of Sens, when he died suddenly in July 1777, aged 61. His other works are, the apotheosis of Xavier—an Apollo—Venus and Mars, &c.

COUTHON, Georges, a native of Orsay, in Auvergne, who was brought up to the bar. At the revolution, he became member of the national assembly and of the convention, and there displayed the most ferocious and vindictive conduct. He lent all his powers to procure the destruction of the monarchy, and the disgrace and death of the king; and afterwards, as the friend and associate of Robespierre, he recommended the adoption of the most bloody and atrocious measures. In his zeal against crowned heads, he proclaimed death to tyrants, and peace to the cottage, and wished that kings might no longer have an earth to support, nor a sun to enlighten them. When sent as deputy to Lyons, he struck with a hammer the columns of the noblest edifices, exclaiming, "Down, ye monuments of pride, I condemn you to destruction." His savage conduct was so well known, that when once complaining of thirst, during a long debate in the convention, one of the members observed, he ought to have a cup full of blood. The fall of Robespierre, whose crimes he had shared, was his own. He was guillotined 28th July 1794. Though of so ferocious a heart, the features of his countenance were mild and pleasing; but his body was deformed, so that the convention permitted him to sit while speaking.

COUVREUR, Adrienne le, a French actress, born at Fismes, in Champagne, 1690. She first appeared in 1717, in the character of Electra, and was received with universal applause. Her best character was Phædra. She died 20th March 1730. She was for some time mistress to marshal Saxe, whom, when reduced to distress in the acquisition of his dukedom of Courland, she assisted with a large sum of money raised upon her jewels.

COWARD, William, a medical writer, born at Winchester, and educated there at the college, and at Hart-hall Oxford, from which he was removed to Wadham. In 1680 he was chosen fellow of Merton, and two years after he translated Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel into Latin, which however, did not much contribute to his fame, as it was surpassed by the rival translation of Atterbury. He took his medical degrees in 1685 and 87, and after settling at Northampton for some time, he removed to London in 1694. But not more devoted to physical pursuits than literature, he soon drew the public attention to his publication, called Second thoughts concerning the human soul, in which, with great learning and metaphysical knowledge, he united sentiments, which were repugnant to the opinions of the best divines. Though he was a sincere believer in the gospel, yet his ideas about the immateriality and immortality of the soul, drew upon him the censure of the public, and he was ranked with Toland, Tindal, and Gildon, as an enemy of the christian religion. This work as well as his other book, called the grand essay in defence of it, not only drew the attacks of several writers, such as Dr. Nichols, Broughton, and Turner, but the animadversions of the house of commons, who, on the 17th March 1704, voted the books to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, as containing doctrines contrary to the the church of England, and subversive of the christian religion. Afterwards Dr. Coward applied himself to the pursuits of his profession, and published his tract called, Ophthalmiatria, which appeared with the approbation of Hans Sloane. From the persecution which attended his writings, it is supposed that Dr. Coward removed from London, as a hiatus occurs in his history, for about 12 years. His heroic poem on Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whether sceptical or censorious, published about this time, was little attended to, and is now totally unknown. His licentia poetica discussed, appeared in 1709, but though introduced with the poetical flattery of Aaron Hill, of John Gay, and of Barklay, it possessed little merit, and found few admirers. In 1718 Dr. Coward is mentioned in the college of physicians' list, as residing at Ipswich, where it is supposed he died about 1725. Though his writings no longer engage attention, it must be acknowledged, that he was not devoid of learning, judgement, and abilities. Though sceptical in his religious opinions, he still was exemplary as a christian, and a firm believer in the mercies offered to mankind by the gospel.

COWELL, John, an eminent civilian, born at Ernsborough, Devon, 1554, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He became fellow of his college, professor of civil law in the university, and master of Trinity-hall. His Interpreter, was published in 1607, in 4to, undertaken at the request of Bancroft the archbishop. This book displaying great and extensive knowledge, for some time remained uncensured, but at last, it was observed that the author had spoken with great freedom and severity of the common law, and of its professors, especially Littleton, and had "disputed too nicely on the mysteries of the monarchy," and asserted that the monarch might make laws, without the consent of parliament, and in consequence of this, the house of commons proceeded with great violence against him; but James with becoming zeal interposed his influence, and saved him from persecution. After this Cowell retired to Cambridge, where he underwent an operation for the stone, which proved fatal 11th Oct. 1611. He was buried in Trinity-hall chapel. He wrote besides Institutes of the laws of England—and a tract de regulis juris, which last was never published.

COWLEY, Abraham, an English poet, born in London 1618. He was educated at Westminster school, and the accidental perusal of Spenser's works, so much roused his poetical genius, that he published his "poetical blossoms," before he was removed to the university. He entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he wrote some poems, and planned the design of those masculine pieces, which have immortalized his name. The loyalty of his sentiments, and the noble independence of his conduct, however, proved displeasing to the republicans of his college, and he was with some others ejected from the university, and came to St. John's college, Oxford, where he published his satire of the Puritan and Papist. His attachment to the royal cause, as well as his literary merits recommended him to the notice of the great; he was intimate with lord Falkland, and confidentially engaged in the king's service. During the civil wars, he was settled in the duke of St. Alban's family, and was absent from England about 10 or 12 years, and during that time, performed some very dangerous journeys to Jersey, Scotland, Flanders, Holland, and other places, while he managed the correspondence between the king and his consort, and the various bodies of loyalists dispersed through the kingdom. In 1656 he ventured to come into England with great secrecy, but he was arrested, though by mistake, and was restored to liberty only by giving bail for £1000. After Cromwell's death he returned to France, and at the restoration he determined to retire to solitude and learned ease. His intentions were favored by the liberality of the duke of Buckingham and lord St. Alban's, who gave him an estate, and the last eight years of his life were spent in that comfortable retirement, which he so much admired. He lived some time at Barn-Elms, but as the situation was not healthy, he removed to Chertsey, where, in consequence of exposing himself too long to the cold air, he was attacked by a violent defluxion and stoppage in his breast and throat, which by being at first disregarded, in a fortnight proved fatal. He died 28th July 1667, aged 49, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, near Chaucer and Spenser, and a monument was erected to his honor, by George duke of Buckingham, 1675. Cowley took his doctor's degree in medicine at Oxford, 1657, and as it was under the republican government, some have doubted the sincerity of his attachment to the royal cause, but his object was not of a political nature. He wished to study medicine as a science, and for that purpose a degree was necessary. His books of plants were published in 1662, and as he had employed himself not only in anatomical dissection, but to the laborious consideration of simples, and the deep researches of botany, his works on those subjects, are the thoughts of a master. Besides the works already mentioned, he published in a new edition of his poems, miscellanies,—the Mistress—Pindaric odes—Davidis—the Cutter of Coleman-street, a comedy, &c. Besides poems, he wrote in prose, a proposition for the advancement of experimental philosophy—and a discourse on the government of Cromwell. Cowley is very respectable as a poet, and his verse though sometimes uncouth and inelegant, does not want fire and majesty. He abounded, as Addison observed, above all others in genuine wit. Dr. Johnson places him at the head of metaphysical poets.

COWPER, William, born at Perth, was educated at Edinburgh, where he became professor of philosophy. Though originally a strict presbyterian, he renounced his sect, and embracing the doctrines of the church, was made bishop of Galloway, 1614. He died three years after, aged 53. He was an able divine. His works were printed in one vol. folio.

COWPER, William, D. D. youngest son of earl Cowper, was born in London, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. After possessing some small living, he was made dean of Durham, which he held till his death 1772, in his 59th year. He wrote an able treatise on geometry, besides eight sermons, and an advice to a lady much esteemed.

COWPER William, M. D. a physician of reputation at Chester, who died 20th Oct. 1767. He published some antiquarian treatises, and was preparing at the time of his death, an history of Chester.

COWPER, William, a celebrated English poet. He was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II. and rector rector of Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, where he was born 1731. He lost his excellent mother when he was only six years old, and after learning the rudiments of language at Market-street Hertfordshire, he removed to Westminster school where he continued till his 18th year. As the great nephew of chancellor Cowper, he was marked for eminence in the law, and after being for some time in the office of an attorney, he entered at the Inner-temple, and at the age of 31 he was appointed clerk in the house of lords. This honorable office his great timidity prevented him from accepting, and when afterwards nominated clerk of the journals, which seemed to require no personal attendance, his agitation of mind became excessive when called upon, at the bar of the house, on an unusual occasion, to perform the duties of his place, and he resigned under the greatest depression of spirits. Weakness of nerves, produced debility of body and of mind, but by the friendly attention of Dr. Cotton of St. Alban's, his melancholy terrors gradually subsided, and from a dejected gloom he rose to the purer use of his mental faculties and to the enjoyment of rational conversation, and the cheering and serene understanding of the hopes of revelation. In 1765 he settled at Huntingdon, and became the friend and the intimate of Mr. Unwin, a neighbouring clergyman, after whose unfortunate death, by a fall from his horse in 1767, he retired to Olney, Bucks, with his widow, whom he regarded with all the affection of a mother. His time in retirement was spent, not only in devotion but in literature, and he contributed sixty-eight hymns to the collection which his friend Mr. Newton the curate of Olney, and an eloquent supporter of the doctrine of Calvin, gave to the world. In 1782 he appeared himself before the public by the publication of a volume of poems, and in 1785 the general voice of approbation was raised towards him on the appearance of his second volume. He afterwards engaged in a translation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey in blank verse, and in the opinion of some judges the work, though inferior to the versification of Pope, possesses great merit, and presents to the English reader a more pleasing and perfect picture of the great original. In 1786 he removed with Mrs. Unwin to Weston, Northamptonshire, and afterwards turned his thoughts to a life of Milton, and to a complete edition of his poems, and after he had made some little progress he was introduced to Mr. Hayley, who had been engaged on the same subject, and thus arose an intercourse of friendship which continued to the last period of life. The poet had communicated so much pleasure and instruction to the world by the sweetness of his lines, and the pure precepts of morality and benevolence which every where captivate the reader, that the king honorably bestowed upon him a pension of 300l. per annum in 1794; but the compliment, so flattering to a man of talents, and so becoming the sovereign of an enlightened nation, gave more satisfaction to his friends than to himself. The wretched poet was again sunk into dejection and religious melancholy, and few intervals of reason beamed upon the afflicted mind of this amiable man. For a while indeed he amused himself in the revision of his Homer, but again relapsed into that depression of spirits which robbed him of all the comforts and the serenity of a reflecting mind. He died 25th April 1800 at Dereham Norfolk, where a handsome monument in the church marks the spot where his remains were deposited. In exhibiting a story in poetical numbers Cowper possessed a peculiarly happy genius; his John Gilpin, which was related to him by his friend lady Austin, to amuse him in a tedious hour of melancholy, when converted into verse by his pen proved a most popular ballad, and has since continued to please and to amuse the nation. In his manners though reserved he was pleasing, his conversation was cheerful, and Mrs. Unwin, lady Austin, lady Hesketh, and Mrs. Throgmorton and others, were not only honored with marks of his friendship, but immortalized by the happy effusions of his delicate and sportive muse. The singular subjects of one of his best pieces was undertaken at the request of lady Austin, who called forth his powers of composition by bidding him write, on a sofa. The sofa must be regarded as a most valuable composition, and though in that and in his other larger poem The Task, there is perhaps no well digested plan or regular connection, the whole must be considered as the effort of a great genius, assisted by the feelings of a truly humane, virtuous, and benevolent heart. An elegant and pleasing account of the life and writings of this extraordinary man has been published by his friend Mr. Hayley.

Cox, Richard, an English prelate of mean parentage, born at Whaddon, Bucks, about 1500. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was invited by Wolsey, to form one of the chosen few, on his new foundation at Oxford; but after some time his open avowal of Luther's principles, rendered him obnoxious to the censures of the university, and he was stripped of his offices and imprisoned. Afterwards he was made master of Eton school, and by the favor of his patron and friend Cranmer, he was raised to the offices of archdeacon and prebendary of Ely and Lincoln, and of dean of Christ church. As tutor to king Edward VI. he became a great favorite at court, was made privy counsellor, and chancellor of the university of Oxford, canon of Windsor, and dean of Westminster. During the bloody reign of Mary he left England, and maintained on the continent, his reputation for learning, and for adhering to the protestant faith. On Elizabeth's accession, he returned to England, and gained such popularity by his eloquence and zeal against popery, that he was raised to the see of Ely, over which he presided for 21 years. His opposition to the catholics, drew upon him the resentment of his enemies, and even the queen herself shewed herself unfriendly to him. Exposed to the persecution of chancellor Hatton, who wished to strip him of all his ecclesiastical domains, he at last offered to resign his dignities, provided that £200 per annum were allowed him, to support him in his retirement and solitude. None, however, could be found to succeed upon those disgraceful terms, and he held the bishopric till his death, 1581, in his 83d year. He was a great advocate for the marriage of the clergy, and he was the first who brought a wife to live in a college. He wrote several theological tracts, but he is chiefly known for the active part which he took in the compilation of the liturgy. The four gospels—the acts of the apostles—and the epistle to the Romans, were also translated by him, in the share which he had in the bible, now called the Bishops' bible. He was also concerned in the compilation of Lily's grammar.

Cox, sir Richard, chancellor of Ireland, was born at Bandon, county of Cork, 25th March 1650. Though left an orphan under the age of three, he yet, under the protecting care of his grandfather, and of his uncle, evinced great natural abilities. For three years he practised as an attorney, but coming to Gray's inn in 1671, he studied for the bar. In consequence of an early marriage, he had a large family, and the cares which they brought upon him, roused him from the obscurity, where for seven years he had been lost as a farmer, and by the interest of sir Robert Southwell, he was elected recorder of Kinsale. He now practised with great success in the law, but removing from the convulsion which agitated the protestants he came to Bristol, where, from his many avocations, he devoted himself to the completion of his history of Ireland. At the revolution he was made under secretary of state, afterwards recorder of Waterford, in 1690 second justice of the common pleas, and the next year governor of the county and city of Cork. In this singular character uniting the office of judge with military duties, he behaved with great spirit and propriety, he was knighted in 1692, and the next year made chancellor of Ireland, and in 1706 created a baronet. On the accession of George I. he as well as some of the Irish judges, were removed from office, but while he hoped to spend the rest of his life in literary and independent retirement, he found himself exposed to the censures of the Irish parliament, who however, never proceeded further against him. In April 1733, he was seized with a fit of apoplexy, which ending in a palsy, carried him off, the following 3d May, in his 84th year. He was esteemed not only as an able lawyer, and impartial historian, but as an humane and beneficent man. Besides his Hibernia-Anglicana in folio, he wrote an enquiry into religion, and the use of reason in reference to it, 8vo.—an address to those of the Roman communion in England, 12mo.

Cox, Leonard, a grammarian, born at Monmouth, and educated at Cambridge. He was for some time, and with great reputation, master of Reading school, after which he travelled through France, Germany, Poland, and Hungary, where, as a teacher of the learned languages, he acquired much fame. He died at Caerlton, Monmouthshire, 1549. He wrote some Greek and Latin treatises, besides a commentary on Lily's grammar.

Coxeter, Thomas, born at Lechlade, Gloucestershire, Sept. 1689, entered at Trinity college, Oxford, from whence he removed to London, to study the law, but the death of his patron sir John Cook in 1710, overturned his hopes of high distinction. Left without any plan to pursue, he became the friend and companion of authors and bookellers, and began to make a curious collection of old plays. He proposed to write the biography of the old English poets, but did not proceed far in the work. He gave in 1739 a new edition of Baily's life of bishop Fisher, and circulated proposals for publishing antient plays, a plan which was afterwards adopted by Doddley. He was in 1737 secretary to a society for the encouragement of English history, under whose auspices Carte's history of England, first volume, appeared. He died April 19th 1749, aged 59.

Coxis, Michael, a painter of Mechlin, who died 1592, aged 95. His imitations of Raphael are greatly admired, as well as his designs.

COYER, l'Abbe Gabriel Francis, a French writer, who was born at Baumelles-Nones, Franche Comté, and died at Paris July 18th, 1782, in an advanced age. Originally a Jesuit, he abandoned the order, and lived by his pen. His works possess vivacity, ease, and wit. He wrote Bagatelles morales,—the history of John Sobieski 3 vols. 12mo,—travels in Italy and Holland, 2 vols,—observations on England,—treatise on preaching, and on public education, besides a translation of Blackstone's commentaries.

COYPEL, Charles Anthony, a celebrated painter, who died at Paris, his native city, 1752, aged 58. He was painter to the duke of Orleans and to the king, and by his amiable manners and extensive endowments he deserved and enjoyed the friendship of the great. He was author of some theatrical pieces, which were performed in private theatres, and he also composed several dissertations on painting, and some academical lectures. He was very charitable, and for his many virtues was highly esteemed by the duke of Orleans. He erected a preparatory school at Paris for students before they went to Rome, and he also projected the exhibition of the pictures in the Luxembourg gallery. His father Anthony, who died in 1722, aged 61, was also an eminent artist, and painter to the king, and his grandfather Noel had been equally celebrated at Paris, and at Rome where he was director of the French academy of painting. He died 1707, aged 79.—Noel Nicholas, the son of Noel, [was also known not only as a painter of fine church pieces, but as an able professor in the academy. He died 1735, aged 43.

COYSEVOX, Anthony, a French sculptor, born at Lyons. He died 1720, aged 80, chancellor and regent of the academy of painting and sculpture. Versailles was embellished by the finet of his pieces. At Marly his Neptune and Amphitrite, and at the church of St. Eustachius the statue of Colbert, are likewise fine specimens of his great powers.

COYTIER, James, physician to Lewis XI. of France, is remarkable for the great ascendancy which he obtained over the superstition and timidity of that monarch, who seemed greatly terrified at the thought of death. This influence he artfully exerted to advance his interests and those of his family.

COZZA, Francesco, a painter, born at Palermo in Sicily. He was pupil to Dominichino, and eminent in fresco and in oil painting, and employed himself in several of the great works which adorn Rome, where he died 1664.

CRAASBECK, Joseph van, a painter, born at Brussels 1608. He died 1668. He was pupil to Brouwer, and chiefly excelled in vulgar scenes, where he represented drunkenness and ale-house quarrels with great spirit.

CRAE, Roger, an English hermit, born in Buckinghamshire in the beginning of the 16th century. He left his occupation of hatter, and with a mind influenced by fanaticism and the love of singularity, he disposed of his property, and distributed it to the poor, and building a small hut at Ickman near Uxbridge, he lived there in great great austerity. His reputation for sanctity and abstinence was such that he was visited by many respectable persons, who consulted him as a seer and prophet. He is said to have foretold the restoration, and the elevation of the house of Orange to the British throne.

CRABB, Habakkuk, an eminent dissenter, born at Watisfield, Suffolk and educated under Daffworth at Daventry. He officiated as minister at Stowmarket, and afterwards at Cirencester, and then joined his brother-in-law Fenner in the care of a school at the Devizes. On the death of his friend the well known Thomas Hanmer, he was invited by his congregation, but his principles were not appreciated with that liberality which he expected in his native place; and as being accused of departing from the faith of the dissenters, he retired from his ministry to Royston, where the loss of his wife added to other disappointments brought on a nervous fever which hurried him to his grave, two years after his wife, Dec. 25th 1795. He left several manuscript sermons, some of which have been published. He was a respectable man, and for 45 years a very exemplary character, who while he dissented from the church, yet respected the opinions of his neighbours, and preached religion without disseminating faction.

CRADDOCK, Samuel, rector of North Cadbury, Somersetshire, was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He was a respectable man, and his principal works display considerable ability. He published the history of the Old and New testament—the apostolical history—the harmony of the four gospels, &c. He died Oct. 7th 1706, aged 86.

CRADDOCK, Luke, a painter of great natural genius. His birds were greatly admired, and rose in value to three or four times their original price, after his death. He worked generally for dealers, and refused to employ his pencil for the great, observing that they restrained his fancy. He died 1717, and was buried in St. Mary's Whitechapel.

CRAIG, Nicholas, a learned Dane. He was born at Ripen in 1541, and was regent of the school at Copenhagen in 1576. He died 1602, aged 61. He was engaged by the king of Denmark in some important negotiations, which he fulfilled with great credit and satisfaction. He wrote a learned book on the republic of the Lacedæmonians, reprinted at Leyden 1670, 8vo, besides the annals of Denmark in six books, reprinted at Copenhagen in 1737, folio.

CRAIG, John Thomas, a learned Scotch lawyer, born at Edinburgh, 1548, where he died 1608. He acquired eminence at the bar. He is well known for his "Jus Feudale," a learned work universally admired. He wrote also a treatise on the sovereignty of Scotland, and in another work proved the legality of James's succession to the English crown.

CRAIG, James, a Scotch divine, born at Gifford, East Lothian, and educated at Edinburgh. He was much admired as a popular preacher. He died at Edinburgh 1744, aged 62. He published 3 vols of sermons, chiefly on the heads of christianity, besides 2 vols. of divine poems much esteemed.

CRAIG, John, a Scotch mathematician, who became known by his "theologiæ christianæ principia mathematica," in 36 pages 4to, printed at London 1699, and reprinted at Leipzig 1755. In this small work he entertains curious reveries, and attempts to prove, by mathematical calculation, that the christian religion will last only 1454 years from the date of his book. This work was refuted by the abbé Houteville, in his christian religion proved by facts. He had also a dispute with J. Bernouilli on the quadrature of curved lines, and curvilinear figures, and also on an algebraic question, in which he acknowledged, very candidly, in the philosophical transactions, the fallacy of his own suppositions.

CRAIG, William, a Scotch divine, born at Glasgow, Feb. 1709, and educated at the university there. Early devoted to the pursuits of classical literature, and highly sensible of their beauty and simplicity, he, with the approbation of his friends Clerk and Hutcheson, transfused their most striking passages, not only into his conversation, but his pulpit oratory, which, was solemn, elegant, and correct. The popularity of his preaching recommended him to the notice of Mr Lockhart of Cambusnethan, who presented him to that parish. After refusing the honorable invitations of some other patrons, he at last removed to Glasgow, where, in the circle of his friends, and in the midst of an applauding audience at St. Andrew's church, he pursued his ministerial career with earnestness, animation, and success. Though some of his contemporaries preferred to hear the abstruse tenets of speculative theology, and all its mysterious doctrines, enlarged upon in the pulpit, he applied himself to bring home to his hearers their duties, and the knowledge of their character, according to the precepts and the example of the great Saviour. Mr. Craig was sensibly affected by the death of his wife, 1758, with whom he had lived happily 16 years, and though afterwards he married again, he never recovered his wonted spirits. The death of his second wife and of his eldest son increased his dejection, and he at last sunk gradually into the grave, 1783, aged 75.

CRANKENTHROP, Richard, was born at Strickland, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was an eloquent preacher, well acquainted with divinity, and much admired by the puritans. He went as chaplain to an embassy to the emperor, and afterwards was presented to the rectory of Braintree in Essex. He died in 1624, at his rectory of Black-Notley. His works are Justinian defended against Baronius—a defence of Constantine—a treatise on the 5th general council, &c.—five books of logic—a defence of the Anglican church, &c.

CRAMER, John Frederic, a learned professor at Duisburg, resident for the king of Prussia at Amsterdam, died at the Hague, 1715. He was well skilled in civil law, languages, and medallist history. He translated Puffendorf's introduction to history, and wrote vindiciæ nominis Germanici contra gallos, &c.

CRAMER, Gabriel, an able mathematician, born at Geneva 1694. He was the pupil of John Bernouilli, and became known over Europe for his great skill in mathematics. He destroyed his health by excessive application, and died at the baths of Languedoc in 1752. He published some works, besides an edition of the two Bernouilli's works, published 6 vols. 4to. 1743.

CRAMER, Nicholas, a Flemish painter, who died 1710, aged aged 40. His pieces are much admired for taste and correctness.

CRAMER, Daniel, a native of Beltz in Brandenburg, professor of eloquence at Wittemberg, and afterwards dean and consistorial professor at Stellen, where he died 1598, aged 30. He was an able divine, and wrote also on the logic and metaphysics of Aristotle—scholæ propheticæ—arbor hereticæ consanguinitates, &c.

CRAMER, John James, a native of Elgg, professor of the oriental languages at Zurich, and afterwards at Herborn, where he also filled the chair of divinity and ecclesiastical history. He wrote exercitationes de arâ exteriori secundi templi, 4to.—theologia Israelis, 4to.—and died 1702, aged 29. His brother John Rodolphus, Hebrew and divinity professor at Zurich, and dean of the college of the canons, was author of some valuable works on Hebrew antiquities, dissertations, harangues, &c. He died at Zurich 1737, aged 59.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a native of Quedlinburg, who first reduced the art of assaying in metallurgy into a system, and wrote on it elementa artis docimasticæ, 8vo. 1739. He wrote besides, elements on metallurgy, 2 vols. folio—introduction to the care, &c. of forests, with a description of the method of burning charcoal, &c. 1766, fol. He died near Dresden, 1777, aged 67.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a German writer, who, after studying at Leipzig, and giving public lectures, and editing a weekly paper called the Guardian spirit, removed 1754 to Copenhagen, as chaplain to the court. He was made professor of divinity 1765; but the disgrace of Struensee was fatal to his fortunes for a while, yet though dismissed, he was again recalled from Lubeck, where he had taken refuge, and he died divinity professor at Kiel 1788, aged 65. He was not only an able divine, but a poet of considerable merit. Besides a spirited version of the psalms, odes, and other poems, he wrote the life of Gellert, sermons, miscellanies, &c. and translated the best part of Chrysostom into German, and Bossuet's universal history, with dissertations.

CRANE, Thomas, a nonconformist, born at Plymouth, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. Cromwell gave him the living of Rumpelsham in Dorsetshire, from which he was ejected in 1662. He died 1714. He published a treatise on divine providence.

CRANIUS, Luca, a painter of Bamberg, who died 1553, aged 83. His pieces though once admired, are now no longer esteemed. His son imitated his manner of painting, and died 1586, aged 76.

CRANMER, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, 1489. He was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. By his marriage he lost his fellowship, but recovered it in consequence of the early death of his wife in childbed, and he took his degree of D. D. in 1523. The freedom and ability with which he canvassed the king's marriage with his brother's widow, recommended him to the notice of the court, and Henry soon employed his abilities in defence of his views. Cranmer went to Rome with the book which he had written in support of the invalidity of the king's marriage, and offered to dispute, with any ecclesiastic whom the Roman pontiff might appoint, but the challenge was not accepted. He now continued in Germany as ambassador from the king, and he married a second wife, a niece of Osiander at Nuremburg. Upon the death of Warham he was raised to the vacant see of Canterbury, but without acknowledging the pope's supremacy; and two months after, May 1533, he pronounced the divorce between Henry and queen Catharine of Arragon, and married the king to Anne Boleyn. Thus at war with the authority of the pope, he began earnestly to labor for the advancement of the reformation, by the translation of the bible into English, and by inveighing against the vices and the usurpation of the court of Rome. In 1536 he divorced Henry from Anne Boleyn, but though seemingly the favorite of the king, he boldly opposed his measures for the confiscation of all the monasteries into the royal treasury, whilst he wished to convert those immense spoils for the advancement of literature and religion by the appointment of readers of divinity of Greek and Hebrew in every cathedral in the kingdom. After the death of Cromwell, he retired from public affairs, but his influence was such, that he procured the passing of laws, for the promotion of true religion, and the modification of the six articles, which proved so obnoxious to the clergy. His enemies, however, were not silent in these times of popish intrigue and corruption, and the commons, as well as the privy council, severely reprobated his conduct, till Henry interposed, and saved him from further prosecution. At the king's death, he was one of the regents of the kingdom, and executor of his will, and he crowned Edward VI. whose godfather he was. He now labored assiduously in the reformation. The homilies were composed, and some by Cranmer himself; the six offensive articles were repealed, the communion was given in both kinds, the offices of the church were revised, the visitation of the clergy regularly enforced, and the book of common-prayer was completed and established by law. The elevation of Mary to the throne, now threatened Cranmer with persecution. Though he originally opposed the views of lady Jane Gray, he now espoused her cause, and the successful queen, irritated at his conduct, and perhaps more at his consequence among the protestants, summoned him before the council, and soon after he was sent to the tower. He was attainted for high treason Nov. 3d, 1553, and found guilty, but at his earnest solicitation, he was pardoned for the treason, and arraigned by his persecutors for heresy. He was removed in April 1554, with Ridley and Latimer, to Oxford, to dispute and make his defence before popish commissioners; but on the refusal of himself, and his venerable friends to subscribe to popery, they were condemned as heretics. In Sept. 1555 he was again arraigned in St. Mary's, Oxford, of blasphemy, perjury, incontinency, and heresy; and while they pretended to summon him to Rome, to make his defence within 80 days, they secretly determined his execution: Cranmer, though firm to his faith, yet yielded before the terrors of death, and in a moment of weakness and despair, he was prevailed to sign his recantation, and to reimbrace popery. But notwithstanding this concession, his enemies resolved to commit him to the flames, and when he was brought to St. Mary's church in order to make a profession of his faith, he surprised his persecutors, by an awful appeal to heaven and their consciences, and by a solemn renunciation of the tenets he had lately, in a moment of error, embraced, braced, emphatically exclaiming, "that, that one thing alone wrung his heart, and that the hand which had falsely signed the dishonorable deed, should first perish in the flames." This manly conduct surprised and enraged his enemies, he was immediately dragged over against Baliol college, where standing in his shirt, and without shoes, he was fastened to the stake. The fire was soon kindled, and the venerable martyr stretching his right hand into the flames, exclaimed, "this hand hath offended, this unworthy hand." His miseries were soon over, and his last words were, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." This happened 21st March 1556, in his 67th year. Cranmer, as the great promoter of the reformation, is deservedly respected; but his learning, his perseverance, and his zeal, are not more remarkable than the integrity of his heart, the gentleness of his disposition, and the humane virtues of his character. He patronised learned men; under his protection, Bucer and Fagius settled at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr at Oxford, and John a Lasco, Ochinus, Tremellius, and others, were enabled to advance the interests, of science and of religion. His works were chiefly on the religion and the controversies of the time, and besides 26 different publications, which are mentioned as written by him, there are some manuscripts preserved in the king's library purchased for £50, besides those in the Cotton collection, and other private repositories.

CRAPONE, Adam, a native of Salon, known for the canal which still bears his name, which he formed between Arles and the Durance. He had projected the canal of Languedoc, which was afterwards finished by Lewis XIV. He was poisoned through envy at Nantes, in his 40th year, 1598.

CRASHAW, Richard, an English poet, born in London, and educated at the Charter house, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was afterwards fellow of Peterhouse, but was ejected during the rebellion, for denying the covenant, and soon after was converted, or as Pope says out-witted, to the catholic faith. He went to Paris in quest of preferment, but his distresses and poverty became very great, till the benevolence of Cowley not only relieved him, but recommended him to queen Henrietta. By her influence he went over to Italy, and was made secretary to an Italian cardinal, and soon after obtained a canonry in the church of Loretto, where he died 1650. He was an excellent scholar, well acquainted with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spanish. He wrote Steps to the temple,—the delights of the muses,—carmen Deo nostro, &c. He is best known by the encomiums of Pope, who not only admired his poetry, but borrowed some passages from it. An edition of his works appeared 1785.

CRASSO, Lawrence, baron of Pianura, wrote an history of the Greek poets 1678, commended by the Italians, but severely censured by the French. He also published the eulogiums of the literati of Venice, two vols. 4to, 1666.

CRASSUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman orator, greatly commended by Cicero. He died about 92 B.C.

CRASSUS, Marcus Licinius, one of the triumvirs with J. Caesar, and Pompey, was surnamed the rich. His will to encrease his opulence by the conquest of Parthia proved his ruin. He was defeated and killed in Syria B.C. 53.

CRATES, a philosopher, B.C. 328. He was disciple to Diogenes the cynic, and prided himself on his poverty, and the meanness of his behaviour.

CRATES, an academic philosopher of Athens B.C. 272.

CRATESIPOLIS, a queen of Sicyon, celebrated for her valor after the death of her husband Alexander B.C. 314.

CRATINUS, a poet of Athens, who wrote 21 plays, &c. He died B.C. 431, aged 97.

CRATIPPUS, an Athenian philosopher, best known as the instructor of Cicero's son.

CRATO or de CRAFTHEIM, John, a native of Breslaw, physician to the emperor Ferdinand I. Besides medical tracts, he wrote some poems; and as he was intimate with Luther, the little work called Luther's table-talk, has been extracted from his writings. He died 1585 at Breslaw aged 66.

CRAWFORD, David, a Scotch lawyer, born at Drumfoyle 1665. He was made historiographer of Scotland by queen Anne, and devoting himself to his favorite study of historical antiquities, he published memoirs of Scotland, during the times of the four regents—a peerage, in folio,—the history of the royal family of Stuart,—and a description of the country of Renfrew. He wrote besides the life of Guthery bishop of Dunkeld, and began the history of Scottish affairs. He died in his native place 1726, aged 61.

CRAWFORD, William, a divine, born at Kelfo, and educated at Edinburgh. In 1711 he opposed vigorously the settlement of ministers by presentations, in which he was supported by some of the clergy. He died 1742, aged 66. He wrote "dying thoughts," besides sermons, published 2 vols. 12mo.

CRAYER, Gaspar de, a painter, born at Antwerp in 1585. He studied under Raphael Coxis, whom he soon surpassed in the boldness of genius, and in the graceful exertion of his pencil. His portrait of cardinal Ferdinand, brother to the king of Spain, was so exquisitely finished a performance, that the monarch sent the artist a golden chain, and a medal, and settled a handsome pension upon him. He was greatly esteemed by Rubens and by Vandyck. Though he was indefatigable in his application he lived to a great age, supported by constant temperance and regularity. Though chiefly he excelled in portrait painting, yet his historical pieces are much admired. His centurion alighting from his horse to prostrate himself at the feet of Christ, was seen with undisguised approbation by Rubens, and is admired as a masterly performance. He died 1669.

CREBILLON, Prosper Joliet de, a French tragedian ranked next after Corneille and Racine, was born at Dijon 1674. He originally studied the law, but the impetuosity of his passions thwarted the views of his friends, and at last he produced a tragedy which met with applause, and encouraged him in the career of a theatrical writer. He married, but in consequence of it, lost his father's protection, who disinherited him, though the cruel will was revoked on his death-bed. In 1711 Crebillon lost his wife, whose death he feelingly deplored, and and he long continued, like most men of letters, exposed to distress and poverty, till a place in the French academy and the office of police censor rendered his circumstances affluent. He lived to a great age, highly respected and admired for his virtues, as well as literary abilities. He died 1762, aged 88. Being asked one day which of his productions he thought best; "I do not know," says he, "which is the best; but this (pointing to his son) is certainly my worst." His best plays are his Atreus, Electra, and Rhadamistus.

CREBILLON, Claude Prosper Joliot de, son of the preceding, was born at Paris, february 12th, 1707, and died there 12th April 1777. He is known as a writer of novels, some of which are licentious and immoral. His works were collected in 11 vols. 12mo, 1779. Crebillon might be called the Petronius of France, as his father was denominated the Æschylus. The father, says d'Alembert, "paints in the blackest colors the crimes and wickedness of man, whilst the son draws with a delicate and just pencil the refinement, the shades, and even the graces of our vices." Crebillon was censor royal. Though he lived in friendly terms with his father, yet he highly displeased him for a little time by his marriage with an English woman.

CREDI, Lorenzo di, an Italian painter, born at Florence. He died 1530, aged 78. He studied under Verocchio, where da Vinci was a pupil with him.

CREECH, Thomas, an English poetical translator, born near Sherborne, Dorset, and educated at Sherborne, and Wadham college Oxford. He distinguished himself by his classical learning, and his translation of Lucretius rendered him so respectable that he was elected fellow of All souls. In 1701 he was presented by his college to Welwyn rectory in Herts, but before he went to reside on his living, he put a period to his existence at Oxford. The causes of this unfortunate event are not known. Some say that the contemptuous treatment which he received from a woman, with whom he was in love, so stung him that he hanged himself in his study, where three days after he was found; but Jacob ascribes his death to the moroseness of his temper. Besides his Lucretius, he translated Horace in 1684, and turned the fables to our own times, observing that Rome was now rivalled in her vices, and that parallels for hypocrisy, profaneness, avarice, and the like, were easy to be found. His inferior works are translations of Theocritus, some of Ovid's epistles, the 13th satire of Juvenal, the lives of Solon, Pelopidas, and Cleomenes, from Plutarch, and of Pelopidas, from Cornelius Nepos, &c. On his father's monument he is called the learned, much admired, and much envied Mr. Creech.

CRELL, Lewis Christian, a native of Neustadt, who studied at Leipzig, and there obtained the rectory of St. Nicholas' school, and the philosophy professorship. He wrote de civis innocentis in manus hostium ad nervum traditione,—de Scythala Lacocica—de providentiâ Dei in regibus constituendis, &c.—and died 1735, aged 64.

CRELLIUS, John, a Socinian, born near Nuremberg, 1590. As his opinions were not tolerated in his own country, he settled in Poland 1612, where he became professor to the unitarians. He died at Racovia of an epidemic fever in his 43d year. He was a man of very extensive learning. He wrote among other things several tracts upon the new testament, and an answer to Grotius' book de satisfactione Christi, against Socinus, which Grotius treated with respect, and acknowledged to be drawn up with moderation. His works form two vols. folio.

CREMONINI, Cesar, an Italian philosopher, who was born at Cento in the Modenese, and died at Padua of the plague at the age of 80, 1630. He was professor at Ferrara and Padua, and he published several works in Italian on philosophy, in support of the doctrines of Aristotle, in which he maintained the materiality of the soul.

CRENIUS, Thomas, a native of Brandenburg, corrector of the press at Rotterdam and Leyden. He died at Leyden 1728, aged 89. His writings, which are in Latin, are very numerous, and chiefly on philological subjects.

CREQUI, Charles de, prince de Foix, duke de Lesdiguières, was marshal and peer of France, and distinguished himself by his duel with don Philippin, bastard of Savoy, to whom in the first encounter he granted his life, but slew in the second. His valor was displayed against the Spaniards at the relief at Aft and Verrue, at the taking of Pignerol and the Maurienne, and at the battle of Thesin. He was killed by a canon ball at the siege of Bremen 1638, in his 60th year. He was also an able and eloquent negociator, as these verses made on his death affirm:

Qui fuit eloqui flumen, qui flumen in armis

Ad flumen, Martis flumine, clarus obit.

He married successively two daughters of the constable de Lesdiguières, by the first of whom only he had children.

CREQUI, Francis de, great-grandson of the foregoing, was marshal of France, and a man of heroic courage. Though defeated in 1675 near Confarbrick on the Sarne, he flew to the relief of Treves, and chose rather to surrender at discretion than capitulate. In the campaigns of 1677 and 1678, he displayed prodigies of valor. He defeated the duke of Lorraine at Kochersberg, took Friburg, pursued his dispirited enemies towards Offenburg, and burnt the bridge of Strasburg. He took Luxemburg in 1684, and died three years after, february 4th, 1687, aged 63. He was commander of the galleys since 1661.

CRESCENS, a cynic philosopher, who attacked the Christians, and prevailed upon the people to put Justin to death, because he had refuted his opinions, in the second century.

CRESCEMBENI, John Maria, an Italian, born at Maurata in Ancona 1663. He was founder of the celebrated Arcadian academy for the reformation of learning, taste, and criticism. He was its first director in 1690, and continued so till his death 1728. He was eminent both as a poet and a prose writer. His chief works are a valuable history of Italian poetry, reprinted six vols. 4to. Venice 1731,—and an history of the academy of Arcadia, with anecdotes of its members, seven vols. 4to. history of vulgar poetry, &c. seven vols. 4to.

CRESCENTIUS, Peter de, a native of Boulogne in the 14th century, who, to avoid the troubles of his country, travelled for 30 years as a law practitioner. On his return he published his valuable work on agriculture, called called opus ruralium commodorum, dedicated to Charles II. of Sicily. The best edition is Gefner's, Leipzig 1735. It has been translated into various languages.

CRESPI, Daniel, a Bolognese painter who died 1630, aged 38. His portraits have great merit, and especially his church paintings.

CRESPI, Giuseppe Maria, a painter of Bologna, who died 1747, aged 82. His method of painting was in a darkened room, with a few rays from the sun or from the light of a flambeau, by which he gave greater vivacity to his subjects, and a more judicious distribution of light and shade.

CRESSY, Hugh Paulin, an English divine, born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, and educated there and at Oxford, where he became fellow of Merton college. He was chaplain to Thomas lord Wentworth, and afterwards to Lucius lord Falkland in Ireland, from whom he obtained the deanry of Loughlin, and a canonry of Windfor, which however he never enjoyed. After the death of Falkland he travelled with Bertie afterwards lord Falkmouth; but in Italy, listening to the persuasions of the catholics, he became a convert, and made a public profession of his faith at Rome 1646. From Rome he came to Paris, and was taken under the protection of queen Henrietta, and afterwards retired to the college of Douay, where he changed his name to Serenus de Cressley, and during seven years' residence published several valuable and laborious works. At the restoration he came to England, and was chaplain to queen Catharine, and resided in Somerset-house, Strand. Though a catholic he was however respected universally, as he never interfered with the intrigues and politics of the times. His pen indeed was frequently engaged in the defence of his faith, but whilst his friends considered him as their ablest champion, the protestants respected him as a learned, judicious, and candid writer. His attack on one of Stillingfleet's works raised against him the censures of his old friend Clarendon, whom he answered with spirit but moderation. The unpopularity of popery at last induced him to spend the last period of his life away from the capital, and he retired to East Grinstead in Sussex, where he died soon after, 10th of August 1674, aged 70. His mild, humane, and humble deportment had endeared him to all ranks of people. The most known and valuable of his works is his ecclesiastical history, of which only one volume was published, as the second, in which he meant to bring down the history to the dissolution of monasteries, was left incomplete at his death.

CRESTI, Dominico, an historical painter, the pupil of Zuccherò, known by the name of Passignano, from the place of his birth, near Florence. He died 1638, aged 80.

CRETIN, William du Bois, surnamed, a French poet, whose chief merit was puns, low wit, and equivokes. He was historian royal under Charles VIII. Lewis XII. and Francis I. and died in 1525. Marot admired him greatly; but the judgment of posterity is not so favorable. His works were reprinted in 12mo. 1724, at Paris.

CREVIER, John Baptiste Lewis, professor of rhetoric at Paris, is known as the pupil of Rollin, and the finisher of his Roman history. He published an edition of Livy, 6 vols. 12mo.—the history of the Roman emperors to Constantine, 12 vols. 12mo.—the history of the university of Paris, 7 vols. 12mo.—rhetorique Francoise, &c. He died 1765, in an advanced age, respected as a man of talents and of extensive knowledge.

CREW, Nathaniel, bishop of Durham, was born Jan. 31, 1634, and succeeded to the title of lord Crew on the death of his brother. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, was proctor of the university 1663, afterwards clerk of the closet to Charles II., dean of Chichester, bishop of Oxford 1671, and three years after translated to Durham. On the accession of James II. he was admitted of the privy council, and showed himself very friendly to all the measures of the court, in religion and in politics. He paid particular respect to the pope's nuncio, when he came to London, and refused to introduce dean Partrick to the king, because he was too zealous against popery. The unpopularity of James's government, and the landing of the prince of Orange, however, made great alterations in the bishop's conduct. He withdrew from the king's councils, and, upon the abdication, he expressed a wish to resign his ecclesiastical dignities to Dr. Burnet, with an allowance of £1000 for life. He afterwards left his retirement, and appeared in parliament; but his name was excepted from the act of indemnity of 1690. His pardon, however, at last was procured by the intercession of his friends, and he passed the remainder of his days in peace. He died September 12th, 1721, aged 88. Notwithstanding his adherence to the violent, illegal, and arbitrary measures of a corrupted court, he was a liberal patron, and his munificence in favor of the indigent, and of public bodies, is a convincing proof of the goodness of his heart.

CRICHTON, James, a Scotchman of the 16th century, whose adventures and personal endowments, have procured him the name of "the admirable Crichton." He was born in 1551, or according to lord Buchan, in 1560. His father was lord advocate of Scotland, and by his mother, who was a Stuart, he was descended from king Robert II. He was educated at Perth, and at the university of St. Andrew's, where, under the tuition of professor Rutherford, he made such wonderful progress, that at the age of 20 he had run through the whole circle of science, and could write and speak to perfection 10 different languages. Thus gifted with mental endowments, and aided by all the advantages of a graceful person, elegant manners, and polite accomplishments, he travelled to Paris, where he publicly challenged the most renowned scholars, to dispute with him in any art or science which they pleased, and in 12 languages. On the appointed day he appeared at the college of Navarre, and from 9 in the morning till 6 in the evening, he so defeated his opponents, and astonished his auditors, that the president in admiration, with four of the most eminent professors of the university, presented him with a diamond ring, and a purse of gold, as a token of their approbation. The next day, not exhausted by preceding exertions, he appeared at the Louvre, and exhibited such feats in tilting, that, in the presence of the princes of the court, he carried away the ring 15 times successively, and broke as many lances on the Saracens. At Rome he challenged the wits and the learned of that city, to propose any question to him, to which he would give an immediate answer, and in the presence of the pope, the cardinals, and great men of the place, he obtained in his defence fence as much éclat as he had received at Paris. Boccacini however asserts, that his challenge was received with pasquinades, and that he retired from Rome in disgust. From Rome he passed to Venice, where he introduced himself by an elaborate poem, to the notice and friendship of the learned Aldus Manutius. He gained also the friendship of Laurentius Muffa, Spero, Speronius, John Donatus, and other learned persons, and after he had been honored with an audience from the doge and the senate, in which he astonished them by the rapidity of his eloquence, and the gracefulness of his manners, he visited Padua. At Padua he pronounced an extempore poem, on the beauties of the university, and after disputing for six hours, with the most celebrated professors, and refuting the doctrines of Aristotle, he concluded by delivering an oration in praise of ignorance, which excited universal applause. He further exposed the errors of Aristotle, in the presence of the university, and for three days astonished his hearers, supported his propositions, and obtained the praises and the acclamations of the most crowded audiences. At Mantua he displayed his bodily agility by attacking and killing a gladiator, who had foiled the most skilful fencers in Europe, and had lately slain three antagonists; and with great benevolence, this admirable Scotsman bestowed the reward he obtained for this exploit, upon the widows of the three persons who lately had lost their lives. The duke of Mantua was so pleased with him, that he appointed him tutor to his son Gonzaga, a youth of dissolute manners, and of an unprincipled heart. Crichton, to show his gratitude, and to support his fame, wrote in consequence of this, a comedy, in which he acted in 15 different characters, and all with inimitable success. In the midst of his popularity, while walking during the carnival, and playing upon his guitar in the streets of Mantua, he was suddenly attacked by six men in masks. Their number proved no defence against the superior dexterity of Crichton, they were all disarmed, and the leader falling on his knees, begged for life. It was Crichton's pupil, to whom the astonished master recollecting his rank, immediately presented his sword, with every apology for the opposition which he had made. Instead of accepting the generosity, the perfidious prince buried the sword into his defenceless bosom. The cause of this brutal and cruel action in Gonzaga, is ascribed by some to jealousy, because Crichton was a greater favorite in the eyes of some admired lady; but others attribute it to a drunken frolick, leaving it undetermined whether the meeting was designed or accidental. This happened July 1583, though lord Buchan fixes it on the preceding year, and asserts that he was then 22, though others with greater probability make him 32 years old. His death was universally lamented, the people of Mantua mourned for him three fourths of a year, and his picture appeared in the chambers and houses of every Italian. To the character already mentioned, it may be added, that Crichton's memory was universally retentive, and he was naturally endowed with great powers for declamation, unexhausted fluency of speech, and unusual readiness to reply.

CRILLON, Lewis de Berthon de, a French general, knight of Malta, descended from a noble Italian family, was born 1541. At the age of 15 he merited the notice of Henry II.

by his valor at the siege of Calais, and he distinguished himself afterwards against the Huguenots at the battles of Dreux, Jarnac, and Moncontour. At the battle of Lepanto in 1571, his valor was conspicuously displayed, as well as in the other encounters of these warlike and perilous times, so that he was deservedly called by Henry IV. the brave Crillon. At the peace of Vervins he retired to his estates at Avignon, where he died 2d December 1615, aged 74. Bening a Jesuit pronounced his funeral oration in a bombastic stile, and Madame de Luffon published his life in 2 vols. 12mo. Besides great and incomparable valor, Crillon possessed integrity, honor, and virtue, and when invited by Henry III. to murder Guise, he answered that he would fight him, but be no assassin.

CRILLON MAHON, N. duke de, distinguished himself in the seven years' war, and afterwards quitted the service of France for that of Spain, where he was made a grandee of the first order. In the war between England and Spain he was placed at the head of the armies, and had the good fortune to take Minorca, in 1782, in consequence of which he assumed the name of Mahon from the capital of the island. In his attempts to reduce Gibraltar he was more unfortunate, and saw the measures he adopted all baffled by the superior valor of the English, and the vigilant care of general Elliot. In the revolutionary war he would take no part in the cause of Spain, but remained neuter. He died at Madrid 1796, aged 80.

CRINESIUS, Christopher, a native of Bohemia, professor of theology at Altorf, where he died 1626, aged 42. He wrote a dissertation on the confusion of tongues,—Exercitationes Hebraicæ.—Lexicon Syriacum. 4to. two vols.—lingua Samaritica, &c.

CRINITUS, Petrus, a native of Florence, professor of belles lettres, after Angelus Politianus. He was a man of great learning, but addicted to the basest sensualities. He died 1505, aged 40. He wrote lives of the Latin poets, and de honestâ disciplinâ, besides poems of no great merit.

CRISP, Tobias, the champion of Antinomianism, was educated at Eton, and took his bachelor's degree at Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Baliol, Oxford, where he took his degrees of D.D. He was rector of Brinkworth, Wilts, in 1627, and there he lived in a hospitable manner, regular, virtuous, and devout. He came to London in 1642, where his tenets respecting grace opposed him in a controversy with 52 divines. He died 27th february 1642. His sermons were reprinted 1689. He asserted in his discourse "Christ alone exalted," that salvation was completed on the cross, and that belief was all that was required of the happy elect.

CRIIAS, one of the 30 tyrants appointed over Athens by Lyfander. He fell in battle B.C. 400.

CRITO, one of the pupils and friends of the great Socrates.

CRITOEBULUS, a physician, who is said to have extracted the arrow which wounded the eye of Philip of Macedonia.

CRITOLAUS, a Greek historian.

CRITOLAUS, a native of Tegea in Arcadia, who fought against the Pheneans. When defeated by the Romans he poisoned himself B.C. 146.

CROESE, Gerard, a protestant divine of Amsterdam, author author of the history of the quakers, translated into English, and of Homerus Hebræus. He died 1710, aged 68, near Dordrecht.

CÆSUS, last king of Lydia, is famous for his opulence and his liberal patronage of learned men. He was defeated by Cyrus king of Persia B.C. 548, and reduced to privacy.

CROIUS or DE CROI, John, a native of Uzer, who became there a protestant minister. He wrote Specimen conjecturarum, & observationum in quædam Origenis, Irenæi, & Tertulliani loca, 1682,—observationes sacræ & histor. in Nov. Testam. 1644, &c. He died 1659.

CROFT, Herbert, an English prelate, descended from an ancient family, was born at Great Milton, Oxfordshire, 18th October 1603, at the seat of sir William Greene. At 13 he was sent to Oxford, but upon the conversion of his father to popery, he was removed from the university, and placed in the monastery of Douay, and afterwards in the college at St. Omer's. A visit to England on family affairs introduced him to the acquaintance of Morton bishop of Durham, who prevailed upon him to return to the protestant faith, and, by the advice of Laud, he again entered at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was now preferred to a living in Gloucestershire, and to another in Oxfordshire, and in 1639, he was made prebendary of Salisbury, and the next year took his degree of D.D. He was afterwards prebendary of Worcester, canon of Windsor, and in 1644 dean of Hereford, but he suffered like all loyal subjects during those troublous times, till in 1659, by the death of his two elder brothers, he succeeded to all the estates of his family. At the restoration he was raised to the see of Hereford 1661, which he refused to quit for higher preferment, employing himself in deeds of charity, benevolence, hospitality, and frequent exhortation from the pulpit. His small treatise "the naked truth," printed at a private press, was published in 1575, when the papists hoped to take advantage of the quarrels of the nonconformists with the church of England, and it became a popular work, which not only drew the attention of parliament to the subject, but produced some severe attacks against it. One of these, by Dr. Turner of St. John's college, Cambridge, was answered by Andrew Marvell, who applauded the bishop's works, and ably defended his principles. Besides this, the bishop published some occasional sermons, religious tracts, a legacy to his diocese, and in 1685, animadversion on Burnet's theory of the earth. In the latter part of his life he wished to resign his bishopric from some scruples of conscience. He died at Hereford 18th May 1691, and was buried in the cathedral. His only son Herbert was made a baronet by Charles II. 1671, and died 1720.

CROFT, William, a musician, born at Nether-Eaton, Warwickshire. He was pupil to Dr. Blow, whom he succeeded as master of the children, and composer to the chapel royal, and organist, at Westminster-abbey. In 1712 he published his divine harmony, and in 1715 he became D. Mus. and in 1724 he published by subscription his "musica sacra," two vols. He died August 1727, aged 50, from an illness occasioned by his attendance at the coronation of George II. He was buried in Westminster-abbey.

CROFTON, Zachary, an Irish non-conformist, educated at Dublin. During the Irish troubles he came to England, and obtained the living of Wrenbury in Cheshire, from which he was expelled in 1648, for refusing to take the engagement. He afterwards held St. Botolph's near Aldgate. At the restoration he engaged in a controversy with bishop Gauden, who combated the superiority of his learning by imprisoning him in the tower, from which he was with difficulty liberated. He afterwards lived in Cheshire, and lastly opened a school near Aldgate, where he died 1672. He was author of some controversial pamphlets.

CROIX DU MAINE, Francis Grude de la, a learned French writer in the 16th century. He was passionately fond of literature, and made a most valuable collection of books. He published in 1584, his French library, or a general account of all authors, who wrote in that language. The time of his death is unknown.

CROIX, Francis Petit de la, secretary and interpreter to the French king, in the Turkish and Arabic, died November 4th, 1695, aged 73. He was a man of great integrity and refused to be bribed by the Algerines, to make a treaty with them favorable to their interests. He digested Thevenot's voyages to the East Indies, he made an accurate catalogue of all the Turkish and Persian books in the French king's library, and composed besides two dictionaries for the French and Turkish languages, and also a learned history of Genghis Khan, with a good map of the north of Asia. His son added an abridgment of the lives of those authors from whom it was extracted, which was translated into English 1722, in 8vo.

CROMPTON, William, M. A. was born at Barnstaple, of which, after an Oxford education, he became minister. He was ejected after the restoration for nonconformity, but his manners were so inoffensive, and his conduct so virtuous, that he was respected by his congregation among whom he still preached in private houses, till his death 1696. He published a remedy against superstition, and other small tracts.

CROMWELL, Thomas, earl of Essex, an eminent statesman under Henry VIII. was son of a blacksmith at Putney, Surrey, and born about 1490. His education like his origin was low, but he possessed strong natural parts, which he improved by indefatigable application. He was at Antwerp for some time, as clerk to the English factory, and he afterwards travelled on the continent, as the private agent of the king, and in the character of a soldier, he was engaged with Bourbon in the sacking of Rome. On his return to England, he was admitted into Wolsey's family, and completely gained his confidence and friendship, which he repaid with the strongest attachment, and by a most able and eloquent defence of him in the house of commons, when he was impeached. After Wolsey's fall, he served the king with equal fidelity, and was rewarded with honors and riches. He gradually rose to be a privy counsellor, chancellor of the exchequer, secretary of state, master of the rolls, keeper of the privy seal, earl of Essex, and high chamberlain of England. His zeal in the reformation was very pleasing to the king, and he not only directed his vengeance in the dissolution of the abbeys and monasteries, but largely shared in the spoils of the plundered church. In destroying the relics of popery, he was the means of introducing good regulations, tions, and he provided that the bible should be read in English, in the several churches, and also that a register of births, marriages, and burials, should be regularly kept. The prosperity, however, which he had long enjoyed, was now all at once destroyed, by the active part which he took in procuring the marriage of his master with Anne of Cleves. Henry, dissatisfied with his new queen, wreaked his vengeance on his favorite, who had promoted his union, and Cromwell, unpopular for the dissolution of religious houses, and the large subsidies which he had extorted from the people, was now arrested, and arraigned as a traitor. Though forsaken by all his former friends, except the undaunted Cranmer, and unable to find one defender, for fear of the royal resentment, he yet pleaded for mercy in a letter to the king in such moving terms, that Henry read it three times, and probably would have pardoned him, had not his passion for Catharine Howard kindled his fury. Cromwell suffered on Tower-hill, after six weeks' imprisonment, July 16th, 1540. Though abused by the papists as cruel, ambitious, and crafty, he is represented as preferring men of learning and abilities, more than any of his predecessors ever had done. His son was created lord Cromwell.

CROMWELL, Oliver, the celebrated protector of England, was born of a very respectable family at Huntingdon 25th April 1599. He received his education in the grammar-school of his native town, and in 1616 was admitted as fellow commoner at Sidney college Cambridge. He did not however here pay much attention to academical studies, as foot-ball, cricket and other exercises, were more congenial to his pursuits, and therefore his mother, now become a widow, sent him in 1618 to Lincoln's-Inn. Irregularities here prevailed, and licentious and intemperate pleasures engaged his attention more than the law, till at last when 21 he married Elizabeth the daughter of sir James Bouchier of Essex, and retired to lead a regular life at Huntingdon. Some time after he removed into the isle of Ely, where his uncle had left him an estate of 420*l.* a year, and then he relinquished the principles of the church of England, and became a zealous puritan. He was elected into parliament in 1628, and distinguished himself by his violence against the bishops; but the warmth with which he supported ministers of his own persuasion soon reduced his fortunes and obliged him to take a farm at St Ives. For five years he endeavoured to improve his income in agricultural pursuits, but instead of increasing it, he nearly ruined himself, and in 1637 he formed the plan of passing over to New-England, which he was prevented from doing by a proclamation from the king, against migration. As he had acquired some distinction among the puritans for his gift of preaching, praying, and expounding; he had the interest by means of the people of his persuasion to recommend himself to the corporation of Cambridge, and to be chosen their representative in the parliament of 1640. In the house he was a frequent speaker, but, without art or elocution, he exclaimed warmly against grievances in church and state, and zealously promoted the remonstrance of November 1641 which laid the basis of civil war. Courtied by the leading men of opposition, by his relation Hampden, by Pym, and others who knew his firmness and his devotion, he became well acquainted with the intrigues of the times, and when the parliament resolved in 1642 to levy war, he went to Cambridge, where he raised a troop of horse, of which he took the command. His severity to the loyal members of the university, who contributed their plate to the service of the king, was very culpable; but his wish was to destroy every thing which tended to support the royal cause, and in this attempt he evinced such zeal and activity that in a few months he acquired the character of a good officer, and his soldiers were the best disciplined troops in the kingdom. After various proofs of his devotion to the republican party, Cromwell, who was now become a lieutenant-general had an opportunity of distinguishing himself at the battle of Marston-moor 3d July 1644, where his cavalry, called Ironsides, charged the fortune of the day, and ensured victory wherever they appeared. At the second battle of Newbury, his intrepidity again appeared conspicuous, his valor and services were regarded as so extraordinary, that he was called the saviour of the nation and in the self denying ordinance which was passed by the parliament, for the exclusion of officers from seats in the house, Cromwell alone was exempted. His successes continued to ensure the approbation of the republicans, and the fatal battle of Naseby, 14th June 1645, established his triumph as the ablest general of the times, and the firmest supporter of the public liberties of the state. He was thanked by the parliament and rewarded with a pension, but while the popular leaders considered him as fully devoted to their services they soon saw cause to doubt his sincerity. When the king had thrown himself into the hands of the Scotch and had been shamefully sold to the English, the parliament began to regard the army whose services had ensured them the victory as useless and dangerous, and therefore ordered part of it to be disbanded, but Cromwell by his intrigues prevented the execution of their plans, and whilst he stepped forth as the advocate of their rights against the tyranny of the parliament, he secured fully to his person the attachment of the soldiers. No sooner was the king lodged in Holmby castle than the artful general made himself master of his person by means of cornet Joyce, and thus by declaring himself the arbiter of his fate, he was courted and flattered both by the unfortunate Charles, who wished for his own release, and by the parliament, who labored for his destruction. After rendering the king more unpopular with the parliament, and the parliament suspected to the army, Cromwell at last took the bold measure of excluding from the house of commons those members whom he knew to be averse to his schemes of ambition, and the trial of the devoted monarch soon after followed. Cromwell acted openly as one of his judges, and he signed the warrant for his execution, and by this bloody deed thus paved the way to his own greatness. The government was now placed in the hands of a council of state, whose decisions were directed by the artful general; but while he considered himself as secure, his power was threatened by rebellion in the army, and even in his own favorite regiment. With his usual presence of mind he appeared among the rioters, supported by some regiments on whom he could depend, and calling four men by name out of the ranks, he made them cast dice for their life, and obliged the two that escaped to shoot the others. Having thus restored tranquillity he was received every where with marks of respect, and satisfied that the spirit of insubordination was subdued in England and Scotland, he embarked with an army for Ireland 1649. He quickly here routed the enemies of the republic, and with such acts of inhumanity that his very name became a terror to the Irish. In 1650 he returned to London, and was publicly thanked for his services by the submissive commons who invested him with the chief command of the army in Scotland, where Charles II. had been acknowledged king. He marched to the north with his usual rapidity, and on the 3d September 1650 he defeated the Scotch army in a dreadful battle, at Dunbar, and the next year, on the same auspicious day, he completed the ruin of Charles' fortunes by the crowning victory, as he said, at Worcester. His success was regarded as so important that a general thanksgiving was appointed, and the third of September declared an anniversary state holiday. In the midst of these public honors Cromwell never lost sight of his ambitious projects. Though commander in chief of the whole island, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, he found that his power depended on the will of the parliament, and therefore he determined to dismiss them. Whilst the commons and the council of the officers were distracted by opposite opinions on subjects of government, Cromwell forwarded secretly his own views, and all at once rising up in his seat in the house, he bade the speaker leave the chair, and the whole body be gone and give place to honest men; and filling the room with armed soldiers he turned the whole assembly out, and locking up the doors he retired to Whitehall. The dismissal of the parliament was followed by that of the council of state, and the appointment of a body of officers, subordinate to the usurper's authority. Though he permitted a mock assembly to be called, under the name of council of state, he was soon after displeased with their conduct, and by the voice of his general officers, he assumed the title of protector of the commonwealth of England, and was invested with the new office, 16th Dec. 1653, in the chancery court, Westminster-hall. Thus absolute in the government, he appointed a council of state, consisting of men of superior wisdom and sagacity, and adopted such measures as could give stability to his power, and add to the security and independence of the kingdom. Peace was made with Sweden, Holland, Portugal, and France, the most upright judges filled the courts of Westminster-hall, and liberty of conscience was tolerated with the most magnanimous moderation. Notwithstanding the popularity of his measures, however, he met with opposition from the people, and the parliament, which he assembled with great solemnity, presumed to dispute the legality of his office, and were dismissed with a severe reprimand. In 1655, though threatened with conspiracies, he supported with vigorous hand the honor of the nation. Blake conquered Jamaica, and humbled the native powers on the Mediterranean shores, who had plundered the British commerce, and a treaty of offensive alliance was formed with France against the Spaniards in the Netherlands, and Dunkirk was taken possession of by the English. The expences of government were however such, that the protector called another parliament, 19th Sep. 1656, but to ensure their obedience, he obliged them at the door of the house to swear allegiance to his person. This had due effect, the members awed into deference for his power: not only voted him supplies, but decreed new statutes for the security of his authority, and bestowed upon him the title of king, which by the advice of his friends and relations, and much against his inclination, he declined. He however, assumed the power of creating peers, and again, to give greater dignity to his authority, he was in 1657 a second time inaugurated protector in Westminster-hall, with all the pride and pomp of a coronation. At the end of a year his fears were alarmed by the publication of "killing no murder," a pamphlet by colonel Titus, which directed against him the dagger of every bold assassin, and in 1658 he felt not a little disappointment at the conduct of his parliament, which he addressed as composed of lords and commons, in the usual language of the kings of England, though none of the ancient nobility condescended to appear among them. These open insults, together with the secret machinations of his enemies and the general odium of the people, was increased by the death of his favorite daughter Mrs. Claypole, who on her death-bed bitterly reproached him with the tyranny of his conduct. The severe agitations of his mind at last undermined the powers of his constitution, and his deportment became altered, he grew reserved and suspicious, and the attacks of a slow fever were succeeded by a tertian ague. Though the disorder seemed at first not alarming, his physicians perceived his danger, but regardless of their intimations, he depended upon the prayers of the godly for recovery, and hoped that the interference of heaven would be exerted for his preservation. His disorder proved fatal, 3d September 1658. He was carried with great funeral pomp from Somerset-house and buried in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster-abbey, but after the restoration his body was taken up and hung on the gallows. Though an usurper and a tyrant, Cromwell possessed great powers of mind and contributed much to the prosperity and glory of the nation. Not only Milton defended his government, but Waller, Sprat, Dryden, and Cowley, celebrated his virtues and the triumph of his protectorate. How blameworthy soever he might have been in the acquisition of his power, observes one of his biographers, he certainly rivalled the greatest of the English monarchs in glory, and made himself courted and dreaded by the nations around him. In his religious opinions he was a wavering fanatic, and though grave and demure he had the hypocrisy to adopt such tenets only as tended best to secure his usurpation. Of all his children only six lived to maturity: Richard his successor, who held the protectorate with feeble hands, and resigned it for a life of ease and obscurity, was born 4th October 1626, and died at Cheshunt, July 13th 1712: Henry, born 20th January 1627, was lieutenant of Ireland, and died 25th March 1674: Bridget, who married Ireton, and afterwards general Fleetwood: Elizabeth, his favorite daughter who married Mr. Claypole of Northamptonshire: Mary, who married lord Fauconberg, and is supposed to have interested herself warmly for the restoration of Charles II. and died March 1712: And Frances, the youngest, who married Mr. Rich, grandson to lord Warwick, and afterwards for the army by his father; but his inclinations were bent to literature; and the perusal of des Cartes' works totally directed his attention to mathematics and philosophy. After travelling over Europe, he was elected professor, and, in 1706, made rector of the academy of Lausanne, and, in 1724, mathematical professor at Groningen. He was afterwards preceptor to Frederic of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the king of Sweden, and, after being engaged in some embassies, he returned to Lausanne, where he died, 1748, aged 85. He wrote essay on logic, afterwards enlarged to 6 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on beauty, 2 vols. 12mo.—on the liberty of thinking—on ancient and modern pyrrhonism, folio.—sermons—commentary on Pope's essay on man—miscellaneous works—and pieces on philosophy and mathematics.

CRONECK, John Frederic baron de, born at Anspach, died of the small-pox, 1758, aged 27. He distinguished himself as a sensible and ingenious poet. He travelled over Europe, and at Paris gained the friendship of the learned and the great. His works were printed in German, at Leipzig, 1760.

CRONSTEDT, Axel Frederic, a native of Sudermania, in Sweden, educated at Upsal, where he applied himself to natural history. He was employed as inspector of the mines, 1744, and in 1753 was elected member of the royal academy of sciences at Stockholm. He published various works on the arrangement of minerals and the fossil productions of nature. He died 1765, aged 43.

CROOK, sir George, was born at Chilton, Bucks, and educated at Oxford, and the Inner-temple. He rose to the offices of king's serjeant, justice of the common pleas, and chief justice of England. In the commons, he voted against ship-money. He died at Watlington, Oxfordshire, 1641, aged 82. He founded and endowed an hospital at Beachley, in Buckinghamshire, where also he built a chapel.

CROSBY, Brass, lord mayor of London, was born at Stockton-upon-Tees in 1725, and early came to London, where he practised as an attorney. He purchased the place of remembrancer to the city, in 1760, which he sold again the next year, and in 1764 he was elected sheriff, the next year alderman, and in 1770 lord mayor. In this high office he distinguished himself by his opposition to the court, in the prosecution of Wheble and other printers; and he spiritedly supported Wilkes and Oliver, for which he was sent to the Tower. During his confinement, his conduct was applauded by the city, and various addresses came to him from some counties and respectable towns. He was released, 23d July, by the prorogation of parliament, and conducted to the mansion-house in great pomp by the populace, and honored, at the expiration of his office, by the thanks of the corporation, and the vote of a cup of £100 value. He died 14th February 1793.

CROSS, Michael, an English artist, who was employed by Charles I. to copy the best pictures of Italy. It is said, that being permitted by the doge of Venice to copy the Madonna of Raphael, in St. Mark's church, he left his copy behind, and brought away the original, which, in the time of the republic, was sold to the Spanish ambassador, and now adorns the Escorial.

CROSS, Lewis, a painter, who died 1724. He retouched a picture of Mary queen of Scots, in the possession of the duke of Hamilton, and with such effect, that several copies have been taken from it.

CROUSAZ, John Peter de, a mathematician of eminence, born at Lausanne 13th April 1663. He was intended for the army by his father; but his inclinations were bent to literature; and the perusal of des Cartes' works totally directed his attention to mathematics and philosophy. After travelling over Europe, he was elected professor, and, in 1706, made rector of the academy of Lausanne, and, in 1724, mathematical professor at Groningen. He was afterwards preceptor to Frederic of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the king of Sweden, and, after being engaged in some embassies, he returned to Lausanne, where he died, 1748, aged 85. He wrote essay on logic, afterwards enlarged to 6 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on beauty, 2 vols. 12mo.—on the liberty of thinking—on ancient and modern pyrrhonism, folio.—sermons—commentary on Pope's essay on man—miscellaneous works—and pieces on philosophy and mathematics.

CROWNE, John, a native of Nova Scotia, who came over to England, eager to acquire fame and independence by the powers of his mind. His distresses at first were so great that he became upper servant in an old lady's family, from which he soon extricated himself by the wit and humor of his writings. He became a favorite with the court, and was employed by Charles II. at the request of Rochester, to write the masque of Calypso. Upon the discovery of the popish plot, he embraced the part of the tories, and wrote his "city politics," to satyrise the whigs, a comedy, which, while it procured him applause, excited against him the resentment of a powerful faction. Anxious now to retire from the intrigues and persecutions of politics, he petitioned the king for a place for life; to which Charles assented, provided he wrote another comedy. Even the king himself assisted him, by recommending him to borrow from the Spanish comedy of "non pued esser;" from which was produced the play of Sir Courtly Nice; but, on the last day of rehearsal before the comedy could be acted, the king died, and all the hopes of the poet were dashed to the ground. Instead of independence, Crowne now had recourse to his wit for maintenance. He died about 1703, author of 17 plays, besides the "church scuffle," a heroic poem, and two other poems, Pandion and Amphigenia, and the Dæneids.

CROXALL, Dr. Samuel, was born at Walton-upon-Thames, Surrey, and educated at Eton school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. At the university he wrote the fair Circassian, which he dedicated to Mrs Anna Maria Mordaunt, of whom it is said he was deeply enamoured, but as the poem was a licentious imitation of Solomon's songs, he carefully avoided disclosing himself to be the author, before he applied for ordination. He obtained the living of Hampton, Middlesex, the parishes of St. Mary Somerset, and Mountshaw, London, and became chancellor, prebendary, and canon of Hereford, and afterwards added the archdeaconry of Salop and the living of Sellek to his other preferments. As the church of Hereford was governed by him during the old age of bishop Egerton, he very improperly pulled down an old chapel adjoining the palace, to build a house for his brother. His politics inclined to the whigs, and hence in queen Anne's reign he wrote in their support, and published his two cantos in imitation of Spenser, to satyrise Harley's administration. He wrote besides "the Vision," a poem addressed to lord Halifax,—the fables of Ætop,—scripture politics,—the royal manual,—and all the dedications prefixed to “Select Novels.” He died at a great age, February 13, 1752.

CROZE, Mathurin Veyssiere la, born at Nantz 1661, became a Benedictine monk in 1678, and distinguished himself by his extensive learning. A bold and independent mode of thinking, added to disgust and disappointment, induced him to abandon his order and his religion in 1696. He made his recantation at Basil, and employed himself in Berlin as an instructor of youth, as librarian to the king, and as professor of philosophy. He died 1739, aged 78. He wrote some valuable works, dissertations historiques, &c.—an Armenian dictionary, 4to. compiled after twelve years’ labor—histoire du Christianisme des Indes, 12mo.—du Christianisme d’Ethiopie, & d’Armenie, &c.

CRUCIGER, Gaspas, a protestant of Leipzig, author of some commentaries on scripture. He died at Wittemberg 1548, aged 45.

CRUDEN, Alexander, M.A. was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college there. He settled in London in 1728, and kept a bookseller’s shop under the royal exchange; but maintained himself chiefly by superintending publications for the press. In 1737 his Concordance was published, and it again appeared improved in 1761, as a most valuable book. Cruden was occasionally deranged. About the year 1738 he went on a romantic view to reform the English universities, and was soon after confined at Chelsea. He was a second time in confinement in a mad-house, and was at last found dead, in a praying posture, at Islington, 1774, aged 70. He was a worthy, pious, and inoffensive man.

CRUSIUS, or KRANS, Martin, a native of Bamberg, professor of belles lettres at Tubingen, and the first who taught Greek in Germany, died at Elstringen 1607, aged 81. He is the learned compiler of Turco-Græciæ, libri octo 1584—annales Suevici ad ann. 1549—Germano-Græciæ, libri sex, 1585, fol.

CRUZ, Juana Inez de la, an ingenious lady, born at Mexico. She was naturally endowed with great powers of mind, which were carefully cultivated, and rendered her well skilled in philosophy, history, mathematics, poetry, and every branch of literature. The poems which she published possessed great merit, according to the opinion of father Feyjod. The best part of her life was spent in the seclusion of the monastery of St. Geronimo, where she died, after 27 years’ residence, aged 44, in 1695.

CRYPTOPYLUS, Metrophanes, a Greek, who studied the Latin and English languages at Baliol college, Oxford, and returned in 1622 to his own country, where the patriarch of Constantinople made him his secretary and chancellor. He was raised to the see of Alexandria on the translation of Cyril Lucar. The confession of faith attributed to Cyril, and published in Greek, 1629, was written by him. He died after 1641.

CTESIAS, a Greek physician in the service of Artaxerxes, king of Persia. He wrote a history of Persia.

CTESIBIUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, B.C. 125, known as the inventor of the pump, the water-clock, &c.

CTESIPHON, an Athenian, whose attempt to decree a golden crown to Demosthenes was opposed by Æschines, and produced the two famous orations of the rival orators de coronâ.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, a celebrated divine, born 1617, at Aller, Somersetshire, where his father was rector. He was of Emanuel college, of which he became fellow and tutor, and where he had among his pupils sir William Temple. In 1641 he was presented to the rectory of North Cadbury, Somersetshire, and the following year he published his “discourse concerning the true notion of the Lord’s supper,” and afterwards his treatise “the union of Christ and the church, a shadow.” In 1644 he took his degree of B.D. and was that year appointed master of Clare-hall, and the year after regius professor of Hebrew. In 1647 he preached before the house of commons, for which he received the thanks of the house. In 1651 he took his degree of D.D. and three years after was elected master of Christ’s college, at which time he also married. He was, in 1657, one of those who were consulted by parliament about the English translation of the bible, and by his learning and consequence he gained the friendship of Whitelocke, and of Thurloe the able secretary of the two protectorates. At the restoration, Cudworth wrote a copy of congratulatory verses to the sovereign, and, in 1662, he was presented by Sheldon bishop of London to the vicarage of Ashwell, Hertfordshire. In 1678 he was installed prebendary of Gloucester, and he then published in folio his famous work, “the true intellectual system of the universe, wherein the reason and philosophy of atheism are confuted, and its impossibility demonstrated.” This work, from its nature and importance, had many assailants; but it is acknowledged by Dryden, Bayle, and Shaftesbury, that he was so fair and moderate in his principles that he almost betrayed the cause which he meant to defend. A warm dispute was raised in consequence between him and le Clerc. The work was translated into Latin, in 1733, by the learned Mosheim, and the original was republished, in 1743, in 2 vols. 4to. by Dr. Birch, with great additions, and with an accurate statement of all the quotations, and a life of the author by the editor. Cudworth died at Cambridge 26th June 1688, and was buried in Christ college chapel. Of his posthumous works, which were a continuation of his intellectual system, one was published by Chandler bishop of Durham 1731, called “a treatise concerning eternal and immutable morality,” intended chiefly against Hobbes and others. His other MSS. were on moral good and evil—a book of morality, with Hobbes’ philosophy explained—discourse on liberty and necessity—de libero arbitrio—on Daniel’s prophecy of the 70 weeks—of the verity of the Christian religion, against the Jews—Hebrew learning, &c. Cudworth was a man of extensive erudition, well skilled in the languages, an able philosopher, an acute mathematician, and a profound metaphysician. Though he embraced the corpuscular philosophy, and considered Plato as a guide with respect to the Deity, he was deservedly esteemed for his virtues, his piety, his moderation, and humanity. His only daughter, Damaris, married sir Francis Masham, and was distinguished as much for her learning and genius as for all the amiable virtues of her sex.

CUERENHERT, Theodore van, a singular character, born at Amsterdam 1522. He was a man of science, and had a turn a turn for poetry; but he chiefly maintained himself at first by engraving, in which he displayed skill and genius, though he was too hasty and volatile in his execution. He settled at Haerlem and was honorably employed several times as ambassador to the prince of Orange. Such, at last, were his extraordinary ideas about religion, that he asserted no one could officiate as a minister without a supernatural mission, and that it was unworthy a Christian to enter a place of public worship. These wild ideas, in the indulgence of which he would hold no communication with papists or protestants, procured his banishment from the country. He died at Tergout 1590, aged 68. His works were published, 3 vols. folio. 1630. As an artist, he worked with the Galles, and had Henry Goltzius for his pupil.

CUEVA, Alfonso de la, known by the name of Bedmar, was ambassador from Philip III. to the Venetian republic. In this sacred character, he plotted the seizing of the city; but when the conspiracy was discovered, and the conspirators put to death by drowning, the author of the horrible scheme, out of respect to the Spanish king, was secretly dismissed by the senate, to avoid the fury of the populace. Cueva fled to Flanders, where he became president of the council, and received a cardinal's hat. In consequence of the severity of his government he retired from Flanders to Rome, where he died, 1665. He was a man of astonishing powers of mind, great political sagacity, an acute judge of the manners and prejudices of mankind, composed in the most violent and popular agitations, and such a master of the knowledge of the human passions, that his conjectures about futurity seem almost prophetic. Some attribute to him a treatise against the republic of Venice, though Velfer is supposed to be the author.

CUFF, Henry, a celebrated wit, unfortunate for his connection with Essex, was born at Hinton St. George, Somersetshire, 1560. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he became fellow; but a joke upon the well-known humorous dishonesty of his founder drew upon him the resentment of the president, and he was ejected from the society. His merit, however, was so universally known, that he was admitted at Merton, and two years after, 1588, was elected one of its fellows. He was afterwards Greek professor and proctor of the university; and then travelled abroad, to improve himself for some active scene of life. His many qualifications, and the interest of his friends, recommended him at last to the earl of Essex, whose secretary and confidant he became. This proved a most fatal engagement. When Essex was condemned, he accused Cuff as being the author of his misfortunes, and sir Henry Neville confirmed afterwards the accusation, in consequence of which the wretched secretary, perhaps no otherwise guilty than as the tool of a bold and ambitious favorite, was arraigned, and, though he defended himself with great animation, he was condemned, and executed at Tyburn 30th March 1601. He was a man of great learning and genius, and though his memory has been censured by Bacon, Wotton, and even by his friend Camden, he had some amiable qualities. He wrote a curious philosophical piece, which appeared 1607, called the differences of the ages of man's life, together with the original causes, progress, and end thereof, 8vo.

CUGNIERES, Peter de, an upright magistrate, advocate of the parliament of Paris in 1329, who supported the rights of Philip Valois against the clergy.

CUJACIUS, James, an eminent lawyer, born at Toulouse 1520. He was of mean origin; but the greatness of his genius compensated for his obscurity, and, by his indefatigable industry, without the assistance of a master, he made himself perfect in the knowledge of Greek and Latin literature, and particularly in civil law. He was meanly refused the professor's chair in his native town; but his abilities attracted pupils from every country; and to his superior talents in education, France owed the ablest and the most expert of her lawyers and magistrates. He settled at Cahors, and afterwards at Bourges, which he would not quit, though honored by the king of France, and invited to Turin by the duke of Savoy, and to Bologna by pope Gregory XIII. He was so kind to his pupils, and so communicative and familiar, that he was called the father of his scholars. He died at Bourges 1590. His works were published at Paris, 10 vols. fol. 1659, by Fabrot.

CULLEN, William, the celebrated physician, was born in Lanarkshire, and served his time with a surgeon and apothecary at Glasgow, and then went as surgeon in a vessel from London to the West Indies. On his return, he settled at Shotts, and afterwards at Hamilton, where an accidental introduction to the duke of Hamilton laid the foundation of his advancement. By the advice of his patron he removed to Glasgow, where he obtained an appointment in the university. It was about this time that he had formed an intimacy and partnership with William Hunter, afterwards equally celebrated. In 1740, Cullen took his degree of M.D. and in 1746 he was appointed lecturer in chemistry at Glasgow, and in 1751 was nominated king's professor of medicine. His practice was now very extensive, and his reputation as a lecturer proved by the increasing number of his pupils. In 1756 he was invited by the university of Edinburgh to the vacant chair of chemistry; and in this new office he displayed such powers, and such knowledge, that an opposition was raised against him by those who envied his fame, and could not rival his abilities. His character, however, became more respectable from opposition; the mildness of his manners recommended him not less than his professional knowledge; and so well established was his merit that he was made professor of medicine by the magistrates of Edinburgh, on the death of Dr. Alston, in 1763. He published the lectures which he delivered, in consequence of the appearance of a surreptitious copy. He at last resigned his office to Dr. Black, in consequence of his growing infirmities, though he afterwards joined Dr. Gregory as candidate for giving lectures on the practice of physic. These illustrious coadjutors lectured alternately, till the death of Dr. Gregory, and then Dr. Cullen succeeded to the care of all the pupils, which he continued to do till within a few months of his death. He died 11th October 1790. He married miss Johnston, the daughter of a clergyman, by whom he had a numerous family. She died 1786. His other works were, lines of physic, 4 vols. 8vo.—Synopsis nosologiae methodicae, 2 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on the recovery of drowned persons, &c. 8vo.

CULLUM, sir John, was born 21st June 1733, and educated educated at Bury school, and Catharine-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He died at Hardwike-house, 9th October 1785, rector of Great Thurlow, Suffolk, and member of the royal and antiquarian societies. He published the history and antiquities of Hawsted, Suffolk.

CULMER, Richard, a violent fanatic, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was expelled from the living of Goodneston, in Kent, for refusing to read the book of sports, and then became lecturer at Canterbury, and was afterwards employed by the parliament in breaking down and defacing images, pictures, &c. from all places of worship. In his indiscriminating zeal, he demolished the beautiful painted window of Canterbury cathedral, of which he gave an account; and for his meritorious services in the cause of republicanism he was promoted to the vacant living of Minster in Kent, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He was a most abusive and litigious character, and from his fondness for fighting he was called the blue-skin Dick.

CULPER, Nicholas, son of a clergyman of that name, after a few years spent at Cambridge, was bound to an apothecary. He engaged himself deeply in the study of astrology, of which he became professor. He died in Spital-fields 1654. He wrote several books, the best known of which is his "herbal," in which he describes the good and bad qualities of plants, as if by casting their nativities.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, a learned prelate, son of a citizen of London, where he was born July 15, 1632. He was educated at St. Paul's school and Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He took his degree of M.A. 1656, and two years after he was presented to Brampton rectory, Northamptonshire. He was drawn from his solitude, in which he diligently discharged all the pastoral duties, by the elevation of his friend Orlando Bridgman to the seals, 1667, from whom he received the living of All-hallows, Stamford. He published, in 1672, his work de legibus naturæ disquisitiones philosophicæ, &c. which has been translated into English by Tyrrel and by Maxwell. This performance greatly raised his reputation for science and for knowledge; and he was further distinguished for the exercises which he performed when he took his degree of D.D. in 1680. In 1686 he published his essay on Jewish measures and weights, a work of great merit, and full of accurate calculation. In 1691 he was raised to the see of Peterborough by William, without solicitation or interest, but merely from the eminence of his learning, his exemplary manners, and his strong attachment to the protestant faith. In his episcopal duties he was indefatigably vigilant, observing to his friends, who dissuaded from exertions which might injure his health, "that he would fulfil his duties as long as he could, and that a man had better wear out than rust out." Some part of his time, however, was devoted to literature, he was a sound mathematician, well acquainted with oriental learning, and perfectly informed in all the branches of science and philosophy. In his pursuits to discover the true causes of idolatry, he paid great attention to the shattered Phœnician history of Sanchoniathon; but though great labor was bestowed on the subject, and a book prepared for the press, his bookfeller objected, on account of the times, to the publication, which was deferred till after his death, when his son-in-law, Mr. Payne, gave to the world, in 1720, his Sanchoniathon's Phœnician history, from Eusebius' præpar. evangel. &c. and, in 1724, his second work, his origines gentium antiquissimæ. The bishop lived to a good old age, and to the last retained the great powers of his mind. He died October 9, 1718, in his 87th year, in consequence of a violent attack of the palsy, which proved immediately fatal. He was buried in his own cathedral.

CUMBERLAND, William duke of, second son of George II. was born 1721. He was at the battle of Dettingen with his father, and distinguished himself so much, that at the battle of Fontenoy he might have ensured a most glorious victory, had he been ably supported by the Dutch troops. His next services were the defeat of the pretender at the battle of Culloden, 1746, for which he was highly applauded by the parliament and by the nation. In 1747 he lost the battle of Val, by the hesitating assistance of the Dutch. He died 1765.

CUMBERLAND, Henry Frederic duke of, son of Frederic, prince of Wales, was created duke in 1766, and in 1771 married Anne Horton, daughter of lord Carhampton, and widow of Mr. Horton. This union was the cause of the royal marriage act. He was grand master of the free masons, and died September 1790, aged 45.

CUMING, William, an eminent physician, born at Edinburgh 1714, and educated at the high school and university of that city. After residing some time at Paris and Leyden, he came to London, from whence he removed to Dorchester. In this situation, from which he refused to retire, for the more extensive practice of London, he soon gained universal reputation, and recommended himself to his patients as well by the gentleness of his manners and his probity as by his learning and his skilful management of diseases. Though he did not commit any thing to the press, he was particularly attentive to assist his friends, among whom Mr. Hutchins, the historian of Dorsetshire, has paid very handsome and deserved compliments to his abilities and kind assiduity. Dr. Cuming was afflicted with great weakness in his eyes, which, though it lessened, did not damp, his pursuits after knowledge. He was fellow of the London and Edinburgh societies of antiquarians, and he was also fellow of the college of physicians. He died of a dropsy, 25th March 1788, aged 74.

CUNÆUS, Peter, a learned lawyer, professor at Leyden, was born at Flushing 1586. He was educated for the church; but the rancor of the theological disputes of the times disgusted him, and he applied himself to belles lettres and to the law. He was a man of great learning, and deservedly commended by Vossius, Casaubon, Scaliger, and others. He died 1638. He wrote, among other valuable works, de republicâ Hebræorum—satira Menippæa, in sui sæculi homines inepte eruditos—remarks on Nonius' Dionysiaca—a translation of Julian's Cæsars, &c.

CUNEGONDE, daughter of Sigefroi count of Luxembourg, married the emperor Henry II. by whom she had no children. Some historians accuse her of incontinence, while others regard her as ill treated by her husband, after whose death, in 1024, she retired to a monastery.

CUNNINGHAM, William, a physician, who, as bishop Tanner informs us, resided in Coleman-street, London. He lived at Norwich about 1559; but, in 1563, was a public lecturer in Surgeons' hall, London. He was a man of great learning as an astronomer and physician, and was equally eminent as an ingenious engraver on copper.

C. NITIA, Maria, a learned lady in the 17th century, born in Silesia. She possessed a perfect knowledge of ancient and modern languages, but particularly excelled in mathematics and astronomy, on which she wrote some ingenious treatises, especially her Urania propitia, in 1650, in Latin and German, dedicated to the emperor Ferdinand III. This work contains astronomical tables, calculated on Kepler's hypothesis, and displays her powers as a scholar and mathematician to have been very great and most respectable. She married a physician, Elias de Lewin, and died at Pissehen 1664, much regretted as a person of science, and highly beloved as a woman of an amiable character.

CUNNINGHAM, Alexander, a Scotch historian, born at Ettrick, near Selkirk, in 1654. He was educated in Holland, where no doubt he imbibed all the principles of government then fashionable, and where he became acquainted with the fugitive lords Sutherland and Argyle. He came over with William at the revolution, and maintained an intimacy with the most popular members of government. He was for many years employed as travelling tutor to lord Hyndford and his brother William, and afterwards to lord Lorne, and viscount Lonsdale; and during his visits to the courts on the continent, he had the means of making important observations on the manners and politics of various countries, which he communicated in confidence to the king and to his ministers. To this may be attributed the vast information which he manifests in his writings, and the great military knowledge which he displays, and which he derived from the friendship of his pupil lord Lorne, afterwards so famous as John duke of Argyle. At the accession of George I. Cunningham, by the partiality of his friends, Argyle, Sunderland, and Walpole, was sent as envoy to the Venetian republic, where he resided five years, till 1720. He afterwards lived in studious retirement, respected as a politician and as a man of letters. From an inscription in St. Martin's church over an Alexander Cunningham, supposed to be his, he died 15th May 1737, in the 83d year of his age. His history of Great Britain, from the revolution to the accession of George I. appeared in 2 vols. 4to. 1787, translated into English from the Latin manuscript, by Dr. W. Thomson. The work had passed into the hands of Dr. Hollingberry, and was recommended, from its valuable contents, for publication, by lord Hardwicke and Dr. Douglas bishop of Salisbury. It is indeed a work of merit, and it relates the particulars of an important period with accuracy, spirit, and impartiality; though, in the drawing of some characters, especially that of Burnet, the author shows himself prejudiced and uncandid. To our author some have likewise attributed the celebrated criticisms on Horace, 2 vols. 8vo. 1721, and those posthumous remarks on Virgil published 1742; but by those who have examined the matter with great care and nicety, the matter is left doubtful. It appears, indeed, that the historian and the critic were both of the same name, both Scotch, both lived in the same times, both educated in Holland, both eminent for their skill in the game of chess, both employed as travelling tutors, and both attained to an advanced age. The coincidence is so remarkable, that the character should be considered as belonging solely to the Venetian envoy, whose learning was adequate to the most refined criticism, and the deepest observations on ancient times and manners.

CUNNINGHAM, John, son of a wine-merchant in Dublin, displayed early evidences of poetical genius. At 17 he wrote his "love in a mist, or the lass of spirit;" from which Garrick drew the prominent features of his "lying varlet." He was for several years of his life engaged as a strolling player, in the north of England and in Scotland. He settled at last at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a place to which he was very partial, and where he died 18th September 1773, aged 42.

CUNY, Lewis Anthony, a Jesuit of Langres, who died 1755. He is known by three funeral orations, on the dauphin of France, the queen of Poland, and cardinal Rohan.

CUPANO, Francis, a Sicilian ecclesiastic, who published, in 1667, a catalogue of the plants of Sicily, and also a valuable history of the island.

CUPERUS, Gifbert, professor of history and burgo-master of Davenport, was born at Hemmen, in Gueldres, 1644. He died at Davenport 1716. He wrote observations criticæ et chronologicæ, 3 vols. 4to.—apothecias Homeri, 4to.—history of the three Gordians—a collection of letters.

CURÆUS, Joachim, a German physician, born in Silesia. He improved himself greatly by travelling, and died 1573, aged 41. He wrote, in Latin, the annals of Silesia and Bresslau, in folio.

CURCELLÆUS, Stephen, an eminent divine, born at Geneva, died at Amsterdam 1658, aged 72. After residing some time in France, he settled at Amsterdam, where he was followed by the Arminians, and where he succeeded Episcopius as divinity professor. He was an able critic and a great linguist, and wrote several theological tracts. He published a new edition of the Greek testament, with various readings, and with a copious dissertation, in which he properly observes, that none of the readings affect in the least degree the articles of faith. Polemburg, the successor of Curcellæus in the professor's chair, has prefixed an account of his life to the folio edition of his works.

CURIO, an orator of Rome, who called Cæsar the man of all the women and the woman of all the men. His son was also eminent as an orator, and as the friend of Cæsar.

CURIO, Cælius Secundus, was born at San Chirico, in Piedmont. His abjuration of the Romish religion for the tenets of Luther, exposed him to the persecution of the catholics, and he was seized and confined in the prison of Turin, by the bishop. He however escaped from his enemies, and fled to Salo and Pavia; but the influence of the pope still persecuted him over Italy, till he took refuge at Lausanne, in Switzerland, where he became principal of the college. He afterwards removed to Basil, where for twenty-two years, till his death, 1569, at the age of 67, he continued respectably to fill the chair of eloquence.

eloquence and belles lettres. His work, "de amplitudine beati regni Dei," 1550, in 8vo. is a curious composition. He wrote besides, "opuscula," 8vo.—letters—Calvinus judaifans, &c.

CURIUS, Dentatus Marcus Annii, a Roman consul, distinguished in the wars against Pyrrhus. He preferred poverty to riches, and rejected with disdain the offers of the Samnites, who solicited him with large bribes, about B.C. 272.

CURL, Edmund, a bookseller, whose name has obtained immortality in Pope's Dunciad. He was born in the west of England, and, from low beginnings, kept a shop in the neighbourhood of Covent-garden, where the books he published were generally enlarged by wretched notes, forged letters, and bad plates. He lost his ears for publishing "the nun in her smock," and other licentious pieces. He died 1748.

CUROPALATE, John, an officer in the household of the Greek emperor of that name. He wrote a Greek history from the time of Michael Curopalate to the reign of Alexius, from 813 to 1081. This work has been most shamefully pillaged by Cedrenus, who wrote an abridged history from the beginning of the world to the reign of Isaac Comnenus. Syncellus, Theophanes, and others, have also borrowed from him.

CURADI, Francesco, an Italian painter, who died 1660, aged 90. He was very correct in his historical pieces, and had a perfect knowledge of the chiaro-obscur.

CURRIE, James, an eminent physician. He was born, 1756, at Kirkpatrick-Fleming, Dumfriesshire, and, after receiving a proper education at Dumfries school, he was sent to Virginia in a commercial capacity. The intricacies of commercial business, however, had no attraction for him, and he returned with eagerness to study medicine at Edinburgh, where, after three years' residence, he took his degree of M.D. He settled at Liverpool, and acquired deserved celebrity, not only from his practice, but the candor and benevolence of his heart, his classical taste, and his general information. He afterwards removed to Bath, on account of ill health, and died at Sidmouth, Devonshire, 31st August 1805. Dr. Currie was well known as the author of a letter, commercial and political, to Mr. Pitt, published under the assumed name of Jasper Willson, 1793, which passed through several editions, and attracted much of the public attention from its own merits, and from the answers which were made to it. Besides his medical reports on the effects of water, cold and warm, as a remedy in febrile diseases, 8vo. 1797, with an additional volume 1804, he wrote some valuable papers in the Manchester transactions, the collections of the London medical society, and the philosophical transactions. He also edited Burns' poems in 1800, with a pleasing account of the poet's life, and a learned criticism on his writings.

CURSON, or CORCONE, Robert, an Englishman, who studied at Oxford and Paris. He became chancellor of Paris university, and was made a cardinal by Innocent III. in 1212. He was active in preaching the crusades, and died at Damietta 1218. He wrote on the question, whether Origen be saved or not. The work is now lost.

CURTIUS, Martius, a Roman, who is said to have sacrificed his life for the good of his country, by leaping into a gulf, which could close only when Rome had thrown into it whatever she held most precious, about 362 B.C.

CURTIUS, Quint. Rufus, a Roman historian, whose life of Alexander the great, in 10 books, is much admired. The age in which he lived is not accurately ascertained, though some place him in the reign of Trajan.

CUSA, Nicholas de, a cardinal, born at Cusa, of mean parentage. His great merit, and his extensive knowledge of law and of divinity, recommended him to the notice of pope Nicholas V. who made him a cardinal 1448, and bishop of Brixia two years after. He was sent by the pope to Germany as legate; in 1451, to preach the crusades against the Turks, in which he was unsuccessful. He died at Todi, in Umbria, 1464, aged 63. His works, which were numerous and valuable, were collected and printed in 3 vols. Basil, 1565. They contain, besides controversial and metaphysical tracts, some geographical and astronomical pieces, and Cribratio alcorani, a treatise intended against the spreading of Mahomet's doctrines after the fall of Constantinople.

CUSPINIAN, John, a German, who was born at Sweinfurt, and died at Vienna 1529, aged 56. He was physician to the emperor Maximilian I. by whom he was employed in some important negotiations. He wrote a learned Latin history of the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to the death of Maximilian I.—a history of Austria—a history of the Turks, and of their cruelty towards the Christians.

CUSSAY, N. governor of Angers, is known for his noble reply to the duke of Guise, who had ordered the protestants of Anjou to be massacred on the fatal day of St. Bartholomew. "Tell the king," answered he, "that my fellow citizens are brave and loyal, but not assassins."

CUSTINES, Adam Philippe count de, was born at Metz 4th February 1740, and distinguished himself in the seven years' war. In the American war he assisted the revolted colonies at the head of his regiment, and in the national assembly he espoused warmly the popular party. When placed in the command of the army of the Rhine, he took the cities of Spire, Mentz, Frankfort, &c. but a reverse of fortune obliged him to fall back. Want of success was in the eyes of a jealous tribunal considered as treason, and Custines perished on the scaffold 27th August 1793. He was weak in his conduct, proud in prosperity, but a coward in adversity. His son, with greater firmness than his father, met the stroke of the guillotine 3d January 1794, aged 25.

CUTHBERT, an English saint, born in the north, and educated by the Scottish monks in the abbey of Icolmkill. He settled in the island of Lindisferna, four miles from Berwick, now called Holy-island; from whence he came to the court of Egfred king of Northumberland, whom, with many of his nobles, he converted to Christianity, and baptised. He was made bishop of the Northumbrian Saxons; but, from his fondness for solitude, he retired to Holy-island, where he founded a monastery, and where he died 686, leaving behind him a great number of pupils, and a deserved character of sanctity, virtue, and devotion.

CUTTS, John lord, was born of an ancient family, at Matching, in Essex, and distinguished himself in the wars of William III. He was early in the service of Monmouth, mouth, and signalized himself greatly, under the duke of Lorraine, in Hungary, and at the taking of Buda by the imperialists. At the revolution, he had a regiment of foot, was created baron in Ireland 1690, governor of the isle of Wight 1693, and complimented by Hopkins as one to whom a double crown was due, as a hero and a poet. On queen Anne's accession he was made lieutenant-general of the forces in Holland, commander of the forces in Ireland in 1705, and afterwards one of the lords justices of that kingdom; an appointment which broke his heart, because it removed him intentionally out of the sphere of active enterprize. He died at Dublin 26th January 1707, and was buried in Christ-church cathedral. He wrote a poem on queen Mary's death, and published, 1687, poetical exercises, written on several occasions—a poem on wisdom—another on Waller. The poetry, though not deserving to rank very high, yet possesses merit, and justifies the praises of Waller and others.

CYAXARES I. king of the Medes after Phraortes, died 585 B.C.

CYAXARES II. king of Media, is supposed to be the famous Darius, who died 536 B.C.

CYGNÉ, Martin du, a learned Jesuit, professor of eloquence, born at St. Omer, died 1669, aged 50. He wrote explanatio rhetoricæ—ars metrica et ars poetica—fons eloquentiæ, &c. 4 vols. 12mo.—comædiæ 12 cum Terent. tum Plaut. concinnatæ, 2 vols. 12mo.

CYNÆGIRUS, an Athenian, who, at the battle of Marathon, pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and, in swimming after them, had both his arms and his head cut off.

CYNEAS, a Thessalian philosopher, who accompanied Pyrrhus in his invasion of Italy. He called the Roman senate an assembly of kings.

CYPRIAN, Thascius Cacilius, one of the fathers of the church, born at Carthage. He was bishop of Carthage, and suffered martyrdom 258. He wrote some valuable works, edited by Dr. Fell, and translated into English by Marshall.

CYPRIANI, or CIPRIANI, an Italian painter, who settled in England, and died in London 1785. He possessed great merit in his profession, and his pieces spread over Europe by the graver of Bartolozzi, are well known and admired for grace, beauty, and expression. In private life he was highly and deservedly esteemed for his many talents and virtues. His son inherited his virtues.

CYRANO, Bergerac, a French author, born in Gascony 1620. He early entered the army, where his valor distinguished him in the field as well as in duelling, and procured him the appellation of the intrepid. He was shot through the body at the siege of Mouzon, and run through the neck at that of Arras in 1640; but his prospects of promotion were so small, compared to the dangers and difficulties to which he exposed himself, that he abandoned the army, to wield the pen of wit and poetry. Though fond of independence and liberty, he attached himself to marshal Gassion, and afterwards to the duke of Arpajon. He died in 1655, aged 35, in consequence of a blow received on the head by the fall of a piece of timber. His works consist of a tragedy on the death of Agrippina, mother of Germanicus—the pedant, a comedy—besides a comic history of the states and empires of the sun and of the moon—letters—dialogues—and fragments of physics, &c. He abounded in wit and humor, he wrote with great facility, and interwove in his philosophical romance the system of Des Cartes. In many parts, from his fine strokes of satire on the wild inquiries of the philosophers of the age, he has, says lord Orrery, directed the plan which Swift afterwards pursued.

CYRIL of Jerusalem, one of the fathers, who was bishop of Jerusalem. He died 386, author of some works.

CYRIL of Alexandria, bishop of that see, died 444. He was violent in his measures to banish the Jews and Novatians from Alexandria; and wrote various works, edited at Paris, 7 vols. fol.

CYRILL, Lucar, was born in Candia 1572, and educated at Padua and in Germany. He was made bishop of Alexandria, and afterwards, 1621, patriarch of Constantinople. He was deposed, for his attempts to reform his clergy, and at last was strangled, by order of the grand signior, in 1638. His confession of faith and his letters were published, Amsterdam, 1718.

CYRUS, the elder, king of Persia, was son of Mandane, the daughter of Astyages. He dethroned his grandfather, established the Persian empire, and was at last killed in the battle against Tomyris queen of the Massagetæ, B.C. 530.

CYRUS, the younger, son of Darius, revolted against his brother Artaxerxes, and was defeated by him in the plains of Cunaxa, 401. Had he not been too rash, he might have obtained the victory. The retreat of the 10,000 Greeks who accompanied him is celebrated in ancient history.

CYRUS, a Latin poet, in the reign of the younger Theodosius. He afterwards became a Christian, and bishop of Phrygia.

DAC, John, a German painter, born at Cologne 1556, and employed by the emperor Rodolph, who rewarded his great abilities with honors and with opulence. His pictures are all in a grand stile.

DACIER, Andrew, a French philosopher and critic, born at Castres, in Upper Languedoc, 6th April 1651. His parents were protestants, and he was educated at Castres, and Puy-lousens, but chiefly at Saumur, under the celebrated Tanaquil Faber, whose daughter he married. At Paris he was recommended to the duke of Montausier, and was placed in the number of those who were to publish the classics for the use of the young dauphin. His first work was the edition of Pompeius Festus, 4to. 1681, greatly improved in the edition of 1699. His Horace, with a French translation, appeared in 1681, in 10 vols. 12mo. and has frequently been reprinted. He next published St. Anastasius' contemplations, with notes and a Latin translation, in 1682. The next year he married Faber's daughter; and, in 1685, he with her abjured the protestant religion. He published nothing afterwards till 1691, when his moral reflections of Marcus Antoninus, 2 vols. 12mo. appeared; and in 1692, Aristotle's poetics, with a translation and critical remarks, in 4to. which some have considered as his best performance. In 1693 he published a translation of the Œdipus and Electra of Sophocles; in 1694, the first volume of Plutarch's lives; in 1697, the translation of the works of Hippocrates, 2 vols. 12mo.; in 1699, that of Plato's works, 2 vols.; in 1706, the life of Pythagoras, his symbols, golden verses, &c. 2 vols.; in 1715, Epictetus, 2 vols.; and in 1723 the lives of Plutarch were completed, in 8 vols. 4to. Besides these, Dacier published notes on Longinus, a dissertation on the origin of satire, speeches in the French academy, answers to some critics who had censured his person and manners, &c. besides a commentary on Theocritus, and a treatise on religion, never published. As he had been concerned in the compilation of the medallic history of Lewis XIV. the monarch settled on him a pension of 2000 livres, and appointed him keeper of his books in the Louvre. In 1713 he was made perpetual secretary to the French academy, and in 1717 he obtained a reversionary grant of 10,000 crowns, as library keeper to the king, which was afterwards to devolve to his wife if she survived him. Her death, in 1720, prevented her enjoyment of a grant so very honorable to her merits. Dacier, though greatly afflicted for the loss of his wife, yet would have married a second time, had not death prevented it. He was carried off by an ulcer in his throat, which he had disregarded, as not dangerous, September 18, 1722, in his 71st year. He was a man of great and extensive learning, who applied the powers of his mind, and the most indefatigable industry, to infuse into his native language all the beauties and all the graces of some of the best writers of ancient times.

DACIER, Anne, wife of Andrew Dacier, daughter of Tanaquil Faber, or le Fevre, was born at Saumur 1651. When she was 11 years old her father discovered the strong natural powers of her mind, and immediately laid the foundation of a learned education which was happily completed. In 1674, she published an edition of Callimachus in 4to. and in consequence of her extensive knowledge, she was engaged in the editing of the classics for the use of the dauphin. Her Florus, appeared in 1674, in 4to. and her Aurelius Victor 1681. In the mean time her reputation was so universally spread, that Christina queen of Sweden wrote her some pressing letters, and invited her to embrace the romish religion, and to come to settle at Stockholm, where every mark of respect and patronage would be shown to her. These offers she declined, and continued her labors in the service of the dauphin. In 1681, her translation of Anacreon and Sappho appeared, so much commended by Boileau, and in 1683, were published Eutropius 4to. and a French translation of the Amphitryo, Epidicus, and Rudens of Plautus, three vols. and the next year the Plutus and Clouds of Aristophanes 12mo. with Dictys Cretensis, and Dares Phrygius. In 1683 she married Dacier, a scholar with whom she had shared the instruction of her father, and two years after she joined him in a recantation of the protestant tenets. It has been indeed insinuated that she had been previously married to Lesnier a bookseller of her father, and that she ran away from him for the society of Dacier, to whom she never was regularly married, an imputation too gross and illiberal to be credited. After her conversion, by the influence of the duke of Montausier, a pension of 1500 livres was settled on her husband, and 500 on herself. In 1688 she published her translation of Terence's plays with notes 3 vols. 12mo, the best edition of which is that of 1717. She also assisted her husband in his Marcus Antoninus and his Plutarch, and in 1711 she published her translation of Homer's Iliad with notes 3 vols. 12mo. In 1714 she wrote a defence of Homer against de la Motte, and two years after against Hardouin, in which she displayed much erudition, great taste, and not a little acrimony crimony. She was however afterwards reconciled to de la Motte. Her last work, the Odyssley [of Homer translated from the Greek, appeared in 1716, 3 vols. 12mo. The two last years of her life she sunk into disease and debility, and died August 17th 1720, aged 69. She had a son and two daughters, the son died young, one of the daughters was a nun, and the other, who possessed the virtues and accomplishments of her sex, died in her 18th year. Brides learning, Madame Dacier was graced with the noblest ornaments of human nature, with generosity, firmness, mildness, and exemplary piety. She had so much modesty that she never discoursed on literature, to display her superiority; but when requested to write her name and a sentence, in the book of a northern scholar, according to the custom of the country, she strenuously declined to enrol herself among the most illustrious characters of the age. When at last prevailed upon, she wrote her name with a verse from Sophocles, expressive that silence is the best ornament of the female sex. To the universal respect of Europe the academy of Ricovrati at Padua, added the honor of enrolling her name among their members in 1684.

DAGAR, Jacob, a native of Paris, the pupil of Vouet, and eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He was patronized by Christian V. of Denmark, at whose court he long resided, and then he visited London, and returned to Copenhagen where he died 1716, aged 76.

DAGOBERT I. succeeded his father Clotaire II. as king of France 628. He made war against Saxony, Britany, and Gascony, but stained by cruelty the laurels which he obtained in the field of battle. He divorced his wife, and not satisfied to marry three others to whom he gave the name of queens, he kept a great number of concubines. It is said that after conquering the Saxons he caused all those to be put to death whose stature exceeded the length of his sword. He died at Epernay 638, aged 36, and was the first monarch buried at St. Denys, which he had founded six years before.

DAGOBERT II. son of Sigebert II. was prevented from ascending his father's throne by the influence of Grimoald mayor of the palace, who caused his own son Chilbert to be crowned king. He afterwards obtained the kingdom of Austrasia, and was assassinated five years after 679, and was buried at Stenay.

DAGOBERT III. succeeded as king of Neustria to his father Chilbert. He died four years after 17th Jan. 715.

DAGOBERT, N. a French republican general, who distinguished himself in Italy and against the Spaniards. He died in the midst of his victories beyond the Pyrenees 21st April 1794.

DAGOUMER, William, professor of philosophy, and rector of the university of Paris, was born at Pont-audemer, and died at Courbevoys in 1755. He published a course of philosophy in Latin, a French work against the advertisements of Languet archbishop of Sens. He is ridiculed by le Sage in Gil Blas under the name of Guilomer.

DAHL, Michael, a Danish painter, patronized by queen Anne and George prince of Denmark. He died in England 20th October 1743.

DAHLBERG, Eric, a Swedish engineer, whose excel-five application compensated for the early loss of his parents, and the misfortunes of a neglected education. He prepared for the brave defence of Thorn, and accompanied Gustavus Adolphus in his Polish expedition, and advised him to march his army across the Great Belt when frozen, and thus penetrate into the very heart of the Danish kingdom and besiege the capital. His great services were rewarded in 1660 with the rank of nobility, and he was successively raised to the command of Malmo, the care of the fortifications, and the government of Livonia. He died at Stockholm 1703, aged 78. He wrote Suecia antiqua et hodierna, three vols. fol. 1700, and distinguished himself so much as an engineer that he was deservedly called the Vauban of Sweden.

DAILLE, John, an eminent protestant divine, born at Chatelleraut sixth January 1594. His father intended to place him in his own situation as receiver of the consignations at Poitiers, but the fondness of the boy for books and literature turned his thoughts to another channel, and he educated him in the schools of Poitiers and Saumur. At the age of 18, he was admitted into the family of du Plessis Mornay to be the tutor of his two grandsons, and in this situation he continued seven years before he began to travel, and received as it is said, more instruction from the learned conversation and company of the grandfather than he communicated to his pupils. He began his travels in 1619, and with his two pupils passed through Geneva, Piedmont, Lombardy, and Venice, where he was introduced to the acquaintance and friendly intimacy of father Paul. While at Mantua one of his pupils was taken ill, and soon after died, so that Daille with difficulty and great danger conveyed the body concealed as a bale of goods, under the care of two servants to the burial place of his father, from the suspicious eye of the inquisitors who viewed with jealousy the conduct of the protestants. With the other pupil he continued his travels, and after visiting Switzerland, Germany, Flanders, Holland, and England, they returned to France late in 1621. In 1623, Daille was ordained and first officiated in the family of the venerable Mornay, who died soon after in the arms of his beloved and reverend friend. The year 1624 was employed in digesting some papers which afterwards were published as memoirs, and in the following year Daille became minister of the church of Saumur, where he spent the rest of his life. In 1628 he wrote his celebrated book "on the use of the fathers" which lord Falkland and his friend Chillingworth greatly valued, and began to translate, but left unfinished; but it appeared in 1651 in an English dress by the hands of Thomas Smith of Cambridge, and in Latin by Mettayer of St. Quintin. In 1633 he published his apology for the reformed churches, which he also translated into Latin, and Mr. Smith into English in 1658. These books, from their importance, and the masterly manner in which the subject was treated, excited a great outcry among the catholics, but they maintained their character against all the attacks and insinuations of popery. Daille was at the synod of Alençon in 1637, where his authority was ably exerted to reconcile the protestants in the then disputed tenets about universal grace. These principles he warmly embraced, and indeed published in 1655 a Latin work against Spanheim the Leyden professor, as "an apology for the synods of Alençon and Charenton."

Charenton. This great and good man died at Paris 15th April 1670, after enjoying through life, except from a small attack of apoplexy for 10 days, the most uninterrupted good health, and with it the undiminished faculties and powers of his mind. His reputation was so high that the protestants in France declared they had seen no better writer since the days of Calvin. He wrote besides several works which were chiefly of a controversial nature, and which equally evinced his learning, erudition, and dexterity of argumentation. He married in 1625, but lost his wife six years after, by whom he had only one son, Hadrian, who distinguished himself as an able divine. He was invited to Rochelle as a minister, and after five years' residence he was chosen minister of Paris, with his father 1658. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Switzerland, and died at Zurich, May 1690. His M.S. and some of his father's works were deposited in the public library.

DALE, Samuel, an apothecary of Braintree, Essex, who became by his merit in 1730, a licenciate of the college of physicians and fellow of the royal society. He wrote Pharmacologia, seu manuductio ad materiam medicam, often printed,—the antiquities of Harwich and Dover court, in 4to. improved from the works of Silas Taylor, besides some valuable papers in the philosophical transactions, &c. He died at Bocking, where he had settled as a physician, 1739, aged 80.

DALECHAMPS, James, a learned physician born at Caen 1513. He died at the age of 75, at Lyons, where he had practised from 1552, to 1588. He wrote a general history of plants, three books de peste, besides Pliny's natural history with valuable notes, and also translated into Latin, Athenæus, in the completion of which he was engaged 30 years.

DALEN, Cornelius Von, an eminent Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1640. He engraved a great variety of portraits, and some antique statues, all in a masterly stile.

DALENS, Dirk, a landscape painter of Amsterdam, who died 1688, aged 29. He is happy in the expression and faithful delineation of his pieces.

D'ALIBRAI, Charles Von, a Parisian who abandoned the profession of arms for the muses. He was of a dissipated turn of mind, and fond of merry society, and he declared that he would die by the mouth of the bottle rather than by the mouth of the cannon. As he had a moderate income, and was free from ambition, he enjoyed with great contentment what he had, and employed his sportive muse as fancy or occasion directed. In the latter part of his life he lived much in the country, and died at an advanced age about the beginning of 1655. His works appeared in 1553, in 8vo. divided into six parts, containing bacchanalian, satirical, heroical, moral and christian poems, of no great merit indeed, but frequently happy in delineation of character and in flashes of wit. He also translated Perez's letters, and 73 epigrams, against Montmaur.

DALIN, Olaus de, a learned Swede, born at Winsberg in 1708. He is deservedly called the father of Swedish poetry, by his two poems on the liberty of Sweden, and the tragedy of Brumhilda. He rose by his genius to fame and fortune, and was appointed preceptor to prince Gustavus, and at last became chancellor of the court.

He wrote, at the request of the government, the history of Sweden, which he brought down to the death of Charles IX. He wrote besides, epistles, fables, satires, panegyrics, &c. and translated Montaigne's book on the declension of the Romans.

DALLINGTON, sir Robert, author of the aphorisms of Tacitus, was born at Geddington, Northamptonshire, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was secretary to Francis earl of Rutland, knighted by queen Elizabeth, and made master of the Charter-house. He died 1637. He wrote besides a survey of the great duke's estate in Tuscany 4to, method for travel, or a state of France, in 1598, 4to.

DALMATIN, George, a Lutheran, minister of Laybach in Carniola, from which he was expelled by the violence of the catholics 1598. He was protected in his disgrace by the baron of Aursperg, in whose house it is said he died. He translated the bible into the Sclavonian language 1584, and wrote some tracts.

DALMATIUS, a bishop of Cyzicum, who attended the council of Ephesus, and wrote the acts of the synod of Nice.

DALRYMPLE, David, son of sir James Dalrymple bart. auditor of the exchequer for Scotland, was born in Edinburgh 28th October 1726. His mother was Christian, daughter of earl Haddington. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Utrecht, where he continued till 1746. In 1748 he was called to the bar, and soon distinguished himself as an advocate. His name as a lawyer was so eminent that he was raised in 1766 to the dignity of one of the judges of the court of session, when he assumed, as is usual, the appellation of lord Hailes, by which he is best known among the learned. He became however conspicuous, not less by his learning, and his writings, than by his integrity, candor, and firmness, as a judge. In 1773 he published remarks on the history of Scotland—and in 1776 and 1779, annals of Scotland, 2 vols. 4to. containing the history of 14 Scottish kings; which valuable work, however, the author did not complete. He published besides, memorials and letters relating to the history of Britain, in the reign of James I. and Charles I. 2 vols. 1762 and 1766—a catalogue of the lords of session from 1532—*—biographia Scotica—*remains of christian antiquity, 3 vols. and other numerous tracts on antiquities, history, divinity, &c. Lord Hailes, though infirm in health, sat on the bench till within three days of his death, which happened 29th Nov. 1792, in his 66th year. He left no male issue, but only two daughters by two different wives.

DALTON, Michael, an English lawyer, born in Cambridgeshire, and bred at Lincoln's-inn. He wrote a well known book on the office of a justice of peace, and on the duty of sheriffs. He was queen's counsel in 1599, and died before the civil wars.

DALTON, John, D. D. was born at Deane in Cumberland, where his father was rector, 1709. He was educated at Lowther, and at Queen's college, Oxford, and became tutor to lord Beauchamp. He employed himself in the mean time, in adapting Milton's masque at Ludlow-castle to the stage, which he rendered, by a judicious selection of songs from other works of the author, and some of his own, a very popular piece, still known known and admired under the title of "Comus." During the celebrity of this performance, he fought out Milton's grand-daughter, who was overwhelmed with old age and poverty, and honorably exerted his influence to procure her a benefit, which produced her £120. His ill health afterwards prevented him from attending his noble pupil, who unfortunately died of the small-pox at Bologna. After being elected to a fellowship in his college, he took orders, and was presented some time after, by the duke of Somerset, to the living of St. Mary at Hill, and by his influence to a prebend at Worcester, where he died 1763. He published a volume of sermons, 1757—two epistles, 4to.—a descriptive poem on the coal mines near Whitehaven—remarks on 12 historical designs of Raphael. His brother Richard was librarian to the king, and published a description of some prints, from drawings of his own, of the procession to Mecca.

DALZELL, Andrew, an eminent Greek scholar, born at Ratho, near Edinburgh, about 1750. From his village school he came to Edinburgh, and studied with such zeal and application, that he became professor of the Greek language in the university, keeper of the university library, and one of the secretaries of the royal society of Edinburgh, &c. His literary acquirements were such, that he was selected to superintend the education of the present lord Lauderdale, whom he accompanied on the continent. As a professor, Mr. Dalzell possessed great abilities and powerful eloquence, and his lectures were so popular, that the study of the Greek language which had long been neglected in Scotland, became under his auspices, a favorite pursuit with the youthful students of the university. To facilitate the labors of his pupils, he devoted much of his time in the composition of valuable notes, in the elucidation of the Greek classics, which he published under the name of Analecτα minora & majora, &c. He wrote besides, some papers on biography, and on literary subjects in the Edinburgh society transactions, and recommended to the English student, Chevalier's description of the plain of Troy, by giving an elegant translation of it, enriched with learned notes. He also edited the posthumous works of his father-in-law Dr. J. Drysdale, whom he succeeded as principal clerk to the general assembly of the church of Scotland. This amiable man and elegant scholar died 8th December 1806.

DALZIEL, Thomas, a Scotch officer, taken prisoner at the defeat at Worcester, and confined in the tower, from which he escaped to Russia, where the czar made him a general. At the restoration he returned to England, and Charles II. made him, for his many services, commander in chief of all his forces in Scotland. He was a singular man in his dress and appearance. He had been brought up hardy, and after the death of Charles I. he never shaved his beard, which grew white and bushy, and descended to his middle. His bald head was generally covered with a beaver hat, the brim of which, was not more than three inches broad. He generally came to London once or twice a year, to kiss the king's hand, who had great regard for him, but whenever he appeared in the capital, the singularity of his dress and appearance drew crowds of boys around him. The time of his death is unknown.

DAMASCENUS, John, a learned father of the church, born at Damascus. He died about 750. His works were edited, 2 vols. fol. 1712, Paris.

DAMASCIVS, a stoic philosopher, pupil to Ildorus, whose life he wrote. He flourished about 540, A. D.

DAMASUS I. a Spaniard, raised to the papal throne 366. Though warmly opposed by Urfin the antipope, he was acknowledged by the Italian bishops, and by the council of Aquileia, who condemned his opponent. He was a zealous enemy to the tenets of the Arians, and died 384, aged 80. Some of his letters have been published.

DAMASUS II. bishop of Brixen, was elected pope on the day of the resignation of Benedict IX. He died at Palestrina, 23 days after his election, 1048.

DAMBOURNEY, N. was born at Rouen, 10th May 1722, and died there, 2d June 1795. He distinguished himself, not only as a merchant, but as a man of science, well acquainted with philosophy and chemistry. He made some curious experiments on plants, &c. and published valuable tracts.

DAMIEN, Peter, cardinal and bishop of Ostia in the 11th century, was originally a benedictine monk, whom his superiors and not his ambition raised to places of eminence and dignity. He publicly condemned the wars which the popes carried on against the emperors, and asserted, from the example of our Saviour, that the ecclesiastics were to oppose their enemies, not by the arms of the flesh, but by the sword of the spirit. He was equally severe against the licentious manners of his age, which he attempted to correct and reform. His works were printed at Paris 1663. He died about 1073.

DAMIENS, Robert Francis, a Frenchman, known for his attempt to assassinate Lewis XV. He was executed 28th March, 1757, in a manner most horrible and wantonly barbarous. Vid. CHASTEL.

DAMO, the daughter of Pythagoras, was well skilled in the philosophy of her illustrious father.

DAMON, a Pythagorean philosopher, celebrated for his friendship with Pythias, which Dionysius the tyrant saw, and desired to share.

DAMON, an Athenian musician, the friend of Socrates.

DAMOCLES, a flatterer in the court of Dionysius, who, for a while, assumed the dress and dignity of the tyrant, to experience what happiness existed on a throne.

DAMOCRITUS, a Greek historian, author of a treatise on tactics, and of another on the Jews, whom he accused of worshipping the head of an ass.

DAMOURS, Lewis, a French lawyer, who died 16th Nov. 1788, author of a life of Ninon de l'Enclos, and other works of little merit.

DAMPIER, John, a native of Blois, who entered among the cordeliers, and was director of a nunnery at Orleans, where he died before 1550. His Latin poems, after the manner of Catullus, are elegant and valuable, and are published in the first volume of the deliciae poetarum Gallorum.

DAMPIER, Capt. William, a famous navigator, born at East Coker in Somersetshire, 1652. He early went to sea, and joined captain Cook, in order to cruise against the Spaniards. They accordingly proceeded to the the South-seas through the streights of Magellan, where they took several prizes, and where Cook died, 1684, and was succeeded in command by Davis. They afterwards attacked and burned the town of Plata, and then advanced to the bay of Panama, near which they took a Spanish ship sent with dispatches to Lima, and from the intelligence received on board, they meditated an attack on the plate ships, which ended unsuccessfully. Their next attack was against Leon, on the Mexican coast, which they destroyed, and also Rio Leja, and there Dampier left Davis, and sailed with captain Swan, to examine more fully the northern parts of the Mexican shore; but meeting with no success, and being disappointed in their wishes to seize the rich Manilla ship, they sailed across the great pacific ocean for the East Indies. After visiting St. John's island, New Holland, Trieste, and Nicobar, Dampier left his companions, and arrived at the English factory at Achan, where he afterwards engaged with captain Weldon in trading voyages for 15 months, and then entered as gunner at a factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he made his escape from the vigilance of the governor, and brought all his papers and journals with him, and reached the Downs, Sept. 16th. As he was now in want of money he sold his share in an Indian prince, whom his companions carried about for exhibition. He was afterwards engaged for three years, till 1711, in a voyage under the British merchants to the South-seas, of which he has recorded several curious and very interesting particulars. His voyage round the world has been frequently published, and is considered as an accurate and valuable performance. The time of Dampier's death is unknown. A good likeness of him is preserved in Trinity-house, Tower-hill.

DAMPIERRE, N. a French general, who distinguished himself under Dumourier at the battle of Jemappe. Though active and warlike he was driven from Aix-la-chapelle, and was beaten by the allies at Quaivrain. As he was examining the works of the enemy his thigh was carried off by a canon ball from an English battery, before the camp at Famars, and he died two days after, 10th May 1793.

DAN, the fifth son of Jacob by Bilhah the maid of Rachel, was the head of a tribe, whose territories were on the shores of the Mediterranean between Joppa and Ascalon.

DANCER, Daniel, a well known miser born near Harrow, Middlesex. The love of money was the ruling principle in his family, and when he inherited his paternal estate, which was considerable, he pursued the same plan of rigid mean parsimony. His intercourse with the world was merely in the selling of his hay, and the other produce of his farm, and the winter comforts of his fire side, in his inhospitable house, arose from the scanty supplies laboriously collected from the hedges, or the scattered boughs on the neighbouring common. On the death of his sister, from whom he received some property, he exchanged the hay bands which hitherto had protected his legs, for a second-hand pair of black worsted stockings, which were the only tokens of his mourning. This singular character died 1794, aged 80, and left the whole of his property to lady Tempest, who it seems had behaved towards him with charity, in the hope of alleviating his apparent poverty.

DANCHET, Anthony, a French poet, born at Riorn

1671. At 19 he became professor of rhetoric at Chartres, and four years after he came to Paris, where he devoted himself to write for the theatre. He was member of the French academy and of that of inscriptions, and had also a place in the king's library. He died 1748, universally esteemed as much for his private character as for his writings. His works, consisting of tragedies, songs, operas &c. were printed at Paris 1751, 4 vols. 12mo.

DANDINI, Jerome, a Jesuit, born at Cesena in Italy 1554. He was the first of his order who taught philosophy at Paris. He was in consequence of his learning rector of the colleges of Ferrara, Forli, Bologna, Parma, and Milan. He also taught philosophy at Perugia 1596, when he was appointed by pope Clement VIII. to be his legate to the Maronites of mount Libanus. He wrote an account of his journey in Italian, which Simon translated into French. Dandini died at Forli 1634, aged 80. His commentary on Aristotle's three books de animâ, appeared at Paris 1611, folio, and his ethics at Cesena 1651.

DANDINI, Pietro, an eminent painter, born at Florence 1646. He studied under Valerio Spada, and his uncle Vincentio Dandini, and after travelling through Italy he resided for some time at Venice, and also at Parma and Modena, that he might more carefully view and copy the finest pieces of the greatest masters. On his return to Florence he was employed by the grand duke in adorning his palaces from subjects from sacred and fabulous history, as well as in fancy and caricature pieces. His genius was great, and he displayed astonishing powers in the imitation of Titian, Veronese, and Tintoretto. He died 1712. His son Ottavio was equally eminent as a painter.

DANDINI, Casare, an historical painter of Florence. He was extremely correct in his drawings, and his pieces were all finished in a superior stile. His altar pieces at Florence are greatly admired, especially that of the chapel l'Annonciata. He was brother to Vincentio and uncle to Pietro.

DANDINI, Hercule Francois, professor of law at Padua, died 1747, aged 56. He was author of several learned works, de scribendi ratione, de servitutibus prædiorum interpretationes per epistolas, &c.

DANDOLO, Henry, a Venetian, raised to the rank of doge of his country 1192. Though then 84 years old, vigor, wisdom, and activity marked his government. He conquered Zara which had revolted, engaged in the crusades, and displayed astonishing valor at the siege of Constantinople. He was in consequence of his services created lord of Romania, and died 1205.

DANDOLO, Andrew, doge of Venice, made an alliance with Egypt, which produced a rupture with the Genoese, who were jealous of his prosperity. He died 1354, aged 44. He wrote an history of Venice, and as the friend of literature corresponded with Petrarch and other learned men.

DANDRE-BARDON, Michael Francois, known as a painter and as a writer, was born at Aix in Provence, 22d May 1700, and died 14th April 1783. He was professor of the academy of painting, and was admired for his historical pieces. He wrote besides some poetry of inferior merit, the life of Carlo Vanloo, 12mo. 1765,— treatise on painting, sculpture &c.—well known anecdotes on the death of Bouchardon,—conference on the utility of history to artists.

DANDRIEU, John Francis, a famous musician, who died at Paris 1740, aged 56. He composed three books of pieces for the harpsichord, one for the organ, with pieces for christmas, much admired by connoisseurs.

DANEAU or DANÆUS, Lambert, a calvinist preacher, who was born at Orleans, and died at Castres in 1596, aged 66. He taught theology at Leyden, and published commentaries on Matthew and Mark, a poetical system of geography, aphorismi politici & militares.

DANES, Peter, born at Paris, studied at the college of Navarre, and was Greek professor at the college royal for five years. He was tutor to the dauphin afterwards Francis II. and he was present at the council of Trent, where he delivered a celebrated speech in 1546. During his stay at Trent he was made bishop of Lavaur. He died at Paris 23d April 1577, aged 80. He was a prelate of extensive learning, commanding eloquence, great gravity of manners and genuine piety. He wrote several things, but never set his name to them. The 10th book of Paulus Æmilii's history of France is attributed to him. His opuscula, with his life, were published by his kinsman Peter Hilany Danes in 1731, 4to.

DANET, Peter, a French abbé, among those learned men who published the classics for the use of the dauphin. He published Phædrus with notes, besides a dictionary, and other works, and died at Paris 1709.

DANGEAU, Louis Courcillon de, member of the French academy, and abbot of Clermont and Fontaine-Daniel, was born at Paris, Jan 1643, and died there Jan. 1st 1723. He usefully devoted his time to facilitate the study of belles lettres, history and geography, for which he invented several new and ingenious games. He published a new method to learn historical geography, two vols. folio.—the principles of heraldry in 14 plates 4to.—historical games of the kings of France,—reflections on the parts of grammar,—of the election of the emperor. His principal work is the dialogues on the immortality of the soul, attributed by some to the abbé de Choisi. He was master of a great variety of languages, but his benevolence was equal to his learning. By economy he was in possession of a respectable income, which was liberally applied to the relief of indigence and distresses.

DANGEAU, Philip de Courcillon, marquis de, brother of the preceding, was born in 1638. He was a great favorite at the court of Lewis XIV. for his many accomplishments, and his taste for literature procured him a seat in the French academy and in that of sciences. He died at Paris 1720; at the age of 82, grand master of the military orders of N.dame du mont Carmel, and Lazarus of Jerusalem. His conversation, manners, disinterestedness, and many other virtues, were the admiration of the age. He left some memoirs in M.S. from which Voltaire, Henault, and la Beaumelle, have drawn some curious particulars. There is also another M.S. in which he exhibits in a very interesting manner the character of Lewis XIV. among his courtiers.

DANHEWER, John Conrad, a native of the Brisgaw of the Lutheran persuasion. He was theological professor at Strasburg, where he died 1666, aged 63. He was author of some theological tracts, and violently opposed the intended union between the Calvinists and the Lutherans.

DANICAN, Andrew, a native of Drieux near Paris, nicknamed Philidor by the king of France. He was a great chess player. He published at London 1740, his analyse du jeu des echecs, and his musical composition of the carmen seculare of Horace, so much admired, was performed at Freemasons-hall 1779, as also Congreve's ode to harmony. He was esteemed for his many private good qualities, as well as his singular dexterity at chess. He played, not two months before his death, two games at the same time and blindfolded, with two of the best chess players of the country, and was declared victorious. His infirmities were increased by a malevolent insinuation that he was a person suspected by government, and he gradually sunk into the grave, after a long residence in England, 31st August 1795, aged above 70.

DANIEL, the last of the four great prophets, was of the royal blood of Judah, and was carried away a captive to Babylon 606 B.C. He was there educated to become one of the favorites of Nebuchadnezzar, and his name was changed to Belteshazzar. So rapid was his progress in the sciences and the language of Chaldea, and so great his wisdom, that the king entrusted him with the government of Babylon, and made him chief of the magi, upon his true explanation of the dream of the mystic statue, which prefigured the four great empires of Assyria, Persia, Alexander, and his successors. He acquired singular celebrity by explaining the writing upon the wall under Belshazzar, and under Darius he became prime minister. His favor with the king however excited the envy of the courtiers, and he was by their intrigues thrown into the den of lions, for refusing to honor Darius with divine homage. His preservation in this dreadful situation restored him to the royal favor, and brought on the destruction of his enemies. The book of Daniel is written partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee.

DANIEL, Arnould, a native of Tarascon, under Alphonus I. count of Provence. He wrote several poems, from which Petrarch received great assistance. He died about 1189.

DANIEL, Peter, a learned advocate of Orleans, died at Paris 1603. He published the aulularia of Plautus and commentaries of Servius on Virgil. His library, which was very valuable, was afterwards conveyed partly to Stockholm, and partly to the Vatican.

DANIEL, Samuel, an English poet and historian, born at Taunton in Somersetshire 1562. He entered at Magdalen college Oxford, but after three years' residence left the university without a degree, and by the influence of his brother-in-law John Florio, he became groom of the privy chamber to Anne queen of James I. He had succeeded Spenser as poet laureat, and by his genius and learning he gained the friendship of the most eminent men, of the times such as Camden, sir John Harrington, Spelman, Cotton, Ben Jonson, Owen, Stradling, &c. He lived, while near the court, at a house in Old-street, where he composed many of his dramatic pieces, but in his old age he went to reside at a farm which he had at Beckington, Somersetshire, where he ended his days in peace and retirement 1619. His poetical works, consisting of dramatic dramatic and other lighter pieces, besides a poem in 8 books on the wars of York and Lancaster, were published in 2 vols. 12mo, 1718. His history of England to the end of Edward III. in 2 vols. 4to, continued afterward by Truffel, was written, it is said "with great brevity and politeness, and his political and moral reflections are very fine, useful, and instructive." This history, as Langbaine observes, is the crown of all his works.— There is another Samuel Daniel, mentioned by Wood as publisher in 1642 of "archiepiscopal priority established by Christ, and of "the birth, life and death, of the Jewish Unction."

DANIEL, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Rouen, 8th February 1649. At the age of 18 he was admitted among the Jesuits, and early began to display his abilities by delivering lectures on literature, philosophy, and theology. One of his first performances was a voyage to the world of Descartes, a romance, most ingenious and excellent, as Bolingbroke observes, which ridiculed the Cartesian system, and which became so celebrated as to be translated into several languages. His great work is his history of France to the death of Henry IV. published at Paris in 3 vols. folio, 1713, and afterwards corrected and enlarged in 7 vols. 4to. 1722. This work was afterwards continued to the death of Lewis XIV. but in an inferior style. Father Daniel wrote besides several theological and other tracts, one of which "dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxus," passed through 12 editions in less than 2 years. All these smaller tracts were collected in two vols. 4to. This very learned and amiable Jesuit died at Paris 23d June 1728.

DANTE, Alighieri, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Florence 27th May 1265, of an ancient family. He early displayed his poetical talents, but the ambition of being elevated among the ruling men of his native city, engaged him in all the troubles and miseries of violent faction. His friends were defeated in the tumult, and he fought with them safety in banishment. In his exile at Ravenna, he vented the severest shafts of his resentment against his enemies, and because the pope and Philip of Valois, brother to the French king, had been instrumental in his downfall, he ridiculed them in his writings, and intimated that Hugh Capet the progenitor of the monarchy was risen from the mean occupation of a butcher. He also incited the prince of Verona to make war against the Florentines, and to procure his recall, but all to little purpose. In his honorable exile, at the court of Guy Polentano, prince of Ravenna, he was sent by that sovereign to negotiate with the Venetians who wished to make war against him, but the magistrates of Venice treated the ambassador with contempt, and refused to admit him within their walls. This arrogant conduct had such an effect upon the sensible and irritable heart of Dante, that, at his return to Ravenna, unable to survive the affront, he died July 1321, aged 57. To his misfortunes perhaps we are indebted for his poems, for unable to revenge himself by force, he drew the pen of satire in his own defence. His triple poem, of paradise, purgatory, and hell, displays astonishing powers of genius, and at once exhibits the sweetness and graces of poetry with the bitterness of insatiable enmity. The reputation and the usurped power of the pope, Boniface VIII. the pedigree of the French king, and the prostituted venality of Florence, that den of thieves, are the subjects which engage and enflame the virulence of the poet. He every where displays spirit, fire, and sublimity, and from his compositions, succeeding poets have learned not only how to point the shaft of satire, but to write with elegance, dignity, and grace. His works were collected and printed at Venice 1564, with the notes of Christopher Landini, and various and improved editions have since that time appeared. He wrote also a Latin work on monarchy, and another de vulgari eloquentia.

DANTE, Peter Vincent, a native of Perouse, who died 1512. He so successfully imitated the verse of the famous Dante, that he was called by his name. He was eminent for his skill in mathematics and architecture, and he invented several useful machines, and wrote a commentary on Sacrobosco's sphere.

DANTE, Vincent, grandson to the preceding, was well known as a painter and sculptor and mathematician. He died at Perouse 1576, aged 46. His statue of Julius III. is much admired. He wrote the lives of those who excelled in drawings for statues. He refused the invitations of Philip II. of Spain, to finish the paintings of the Escorial.

DANTE, Ignatius, a descendant of the great poet, was born at Perugia, and became known for his skill in mathematics as well as in divinity and philosophy. He read lectures on geography at Bologna, and was engaged by Gregory XIII. to draw geographical maps and plans. He evinced such dexterity in this that the pope raised him to the bishopric of Alatri. He died 1586. He published in 1569 at Florence, a treatise on the astrolabe, besides notes on the universal planisphere. He made a sphere of the world in five tables. The meridian line, which he drew through St. Petronius' church in Bologna 1576, was afterwards finished by Cassini.

DANTE, John Baptiste, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Perugia, and distinguished himself by his mechanical powers in making a pair of wings with such nicety that he could support himself in the air, and fly across the lake Trasymenus. In one of his exhibitions before the people of Perugia, one of the wings broke, and he fell on the top of a church, and shattered his thigh. He was afterwards professor of mathematics at Venice, and died before he was forty years old, about the end of the 15th century.

DANTON, George James, a native of Arcis-sur-Aube, born 26th October 1759. He was originally a lawyer, but the revolution drew him into public notice, as the associate of Robespierre and Marat. To an unprincipled hatred against Lewis XVI. he added the most ferocious spirit, and after viewing the massacres of September with pleasure, he prepared to organize the public bodies of the state to resist the invasion of the Prussians. Undismayed amidst the general terror, he opposed the project of removing the convention beyond the Loire; but while he permitted the cruelties of anarchy, he secretly paved the way for his own elevation to the sovereign power. For awhile Robespierre was his friend, but when he saw his superior eloquence, and his influence among the Jacobins, he marked him for destruction. Dragged before the bloody revolutionary tribunal, which he had himself established, Danton showed firmness and indifference. He was guillotined the first day of April 1794. Indolent yet cruel, ambitious and vulgar, this bloody tyrant possessed with a stentorian voice, the imposing powers of persuasion, and while devoted to wine and low pleasures, he gained the good opinion of his guilty associates by gross ribaldry and licentious wit.

DANTZ, John Andrew, a learned Lutheran divine, born at Sanhusen near Gotha. After travelling in Holland and England, he settled at Jena, where, as professor of the oriental tongues, and of theology, he distinguished himself. He died of an apoplexy, 1727, aged 73. He wrote Hebrew and Chaldee grammars—sinceritas sacræ scripturæ veteris testamenti—translations of rabbinical writings, dissertations, &c.

DARAN, James, a native of St. Frajon in Gascony, who became surgeon general in the imperial army at Turin and Milan. He refused the honorable offers of Amadeus to settle in Italy, and returned to France, where he died 1784, aged 83. He wrote a treatise on the virulent gonorrhœa—observations on the diseases of the urethra, &c. He was very expert in his operations in diseases of the bladder, of the urethra, &c.

DARCEY, N. an able chymist and physician of France, who was professor in the national institute, and died at Paris 1801, aged 75. He made some curious experiments with Rouelle and Macquer, and published some valuable memoirs on potteries, and on the various kinds of earth to be used in those manufactories. He also analysed minerals, and gave to the public the state of the Pyrenees, with conjectures on the causes of their gradual wasting away, &c.

DARCI, Patrick count, a celebrated philosopher and engineer, born in Ireland 1725. As he was attached to the Stuart family, he removed to Paris in 1739, and at the age of 17 he distinguished himself by a new solution of the problem of the curve of equal pressure, in a resisting medium. He was engaged in the war of 1744, and was taken prisoner by the English. In 1760 he published his essay on artillery, with curious experiments on the charges of powder, &c. and in 1765 appeared his memoir on the duration of the sensation of sight. This is the most ingenious of his works, and proves him to be an accurate experimentalist. His memoir on hydraulic machines, and also his other works on experimental philosophy, evince a great genius, and a man who to the patience of observation united great and quick discrimination and solidity of judgment. Though an exile he was attached to his country, and loved the name of an Irishman. He died at Paris, of a cholera morbus in 1779.

DARGONNE, Dom Bonaventure, a learned carthusian monk, who died 1704, aged 64. He is author of un traité de la lecture des peres de l'Eglise—des melanges d'histoire & de littérature—and other things.

DARIUS, the Mede, supposed to be the same as Cyaxares the son of Astyages, who died at Babylon, about 348 B. C.

DARIUS I. son of Hystaspes, was king of Persia, after Cambyzes, and after the destruction of the usurper Smerdis. His selection out of the seven nobles, who had united to dethrone the impostor, was owing to the neighing of his horse. He destroyed Babylon, and restored the captive Jews to their country. His forces were defeated at Marathon by Miltiades, and he died B. C. 485, as he prepared to invade Greece.

DARIUS II. king of Persia, after his father Artaxerxes, was father of Artaxerxes and Cyrus the younger. He died in the 19th year of his reign, B. C. 404.

DARIUS III. the last king of Persia, was defeated by Alexander the great, in the dreadful battles of Granicus, Issus, and Arbela, and was murdered as he fled from the field by Bessus, about 331 B. C.

DARQUIER, Augustine, an eminent astronomer, born at Toulouse, 23d Nov. 1718. He early paid attention to mathematical and astronomical pursuits, and as he was blessed with a comfortable independence, he provided himself with the best instruments, and built an observatory in his own house. More generally to diffuse his extensive knowledge, he took pupils whom he ably instructed in astronomy. He paid the expence of calculations to give greater accuracy to his observations, and received no pecuniary assistance whatever from the government. This learned and patriotic man died in his native town 18th Jan. 1802, after escaping the storms of the revolution, and being admitted member of the national institute. He wrote 2 vols. of observations, published at his own expence—Lambert's cosmological letters, translated and printed at Utrecht—elements of geometry, from Simpson—observations on the solar eclipse of 1778, from the Spanish of Ulloa—letters on practical astronomy. His last observations to March 1798, appeared in la Lande's histoire celeste.

DARWIN, Erasmus, an English poet and physician, born at Newark in Nottinghamshire, 1732. As his family was respectable, he received a liberal education, and then entered at St John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. B. 1755. From Cambridge he went to Edinburgh, where he more particularly devoted himself to the study of physic, and where he took his medical degrees. He afterwards settled at Lichfield, where he acquired great celebrity in his profession. His first wife was miss Howard of Lichfield, who bore him three sons, and after her death, which happened in 1770, he married the widow of col. Pole, a lady of agreeable manners, and possessed of a handsome fortune, by whose persuasion, in 1781 he retired to Derby. He died at Derby very suddenly, 18th April 1802. In private life Dr. Darwin was amiable and benevolent, in his conversation easy and entertaining, and in his manners affable. The best known of his works are his botanic garden with philosophical notes, in two parts—the economy of vegetation—the loves of the plants, 2 vols. 8vo.—zoonomia, or the laws of organic life, 4 vols. 8vo.—phytologia, or the philosophy of agriculture and gardening, 4to. He wrote besides, treatise on female education, 4to.—some papers in the philosophical transactions, on medical and philosophical subjects—a thesis on the movement of the heart and the arteries, in consequence of the stimulus of the blood—the system of vegetables of Linnaeus, published by the Lichfield botanical society, &c. As a poet and botanist, the name of Darwin is respectable, his verses display elegance, grace, and beauty, but they they seldom rise to sublimity, and they please more by the easy flow of number, than by the fire of description. His graces are the tinsel of ornament, not the animated the fiery language of the muse. In his system he branches out too much into the fields of fancy, and he seems delighted in informing his readers that his notions of religion were vague and unprincipled. Ovid, in another age, had changed men into trees and plants; but the poet of Lichfield transforms his flowers into human beings, and with all the feeling of carnal passion he describes the inhabitants of his parterre and of his green house, as conveying their amorous sighs, and their tender glances, with all the art and coquetry of modern times.

DARWIN, Charles, son of Dr. Darwin, was born at Lichfield 1758, and educated at Christ's church, Oxford, and at Edinburgh, where he obtained the first prize medal from the Esculapian society, in a treatise on the means of distinguishing pus from mucus. He wrote in Latin, an account of the retrograde motions of the absorbent vessels of animal bodies in some diseases, which his father published in English. He died 1778, at a time when his father promised himself much happiness from the exertions of his great and extensive abilities in the medical world.

DASSIER, John, medallist to the republic of Geneva, struck a series of the English kings, with a hope of procuring an establishment in the English mint, which however did not succeed. His nephew, James Anthony, in 1740 was appointed second engraver to the mint in London, but returned to Geneva five years after. The family were ingenious. They executed a set of the reformers in brass, small, and also large medals of the great men then living. Their bronze medals of Roman history are valuable.

DASSOURI, a French musician and poet of the 17th century. He obtained celebrity by his buffoonery, and was introduced to the court of Lewis XIII. and XIV. He left Paris in 1655, and travelled through Lyons, where he was noticed and entertained by Moliere, and afterwards visited Turin, and other places, where, by his wit, drollery, and artifices, he maintained himself, and procured the patronage of the great. He died at the latter end of the 17th century. In 1674 he published two small volumes, composed in the Chatelet prison. He was ridiculed by Boileau, and severely lampooned by Cyrano de Bergerac, under the name of Soucidas.

DATAMES, an illustrious general of Persia, who, after the most meritorious services, was treated with contempt and suspicion, and in consequence revolted against his sovereign. He was assassinated by Mithridates, 361 B. C.

DATI, Augustin, a native of Sienna, where he became teacher of rhetoric and of the classics, and afterwards first magistrate. He wrote a treatise on the immortality of the soul—epistles—orations—the history of Sienna, &c. printed in 1 vol. fol. 1503, and he died 1478, aged 58.

DATI, Carlo, a native of Florence, professor of literature there. He was remarkable for the civility he showed to strangers who visited his native city, and he became known by his works, which consisted of Italian poems on Lewis XIV. and other things. He proved in one of his tracts, that M. rseennus is not the inventor of the cyloid, but Galileo, and he also ascribes great merit to Toricelli, for the explanation of the suspension of quicksilver in a glass tube. His chief work, according to Boyle, is the life of four of the illustrious painters of ancient times, Zeuxis, Parrhasius, Apelles, and Protogenes. Dati died 1675, respected for his amiable manners not less than for his extensive erudition.

DAVAL, Peter, a barrister of the Middle-temple, known as an able mathematician. He translated cardinal de Retz's memoirs, 1723, and died 8th Jan. 1763, being then accomptant general to the court of chancery. His opinion on elliptical arches, at the time of building Blackfriars-bridge, is recorded in the London-magazine, March 1760.

DAVANZATI, Bernard, a native of Florence, who translated Tacitus into Italian, and wrote besides treatises on Tuscan agriculture—history of the English schism—an account of exchanges,—&c. and died 1606, aged 77.

DAUBENTON, John Lewis Marie, an eminent anatomist, born at Montbard in Burgundy, May 1716. When he had completed his medical studies, he became the active associate of Buffon, in the preparation and the completion of his valuable natural history, and published besides instruction for shepherds—a treatise on trees and shrubs—and many curious and interesting memoirs on subjects of mineralogy—on the improvement of wool, &c. He was at first keeper of the royal museum, and in 1744 was elected member of the academy of sciences, and in 1799 he was chosen member of the conservative senate. He died 31st Dec. of the same year.

DAUBENTON, William, a Jesuit of Auxerre, confessor to Philip V. of Spain. It is supposed, that he enjoyed so much the royal confidence, that the monarch entrusted him with his intention of abdicating his throne, an important secret which the favorite disclosed to Orleans regent of France. He died of an apoplexy 1723, aged 75. He wrote some funeral orations—some sermons, 2 vols. folio, &c.

DAVENANT, John, bishop of Salisbury, was born in Watling-street, 1576, where his father was a merchant. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1597. He took his degree of D. D. 1609, and the same year was elected lady Margaret's divinity professor, and in 1614 was chosen master of his college. His learning recommended him to James I. who sent him with other eminent divines to the synod of Dort 1618, and he was in 1621 raised to the see of Salisbury. He however incurred the king's displeasure, by treating in a discourse on predestination. He died of a consumption, 20th April 1641, and was buried in his cathedral. He was a learned divine, and very exemplary in his manners; but a strong Calvinist. He published an exposition of the epistle to the Colossians,—questions on which he had disputed in the schools, in numbers, 49—animadversions on Hoard's treatises—and other theological tracts.

DAVENANT, William, an English poet, born at Oxford 1605. As his father kept an inn there, and his mother was a great beauty, malevolence has wantonly insinuated that to Shakespeare, who generally stopped there on his road between London and Stratford, our author was indebted for his life and his poetical talents. Young Davenant received his grammar learning at Oxford, ford, and then entered at Lincoln college; but his love of poetry led him from the university, and he became page to the dukes of Richmond, and afterwards to lord Brooke, who himself had some poetical talents. In 1628 he began to write plays, and soon recommended himself to the friendship of the wits of the age. In consequence of a criminal intercourse with a black female in Axeyard, Westminster, he had about this time the misfortune to lose his nose; but though disfigured, and though ridiculed for the adventure, he did not part with his merriment, or the cause of his disgrace. In 1637 he succeeded Ben Jonson as poet laureate, but his attachment to the king's person produced an accusation against him, and he was charged with an attempt to seduce the army. He was bailed and immediately withdrew to France, and afterwards on his return he was knighted by the king, near Gloucester, 1643. At the beginning of the civil troubles, he again retired to France, where probably to please the court, he changed his religion, and in consequence of the weight he thus acquired he was commissioned confidentially by the queen to persuade Charles to give up the church for his security, an intimation which highly displeased the king, who forbade Davenant ever to appear before him again. The queen afterwards employed him to transport some artificers from France to Virginia, but the ship was seized by the English cruisers, and Davenant thrown into prison, and threatened with persecution and death, from which however the friendship and interference of Milton and others saved him. After two years' confinement in the tower he was liberated, and now to maintain himself, he began, as tragedies were considered as profane, to exhibit moral virtues in verse, and to perform in recitative music. At the restoration he obtained a patent for acting plays in Lincoln's Inn fields. He died 17th April 1668, aged 63, and was interred in Westminster-abbey, where these words record his name, "O rare sir William Davenant." His works were published by his widow in 1673, and dedicated to James duke of York. They consist of plays and poems, in which is the famous Gondibert, in which his favorite black female is introduced.

DAVENANT, Charles, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1656, and educated at Cheam, Surrey, and Baliol college, Oxford. He took no degree, and at the age of 19, he distinguished himself by the acting of the only tragedy he wrote, Circe, which appeared with great applause at the duke of York's theatre. From the theatre, however, where he had some interest from the property left by his father, he turned his thoughts to civil law, and had the degree of doctor conferred on him by Cambridge. He served for St. Ives in the parliament of 1685, and in 1698 and 1700, for Great Bedwin. He was appointed by James II. to inspect all plays, and preserve the decorum of the stage, and he afterwards held for 16 years the office of commissioner of excise, and lastly that of inspector general of the exports and imports, till his death, which happened sixth November 1714. Dr. Davenant's knowledge of the constitution, and his great skill in figures, rendered him an able political and financial writer. Though some of his pamphlets for their freedom, their independence of language, and severity of censure, drew upon him the attacks of some able opponents, yet his abilities were universally acknowledged, and his opinion always highly respected. His first political work was an essay upon the ways and means of supplying the war 1695, and he treated the subject in so masterly a manner that whatever he afterwards wrote was fought with avidity, and read with deference. His other works are all upon political and financial subjects. They were the best part collected and revised by sir Charles Whitworth in five vols. 8vo. 1771.

DAVENANT, William, fourth son of sir William, was educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1680, and entered into orders. He translated into English, la Mothe le Vayer's animadversions on Greek and Latin historians. He was presented to a living in Surrey by his friend Robert Wyndham Sole esquire, and it was in the company of this gentleman that he visited Paris, where he was unfortunately drowned, as he was swimming for his diversion in the summer of 1681.

DAVENPORT, Christopher, a learned Englishman, born 1598 at Coventry, where he received his grammar education. He entered at Merton college, Oxford, and two years after went to Douai and Ypres, where he changed his religion and assumed the habit of a franciscan. He afterwards travelled into England under the name of Sancta Clara, and was chaplain to queen Henrietta. In this office he was very active in advancing the cause of popery, by persuasion as well as by writing, and indeed so formidable did his influence appear, that one of the articles of impeachment against Laud, was his holding conferences with this dangerous franciscan. During the civil wars Davenport was a fugitive residing sometime abroad, and sometime in London and Oxford, but after the restoration he was appointed chaplain to Catharine of Portugal, Charles's queen, and he was a third time made provincial of his order in England. He died 31st May 1680. He wrote, among several works, paraphrastica expositio articulorum confessionis Anglicanae, & Deus, Natura, Gratia, in which he attempted to reconcile the king, the church, and the articles of religion, to the church of Rome.

DAVENPORT, John, elder brother to the preceding, was born at Coventry 1597, and entered at Merton college 1613. He did not like his brother become papist, but a most zealous puritan. After being minister of St. Stephen's church, Coleman street, and admired for his oratory, he passed over to Amsterdam, where the minister of the English church, John Paget, prevented his associating with his congregation, a measure which produced a controversy between the two divines. At the breaking out of the rebellion he returned to England, but soon after embarked for America, where he became minister of New-Haven. He died at Boston 1669. He wrote sermons—a catechism containing the chief heads of the christian religion—and other theological tracts.

DAVID, king of Israel, was born at Bethlehem 1085 B.C. and anointed by Samuel, whilst he was keeping the flocks of his father Jesse. His courage in killing the giant Goliath, with a sling and a stone rendered him conspicuous in Israel, but Saul, who at first wished to patronize him, grew jealous of his popularity, and pursued him with the intention of putting him to death.

Thus expelled from his country David wandered among the neighbouring nations, always respected for valor and integrity, and at the death of Saul, he was acknowledged king of the tribe of Judah. After some time on the death of Mephibosheth the son of Saul, who had been placed on his father's throne by the intrigues of Abner, David was received as sole monarch by all the tribes of Israel, and his reign for 30 years was marked by prosperity, glory, and fame. He extended his dominion over some of the adjoining countries, and took Jerusalem the city of the Jebusites, which he called the city of David; but his reputation was stained by his adulterous intercourse with Bathsheba, and his foul murder of Uriah her husband. In a moment of arrogance too he caused the people to be numbered which was severely punished by the visitation of a plague. His transgressions were also visited by dissension in his own family, and by the revolt of his favorite son Absalom who proclaimed himself king. The death of this prince, who was slain by Joab, greatly affected the mourning father, who in his old age resigned the government into the hands of Solomon his son. David died aged 70 B.C. 1015, highly respected for his character of benevolence, courage and piety. The psalms which he composed, in a strain of great sublimity and commanding eloquence, are strong proofs of his devotion as well as of his trust in the Divine Providence.

DAVID, Saint, the patron of Wales was a native of the province, and educated at Bangor in the 5th century. He founded several monasteries in Wales, where his monks maintained themselves by their labor and industry. He governed the see of St. David's 65 years, and was buried in the cathedral there. The symbol of the leek attributed to him is supposed to originate in the custom of Cymortha, still observed among the farmers of the country, where in assisting one another in ploughing their land, they bring each their leeks to the common repast of the whole party.

DAVID, an Armenian philosopher, in the middle of the fifth century, who studied at Athens. He translated some of the works of Plato and Aristotle, and other learned Greeks, which are preserved in the French king's library.

DAVID, de Dinant, a disciple of Amauri, in the beginning of the 13th century, who taught that God was original matter, a system afterwards nearly adopted by Spinoza.

DAVID, George, a fanatic of Ghent, educated as a glazier. In 1525 he began to preach as the true Messiah, the third David, the nephew of God. This strange doctrine created followers and persecution, and he fled to Friesland, and afterwards to Basil, where he died 1556. He prophesied that after three days he would rise again, and about that time the magistrates of Basil in contempt of his opinions dug up his body, which together with his writings was burnt by the executioner.

DAVID, de Pomis, a Jewish physician of the 16th century, who pretended to be descended from the true stock of Judah. He wrote de sensum affectibus, 8vo.—a rabbinical dictionary, Hebrew and Italian, Venice, folio. 1587, very useful and learned.

DAVID, Gantz, a Jewish historian of the 16th century, author of a Hebrew chronicle, 4to. part of which was translated into Latin by Vorstius with notes, Leyden 1644, 4to.

DAVID, of Hirazug, a Welsh divine and poet, called the black, about 1350. He altered and improved the grammar and profody of Edeyrn, at the time of the conquest of his country by Edward I. and according to the new institutions and manners which that era produced, the missal or the office of the Virgin was translated by him into Welsh, and is still preserved.

DAVID EL DAVID, a Persian Jew, in the 12th century, who pretended to be the Messiah, and prevailed upon some of his countrymen to support his imposture. He was at last defeated and beheaded in the king's presence, who ordered the Jews to be massacred through the empire.

DAVID AB GWILUM, a celebrated Welsh bard, patronised by Ivor the Generous. His poetry which possessed beauty, fire and sublimity was chiefly on subjects of love, and 147 of his poems were inscribed to the fair Morvid his mistress, who however proved unkind to his merits, and married Rhys Gwgan, an officer, who distinguished himself in the English army at the battle of Crecy. His works were edited at London 1789.

DAVID, emperor of Trebizonde, after John his brother, was of the imperial family of the Commeni. He was defeated by Mahomet II. who insolently offered him the choice either of being converted to mahometanism, or to suffer death. He heroically chose death, and suffered 1461.

DAVID AP EDMUND, a Welsh poet in the 15th century, born at Hanmer in Flintshire. He was the president of an assembly of bards who met at Caermarthen, at the request of Edward IV. and were opposed by a poetical band from another province. At that meeting a number of canons of poetry were established and agreed upon.

DAVID I. earl of Northumberland and Huntingdon, was king of Scotland, after his brother Alexander the Fierce 1124. He was brought up in England, and married Maud the grand niece of William the conqueror, and after the death of the first Henry, he maintained with spirit the claims of the empress Maud to the English throne against Stephen. To enforce her pretensions he entered England, and seized Carlisle which though conquered afterwards at the battle of North Allerton 1138, he was permitted to retain. He died at Carlisle 11th May 1153, universally respected as a mild, popular, and benevolent king.

DAVID II. king of Scotland, was son of Robert Bruce, whom he succeeded when five years old. During the invasion of his country by Baliol he was conveyed to France, but returned after the defeat of his enemies 1342. He was in 1346 taken prisoner by an English army, after a valiant resistance, and sent a close prisoner to the tower, from which, after a long confinement of 10 years, he was liberated on paying a heavy ransom. He died 1371, aged 47, leaving no issue by his wife Jane daughter of Edward II. of England.

DAVIDIS, Francis, a Hungarian, who at various times embraced the tenets of the Roman catholics, the Lutherans, the Calvinists, the Unitarians, &c. As he opposed both Socinus and Blandrata, and declared that no worship was due to Christ, he was accused of favoring Judaism, and was in consequence thrown into prison, where he died 1579. He wrote some tracts on the millennium, and other theological subjects.

DAVIES, John, a lawyer and poet, born at Chifford, Wilts 1570. He was of Queen's college Oxford, and then removed to the Middle temple, where he was called to the bar. He was member of parliament in 1601, and on the queen's death went with lord Hunston and others to Scotland to congratulate James, who knowing the character of his writings received him with great cordiality and respect. He was solicitor and attorney general to the king in Ireland, and also speaker of the Irish house, and on returning to England in 1612, he was made an English serjeant at law, afterwards one of the judges, and in 1626 lord chief justice of the king's bench. He died however suddenly of an apoplexy before his installation. He was a man of great spirit, of extensive erudition, but more distinguished for wit and learning, than as an able lawyer. His notice of the nature and immortality of the soul, a poem dedicated to queen Elizabeth, has gone through several editions. He wrote, besides smaller poems—orchestra—on dancing—hymns of Aftrea, &c. edited 1773, in 12mo, and some law tracts—an abridgment of sir Edward Coke's reports,—jus imponendi vectigalia, &c. edited 1786, 8vo. Sir John married Eleanor, daughter of lord Touchet, by whom he had a son, an idiot, who died young, and Lucy, who married lord Huntingdon. Lady Davies pretended to be a prophetess, and the Sunday before her husband's death she suddenly burst into tears, which she declared were his funeral tears. She died in London 1552, and was buried at St. Martin's in the fields, near her husband. An account of her wonderful and strange prophecies, was published in 1649.

DAVIES, John, was born at Llanveres in Denbighshire, and educated at Ruthin school by Morgan, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph. He was of Jesus, and afterwards of Lincoln college Oxford. He took his doctor's degree 1616, and became rector of Mallwyd and canon of St. Asaph. He was an excellent scholar, and well acquainted with the history and antiquities of his country. His works are—Antiquæ linguæ Britannicæ, nunc dictæ Cambro-Britannicæ, &c. rudimenta, 1621 8vo. Dictionarium Latino--Britannicum folio. 1632. Adagia Britannica, &c. He also assisted his friends bishop Morgan, and Parny, to translate the bible into Welsh. He died 1644.

DAVIES, John, an eminent critic, born in London 22d April 1679. He was educated at the charter-house and Queen's college Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1701. In 1711 he was made rector of Fen-ditton, near Cambridge, and prebendary of Ely, and 1717 chosen master of his college and created D.D. He died 7th March 1732, aged 53, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He was the learned editor of the works of Maximus Tyrius, Cæsar, Minucius Felix, Cicero's philosophical pieces, &c. Lactantius, &c. Though universally admired as the editor of these valuable classics, yet the abbé d'Olivet, has censured Dr. Davies as a puerile, weak, and injudicious annotator.

DAVIES, John, a poet and writing master. He was educated at Oxford, and afterwards resided in Fleet-street. Most of his poetical pieces are mentioned by Wood. He wrote also the scourge of folly, in epigrams, and the anatomy of fair writing, a copy-book, &c. He died about 1618.

DAVIES, Samuel, an American dissenting clergyman, born at Newcastle, Delaware, 3d November 1724. He succeeded in 1759, as president of the college of New Jersey, and died February 4th 1761. His sermons, 3 vols. 8vo. were published by Dr. Gibbons, London, and are in esteem.

DAVIES, Thomas, a bookseller. He was in 1728 at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1736 appeared as an actor at the Haymarket theatre. He then commenced bookseller in Duke's court, but soon returned to the theatre, and after strolling over the country he appeared in 1752 at Drury-lane, with his wife, a Miss Yarrow, a woman of great beauty and unsullied virtue. In 1762 he again commenced a bookseller in Ruffel-street, and in 1778 became a bankrupt, but the influence and friendship of Dr. Johnson, and a benefit at Drury-lane from Mr. Sheridan, restored him to the comforts of independence. In 1780 he published his life of Garrick, which improved his income and enlarged the number of his friends. He also wrote memoirs of Henderson, a life of Massinger, of Dr. John Eachard, Mr. Lillo, sir John Davies, and also dramatic miscellanies 3 vols. besides some fugitive pieces in the newspapers. He died 5th May 1785, and was buried in the vault of St. Paul's Covent garden.

DAVILA, Henry Catherine, a celebrated historian, born at Cyprus, from which he fled when that island was subdued by the Turks 1571. He came to Avila in Spain, where he understood his family originated, and he afterwards passed to France, where he became a favorite at the court of Henry III. The death of the monarch disconcerted the plans of Davila, who expected there for himself, his brother and two sisters, a permanent settlement, and though he remained for a little while in the service of Henry IV. he went to Venice, where he was honorably received. On his way to Verona, on the affairs of the Venetian republic, he was grossly insulted by a person who at last discharged a pistol at him, and wounded him mortally. The son of Davila, a youth of 18, revenged his death and immediately cut the assassin to pieces. During his residence at Venice, Davila wrote in Italian his history of the civil wars of France in 15 books, from the death of Henry II. 1559 to 1598. This history, considered by Bolingbroke as equal to Livy's annals, is highly esteemed for its authenticity, correctness, and the elegance of the composition. The best edition is that of London 2 vols. 4to 1755.

DAVILA, Peter Francis, a famous Spanish naturalist, who in the pursuit of conchyliology and mineralogy, corresponded with the most learned men in Europe. He died at Madrid 1785. An account of his valuable cabinet was published in 3 vols.

DAVIS, Henry Edwards, a native of Windfor, 11th July 1756. He was educated at Ealing, Middlesex, and at Baliol college Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. In 1778 he wrote his examination of Gibbon's decline and fall of the Roman empire, a work which though the production of a young man was considered as so respectable, that of many attacks it was the only one which the historian deigned to answer. He died 10th February 1784, of a lingering illness, and left behind him a most respectable character for erudition, for goodness of heart, and amiableness of manners. He was buried at Windfor.

DAVIS, John, a native of Sandridge, Devonshire, early inured to a sea life. He obtained in 1585, the command of some vessels to discover a northwest passage to the East Indies, and he gave his name to the streights which he visited, and the next year he proceeded in his spirit of discovery to the coast of Greenland, and as high as the 73d degree of north latitude. He was with Cavendish in 1591, in his expedition to the South seas, and afterwards he was employed in five voyages to the East Indies. He was not only an able seaman but a correct writer, as appears by the account of his voyages which he published. He was unfortunately killed on the shores of Malacca in a quarrel with some Japanese 1605.

DAVISON, Jeremiah, born in England, of Scotch parents, was pupil to Lely, and excelled in painting satyrs. He died 1745.

DAUMIUS, Christian, a native of Misnia, regent of the college of Zwickau, where he died 1687, aged 75. He gave proofs of his learning in his tractatus de causis amissarum linguarum Latinæ radicum, 8vo.—epistolæ 4to.—indagator et restitutor linguarum Græc. radicum,—and poems.

DAUN, Leopold count, a great general born in 1705. He was colonel in 1740, and distinguished himself in the wars of Maria Theresia, and afterwards with greater glory in the relief of Prague, &c. against the king of Prussia whom he defeated at Chotchemitch in 1757, to commemorate which great victory the empress instituted the military order which bears her name. He again distinguished himself at the battle of Hochkirchen in 1758, and at the siege of Dresden, but he was totally defeated at Siplitz near Torgau, in 1760. The peace of 1763 restored him and the country to tranquillity, and he died at Vienna 5th February 1766 at the age of 61, leaving behind him the character of a brave and circumspect general, a humane and benevolent man, and a devout christian.

DAUNOIS, Countess, acquired some celebrity, by her romances and travels in Spain. She died 1705.

DAURAT, John, a French poet, born near the head of the Vienne 1507. He so ably distinguished himself by his learning and application, that he became Greek professor at Paris, and evinced the superiority of his mode and powers of education, by the number of able and illustrious scholars who studied under him. Though learned, he was careless of his affairs, and consequently poor. Charles IX. made him his poet laureat, and was frequently delighted with his conversation. Daurat restored the custom of writing anagrams, in which he was very successful, and so prolific was his muse, that it is said, he wrote in Greek and Latin, not less than 50,000 verses, besides poems in French. He was, as Scaliger observes, a good critic; but he foolishly employed the last years of his life in finding out the bible in Homer's verses. After losing his first wife, by whom he had some children, he at the age of 80 married a young girl, by whom he had a son. He died at Paris 1588, aged 81.

DAWES, Mr William, an English prelate, born at Lyons near Braintree, Essex, 12th Sep. 1671. From Merchant-tailors' school he went to St. John's college, Oxford; but about two years after, in consequence of the death of his two elder brothers, and his inheriting the estates of his father sir John Dawes bart. he removed to Cambridge, as nobleman of Catharine-hall. Soon after taking his degree of M. A. he married Frances daughter of sir Thomas Darcy, and at the proper age entered into orders, and in 1696, after being made D. D. by royal mandate, he was elected master of his college. King William, who was pleased with one of his sermons, gave him a prebend of Worcester, and he was afterwards made rector and dean of Bocking, Essex, in every situation recommending himself to the good opinion of his neighbours, by his affable, benevolent, and charitable conduct. On the accession of queen Anne, he was made one of the royal chaplains; but a sermon which he preached offended some of the ministers, and the see of Lincoln intended for him, was conferred on Wake, 1705. Two years after, however, the queen named him for the see of Chester, and in 1714 he was translated to York. He died of a diarrhoea, and an inflammation of the bowels, 30th April 1724, and was buried near his lady in Catharine-hall. He had seven children, three of whom only survived him. This respectable and worthy man published an anatomy of Atheism, a short poem, 1693—the duties of the closet—sermons preached on several occasions—the duty of communicating, &c.—a preface to Blackall's works. His whole works were collected in 1733 in 3 vols. 8vo.

DAWES, Richard, the celebrated author of Miscellanea Critica, was born in 1708, and educated under the famous Anthony Blackwall, and afterwards at Emanuel college, Cambridge. In 1736 he published a specimen of a Greek translation of paradise lost. His attack upon Bentley, is censured by Toup. He was elected master of Newcastle-upon-Tyne school 1738, which he resigned 11 years after, and died in 1766 at Heworth near Newcastle. His miscellanea critica, has been very learnedly edited by bishop Burgess, Oxford, 1781.

DAY, John, an eminent printer, who had a shop in Aldergate-treet, and another at the west door at St. Paul's. He died 23d July 1584. His name deserves to be commemorated, not only as the printer of a bible dedicated to Edward VI. of Latimer's sermons, of Tyndal's works, of the book of martyrs, &c. but as a man whose great diligence in his profession, widely disseminated knowledge, and advanced, not in a slight degree, the progress of the reformation.

DAY, Thomas, an eminent writer, born in London, 22d June 1748. His father was a collector of the customs, and at his death left him an unprotected infant, but with an income of £1,200 a year. After being eight or nine years at the Charter house, he entered at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he, however, took no degree. He afterwards wished to apply himself to the study of medicine, from which he was dissuaded by his friend Dr. Small of Birmingham, and he at last entered at the Middle temple, and was called duly to the bar, but never practised. In his opinions of mankind he was romantic, he was an enthusiastic admirer of virtue, and had such detestation of female seduction, that he challenged, to no effect, a nobleman whom report described as a vile and licentious violator of virgin innocence.

In his schemes of visionary perfection, he selected two girls from the poor house at Shrewsbury, with the intention of educating them after the principles of Rousseau, and of selecting one of them for his wife; but the conduct and affection of the two young women did not answer his sanguine expectations, though he honorably performed his engagements towards them, and presented them with £500 each, when respectably married, the one to his friend Mr. Bicknell, and the other to a creditable tradesman. In the beginning of the American war, he embraced the part of the colonies, against the conduct of the mother country, and he published some political tracts, and two poems called, the devoted legions, and the desolation of America. Though long regardless of the sex, and afterwards disappointed in his addresses, he married miss Esther Milnes, and retired to the enjoyments of domestic life, and of agricultural pursuits on his estates in Essex and Surrey. In the association for the redress of grievances, Mr. Day was frequently a leading man, and an eloquent speaker, and in 1786 he published a pamphlet against the increase of taxes, and another concerning the bill in parliament for the exportation of wool. The work which has gained him celebrity, is his Sandford and Merton, in three vols. published separately, in 1783, 86, and 89, for the information of youth, a composition of singular merit, which, to simplicity of diction, and interesting anecdotes, unites respect for virtue, morality, and religion. On the 28th Sep. 1789, Mr. Day attempted, with more boldness than prudence, to ride a favorite but untamed horse, which by a sudden plunge, threw off his rider, and by a violent kick on the head put an immediate end to his existence. Mrs. Day heard the afflicting intelligence with horror, she closed the curtains of her bed, and never again suffered the light of the sun to visit them, and after two years spent in this melancholy retirement, she followed her husband to the grave. The epitaph which Mr. Day had written and designed for his friend Dr. Small's tomb, was inscribed on his own.

DEACON, James, an English gentleman, known for his skill in music, drawing, and painting. He died May 1750.

DEAGEANT de St. MARCELLIN, Guichard, a French writer, at first in the service of marshal d'Ancre, and afterwards of the duke of Luynes, whom he assisted against his first patron. He was employed as an able negotiator by the court, and when he became a widower, Lewis XIII. wished to make him bishop of Evreux, but he preferred a second wife and politics to ecclesiastical honors. In the fluctuations of court favors, he was at last disgraced and sent in exile to Dauphiny, where he died 1639, in a good old age. He wrote some memoirs of state, from the time of Henry IV. to the year 1624, which though inelegant, contain some curious particulars. They were printed by his grand-son at Grenoble in 12mo. 1668.

DEBORAH, a prophetess of Israel, who prevailed on Baruch to attack Sisera the general of Jabin. When her countrymen had obtained the victory, she composed a beautiful ode, B. C. 1285.

DE BURE, William Francis, a bookseller at Paris, well known for his bibliographic instructive, 7 vols. 8vo. 1763, &c. He died at Paris 15th July 1782, aged 50.

DECEBALUS, a king of Dacia, who by his valor in defeating the Roman legions, obtained a yearly tribute from Domitian and Nero. Trajan more warlike refused to pay the disgraceful subsidy, and conquered Decabalus, and reduced his country to a Roman province, 105.

DECEMBRIO, Peter Candido, a native of Pavia, secretary to the pope, and afterwards to Alphonso king of Arragon. He wrote lives of Philip Maria Visconti, and Francis Sforza, dukes of Milan,—and besides, published Italian translations of Quintus Curtius, and Livy—and a Latin version of Diodorus Siculus, of Appian, and of part of Homer. He died at Milan, 1477 aged 78.

DECHALES, Claudius Francis Millet, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Chambery 1611. He was not less respectable in private life, than as a man of learning. He read public lectures at Paris for four years, and afterwards taught navigation at Marseilles, and died professor of mathematics at Turin, 28th March 1678, aged 67. His works containing an edition of Euclid's elements—discourses on fortification and navigation—architecture—optics—hydrostatics—trigonometry, &c. were first collected in three vols. folio. called Mundus mathematicus, as a complete course of mathematics, and they were afterwards improved and published in 4 vols. 1690 at Lyons.

DECIUS, Philip, a native of Milan, lecturer in jurisprudence at Pisa, Pistoia, and other places in Italy, where he acquired such celebrity, that no one could dispute with him. He afterwards settled in France, but died at Pisa 135, aged 82.

DECIUS, a Roman consul, immortalized in the annals of his country, for devoting himself to the gods manes in the midst of a battle against the Latins, and thus ensuring the victory to his army.—His son and grand-son on similar occasions followed his glorious example, and thus obtained the victory for their country.

DECIVS, a Roman emperor after Philip. He defeated the Persians in battle, but unfortunately perished in a morass with his army, in a fight against the Goths, 251 A. D.

DECKER, or DECKHER, John, a learned Jesuit, born at Hazebruck, in Flanders, was professor of theology at Douai and Louvain. He was sent on an embassy into Nitria, and was made chancellor of Gratz university, where he died 1619, aged 69. He wrote Velificatio seu theorematum de anno ortus ac mortis domini, 4to.—tabula chronographica a captâ per Pompeium Jerosolymâ ad deletam a Tito urbem, 4to. in which he displayed great erudition and extensive knowledge of chronology.

DECKER, Thomas, a poet, in the reign of James I. He acquired some celebrity by the satire of Ben Jonson, who ridiculed him, in his Poetaster, under the name of Crispinus. Decker resented the affront in his play of Satyrormastix, where Jonson, under the name of young Horace, is the hero of the piece; and so successful and popular was the poetic invective, that the play was universally followed. Decker wrote three of his plays in conjunction with Webster, and one with Rowley and Ford; and though his abilities were not of a superior degree, yet he was admired, and his "honest whore," and "old Fortunatus," are said to possess merit equal to any of the compositions of other theatrical writers, Shakespeare.

Shakespeare excepted. The time of his birth and death is unknown, though it is certain he was alive after 1638.

DEDEKIND, Frederic, a German of the 16th century, who published a very ingenious ironical eulogium on incivility and rudeness, intituled, Grobianus, five de incultis moribus et inurbanis gestibus, Franckfort, 8vo. 1553.

DEE, John, a mathematician of eminence, born in London 18th July 1527. He was educated at Chelmsford, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where, for three years, he says, he devoted each day 4 hours to sleep, 2 to meals and exercise, and 18 to study. He went to the low countries in 1547, and on his return he was made fellow of Trinity-college, just founded by Henry VIII. His attention to mathematical studies, so closely connected with astronomy, and, in those days, to astrology, brought upon him at this time the suspicion of magician; and, to avoid this, he retired to Louvain, in 1478, where it is supposed he took the degree of L.L.D. In 1551 he visited Paris, where he read lectures on Euclid's elements; but the most flattering promises could not prevail upon him to settle there. He therefore returned to England, 1551, and was so highly respected that he was presented to the king, and made rector of Upton-upon-Severn. In Mary's reign, his correspondence with Elizabeth's friends exposed him to the suspicions of treason, and therefore he was arrested, and at last with difficulty set at liberty. He paid his court to queen Elizabeth, who flattered him with compliments; but the general belief of his being a conjurer was in the way of his promotion, and the books which he published countenanced the imputation, from the mysterious language and incomprehensible subjects which they contained. In 1564 he left England, to present a work to the emperor Maximilian; and, in 1571, the queen paid such respect to his celebrity that she sent two physicians to attend him when confined by sickness in Louvain. On his return to England he settled at Mortlake, where he collected a choice library of above 4000 volumes; which, however, during his absence, in 1583, was plundered by the populace, who firmly believed that he had a familiar connection with the devil, by his magical incantations. The appearance of a new star in 1572, and of a comet in 1577, gave him opportunities of distinguishing himself as an astronomer; and he engaged the queen's patronage by his able assertion of her right to the countries discovered by her subjects, and by his ingenious plans for the reformation of the calendar. In 1581 he began his attempts to penetrate more deeply into futurity, and, assisted by Kelly, a young man of Worcestershire, he launched forth into those extravagancies in mystery and superstition by which he pretended to hold intercourse with departed spirits. For two years he was engaged in these unbecoming pursuits, and was at last persuaded by Albert Laski, a Polish lord, who entertained the same notions of astrology, to pass over to the continent, more securely to indulge their mysterious incantations. After travelling through Germany, the three conjurers reached Poland, and, after an introduction to the emperor Rodolph, and to Stephen king of Poland, Dee and Kelly were at last, after the exhibition of some magical tricks, banished from the country by the interference of the pope's nuncio.

The noise of this fanatical adventure reached Elizabeth, who desired Dee to return. He obeyed, and travelling with great pomp and becoming solemnity, reached England 23d November 1689, and a few days after was presented to the queen, who received him graciously. But though so powerful over supernatural agents, Dee was poor, and therefore he petitioned the queen for a liberal subsistence. Two commissioners were appointed to examine his papers and the transactions of his life; and though their report was favorable, he yet obtained no relief. At last, however, by the interference of lady Warwick and archbishop Whitgift, he obtained the chancellorship of St. Paul's, and, two years after, the wardenship of Manchester college, where he spent seven years, in a disturbed and unquiet manner. In 1604 he petitioned James that he might be tried, and that all aspersions of magical incantations might be wiped away from his character; but the king, knowing the habits of his life, disregarded it; and Dee at last removed to Mortlake, where he began again to practise his mysterious arts. Though old and infirm, Dee still believed in his astrological calculations, and the vanity and ostentatious ambition which for above fifty years he had displayed forsook him not when sinking into the grave. He died miserably poor, in 1608, aged 80, and was buried at Mortlake. He was twice married, and he left a numerous family. The eldest of his sons, Arthur, was brought up under Camden, and was physician to Charles I. His writings were very numerous; but besides what he published, several MSS. are preserved in the Cotton library and in the Ashmolean museum. His notes and preface to Billingsley's Euclid, and some other works, prove him to have been a very able mathematician. An account of his communications with spirits and his conferences with the emperor of Germany and the king of Poland, written by his own hand, was published, with a curious preface, by Dr. Meic Casaubon, in 1659, folio, and it attracted for some time the public attention. Dr. Hooke, some years after, attempted to show that Dee was not an astrologer, but that he was a spy, and that the figures and hieroglyphics he used were not those of an enthusiast or magician, but of an artful man, employed to watch the conduct and develope the measures of government. To this conjecture, however, few assented.

DEFESCH, William, a German, eminent for his skill on the violin. He was leader of the band at Marybone-gardens, and also composed for Vauxhall. His musical compositions, songs, and ballads, were much admired. He died about 1750, aged 70.

DE FOE, Daniel, was born in the parish of St. Giles' Cripplegate, about 1668, where his father, James Foe, was a butcher. He was educated among the dissenters, and warmly embraced their tenets; and he probably prefixed De to his name to conceal the obscurity of his origin. He was early an author, and published, 1686, a pamphlet on the contest between the Turks and Austrians. In 1683 he followed in arms the fortunes of Monmouth, and escaped, much to the wonder of all his historians, the sanguinary grasp of Jeffries. He became a liveryman of London 1688, and zealously favored the revolution. About this time he was a hosier, though he afterwards denied the occupation; and in 1692 he was so reduced, either by misconduct or by the unfavorable circumstances of the

the times, that he fled from his creditors, though he afterwards very honorably discharged the best part of his debts. Though offered a respectable commercial situation at Cadiz by his friends, he determined to live by his pen. In 1695 he was made accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, in which he continued till the suppression of the tax in 1699. He now published various pamphlets on political and temporary subjects, one of which, his "true born Englishman," a satire, in verse, in defence of the revolution, recommended him to the notice of king William. His "shortest way with the dissenters," in 1702, as it reflected on the government and the church, was noticed by the house of commons, and he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to be fined, and imprisoned. He was liberated from his confinement in 1704, by the friendship of Harley and of Godolphin, and immediately retired to St. Edmundsbury, where his pen was again employed on political subjects. In 1706 he produced some essays to remove the prejudices of the Scotch against the union; and so great were his services considered, that he was sent by Godolphin to Edinburgh to confer upon the subject with the leading men of Scotland. Upon the conclusion of the union, he was rewarded for his services, and two years after, 1709, he published the history of the union, in a manner so satisfactory, that, in 1786, the same pamphlet was republished, when the Irish union was projected. In 1713 some of his publications were considered as jacobitical, in consequence of which he was prosecuted, but at last liberated from Newgate by the influence of his friend lord Oxford. He found himself so neglected on the accession of the house of Hanover, that he published his appeal to honor and justice, the last of his political tracts, as he was seized with an apoplexy before the work was finished, and as he afterwards devoted himself only to useful and general instruction. In 1715 he wrote the family instructor; and in April 1719 appeared the first part, and August following the second part, of Robinson Crusoe; a work which, though abused by some of his contemporaries, has survived by its merit the malevolence of criticism, and triumphed over the opposition of party, and stands now as the most lasting monument of the literary fame and merits of the author. It is said by some, indeed, that this interesting book was dishonestly borrowed from the papers of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotsman, who lived four years and four months in an uninhabited island, till relieved by captain Wood Rogers in 1709. Selkirk's adventures, indeed, appeared before the public in the captain's voyage; and therefore, though the idea of a man thrown upon a desert island might be borrowed from Selkirk's adventures, yet the rest of the story evidently belongs to the genius and superstructure of De Foe. This respectable writer died at his house at Islington 1731, leaving one daughter, who married Mr. H. Baker, the naturalist. The publications of De Foe are very numerous, and possessed great merit, and, at the time in which they appeared, they were considered as very powerful engines in the hands of party. His attempts to write poetry were not successful, after the noble strains of Waller and Dryden; and if his verses were read, it was more in consequence of the satire which they conveyed than of the merit and beauty of the numbers. The life of a political writer must be exposed to the attacks of open and secret enemies, a circumstance which De Foe's political career sufficiently evinced, but whatever might have been the provocations which he gave to his opponents, it is to be observed, to the discredit of Pope, that, without the most distant imputation of offence, De Foe appeared disgraced in 1728, in the libellous lines of the Dunciad.

DEHUY, an ingenious French engraver, who died 1748. He engraved the pieces of some of the greatest masters, among whom are the names of Rembrandt, Vernet, Aved, Tintoretto, &c.

DEJAURE, N. a French poet, who died young, and suddenly, October 1800. His pieces, called le franc Breton—Montano—Lodoiska, an opera, have been received on the stage with applause.

DEIDIER, Anthony, a medical professor of Montpellier, who published, in 1723, a curious dissertation, de veneris morbis, in which he supposes that the disease is communicated by a number of small animalcules.

DEJOTARUS, tetrarch and king of Galatea, espoused the cause of Pompey in the civil wars, for which he was dethroned by Cæsar.

DELAMET, Adrian Augustin de Buffy, an ecclesiastic, born of a noble family in Picardy. He attended his relation cardinal de Retz in his travels, and then settled at the Sorbonne at Paris, where he died, 20th July 1691, aged 70. He wrote among other things, a resolution of cases of conscience, afterwards republished by Treuve, under the name of dictionary of cases of conscience, 2 vols. fol.

DELANY, Patrick, an eminent divine, born in Ireland about 1686. His father was originally a servant in the family of sir John Rennel, the judge, and afterwards rented a small farm. Young Delany was brought up as sizar at Trinity-college, Dublin, of which he became fellow. At this time he formed a very intimate acquaintance with dean Swift, and soon distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and as an active and successful tutor in his college. The part, however, which he took in supporting two young men who had, for misconduct, been expelled, proved offensive to the provost and to Boulter the primate, who wished to oppose his advancement. Lord Carteret, in 1727, presented him to the chancellorship of Christ-church, and a prebend in the cathedral of St. Patrick. In 1729 he began the periodical paper called the Tribune, continued to 20 numbers; and in 1731 he came to London, to publish his "revelation examined with candor," a work to which he added a second volume, and, thirty years after, a third, and which was universally and deservedly admired. When in London, he married Mrs. Margaret Tenison, a rich Irish widow, who died December 6, 1741. In 1738 he published his "reflections upon polygamy," a curious work, which was followed, in 1740 and 1742, with an historical account of the life of David king of Israel, in 3 vols. a performance which, while it displayed the ingenuity, learning, and judgment of the author, little contributed to the honor of the sacred writings, whose authenticity and character cannot rest upon the labors of men. In 1743, 9th June, he took for his second wife the widow of Alexander Pendarves, a woman of great excellence and known.

known genius; and the following year he was raised to the deanry of Down. The most considerable of his productions after he became dean, was his "remarks on the life of Swift by lord Orrery." This publication set in fairer colors the character of Swift, and exhibited him in a more amiable view, from the recollections of friendship and intimacy, than that of lord Orrery. His labors, however friendly, did not pass uncensured from the pen of Deane Swift esq. who reflected, with petulance and abuse, on the publication of Dr. Delany; who replied, in 1755, with great temper and truly christian moderation. Besides these, he published sermons, and some theological tracts. He died at Bath; May 1768, in the 83d year of his age. Dr. Delany was remarkable, not more for his learning, than for his benevolence and hospitality. He left little property behind him, though the last twenty years of his life his annual income was £3000, which generously were distributed at the call of indigence and distress.

DELANY, Mary, second wife of Dr. Delany, was daughter of Bernard Granville, afterwards lord Lansdowne, and was born at Coulton, Wilts, 14th May 1700. When she was 17, she was influenced by her relations, against her inclinations, to marry Alexander Pendarves esq. of Roscrow, in Cornwall, a gentleman of great property, but much advanced in life; but though she lived unhappy, her time was usefully devoted to the cultivation of her mind, naturally vigorous and eager after improvement. In 1724 she became a widow; in consequence of which she left Cornwall, and resided chiefly in London. After a widowhood of 19 years, she married, in 1743, Dr. Delany, whom she had long known as the friend of her learned correspondent dean Swift, and with him she lived the happiest of wives, till his death, in 1768. When this melancholy event took place, she wished to settle at Bath, but the duchess of Portland who knew and loved her virtues, insisted upon her living with her at Bullstrode, and she continued in that hospitable retreat for some years. On the death of the duchess, the king, with laudable benevolence, assigned Mrs. Delany, a house, ready furnished, in St. Alban's street, Windsor, and granted her a pension of £300 a-year, which she enjoyed till her death, 15th April 1788, at the advanced age of nearly 88. Mrs. Delany is well known for her spirited and elegant correspondence with some of the learned and of the witty of the times, but particularly for her great skill in drawing and painting. Her pieces, which are numerous and tastefully executed, adorn the mansions of her relations, as well as her works in embroidery and in shells. She is also known for inventing, at the age of 74, an ingenious Flora, by the tasteful application of colored papers together, skilfully cut with scissars, and so delicately disposed upon black ground, as to imitate and almost equal the works of nature. In this elegant accomplishment she continued to be engaged till her 83d year, when her sight began to fail; and so astonishing was her assiduity, that not less than 980 plants were exhibited in her beautiful flora which is now in the possession of her nephew, Court Dewes esq. She also wrote some poetry.

DELAUNE, Thomas, a nonconformist, who, in 1683, wrote an answer to Dr. Calamy's discourse concerning a scrupulous conscience. His book called "plea for nonconformity," gave such offence, that he was tried, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine; which as he could not do, he died in prison.

DELEYRE, Alexander, a native of Bourdeaux, who wrote an analysis of lord Bacon's works, 3 vols. 12mo.—the genius of Montesquieu—the spirit of St. Evremond, &c. He also assisted Raynal in his history of the commerce of the Indies, and contributed some valuable articles to the encyclopedie. He died 1797.

DELFT, Jacob, a celebrated portrait painter, of Delft, who died 1661, aged 42. He was grandson of Mirevelt, whom he rivall'd in the efforts of his pencil.

DELIUS, Christopher Traugott, a native of Walhausen, in Thuringia, who, after serving in the army, was made surveyor of the Hungarian mines, and then placed at Vienna, in the department of the mines and of the mint. He was an eminent mineralogist, and wrote a dissertation on mountains, 8vo.—an introduction to the art of mining, 4to. He died in Italy 1799, aged 51.

DELMONT Deodalt, an historical painter, born at St. Tron. He was pupil to Rubens, who highly esteemed him. He died 1634, aged 53.

DELOBEL, a French painter, of the 17th century. His pieces which are in a very superior stile, adorn chiefly the churches and cathedrals of France.

DE LOLME, John Lewis, L.L.D. a native of Geneva, who for some years resided in England, and acquired great celebrity as an author. In the latter part of his life he retired to the continent, and died in Switzerland, March 1807. He was in his character a man of talents and information, entertaining and witty in his conversation, temperate in his living, but in his person little attentive to the graces of outward appearance. He is author of parallel between the English constitution and the former government of Sweden, 1772—treatise on the constitution of England, 1775, a work of singular merit, often reprinted, and commended by the approbation not only of lords Camden and Chatham, and other great political characters, but by the nervous writer of Junius' letters—essay on the union of Scotland with England, 1787—memorials of human superstition—observations on the tax on windows, 1788—observations on the late national embarrassments, 1789, &c.

DELRIO, Martin Anthony, a learned Jesuit, born at Antwerp, of Spanish parents, 1551. He studied at the universities of Paris, Douai, and Louvain, where he displayed astonishing powers of memory, and great quickness of learning. He was admitted L. L. D. at Salamanca, and afterwards became a counsellor of the parliament of Brabant, and entered the Jesuits' order at Valladolid. He taught belles lettres at Liege, Mayence, Gratz, and Salamanca, and died at Louvain, two years after his friend Lipsius, 1608. Besides notes on Seneca, Claudian, and Solinus, he wrote explications of difficult passages in scripture—commentaries on the old testament—disquisitiones magicæ.

DELRIO, John, a native of Bruges, dean of Antwerp, died 1624. He wrote commentaries on the 119th psalm.

DEMADES, an Athenian orator, for some time at the court of Philip of Macedon. He was put to death by Cassander, B.C. 322.

DEM

DEMARATUS, a king of Sparta, who was obliged to resign the crown in consequence of the imputation of his enemies, who accused him of being illegitimate. He retired to Persia, where he was honorably received.

DEMESTE, John, M.D. chaplain and chief surgeon to the forces of the prince of Liege, was a native of Liege, where he died, August 20, 1783, aged 38. He is well known as the author of some ingenious letters on chemistry, Paris, 1779.

DEMETRIUS, Polissætes, son of Antigonus, was honored by the Athenians with the dedication of brazen statues, because he had delivered their city from the power of Demetrius Phalereus, and defeated Cassander at Thermopylæ. Though beaten at the battle of Ipsus, he had the good fortune to seat himself on the throne of Macedonia; where his posterity remained till the age of Perseus. He died B.C. 286.

DEMETRIUS, Soter, king of Syria, was son of Seleucus. He was for some time an hostage at Rome, and perished in battle, B.C. 150.

DEMETRIUS II. surnamed Nicanor, was king of Syria after his father, Demetrius I. He formed an alliance with the Jews, and was at last killed by the governor of Tyre, B.C. 127.

DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, a philosopher, the disciple of Theophrastus. He was highly honored by the Athenians, and afterwards was hospitably entertained by Ptolemy king of Egypt. He contributed 200,000 volumes to the Alexandrine library, and died by the bite of an asp, 284 B.C.

DEMETRIUS, a cynic philosopher, in the reign of Caligula, afterwards banished by Vespasian for his insolence.

DEMETRIUS, czar of Russia, son of the czar John Basilowitz, is by some historians called the false Demetrius, and regarded as an obscure native of Jaroslaw, who was instructed by an artful monk to assume the character of the real Demetrius, who, it is said, had been murdered by Boris Gudenow. This youthful adventurer, whether really the prince or pretender, invaded Russia with a small army, in 1604, and was so successful as to seat himself on the throne. After a short reign of eleven months, he was assassinated, 1606. He had married the daughter of Mnieski, palatine of Sandomir, who had warmly espoused his cause.

DE MISSY, Cesar, a learned divine, born at Berlin 2d January 1703. He studied at Berlin and at Frankfurt on the Oder; and after preaching for five years in several towns of the United Provinces, he came to London, where he was ordained to serve the Savoy chapel, and in 1762, named by the bishop of London French chaplain to the king. He died 10th August 1775. He published some poetical pieces—essays on profane and sacred literature—epitomes of books, memoirs, &c. but generally anonymously, or only with his initials. He also assisted many of his friends, particularly Westein, in his edition of the Greek testament, and Jortin in his life of Erasmus. He was a learned and pious man.

DEMOCEDES, a physician of Crotona, who, after serving Polycrates of Samos, became the slave and the physician of Darius king of Persia. He returned to his country by stratagem, and married the sister of Milo, the celebrated wrestler.

DEM

DEMOCRITUS, a famous philosopher of Abdera, whose mental acquirements were so great and extraordinary that his countrymen accused him of madness. Hippocrates, however, saw and acknowledged his merit. He laughed constantly at the follies of mankind. He died at the age of 109, about 351.

DEMONAX, a philosopher of Crete in the reign of Adrian. He had the highest contempt for riches, and lived upon the accidental supplies which he received from his friends and strangers. He lived to his 100th year.

DEMOIVRE, Abraham, an eminent mathematician, born at Vitry, Champagne, May 1667. He left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and came to England, where, by studying the principia of Newton, he made himself a complete master of mathematics, in which he read some popular lectures for his support. He was admitted member of the royal society in London, and of the academy of sciences, Paris; and died in London November 1754. His works are strong evidences of his superior learning and great application. He published, miscellanea analytica, 4to.—a treatise on annuities—and his great work, “doctrine of chances,” in 1718, 4to. twice reprinted, with considerable improvements.

DEMOSTHENES, a celebrated orator of Athens. Though but the son of a blacksmith, he rose to consequence; and though neglected by his guardians, and impeded in his education by weakness of lungs, and an inarticulate pronunciation, his assiduity overcame all obstacles, and enabled him to rise superior to every difficulty, and become the most illustrious and eloquent orator of all antiquity. He warmly resisted the politics and the insinuating conduct of Philip of Macedon, and was equally violent against his son and successor, Alexander the great; but, in spite of his eloquence, the arts and the valor of the Macedonians prevailed, and Demosthenes unhappily found, that the Athenians whom he addressed were only the degenerate sons of those heroes who had bled at Marathon, at Salamis, and at Thermopylæ. Demosthenes, who had inveighed against the bribery of the Macedonians, himself was accused of receiving some splendid presents of money from Harpalus, the deputy of Alexander; but the unpopularity of his conduct continued but a short time; till at last the victories of Antipater obliged the Athenians to deliver their orator, and Demosthenes, rather than fall into the hands of his enemies, destroyed himself by poison, B.C. 322. The best edition of his orations is that of Reiske.

DEMOURS, Peter, a native of Marseilles, known for his eminence as a physician and for the dexterity of his surgical operations, and his great skill as an oculist. He died at Paris 26th June 1795, aged 93, author of some respectable works on his profession.

DEMPSTER, William, a learned Scotsman, born in the shire of Angus, 1490, and educated at St. Andrew's, from whence he went to Paris, and was successfully employed by the university there to refute the books of Raymond Lully, who had impugned Aristotle's philosophy. After visiting Padua and other places, he returned to Scotland, of which he published an ecclesiastical history, in which he magnifies the most common events into miracles. He died at Paris 1557.

DEN

DEMPSTER, Thomas, a native of Scotland, who studied at Paris, and there taught classical learning. His quarrelsome temper however, and his severities to his pupils, rendered him unpopular, and he was obliged to fly from Paris, and to return to Scotland. He afterwards went to Pisa, where his wife, a woman of great beauty, ran away with one of his scholars, a misfortune which he bore with all the indifference of stoicism. He afterwards read lectures on polite learning in various universities, and obtained a professor's chair at Nîmes, from whence he retired to Bologna, where after some years' residence he died 1625. He wrote some learned works, commentaries on Rosinus' Roman antiquities, and on Claudian,—four books of epistles,—dramatic pieces and poems,—a martyrology of Scotland,—a list of Scottish writers, &c. He was a man of astonishing memory, so that he was properly called a living library. His application was indefatigable, he never studied less than 14 hours daily, but he wanted judgment and discrimination. He was so partial to his country that he attributed to the natives of it, nearly all the books which English, Welch and Irish authors had composed. He has therefore been censured by protestants as well as papists, and Baillet has observed that in his ecclesiastical history of Scotland, in 19 books, he had no conscience, he forged titles of books never published to raise the glory of his native country, and he has been guilty of several cheating tricks by which he has lost his credit among men of learning.

DENHAM, sir John, an English poet, born in Dublin 1615. His father was chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland, and when afterwards removed to the English bench, he brought his son with him, who was educated in London, and in 1631 entered at Trinity college, Oxford. During his residence in the university, and afterwards while a student at Lincoln's Inn, he was devoted to gaming and dissipation, more than to learning and science, and his father not only augured the most fatal consequences, but threatened to disinherit him. In 1641, three years after the death of his father, he published his tragedy of "Sophy," which, says Waller, broke out like the Irish rebellion three score thousand strong, when nobody was aware of it. Soon after he was sheriff of Surry, and governor of Farnham castle, but not understanding military affairs he came to the king at Oxford, where, in 1643, he published his "Cooper's hill," a poem, says Dryden, which for majesty of style is and ever will be the standard of good writing. His attachment to the royal cause during the civil wars ensured him the confidence of the queen, who entrusted him with a commission to her unfortunate husband a captive in the army. He afterwards went as ambassador with lord Croft from Charles II. to Poland, and in 1652 he returned to England, where he found his estates greatly reduced in consequence of his former habits of gaming, and the persecutions of the civil war. For about a year he was hospitably entertained by lord Pembroke. At the restoration he entered upon his office of surveyor general to the king's buildings, and at the coronation he was created K.B. In the latter part of his life, in consequence of some domestic difference on his second marriage, he unfortunately lost his senses, which he however recovered. He wrote some verses on Cowley's death, and soon followed him to the grave. He died March 1668, and was buried in Westminster-abbey near the remains of Chaucer, Spencer, and Cowley. Denham's works have been published together at different times, the sixth edition of which appeared in 1719. These poems are above 20 in number, containing besides the Sophy, and Cooper's hill, the destruction of Troy, and Cato Major. Wood mentions other works of Denham, such as a new version of the psalms, a panegyric on general Monk, the true presbyterian, &c. Denham, as Johnson has observed, is deservedly considered as one of the fathers of English poetry. Cooper's hill is the work that confers upon him the rank and dignity of an original author. He seems to have been, at least among us, the author of a species of composition that may be denominated local poetry, of which the fundamental subject is some particular landscape to be poetically described, with the addition of such embellishments as may be supplied by historical retrospections or incidental meditation. He is one of the writers that improved our taste and advanced our language, and whom we ought therefore to read with gratitude, though having done much, he left much to do.

DENELLE, an infamous revolutionist. He was the friend of Marat, and shared all his crimes, and at last, after trying to poison his wife and five children, he killed them with his own hand with blows. He expiated his crimes on the scaffold.

DENNER, Balthasar, a portrait painter, born at Ham-burgh 1685. He was offered, in London, for his excellent portrait of an old woman, 500 guineas which he refused. He died 1747.

DENNIS, John, an English critic, born in London 1657, and educated at Harrow and Caius college, Cambridge. After taking his bachelor's degree he was expelled for attempting to stab a person in the dark, upon which he travelled over France and Italy, and at his return set up for a man of fashion and of wit. He began his literary career as early as 1690, and continued to write till his death in 1733. He was intimate with the great and the learned of the times, but his temper was so violent, and his pride and suspicions so great, that his life was a continual scene of tumult and quarrel, inflamed and cherished by the invectives of his pen. He wrote in 1692, a pindaric ode on William's victory at Aghrim, and he also honored the death of that monarch and that of his queen, with poetical incense. In 1704 came his favorite tragedy "Liberty asserted," in which he used such violent language against the French nation, that in the pride of self-consequence he persuaded himself peace could never be re-established between the two countries without his being delivered up to the offended enemy. With this idea he applied to the duke of Marlborough for his protection, who declared to the alarmed poet that he had no influence with the ministry, but that he thought, without being terrified, his own case as desperate, as he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis himself. This singular character thus exposed to ridicule, is said on another occasion to have been walking near the sea while the guest of a friend in Sussex, and that at the sudden sight of a ship sailing as he imagined towards him, he decamped in the greatest hurry, calling his friend a traitor for conspiring to deliver his person up to the French. His poems on the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies gained him the friendship of the victorious hero of the day, who presented him with 100*l.* and procured him an appointment in the customs worth 120*l.* per annum. He also wrote some prose pieces, especially priestcraft dangerous, &c. against Sacheverell's political union, and some severe reflections on Pope's essay on criticism, and Addison's Cato. This not only occasioned a curious pamphlet called the narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable frenzy of Mr. John Dennis, but it drew upon him the satirist's resentment, and entitled him to a conspicuous place among the heroes of the Dunciad. Though now disregarded as a writer and a critic, he was esteemed in his day, but it was observed by a wit that Dennis was the fittest man in the world to instruct a dramatic writer, for he laid down rules for writing good plays, and showed him what were bad by his own.

Blenheim

DENNY, fr Anthony, a favorite of Henry VIII. born at Cheshunt, and educated at St. Paul's school and St. John's college, Cambridge. His great abilities soon recommended him to the court, where he became gentleman of the bed chamber, groom of the stole, and a privy counsellor. He was also knighted by the king, and in the general plunder of the property of the church, fr Anthony received from his capricious master very large and valuable grants of lands in Hertfordshire. When Henry was on his death-bed, fr Anthony alone had the courage and humanity to approach him, to remind him of his situation, and to exhort him to devote the few remaining moments of life to the momentous concerns of religion. The king had such an opinion of his integrity, that he made him one of the executors of his will, and of the counsellors of his successor, and gave him a legacy of 300*l.* fr Anthony was a man of great piety as well as learning. He died 1550, leaving by his lady Joan, daughter of fr Philip Champenon of Modbury, Devon, six children, of whom Henry the eldest was father of Edward who was knighted, and in 1626 made earl of Norwich.

DENTON, John, an English divine, educated at Clare hall, Cambridge, and ejected for nonconformity from the living of Oswald Kirk, Yorkshire in 1662. He afterwards conformed and after being re-ordained, was presented to the living of Stonegrave, and a prebend of York, which he held till his death 4th January 1708, in his 83d year. He published some sermons and religious tracts, and was the intimate friend and correspondent of Tillotson afterwards the primate.

DENTRECOLLES, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, born at Lyons 1664. He went to China as missionary with Parrennin, and he died there on the same year as his associate 1741, and both aged 77. This Jesuit wrote several works in the Chinese language to recommend the christian religion to the disciples of Confucius, and some interesting pieces of his are also found in "lettres edifiantes & curieuses," and in du Halde's China.

DENYS, James, an historical painter, born at Antwerp 1645. He studied in Italy, and resided for some time at the court of Mantua, where he was highly honored. He returned afterwards to his native city, where he died.

DEPARCIEUX, Anthony, a mathematician, born in the diocese of Ufez. He wrote a treatise on trigonometry 4to—essays on the probabilities of the duration of human life 4to. a valuable work, which obtained him a seat in the academy of sciences,—memoir on the inundations of the river Seine, &c. His skill was much applauded in his construction of sun-dials on a new plan, and also for his meridian lines. He died 1768, aged 65.

DERBY, James Stanley earl of, an English nobleman, celebrated for his courage during the civil wars. With only 600 horse he bravely defended himself at Wigan against col. Lilburne and 3000 horse and foot, but when taken at the battle of Worcester, he was basely beheaded though faithfully promised pardon, October 15th, 1651. His widow imitated his heroic conduct, and after the brave defence of Latham house, she retired to the Isle of Man where she defied the attacks of her enemies. She was the last person who submitted to the power of the regicides.

DERCYLLIDAS, a Lacedæmonian general, who avenged his country against the Persians and defended Chersonesus against the inroads of the Thracians about 400 B.C.

DEREING, Edward, an eminent divine, born in Kent, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge. He was preacher at St. Paul's London, and distinguished himself by his eloquence before the court. He died 1576, much respected for his piety as well as learning. He wrote sermons,—lectures on the epistle to the Hebrews,—answer to Harding, &c.

DERHAM, William, an able philosopher and divine, born at Stoughton near Worcester, 26th November 1657, and educated at Blackley, and Trinity college, Oxford. He was presented in 1682 to Wargrave vicarage, Berks, and in 1689 to Upminster rectory, Essex. He devoted the best part of his time to mathematics and experimental philosophy. He was chosen fellow of the royal society, and enriched the philosophical transactions with many curious and valuable communications. In 1716 he was made canon of Windsor, and the university of Oxford in 1730 honorably granted him the degree of D.D. for his meritorious services in the cause of science. This pious and good man, always employed in the labors of philosophy, humanity, and religion, died 5th April 1735, aged 78, and was buried at Upminster. His publications are very numerous, not less than 40, and mostly on philosophical subjects. The best known of his works are his physico-theology, 16 discourses preached at Boyle's institution 1711 and 12, and in 1714 his astro-theology, and in 1730 his christo-theology, a sermon to prove the divine origin of christianity, besides the artificial clock-maker, an ingenious book the fourth edition of which was published 1734. He also assisted some of his literary friends, he revised the "miscellanea curiosa," he prepared notes and observations for Eleazer Albin's natural history 4 vols, 4to. and published some pieces of Mr. Ray, and also the experiments of Dr. Robert Hooke. He left behind him a very valuable collection of curiosities.

DERING, fr Edward, a native of Kent, very violent in parliament in favor of republican principles. He brought in a bill for the abolition of bishops, deans, and chapters, and proposed other plans of reforms. Afterwards however he changed his opinion and espoused the royal cause which he supported with a troop of horse, equipped at his own expence. He was a great sufferer in the civil wars, and died before the restoration. His speeches in parliament were published in 4to.

DERRICK, Samuel, a linen draper of Dublin, who in 1751 came to London with the intention of supporting himself as a literary character. He once attempted the character of Gloucester in Jane Shore, but with such ill success that it was never repeated. After this he subsisted by pamphlet writing, but his extravagance led him into perpetual difficulties. He was on Beau Nash's death by means of his friends appointed in his place master of the ceremonies at Bath and Tunbridge, but ill conduct prevented his rise to independence, and he died very poor 7th of March 1769, aged 45. He translated among other things Sylla, a dramatic entertainment by the king of Prussia, 8vo. 1753.

DERYK or DERICK, Peter Cornelius, a landscape painter of Delft, the pupil of Hubert Jacobs. He studied afterwards in Italy, and died 1630, aged 62.

DERYKE, William, a historical painter at Antwerp, who died 1697.

DESAGULIERS, John Theophilus, son of a protestant minister at Rochelle, where he was born 12th March 1683, and which he left at the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, and he succeeded Dr Keil in reading lectures on experimental philosophy. In 1712 he married, and was the first who introduced the reading of lectures in London, where he had for his audience not only the learned and the great, but also George I. and George II. and the royal family. He was patronised by the duke of Chandos, who gave him the living of Edgware, and he afterwards became captain to the prince of Wales, and had a valuable living in Essex. In the latter part of his life, he had lodgings under the piazzas, Covent-garden, where his lectures were continued till his death 1749. He was member of several foreign academies, and published a course of experimental philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. 1734.—Gravesande's mathematical elements of natural philosophy, —and an edition of Gregory's elements of catoptrics and dioptrics.

DESAIX, Lewis Charles Anthony, a French general, born of a respectable family at Vegou near Riom in August 1768. He embraced the military profession as lieutenant in the regiment of Britany, and at the revolution he assisted Custine as his aide-de-camp. He was wounded in the cheek at the battle of Lauterburg, but disregarded the pain while he boldly rallied the yielding battalions to the fight. He was general of division under Moreau, whom he assisted in his glorious retreat from the Danube; and afterwards he drove the Germans from the Rhine, and at the battle of Radstadt he obliged the archduke Charles to retreat. He bravely defended the bridge of Kehl, and afterwards in consequence of the treaty of Campo Formio, he attended Bonaparte into Egypt. In this distant country he every where displayed the same presence of mind, the same bravery, and after dispersing the Arabs, and the scattered forces of Murad-bey, and Elphi-bey, he was named commander of Upper Egypt which his valor and steadiness had completely subdued. After Bonaparte's retreat from Egypt he signed the treaty of El-arisch with the English and the Turks, and returned to Europe, but was detained as a prisoner by lord Keith. When set at liberty he hastened back to France, and found his friend Bonaparte advancing to the conquest of Italy. His happy arrival, after a severe march of 30 miles, with a fresh squadron, gave the decision to the memorable battle of Marengo, but at the very moment that he ensured the victory to his already yielding countrymen, the brave Desaix received a fatal shot in the breast and immediately expired 14th June 1800. He was buried with the military honors which his services and his private virtues deserved.

DESAULT, Peter, a native of Arzac, distinguished as a physician. His treatise on the venereal disease and on the method of curing it without salivation, was much admired, and also that on the stone in the kidneys, and the bladder, which was attacked by Astruc. He died at Bourdeaux 1737, aged 62.

DESAULT, Peter Joseph, a French surgeon whose journal de chirurgie was translated into English by Gossling. He was born at Maguibernois near Macon, and died June 1st 1795, in his 46th year, not without suspicion of being poisoned for his attendance on the unfortunate Lewis XVII. It is remarkable that his successors, Clopart and Doublet, died within four days after. He had been much esteemed as a professor of anatomy at Paris where 300 pupils together attended his lectures, and also as surgeon at the hospital of charity, and at the hotel Dieu.

DES BARREAUX, James de Vallee lord, a French nobleman, born at Paris 1602. He was brought up by the Jesuits, who in vain endeavoured to gain him over to their society, and he afterwards became counsellor in the parliament of Paris, where his wit was more admired than his application. He exposed himself to the resentment and persecution of Richelieu, by refusing to yield a favorite mistress to the hoary libertine, and thus banished from regular employment he spent his time in visiting his friends, and in pursuing his pleasures. About four or five years before his death, however, he began to reflect upon the vicious course of his conduct, and after disregarding the truths and the practice of christianity, he gave himself up to serious meditation, and to penitence. He retired to the pure air of Chalon on the Soan, where, after an exemplary close of life, he died 1647. Some time before his death he wrote the famous sonnet so full of contrition "grand dieu, tes jugemens," &c. He was, in the days of his gaiety and libertinism, author of some poems in Latin, and also in French, and of some popular songs, &c.

DESBILLONS, Francis Joseph, a French Jesuit, born at Chateaufneuf 25th January 1711. After reading lectures in the colleges of Caen, Nevers, la Fleche, and Bourges, he came to Paris, where he studied for 15 years in the college of Lewis XIV. At the abolition of his order 1762, he retired to Mannheim, where he published his fables, on which he had so long been engaged, 530 in number, divided into 15 books, in two vols. He also published a learned edition of Phædrus, and wrote some Latin poems, and left in M.S. an history of the Latin tongue. He died 19th March 1788, aged 78.

DESBOIS, Francis Alexander, author of a military dictionary 3 vols. 8vo.—a dictionary of agriculture two vols. 8vo.—a dictionary of animals 4 vols. 8vo. and other works, died in the public hospital at Paris 1784, aged 85.

DES CARTES, René, a French philosopher. Vid. CARTES.
DESERICIUS,

DES

DESERICIUS or DESERITZ, Joseph Innocent, a native of Nitra in Hungary, made a Roman cardinal, and sent by Benedict XIV. as ambassador to the hospodar of Wallachia. He died 1765, aged 63. He wrote pro cultu literarum in Hungaria, ac speciatim civitate diocesique vindicatio, 4to.—de initiis & majoribus Hungarorum commentaria, 5 vols. fol.—historia episcopatus diocesis & civitatis Vacienfis, fol. &c.

DESGODETS, Anthony, a native of Paris, eminent as an architect. When going to Rome in 1674 he was captured by the Algerines, and remained 16 months in slavery, and when he reached the capital of Italy at last, he composed his work "the antient edifices of Rome drawn and measured with exactness," fol. which was newly edited 1779. He was made comptroller of the royal buildings at Paris and architect to the king. He died 1728, aged 75. Two of his works on architecture have appeared since his death.

DESHAIS, John Baptist Henry, a French painter, born at Rouen 1729. Under the direction of Vermont, Restout, and Carlo Vanloo, he improved his strong natural abilities, and in 1751 obtained the prize of the academy. After visiting Rome for improvement and information, he returned to Paris, and was admitted into the academy with universal approbation. The superior merit of his pictures promised the noblest monuments of genius to adorn the French school, but he unfortunately died in the midst of his career in 1765. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of the Virgin, the resurrection of Lazarus, Potiphar's wife and Joseph, the combat of Achilles and Xanthus, Jupiter and Antiope, Artemisia at her husband's tomb, &c.

DESIDERIUS or DIDIER, last king of Lombardy, succeeded Astolphus 756. His invasion of the papal dominions was resisted at the request of the pope by Charlemagne his son-in-law, and Didier was made prisoner and died in France. His other daughter had married a brother of Charlemagne, Carloman, another son of Pepin king of France.

DESMAIS, Joseph Francis Edward de Corsembleu, a French writer, born at Sualy-sur-loire, who died February 25th 1761, aged 38. He was a man of great abilities, very amiable in his manners, moderate in his wishes, and benevolent in his intercourse with mankind. He used to say, "When my friend laughs, it is his business to inform me of the cause of his joy; but when he weeps, it is mine to discover the sources of his grief." He wrote the comedy of the "impertinent," which met with great applause. He also wrote miscellaneous works, and in his poetical pieces displayed ease, grace, and elegance. His works were published 1777, two vols. 12mo. Paris.

DES MAIZEAUX, Peter, a learned biographer, born at Auvergne 1666, where his father was a protestant minister. He came early to England and was elected secretary to the royal society. He died 1745. He edited the works of St. Evremont three vols. 4to. and also published the life of Bayle, prefixed to his dictionary. He had some hand in the general historical dictionary, 10 vols. fol. and in other useful works, and wrote the lives of Chillingworth and John Hales.

DESMARES, Toussaint, a priest, native of Vire in Normandy. He defended the cause of the Jansenists before pope Innocent X. and distinguished himself by his fer-mons. He was persecuted for his opinions, but humanely protected by the duke of Liancourt, at whose house in Beauvais he ended his days 1687, aged 87. He wrote the neurologe de port royal, printed 4to. 1723, and other works.

DESMARETS, Nicholas, nephew of Colbert, and minister of state and comptroller in the reign of Lewis XIV. died 1721. He published a very curious and interesting account of his administration.

DESMOLETS, Peter Nicholas, an ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He edited Lamy's treatise de tabernaculo fœderis sanctâ civitate Jerusalem & templo ejus, fol.—Ponget's institutiones catholicæ in modum catecheseos, 2 vols. fol.—and continued Sallengre's memoires of literature, 11 vols. 12mo. He died 1760, aged 83.

DESMOULINS, Benedict Camille, a native of Guise in Picardy, who displayed his republican zeal at the taking of the Bastille, and in the demolition of the monarchy. As the friend of Danton he was one of the original founders of the Jacobin club, and he had a share in the atrocities of the 20th of June and the 10th of August 792. His influence in the convention was seen with jealousy by Robespierre, and he marked for slaughter the man who presumed to defend Orleans, and to talk of a committee of clemency in the midst of a sanguinary assembly. The fall of Danton was his own; when seized in the night, 31st March 1794, he opened his windows to call in vain for help against the satellites of tyranny, and with Young's night thoughts, and Hervey's meditations in his hand, he was dragged to prison, and immediately after to the scaffold. His writings were periodical—the revolutions of France and Brabant,—the history of the Brissotins,—the Vieux Cordelier. His wife, who wished to share his fate, was permitted to follow him 10 days after to the scaffold. When asked his age by the bloody tribunal, he answered, "My age is that of J. Christ when he suffered death," 33.

D'ESPAGNE, John, minister of a French congregation at Durham-house, Strand, died about 1660. He was much admired as a preacher, and several of his works have been translated into English. They are all on theological subjects.

DESPARD, Edward Marcus, a native of Queen's county in Ireland, of a respectable family. He early embraced a military life, and was employed in the West Indies, on the Spanish main, and in the bay of Honduras, where he was appointed superintendent of the English colony. His conduct in this office gave offence to the settlers, and in consequence of their complaints he was recalled home 1790; but when he applied to government to investigate his administration his representations were rejected without explanation. This rendered him a disaffected subject, and the French revolution no sooner tended to disseminate principles of disloyalty and rebellion, than he warmly embraced the new doctrines. He was seized for his seditious conduct, under the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and confined in several prisons, but when at last liberated, past misfortunes had made no impression upon him, but rather stimulated him to revenge. He now formed the plan of seducing the soldiery from their allegiance, and in the secret committees which he held with his associates, under the sanction of a solemn oath it was agitated to assassinate the king, as he proceeded to the opening of parliament. This murderous design was happily discovered by some of the accomplices.

complices, and Despard and his associates were seized, and tried at a special commission in Southwark, 5th February 1803, and on an impartial trial his atrocious guilt was made too evident to deserve pardon. He suffered on the 21st March with nine others, and after their heads had been cut off, their bodies were delivered to their friends for interment. Without contrition, sorrow, or concern, this infatuated man met his fate, and convinced the spectators how well qualified he was for the worst of nefarious attempts.

DESPAUTÈRE, John, a Flemish grammarian, who was born at Ninove, and died at Comines 1520. He had the use of only one eye. His works, which were chiefly grammatical, were in great vogue in all schools at one time, but now they have given way to more modern and methodical elements of education.

DESPIERRES, John, superior of the Benedictine college at Douay, died there 1664, aged 67. He was eminent as a mathematician, and as a mechanic, and wrote treatises on the Roman calendar,—a defence of the vulgar translation of the bible,—a commentary on the psalms, &c.—and he also constructed an iron sphere which with great exactness represented the planetary system.

DESPLACES, an eminent French engraver, who died 1749. His best pieces were his soldier holding a dagger at Aftyanax in his mother's arms, his descent from the cross, after Jouvenet, his rape of Helen after Guido. Another of the same name engraved several pieces for the cabinet de Crozat.

DESPORTES, Claude, a painter of Champagne, who died at Paris 1743, aged 82. He was highly favored by Lewis XIV. and XV. His best pieces are preserved at Marly. He excelled in grotesque figures, and in animals, flowers, fruits, &c. His son and nephew were equally celebrated.

DESTOUCHES, Andrew, a Frenchman, who went to Siam, and abandoned the profession of a soldier, for that of musician. Though unacquainted with rules, by the mere powers of genius he produced his Isse, an opera, which so highly pleased the French king, that he gave him 200 louis, with many commendations. Afterwards he studied the rules of musical composition, but his other pieces were never equal to Isse. He died 1749.

DESTOUCHES, Philip Nericaux, a French dramatic writer, born at Tours, and educated at Paris. He shone also as a negociator in Switzerland, and lastly in London, where he resided seven years, and where he married. On his return to Paris he was received with esteem for his services, but the death of the regent shattered his fair hopes of preferment and reward, and he retired to Fortoiseau, near Melun, where he forgot the ingratitude of the court in the cultivation of the muses and of agriculture. Cardinal Fleury in vain wished to draw him from his retirement to go to Russia. He died 1754. His works were published by his son, by the order of Lewis XV. 4 vols. 1757, and 10 vols. 12mo. Though devoid of the gaiety of Regnard, and the strong touches of Moliere, he yet commands attention by his interesting scenes, and his tender and affecting delineations of nature. His Philosophe Marié, and his Glorieux, a comedy, rank next to the compositions of Voltaire.

DEVAUX, John, a native of Paris, esteemed as a surgeon, and author of a treatise on preserving health, by instinct,—on making reports on surgery,—and other works, besides translations of medical works into French. He died 1729, aged 80.

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Essex, the favorite of Elizabeth, was born 10th November 1567, at Netherwood Herefordshire, and under the guardianship of lord Burleigh he was educated at Cambridge by Dr. Whitgift afterwards primate. His first appearance at court was in his 17th year, and in 1585 he accompanied the earl of Leicester to Holland, and distinguished himself greatly by his courage at the battle of Zutphen. At his return he was master of the horse to the queen, and at the assembling of an army at Tilbury fort, against the Spanish invasion, he was declared general under Leicester, and soon after made knight of the garter. Thus elevated in rank he disputed for the queen's favor with sir Charles Blunt earl of Devonshire, who wounded him in the knee, but afterwards became his most intimate friend. In 1589 he went with sir John Norris and Francis Drake in the expedition to replace Antonio on the throne of Portugal, but as it was without the queen's permission, he was soon recalled with marks of displeasure, which however his presence soon dissipated. His private marriage with the widow of sir Philip Sidney, daughter of sir Francis Walsingham, was also disagreeable to the queen, and his unsuccessful expedition to assist Henry IV. of France, and his quarrel with lord Burleigh about the Spanish war, tended to show the violence of his temper and the ambition of his heart. Though Burleigh, by proposing a peace with Spain, opposed him, yet he loved him, and after the death of that statesman, Essex found that he had lost a most valuable friend, whose advice and protection often interposed between him and the commission of wrong. He succeeded Burleigh as chanceller of Cambridge, but his enemies viewed the encrease of his dignities with a jealous eye. When a consultation took place about appointing a viceroy in Ireland, the queen recommended sir William Knollis, and Essex sir George Carew, and when the favorite saw his mistress unwilling to yield to his persuasion, he contemptuously turned his back upon her. Elizabeth resented the ill conduct of Essex, and gave him a box on the ear, upon which he placed his hand on his sword, with threatening attitude, swearing he would not take such an affront even from her father. The courtiers present interfered, and he left the palace with unbridled indignation. His friends however prevailed upon him to make concessions, and he was apparently reconciled to Elizabeth, and soon after by the artifice of his enemies sent over to Ireland. The ill success of his ministry there encouraged his opponents, who persuaded the queen to levy an army under Nottingham, to counteract the rebellious schemes of Essex. Essex heard of their plans, and coming suddenly over to England, he was apparently received with cordiality, but soon after stripped of all his honors except of the office of master of the horse. While thus disgraced, he was advised by his favorite Cuffe to restore himself to the queen's partiality by force, but though he disapproved all violent measures, he could not refrain saying the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was as crooked as her carcase. The rash words words were reported to the queen, and Essex was summoned to appear before the council, but he conceived his person in danger, and instead of submitting he prepared to resist. After an unavailing struggle, and some blood shed, he surrendered and was conveyed to the tower. He was arraigned before his peers on the 19th February 1601, and condemned to lose his head, and his execution took place on the 25th. He was in person tall, but careless in his dress. He was learned, and to his honor protected and encouraged learned men. Warm in his friendships, and found, except in few instances, in his morals, he was a good protestant. It is remarkable that his execution took place not without great struggles in the queen's affections. In the days of their friendship, she had given him a ring with promises that it would restore him at all times to her favor, and therefore she suffered to be sacrificed the man who so proudly refused to purchase and at so little price her pardon. The fatal ring indeed was sent by the repenting Essex, but lady Howard the bearer refused to deliver it, and on her death-bed she revealed to the queen her ill conduct, which she attributed to the jealousy of her husband. The queen heard the dreadful tale with astonishment, she retired overwhelmed with grief, and a few weeks after expired.

LEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Essex, son of Elizabeth's favorite was born 1592, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, under sir Henry Saville. His marriage with lady Frances Howard, lord Suffolk's daughter, was very unfortunate, for the lady accused him of impotency, and obtained a divorce that she might marry her new favorite Carr earl of Somerset. Essex served in the Palatinate under sir Horatio Vere, and in Holland, under prince Maurice, and on his return to England appeared in parliament as a violent opposer of the measures of government. During the civil wars he headed the parliamentary army, faced the king's forces at Edgehill, and at the first battle of Newbury, and after reducing Reading and relieving Gloucester he in 1644 returned to the west of England. Here he was unsuccessful against the king's troops, and he owed his safety to flight by sea from the untenable garrisons of Cornwall. In 1645 the parliament, jealous of his power, or dissatisfied with his conduct, deprived him of his office by the self-denying ordinance, and the next year he died at Essex-house in the Strand.

D'EWEES, sir Symonds, an English historian and antiquarian, born in 1602, at Coxden Dorsetshire, the seat of Mr. Symonds, his mother's father. His ancestors came from the Low Countries. In 1618 he entered at St John's college, Cambridge, and two years after began his collection of materials for an history of England. His learning and his labors recommended him to the notice of the most distinguished characters of the times, of Cotton, Spelman, Selden, and others. In 1625 he married Anne daughter of sir William Clopton, who was scarce 18, with whom he lived in great domestic happiness. His great work was finished when he attained his 30th year, but he did not publish it, and it appeared afterwards under the title of Journals of all the parliaments during the reign of Elizabeth, &c. revised by Paul Bowes 1682, folio. He served the office of sheriff for Suffolk, and was knighted, and in 1641 was made baronet; but notwithstanding these marks of royal favor, he embraced the cause of the parliament. He sat in the house till December 1648, when he was ejected for supposed attachment to the king. He died April 18th 1650, and was succeeded by his son Willoughby, to whom the journals were inscribed by Mr. Bowes. The manner in which sir Symonds spoke of Camden's Britannia has drawn upon him the censures of several writers, and he certainly was very injudicious in asserting that scarce a page of it was free from errors. From his MSS. preserved among the Harleian papers, there are some particulars of his life.

DE WITT, John, the famous pensionary of Holland, was born at Dort in 1625, and educated there. His abilities were so great, and his improvement so rapid, that at the age of 23 he published his "Elementa curvarum linearum", a work displaying the deepest knowledge of mathematics. After taking the degree of L.L.D. and travelling for some time, he was made pensionary of his native town, and began to distinguish himself by his skill in political affairs. He warmly but unsuccessfully opposed the war between England and his country, and when afterwards raised to the high office of pensionary of Holland, he sent ambassadors to Cromwell, to negotiate a peace. A pacification took place, but the secret article to exclude the family of Orange from the stadtholdership, brought public odium on De Witt's administration. Notwithstanding the clamors of his enemies, and the pulpit invectives of the clergy, he subdued all opposition by his firmness, and when his office expired, he was unanimously re-elected by the states, 15th Sep. 1663. When war was unfortunately declared against England, after the restoration, De Witt exerted all his power to make the naval armaments as respectable as possible, and after Opdam's defeat, he was one of those named to preside over the fleet. The fleet was shut up in the Texel; but whilst the commanders considered it impossible to sail but with only 10 points of the compass, he by mathematical calculation, convinced them that only four points were against them, and 28 for them, and in consequence of this, the ships were safely conveyed through a passage, which since that time has been called De Witt's diep. Of this affair, and of the events which took place afterwards, he wrote an accurate relation, for which he received the thanks of the state. Of the famous battle of three days, in 1666, he also gave a full account to the states, and in 1667 he established an edict for ever to abolish the stadtholderate in Holland; but in 1672 when the prince of Orange was nominated captain general, the mob invited him to accept the office of stadtholder, and De Witt, no longer popular, resigned his office, after receiving the solemn thanks of the states for his services. When Holland was invaded by the French, the odium was thrown by the friends of the Orange family on De Witt and his party, and so violent were the tumults, that De Witt's brother, Cornelius, was accused by Ticklaer, a barber, and though declared innocent, was sentenced to exile, and soon after the prison in which he was, was attacked, and he as well as his brother, who unfortunately was present, were inhumanly butchered. Their dead bodies were dragged to the gallows, and the pensionary's remains were hung one foot higher than those those of his brother. Their bodies thus insulted were cut into a thousand pieces, and it is even said, that some of the flesh was broiled and eat by the savage murderers. Thus fell this virtuous and amiable man, in his 47th year. As a politician he had no equal, and his love to his country was inferior to none of his other virtues. Without pride and pomp, he lived upon little more than £700 a year, though at the head of a government; and with the greatest and most laudable integrity, he refused a gift of £10,000, with which the states wished to reward his noble services, observing, that such liberality was a bad precedent in a government. His work called, "the true interest and political maxims of the republic of Holland," translated into English by John Campbell, is a glorious monument of his abilities as a statesman, and it displays the true maxims by which a government may become popular at home and respectable abroad, whilst it maintains justice with liberty, and encourages trade without oppression, or monopoly.

DEWIT, James, a painter of Amsterdam, born 1695. He was pupil of Van Hal. His best work is Moses appointing the 70 elders, painted for the burgomasters of Amsterdam.

DEYNUM, John Baptist Van, an eminent miniature painter of Antwerp, born 1620.

DEYSTER, Lewis, an eminent painter and engraver of Bruges, who died 1711, aged 55. His death of the Virgin, is his best piece. His daughter Anna was equally famous as a painter, but she relinquished the profession to construct organs and harpichords, and consequently died poor, 1746, aged 50.

D'HOSIER, Peter, a native of Marseilles, the first who formed genealogies into a science. He was patronised by Lewis XIII. and XIV. who made him counsellor of state. He died 1660, aged 68.

DIACONUS, Paulus, a Lombard, born at Friuli, and educated at the court of Pavia. He became a monk in the monastery of Monte Casino, where he composed his history of the Lombards, in six books. He is considered as accurate in the affairs of his own nation, though not equally exact in treating foreign affairs. He died 720. His history was printed 1611, and is also found in Muratori's Rerum Ital. Scriptores.

DIAGORAS, a philosopher born at Melos, who professed publicly atheism, for which he was accused before the Athenians. He afterwards perished in a shipwreck, 412 B. C.

DIAZ, Bartholomew, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who in 1466 discovered the most southern cape of Africa, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Storms. This appellation, so ill omended, was altered by John II. king of Portugal, to the name of the Cape of Good-hope.

DIAZ, John, a Spaniard, who studied at Paris, and embraced the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards visited Calvin at Geneva, and Bucer at Strasburg, and met at Neuburg his brother Alphonsus, who, as a violent catholic, endeavoured to convert him from the protestant faith. Unable to do this, Alphonsus pretends to return home, and the next morning, instigates an assassin to enter his brother's apartment, and with an axe to dash out his brains, whilst he himself awaits the event at the door of his chamber. The assassins were pursued and seized at Inspruck, but Charles V. took their punishment into his own hand. This dreadful deed was perpetrated the 27th March 1546.

DICEARCHUS, a philosopher of Messina in Sicily, who wrote a treatise on the geography of Greece, &c. published 1709.

DICENEUS, an Egyptian philosopher, in the age of Augustus. He travelled into Scythia, where he persuaded the people to learn and to practise temperance.

DICETO, Ralph de, author of abbreviations chronorum, or an epitome of English history to the conquest — & imagines historiarum, or lives of some English kings — was dean of St. Paul's, London, 1210.

DICK, fir Alexander, son of fir William Cunningham of Copington, by the daughter and heiress of fir James Dick of Prestonfield, was born 1703. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards under Boerhaave at Leyden, where he took his degrees, and after visiting several countries of Europe, he returned to England, and began to practise in Pembrokehire. On the death of his brother fir William, he assumed the name of his maternal grandfather, and retired to his family seat at Prestonfield, where he died 1785. He was in 1756 president of the college of physicians in Edinburgh, and liberally contributed to the honor and support of his profession. He was in 1774 honored with a medal from the London society of arts and commerce, for his successful culture of rhubarb, the first attempt of rearing which in England was owing to his patriotic views.

DICKINSON, Edmund, an eminent physician, son of the rector of Appleton, Berkshire, where he was born 1624. He was educated at Eton, and at Merton college, Oxford, where he took his medical degrees. He published in 1655 his Delphi Phœnicizantes, a learned work, in which he proved that the Greeks borrowed their history of the oracle of Delphi from the scriptures, especially the book of Joshua. This book was universally admired, and Sheldon the primate wished in vain to turn the attention of the ingenious author to theological studies. After practising for some time in Oxford, where he had the misfortune to lose his first wife in childbed, and his second soon after his marriage, he in 1684 settled in London, where, by recovering lord Arlington, he obtained an introduction at court, and became physician to Charles II. and afterwards to his successor. Upon the abdication he retired from practice, and applied himself to the completion of his Physica vetus & vera, &c. which when just finished was unfortunately burnt, and cost him the heavy labors of recomposition. It appeared in 1702, and it proved that the method and mode of the creation of the universe, according to the principles of true philosophy, are related in a concise and general way by Moses. He wrote besides, diatriba de Noë in Italian adventu, &c. — de origine Druidum, &c. He was also an able chemist, and was intimate with Theodore Mundanus, an illustrious professor in that science at Paris. He died of the stone in April 1707, in his 83d year, and was buried in the chapel of St. Martin in the fields.

DICKSON, David, a Scotch divine, born at Paisley 1591, and educated at Glasgow. He was an eloquent preacher; but he was too violent against the episcopals, which subjected him to much obloquy, and to persecution. He was in 1638 a commissioner to the general assembly at Glasgow, and in 1643 in Westminster. He was divinity professor at Edinburgh, but in 1662 he was stripped of all his employments, and died at Edinburgh two years after, aged 73. He wrote a commentary on St. Matthew—the epistle to the Hebrews and Romans—and the psalms, &c.—besides some divinity tracts.

DICTYS CRETENSIS, an ancient historian, said to have been engaged in the Trojan war, under Idomeneus. The work extant under his name is spurious.

DIDEROT, Dionysius, a celebrated writer, son of a cutter, was born at Langres 1713, and educated by the Jesuits, and afterwards at Paris. His father wished him to study the law, but belles lettres were his favorite pursuits, and when settled in the capital, he soon acquired by his wit, his learning, and his genius, friends, patrons, and encouragement. His first publication was Pensées philosophiques in 1746, which afterwards was published under the title of Etrennes aux esprits forts. He now employed himself with Eudon and Toussaint, in publishing an universal dictionary of medicine, in six vols. folio. This work, though deficient in many respects, procured him a greater share of reputation, and he now formed the gigantic plan of a Dictionnaire encyclopédique. In this laborious undertaking he was assisted by d'Alembert, and by several other associates, whose genius, diligence, and judgement were united to produce a work of merit, and of universal interest. Diderot himself took the arts and trades, and infused into his subjects, all the knowledge, the brilliancy, and the nervousness of language, of which he was so capable; but he did not find in his fellow laborers, the same zeal, nor the same abilities. While his own part was completed with spirit and success, his associates proved too often inadequate to their undertakings; their contributions are ill digested, puerile, and contradictory, without system, without union, and devoid of interest and accuracy. This great work, which cost 20 years' labor to Diderot, was retarded in its progress by the suspicions of the court, who considered some reflections on government and religion, as improper and indelicate, and not only some copies were seized, but the printers themselves were sent to the bastille. The work was delivered to the public between 1751 and 1767, and soon sold off, but Diderot did not find that increase to his independence which he expected, so that he was obliged to sell his library, which was purchased for 50,000 livres by the empress of Russia; but with a generosity truly great, the philosopher was permitted the use of his books as long as he lived. Though laboriously engaged in the encyclopedia, Diderot found time to write his Bijoux indiscrets, 2 vols. 12mo. a licentious and disgusting romance, the Fils naturel, and the Père de famille, 1757 and 1758, two prose comedies, which, in an elegant and nervous style, paint the passions, strongly interest the heart, and render virtue in her various trials truly great, noble, and amiable. His letters on the blind appeared in 1749, but the freedoms, and the scepticism of the author cost him his liberty, and he was imprisoned for six months at Vincennes, where the gloom and horrors of confinement nearly deprived him of reason, had not the conversation of J. J. Rousseau and other literary men comforted his affliction. In 1751 he delivered his opinion on metaphysics, poetry, eloquence, &c. in a letter on the deaf and dumb, 2 vols. 12mo. Diderot's other works are—principles of moral philosophy, 12mo.—history of Greece translated from Stanyan, 3 vols. 12mo.—pieces on mathematical subjects—the code of nature—the sixth sense—of public education—reflections on the interpretation of nature—panegyrics on Richardson—and the life of Seneca, a useful work. He died suddenly on rising from table, 31st July 1784, aged 71. Diderot's character has been variously described. His frankness and candor are extolled by his friends, whilst his enemies reproach him as an artful, interested, pliant, and dangerous character. Of his extensive learning, and of his knowledge in every branch of science, his writings are most lasting monuments. It is however to be lamented, that his erudition was not always employed in the support of virtue and morality, nor his abilities exerted to animate man in the cultivation of what is so necessary to his welfare and happiness, the religious duties. A partial collection of his works has been published in 6 vols. 8vo.

DIDIUS JULIANUS, M. Salvius Severus, a Roman emperor, who purchased the diadem of the corrupt soldiery. Severus was soon after raised to the throne, and Didius was put to death after a short reign of 66 days, A. D. 193.

DIDO or ELISSA, queen of Carthage, fled from Tyre after the murder of her husband Sichæus, by his brother Pygmalion, and she settled on the coast of Africa, where she laid the foundation of a new empire. Virgil and other represent her as visited by Æneas, after whose departure she destroyed herself through grief and disappointed love.

DIDOT, Francis Ambrose, an eminent printer at Paris. The works which he printed were peculiarly admired for the correctness, elegance, and beauty of the type, and among these, the edition of the classics published by order of Lewis XVI. for the use of the dauphin, ranked very high. He made some useful improvements in paper mills, and in printing machines, and to his ingenuity the invention of stereotype printing may be fairly ascribed, to the perfection of which he devoted himself with so much zeal, that at the age of 73 he perused five times successively, the edition of Montaigne which his sons had undertaken. He died at Paris, 10th July 1804, aged 74, and was succeeded in his business by his sons, the eldest of whom is lately dead, leaving his concern to his brother, and to his son.

DIDYMUS, of Alexandria, an ancient grammarian, in the age of Augustus, said to have been the author of 400 books.

DIDYMUS, of Alexandria, an able writer, though blind at the age of five. He died 395, aged 85.

DIECMAN, John, a native of Stade, who became superintendant of the duchies of Bremen and Verden, and rector of Stade university, where he died 1720, aged 73. Besides several theological, metaphysical, and philosophical works, he published an edition of Luther's bible, used at Stade.

DIEMEN, Anthony Van, a native of Kuilenberg, where his father was burgomaster. He went to the East Indies, and gradually rose to be governor of the Dutch territories there, an office which he discharged with great zeal, ability, and success. He sent in 1642 Abel Tasman on a voyage of discovery to the southward, and the land which was discovered on the south of New Holland, was called in his honor Van Diemen's land. He died 1645.

DIEMERBROEK, Isbrand, a learned professor of anatomy at Utrecht, born at Montford in Holland. He died at Utrecht, 1674, aged 65. His works are, a treatise on the plague—an history of distempers—a miscellany of pieces on physic and anatomy, folio.

DIEPENBECK, Abraham, a painter of Boisseduc, who died at Antwerp 1675, aged 67. He studied under Rubens, and first painted on glass, and afterwards in oil. His drawings are numerous, and his temple of the muses is considered as a master piece.

DIEST, Adrian Van, a landscape painter, of the Hague, who died 1704, aged 49. He spent the best part of his life in England, where his pencil was employed in delineating the beauties of the western plants of the island.

DIETRIC, John Conrad, a Lutheran, native of Butzbach in Wetteravia. He was professor of Greek and history in his native town, and removed in 1653 to Gießen, where he died 1667, aged 55. He was author of a book de peregrinatione studiorum—antiquitates Romanæ—lexicon etymologico-græcum—antiquitates novi testamenti—antiquitates biblicæ, &c.

DIETRICH, John William Ernest, a native of Weimar, where his father was eminent as a painter of battles, and of portraits. After studying under his father, he went to Dresden to improve himself under Alexander Thiele, and thence removed to Italy. His abilities recommended him to the public notice, and he was made professor of Dresden academy, and director of the painting school of Meissen, and died 1774, aged 62. His landscapes, portraits, scripture pieces, conversations, &c. were much admired, and he acquired some celebrity also as an engraver.

DIETRY, a painter of Dresden, who died there 1730, aged 45. His two views near Rome are very pleasing proofs of his great skill in landscape painting.

DIEU, Lewis de, an eminent divine, born at Flushing 7th April 1590. He early distinguished himself as a preacher, and refused to be the court minister at the Hague, as he was more desirous to censure than countenance the licentious morals of the great. He came to Leyden to teach with his uncle and preceptor, the learned Colonus, and he was divinity professor in the Walloon college till his death in 1642. He published in 1651 a commentary on the four gospels—and notes on the Acts, after a careful examination of several translations,—the history of our Saviour in the Persian language by the Jesuit Jerome Xavier, and a Latin translation—rudiments of the Hebrew and Persian tongues—besides the revelations of St. John, in Hebrew and Syriac, with a Latin version—and other inferior treatises. His father Daniel de Dieu, was minister of Flushing, and a very learned orator, who could fluently preach in German, Italian, French, and English.

DIGBY, Everard, an English gentleman of Drystoke in Rutlandshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He wrote some curious and learned books, de arte natanandi,—de duplici methodo, &c.—theoria analytica—a difsuative from taking the church livings, &c. He died 1592.

DIGBY, sir Everard, son of the preceding, was educated in the Romish church after his father's death. He was recommended to queen Elizabeth, whose court he attended, and he was knighted by king James. Though of mild manners, and peaceful disposition, and rich and independent from his own paternal estates, and the property of his wife, daughter of William Mulisho esq. of Gotherst, Bucks, he yet engaged in the schemes for the destruction of the government. Though not immediately an agent in the gunpowder plot with Guy Fawkes, he gave £1500 towards the expences of it. On the discovery of this diabolical scheme, therefore, he was sent to the tower, and when arraigned he pleaded for his conduct, that the king had broke his promises to the catholics, and that the restoration of the catholic religion was an event, which in the opinion of this insatuated sect, it became every subject to accomplish by whatever means they could; and he added, that as he alone was guilty, pardon should be extended to all others, and his family particularly, not ruined. On the 30th Jan. 1606, pursuant to his sentence, he was hanged, drawn, and quartered at the west end of St. Paul's, London, and he died very penitent, and anxious to make deep atonement for the meditated horrors of the conspiracy.

DIGBY, sir Kenelm, an eminent philosopher, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Gotherst, Bucks, 11th June 1603. He was educated under the care of Laud then dean of Gloucester, and in 1618 he entered at Gloucester-hall, Oxford, where during the three years of his residence, he displayed such great abilities, and so extensive a knowledge, that he was compared to the celebrated Picus de Mirandula. After travelling through France, Spain, and Italy, he returned to England in 1623, and was knighted. He then engaged the attention of the learned and the curious, by the introduction of a secret medicine, afterwards well known by the name of sympathetic powder, which he discovered in his travels. He became a favorite of Charles I. and when a quarrel arose with the Venetians, he was sent with a fleet into the Mediterranean in 1628, and acquired great reputation by his conduct at Algiers, and by his attack of the hostile fleet in the bay of Scanderoon. In 1636, after a visit to France, he was reconciled to the Romish church, much to the regret of his guardian and friend Laud, who expostulated with him in vain, and he defended his motives, and published 1638, a conference with a lady about the choice of religion. reprinted 1654. In 1639 he was very active to levy contributions among the papists for the king's service, for which interference he was called before the parliament, and imprisoned in Winchester-house, from which, however, he was released in consequence of the honorable interference of the queen of France. Upon his liberation he retired to Paris, and soon after visited Des Cartes at Egmont, and laid the foundation of that friendly intercourse and literary communication, which always afterwards prevailed between these two celebrated characters. During his retirement in France, sir Kenelm devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, and published his treatise of the nature of bodies—and another on the operation and nature of man's soul, &c. 1644—and institutum peripateticarum libri quinque, quinque, &c. 1651. Upon the destruction of the regal power, he returned to England to collect the shattered remains of his fortune, but the parliament ordered him to leave the country on pain of confiscation and loss of life. His return to Paris was agreeable to queen Henrietta, whose chancellor he had been appointed, and he was sent by her as negociator to pope Innocent X. The elevation of Cromwell to supreme power enabled him to revisit England, and after staying there the best part of the year 1655, and engaging, it is supposed, to reconcile the papists to the usurpation, he returned to Paris. He afterwards spent some time at Toulouse and Montpellier, where, as a man of letters and as a philosopher, he was contended and respected. At the restoration he came back to England, and became a favorite in the court of Charles II. though his enemies failed not to represent him as lately employed in the service of the usurper. At the establishment of the royal society he was made one of the council. He was very grievously afflicted the latter part of his life by the stone, of which painful disorder he died at his house, Covent-garden, June 11th, 1665. His remains were interred in Christ-church, Newgate. His valuable library, which during the troubles had been removed to France, became at his death the property of the French king. Besides the books mentioned, sir Kenelm publishes observations on Dr. Brown's religio medici—observations on the 22d stanza of the 9th canto, second book, of the fairy queen—a discourse on the vegetation of plants—a treatise of adhering to God, translated from Albertus Magnus. Sir Kenelm was ridiculed for asserting, on the report of some of his friends, that there was a city near Tripoli, whose inhabitants, beasts, &c. had in a few hours been turned to stone, by petrifying vapor from the earth; a circumstance supported by the observations of late travellers, mentioned in Dr. Rob. Hooke's philosophical observations, &c. 1726, 8vo. Sir Kenelm left an only son John, who succeeded him to his estate. Another son, Kenelm, was slain in the king's cause at the battle of St. Neots.

DIGBY, John, a nobleman descended of a respectable family at Colehill, Warwickshire. He was of Magdalen college, Oxford, and after finishing his travels, he was introduced to James I. who appointed him gentleman of the privy chamber, and in 1606 knighted him, and in 1611 and 1614 sent him as his ambassador to Spain. In 1616 he became a privy counsellor, and chamberlain to the king; two years after he was made baron Digby of Sherbourne, and 1620 sent ambassador to the archduke Albert, and next year to the emperor. In 1622 he went to Spain to negotiate the prince's marriage with the infanta, and on his return he was created earl of Bristol. He opposed Buckingham in parliament, and for a while he favored the popular party; but in the civil troubles he was exiled, and died at Paris 21st Jan. 1653. He was author of some poems, of airs and dialogues. He also translated, it is supposed, at James I.'s request, Du Moulin's defence of the catholic faith, contained in the books of king James against the answer of N. Coeffeteau, &c. 1610.

DIGBY, George, earl of Bristol, son of the preceding, was born at Madrid, October 1612. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his abilities, and by his friendship with the celebrated Peter Heylin. In his politics he embraced the popular cause, and was one of Strafford's accusers; but he afterwards favored the king's party, and was expelled from the house of commons, for speaking in the defence of that unfortunate nobleman. During the civil wars he was very active in the royal cause, and in Ireland, Jersey, and France he displayed his zeal in the service of his unfortunate master. After Charles' death he was exempted from pardon by the parliament, and consequently spent his life in exile, but at the restoration he was made a knight of the garter, but he violently opposed in parliament the great Clarendon. He died at Chelsea, 20th March, 1676. It is remarkable, that though he wrote against popery he died a papist, and though a papist he spoke in favor of the test act.

DIGGES, Leonard, a learned mathematician, born at Barham in Kent, and educated at University college, Oxford. He wrote Tectonicum, to shew the measuring of land, &c. 1556, 4to. improved by his son Thomas 1592,—a geometrical practical treatise—pantometria, published by his son 1591—prognostication of everlasting right, good effect, or rules to judge the weather by the sun, moon, stars, &c. 1564. He died 1574.

DIGGES, Thomas, only son of Leonard, after studying at Oxford, proved himself a very great mathematician. He went as muster-master general to the forces sent by Elizabeth to defend the Netherlands. Besides improving some of his father's works, he published alæ five scalæ, &c. mathematical wings or ladders, 1573, 4to.—an arithmetical military treatise, 4to.—a geometrical treatise, &c.—a description of celestial orbs, &c.—motive for association, &c.—England's defence, &c. He died 1595.

DIGGES, sir Dudley, eldest son of Thomas, was born 1583, and educated at University college, Oxford. He studied the law, and after being knighted, travelled to improve himself in foreign lands. He was sent in 1618 as ambassador to Prussia by James I. and two years after he went to Holland as commissioner. He was in parliament in the reign of James, and of Charles I. and his conduct was very independent, and often hostile to the measures of the court, so that he was sent to the tower for his accusation against Buckingham. So powerful was his influence, that measures were adopted to gain him over, and by a reversionary grant of the office of master of the rolls in 1630, which he obtained in 1636, he was brought over to favor the measures of government. He did not long enjoy this honorable office, as he died 8th March 1639, universally lamented. He published a defence of trade, 4to.—a discourse on the rights and privileges of the subject, or a conference with the lords by a committee of both houses, 1628 and 1642—speeches on several occasions inserted in Ruthworth's collections—letters between Walsingham and Burleigh, and others, about Elizabeth's marriage with the duke of Anjou.

DIGGES, Thomas, brother to sir Dudley, was educated at University college, and improved himself by travelling abroad. He translated Gerardo, the unfortunate Spaniard, from Cespades—and Claudian's rape of Proserpine into English verse. He was a learned man, and died 1635.

DIGGES, Dudley, third son to sir Dudley, was educated at University college, and became fellow of All-souls, souls, 1633. He wrote an answer to observations on his majesty's answers and expresses—and the unlawfulness of subjects taking up arms against their sovereign, 1643. He died 1643.

DILLENIUS, John James, an eminent botanist, born at Darmstadt in Germany 1681, and educated at the university of Gießen, in Upper Hesse. He established his reputation as a learned botanist, by his valuable communications to the miscellanea curiosa, and by his other ingenious publications. In his dissertation on the coffee of the Arabians, he gives his preparations made with peas, beans, &c. and asserts, that from rye can be produced, that which most nearly resembles coffee. He enumerates not less than 980 plants, exclusive of mushrooms and mosses in the neighbourhood of Gießen, and thus displays the most indefatigable and ardent industry. His acquaintance with Dr. Cherard, who had been British consul at Smyrna, was productive of an alteration in his plans; he followed his friend to England in 1721, and there resided the rest of his life. He first engaged himself in this country, in a new edition of Ray's synopsis stirpium Britannicarum, and by the death of his friend in 1728, and his bequeathing of 3000*l.* to the university of Oxford for a botanical professorship, to which Dillenius was first to be appointed, he was raised to comfortable independence, and learned retirement. In this wished for situation he applied himself diligently to the improvement of botany, and in his hortus Elthamensis, 417 plants, chiefly exotics, were described and figured with the most careful attention. His expectations, however, did not answer; botany was not yet a favorite study, and the author sold few of his copies, and where he flattered himself with profit, he experienced only loss. In 1735 the university granted him the degree of M.D. and the following year he was honored with a visit from his friend and correspondent Linnæus. He now devoted himself to the completion of an history of mosses, and probably would have undertaken the funguses, had not death closed prematurely his labors. He was attacked the last week in March 1747 with an apoplexy, and died on the 2d April, aged 60. In his private character, Dillenius was very respectable, naturally of a mild temper, but fond of retirement, that his studious pursuits might meet less interruption. His drawings, dried plants, MSS. &c. were purchased by Dr. Sibthorpe his successor, and now enrich the treasures of Oxford.

DILLOX, Wentworth, earl of Roscommon. Vid. ROSCOMMON.

DILWORTH, Thomas, a diligent schoolmaster, whose spelling book—book-keeper's assistant—schoolmaster's assistant—miscellaneous arithmetic, &c.—are well known as useful and popular books. He was for some time engaged at Stratford-le-bow with Dyche, and then set up a school for himself at Wapping. He died 1781.

DIMSDALE, Thomas, an eminent English physician, born at Thoydon-garnon, Essex, where his father was a surgeon. His family were quakers, and his grandfather was the companion of Penn in America. Young Dimsdale, after studying at St. Thomas' hospital, settled at Hertford, which he quitted in 1745 in consequence of the death of his wife, and engaged as surgeon in the duke of Northumberland's army in the Scotch campaign. On the taking of Carlisle he returned to Hertford, where he again married, and in 1761 began to practise as physician. His celebrity as an inoculator in the small-pox, recommended him to the empress Catharine, at whose request he visited Russia in 1763. His successful inoculation of the empress, and of her son the grand duke, was rewarded with the rank of baron of the empire, of counsellor of state, and of physician to the empress, besides a pension of 500*l.* per ann. and a present of 12,000*l.* His son who had accompanied him shared his honors, and was presented with a gold snuff-box set with diamonds. In 1781 Dimsdale was again in Russia to inoculate the grand duke's two sons, and so respectable was his character, that he was elected member of parliament for Hertford in 1780, and again 1784, but resigned his pretensions at the next general election. This able practitioner had the misfortune to lose his eye-sight by a catarrh, which however was happily removed by Wenzell. He died 1800. He was author of tracts on inoculation, with an account of his journey to Russia, 8vo. 1781.

DINARCHUS, a Greek orator, the pupil of Theophrastus. He was banished for a false accusation of receiving bribes, B. C. 340.

DINGLEY, Robert, an English writer, educated at Magdalen college. He became a zealous puritan, and was made rector of Brixton in the Isle of Wight, by the interest of his uncle col. Hammond, when governor there. He died 1659, aged 40. Among his works are mentioned, the deputation of angels, proved by the divine right of nature, from many rubs and mistakes, &c.

DINO, compiler of the six books of decretals, and author of a valuable commentary on the rules of law, was professor of jurisprudence at Bologna, and died about 1307. It is said, that he expected to be made a cardinal, as the reward of his services, and in consequence of such hopes he took orders, and divorced his wife.

DINOCRATES, a Macedonian architect, whose abilities were employed in the building of the city of Alexandria. His offer to cut mount Athos into the form of a statue in honor of Alexander, was rejected by the monarch.

DINOSTRATUS, a mathematician, the pupil of Plato. He is the inventor of the quadratric curve which bears his name.

DINOTH, Richard, a protestant writer of Contances, who died 1680, leaving an accurate work, de bello civili Gallico.

DINOUART, Anthony Joseph Toussaint, canon of St. Benet, Paris, and member of the academy of the Arcades at Rome, was born at Amiens 1st Nov. 1715, and died at Paris 23d April 1786. He first engaged at Paris with Joannet in periodical publications, where the severity of his remarks drew upon him trouble and law-suits. In 1760 he began his ecclesiastical journal, which produced him an extensive correspondence with France, but he was little attentive in this periodical work to propriety, as nostrums, and sermons were recommended in the same page to his readers, and large quotations from various authors were made without any acknowledgement. His other works are embryologia sacra, 12mo.—the manual for pastors, 3 vols. 12mo.—the rhetoric of preachers, &c.—besides some Latin and French poems of inferior merit.

DIO CHRYSOSTOM, an orator of Prusa in Bithynia, wantonly disgraced by Domitian, but treated with great kindness by Trajan.

DIOCLES, a mathematician in the fifth century, the inventor of the ciffoid or curve line, which Newton calls one of the defective hyperbolas.

DIOCLETIAN, Caius Valerius, a Roman emperor, born of an obscure family in Dalmatia. He succeeded Numerian in 284, and after a glorious reign of valor, and the honorable patronage of virtue and learning, he laid down his power at Nicomedia 304, and retired to privacy at Salona, where he died 313.

DIODATI, John, a native of Lucca, professor of philosophy at Geneva, where he died 1652, aged 73. He is well known for his translations of the bible into Italian, with notes, 4to. 1607, into French, 1644—and father Paul's history of the council of Trent into French.

DIODORUS SICULUS, a Greek historian, born at Argynum in Sicily. Of his universal history only 15 books remain, best edited by Wesseling. He flourished about 44 B. C.

DIODORUS, bishop of Tarsus, eminent as a divine, and also as an instructor of youth in the fourth century. Of his writings only a few fragments remain.

DIODEGENES, a famous cynic philosopher, born at Sinope, in Pontus, B. C. 414. He was so independent in his character and conduct, that he preferred living in a tub to the comforts of a house. Pride, however, and misanthropy, seem to have predominated in him, over virtue and true philosophy.

DIODEGENES, a philosopher of Babylon, B. C. 200. He succeeded Zeno in his school, and attended Carneades to Rome in his embassy.

DIODEGENES LAERTIUS, a Greek historian of Cilicia. His lives of philosophers in 10 books are esteemed. He died A. D. 222.

DIODEGENES, a Cretan philosopher, the successor of Anaximenes, B. C. 500.

DIODNETUS, a philosopher, preceptor to Marcus Aurelius.

DION, a Syracusan, celebrated as the friend of Plato, and particularly as the relation and the opponent of the Dionysii, tyrants of Sicily. After successfully expelling the younger Dionysius, he was himself soon after murdered about 354 B. C.

DION CASSIUS, an historian of Bithynia in the third century. Of his Greek history from the age of Romulus to the reign of Alexander Severus, much has been lost.

DIONIS, Peter, a French surgeon who died 1718. His skill in anatomical dissertations and chirurgical operations was very great. He published some valuable works,—un cours d'operations de chirurgie,—l'anatomie de l'homme,—& traité de la maniere de secourir les femmes dans les accouchemens, &c.

DIONYSIUS I. tyrant of Sicily, raised himself from obscurity to the sovereign power, which he maintained with great vigor. His reign is however marked by many actions of cruelty and oppression, and his conduct towards Plato, whom he ordered to be sold as a slave, was infamous in the extreme. He died 366 B. C. after a reign of near 40 years.

DIONYSIUS II. succeeded his father as tyrant of Syracuse, and exceeded him in cruelty though he was inferior to him in sagacity. He was at last expelled by Dion B. C. 343, and died a private man at Corinth.

DIONYSIUS PERIEGETES, author of Periegesis, or geography of the world, in Greek verse, was patronized by Augustus.

DIONYSIUS, an historian of Halicarnassus, who settled at Rome B. C. 30 and wrote a valuable work called Roman antiquities, of which only 11 books are extant. He wrote some other works.

DIONYSIUS, a tyrant of Heraclea, who married a niece of Darius. He was remarkable for his corpulence, and died 304 B. C.

DIONYSIUS, a bishop of Corinth, who suffered martyrdom 178.

DIONYSIUS, a bishop of Alexandria, the disciple of Origen. He wrote some things, and was exposed to persecution. He died 267.

DIONYSIUS, bishop of Rome after Sixtus 259, condemned the heresy of Sabellius in a full synod, and died 269.

DIONYSIUS, a Romish monk called the little, in the fifth century. He compiled a book of decretals, and translated from the Greek, a body of canons, and invented, as it is said, the victorian period, or method of calculating the time of easter.

DIONYSIUS, the Areopagite, a learned Athenian, member of the court of the areopagus, and converted to christianity by Paul's preaching on the unknown God, as mentioned in the Acts 17. He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, but when or where is unknown. The works published under his name, Antwerp, 2 vols. 1634, are spurious.

DIOPHANTUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, said to have invented algebra. The age in which he lived is unknown. His six books on arithmetic, in Greek and Latin, were published Paris 1621.

DIOSCORIDES, Pedacus, a physician under Nero. He wrote five books on the virtues of plants, edited by Saracenus 1598 fol.

DIPPEL, John Conrad, a curious and extravagant character, who called himself in his writings, Christianus Democritus. He warmly opposed the Pietists at Strassburg, and afterwards supported them at Gießen. When unable to get a wife and a professor's chair, he began his invectives against the protestants, and soon after turned his thoughts to chemistry, and pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone. But though thus rich in his opinion he was literally poor, and in consequence of his debts successively confined in the prisons of Berlin, Copenhagen, Frankfort, Leyden, Amsterdam, &c. In 1727 he went to Stockholm to prescribe for the king, but the Swedish clergy, though pleased with the recovery of the monarch, banished the operator, who returned to Germany. In 1733 he published a statement to prove that he should not die till the year 1808, but the next year, unfortunately for the prophecy, he was found dead in his bed at Widgenstein, 25th April 1734. He wrote some enthusiastic works, and denied the divine inspiration of the holy scriptures.

DIROIS, Francis, doctor of the Sorbonne, is known for his work called Preuves & préjugés pour la religion chretienne & catholique, contre les fausses religions & atheism, atheism, and for other ecclesiastical labors. He died about 1700.

DISNEY, John, a native of Lincoln, educated at the grammar school there, and among the dissenters, and afterwards removed to the Middle temple. He never however practised at the bar, but devoted himself to the arduous offices of public magistrate in his native county, and was so upright and zealous in the support of virtue and morality, that he received the thanks of the judges at the assize. Though brought up among the dissenters and the son of a dissenter, he yet honored the church of England, and at the age of 42, took orders and succeeded to the livings of Croft, and Kirkby on Baine, Lincolnshire, and in 1722 to that of St. Mary, Nottingham. He was author of two essays on the execution of the laws against immorality and profaneness, 8vo.—Flora prefixed to Rapin's poem on gardens, translated,—remarks on Sacheverell's sermon,—primitivæ sacre, or reflections on devout solitude 8vo,—genealogy of the house of Brunswick Lunenburg,—view of ancient laws against immorality, &c. folio. This excellent man died at Nottingham 1730, aged 53.

DITHMAR, a Benedictine monk, bishop of Merzburg, died 1028, aged 42. He is known for a valuable chronicle of the emperors Henry I. Otho II. and III. and Henry II. the best edition of which is that published by Leibnitz in his collection to illustrate the history of Brunswick.

DITHMAR, Justus Christopher, member of the academy of Berlin, and historical professor at Frankfort, where he died 1737. His works on the history of Germany evince great learning, and strong application.

DITTON, Humphrey, an eminent mathematician, born at Salisbury, 20th May, 1675. He entered upon the labors of the ministry at his father's request, and for some time officiated at a dissenting meeting house at Tunbridge, where he married. The death of his father soon after enabled him to pursue his favorite studies, and to abandon divinity for mathematics. By the interest of his friends, and especially sir Isaac Newton, he was appointed master of the mathematical school, Christ's Hospital, where he continued till his death 1715. He favored the world with some learned works, and his tracts on the tangents of curves, in spherical catoptrics, general laws of nature and motion, Alexandra's synopsis algebraica, the institution of fluxions, his discourse on the resurrection of Jesus, and the new law of fluxions and a treatise on perspective, are well known.

DIVINI, Eustachius, an Italian artist, eminent in the making of telescopes. He disputed with Huygens about the discovery of Saturn's ring, but the pamphlets written on this occasion show that the Italian's telescopes were not so good as those of his opponent. He died about 1664.

DLUGOSS, John, a Pole, who became archbishop of Leopold, and died 1480, aged 65, much persecuted by king Casimir. His history of Poland, in Latin, though accurate, is written in barbarous language. He brought it down to the year 1444. The 12 first books were printed at Frankfort 1711, folio, and the 13th at Leipzig 1712.

DOBSON, William, an English painter, born in London 1610. Under Peake a stationer, he had the opportunity of copying Titian and Vandyck's pieces with such success that he was generously recommended by Vandyck to Charles I. who patronised him. Though highly favored at court, he died poor at his house in St. Martin's lane 1647. Had his genius been early tutored by the hand of art, he might have become a very great master. His pieces however in history and portraiture exhibit unusual powers.

DOD, John, a nonconformist of Jesus college, Cambridge, who died about 1645. His pious observations were once very popular among the vulgar, as well calculated to recommend virtue and religion. He was called the decalogist, from his exposition of the 10 commandments in conjunction with Robert Cleaver. He was very eminent as a Hebrew scholar, in which he instructed his friend John Gregory of Oxford.

DODART, Dennis, physician to Lewis XIV. was born at Paris 1634, and died 1707, greatly regretted. He was a supporter of Sanctiorius' notions about insensible perspiration, and he made an experiment upon himself during lent, by which he found that he weighed at the end of that season of abstinence only 107 pounds 12 ounces, having lost during that time eight pounds five ounces. He was a very religious and amiable character. His son Claude, was physician to the king, and died at Paris 1720, leaving notes on Pomey's history of drugs.

DOBBS, William, a learned but unfortunate divine, born 1729 at Bourne, Lincolnshire, where his father was vicar. In 1745 he entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he early distinguished himself and took his degrees. He published about this time the beauties of Shakespeare, 2 vols. 12mo, and having entered into orders in 1753, he became a popular and eloquent preacher in London, and was appointed lecturer to some charities, especially the Magdalen hospital, in whose establishment he had been zealously active. In 1761 he wrote a sonnet in praise of Dr. Squire, bishop of St. David's, and for his flattery was made his chaplain, and afterwards prebendary of Brecon. But though his income was respectable from his ecclesiastical appointments, and from his connections with the booksellers, who allowed him cool. a year to superintend the Christian's magazine, his expences were great from an improper spirit of extravagance and gaiety which he thoughtlessly indulged. In 1765 he began to publish in weekly numbers his commentary on the bible, which drew the public attention, as being collected from the papers of Lock, Waterland, West, Clarendon, and other celebrated men, and the work was completed in 3 vols. folio. and dedicated to bishop Squire, who unluckily for the author died soon after. In 1766, as being king's chaplain, he took the degree of L.L.D. and soon after published a volume of poems, and in 1769 he translated Massillon's sermons, inscribed to the prince of Wales. In 1771 appeared his sermons to young men 3 vols. 12mo. dedicated to his pupils Charles Ernst, and Philip Stanhope, afterwards earl of Chesterfield. He was presented in 1772 to the living of Hockliffe, Beds, by his pupil, but though his income was enlarged his expenditure increased in far greater proportion, and in a thoughtless moment of ambition and avarice, he endeavoured to obtain the vacant living of St. George's Hanover square, by offering in an anonymous letter 300l. to lady Apsey, if she would use her influence for the appointment, pointment. The unfortunate letter was divulged, and the chancellor Apsley laid it before the king, in consequence of which Dodd, now proved to be the author of it, was not only erased from the list of chaplains, but ridiculed in the papers, and lampooned on the stage in one of Foote's pieces at the Hay-market. Ashamed of his conduct he fled to Geneva, where his pupil lord Chesterfield honorably gave him in addition the living of Winge in Bucks: but so extravagant and ridiculous was the conduct of this illfated divine, that he appeared at the races at Sablons near Paris, in a phaeton, in all the attire of French foppery. On his return to London he preached his last sermon at the Magdalen 2d February 1777, and two days after signed a bond for 4000*l.* which he had forged in the name of lord Chesterfield, and by which he obtained money to relieve his necessities. The forgery was soon discovered, Dodd was tried and condemned at the Old Bailey 24th February; and executed at Tyburn 27th June. Between the passing of his sentence and its execution, which had been delayed in consequence of doubts about the admissibility of the evidence of the man who had drawn up the bond, great interest was made, and a petition signed by thousands presented to the king, to save from ignominious death this unfortunate man, but all in vain. During his confinement he behaved with great penitence, and addressed his fellow prisoners in his "thoughts in prison," with energy and Christian fortitude. He translated Callimachus, and wrote 4 vols. of sermons on the miracles and parables of our Saviour. His publications are said to have altogether amounted to 55 in number, chiefly on religious and moral subjects. Before the commission of his forgery he offered proposals for a history of free masonry 2 vols. 4to. He was married in 1751, but he left no children.

DODDRIDGE or DODERIDGE, for John, a native of Barnstaple, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree 1576. He then removed to the Middle-temple, and became in 1603 serjeant at law, solicitor to the king, and in 1612 a judge of the common pleas, and afterwards of the king's bench. He died at Egham, Surrey, and was buried in Exeter cathedral, where a monument records his services. He is author of the lawyer's light, or direction for the study of the law, 4to, 1629,—a complete parson, or description of advowsons, &c. 4to, 1630—history of the ancient and modern estates of Wales, Cornwall, and Chester, 4to, 1630,—the English lawyer 4to, 1731,—opinion on the antiquity, power, order, &c. of the high court of parliament in England 1658, published by his relation John Doddridge recorder of Barnstaple.

DODDRIDGE, Philip D. D. an eminent dissenting divine, son of an oilman in London, where he was born 26th June 1702. He was educated at private schools at Kingston-on-Thames and at St. Alban's, and began at the latter place a lasting friendship with Dr. Samuel Clarke who became his religious instructor, and, on his father's death, his faithful guardian. Tinctured with the tenets of the dissenters, he declined the liberal offers of the dukes of Bedford, who wished to bring him up at the university, and to raise him to preferment, and in 1719 he went to the academy of Mr. Jennings at Kibworth in Leicestershire, where he displayed uncommon diligence. He afterwards took the care of a small congregation at Kibworth, and soon after succeeded on Jennings' death to his academy, which, at the invitation of his friends, he removed to Northampton, where he continued the rest of his days, respected as a divine, successful as an instructor, and beloved as a private man. He died 26th October 1751, at Lisbon, where he had gone for the recovery of his health, and was buried in the ground of the English factory there. This amiable character, so much respected by all parties, published several religious tracts, the best known of which are, the principles of the christian religion, &c.—the rise and progress of religion in the soul,—remarkable passages in the life of col. James Gardiner, &c.—ten sermons on the power and grace of Christ, &c.—the family expositor, containing a version and paraphrase of the New testament with critical notes, &c. a valuable work, in 6 vols. 4to. Some of his letters and smaller tracts have been published by Stedman of Shrewsbury.

DODDENS or DODONÆUS, Rambert, a botanist of Malines, physician to the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. and professor at Leyden, died 1585, aged 67. He wrote an history of plants, Antwerp fol. 1616, translated into French by P'Écluse.

DODSLEY, Robert, a well known bookseller and writer, born at Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, 1703. Receiving little of education, he began life as footman in the family of Mrs. Lowther, but in this servile situation he indulged his natural talents for poetry and satire, and wrote the muse in livery, and a small dramatic piece, called the Toyshop, which accidentally was seen by Pope, and engaged all his attention. Interesting himself in the cause of this humble poet, he procured for him the introduction of his piece at the theatre, and manifested for him to the end of life the most cordial and honorable friendship. The Toyshop was succeeded by "the King, and Miller of Mansfield," in 1736, and from the great success of these two pieces he was enabled to settle himself independently as a London bookseller, a situation in which he maintained the greatest respectability of character with the most benevolent intentions and great humility of deportment. After acquiring a very handsome fortune, Doddsley retired from business in favor of his brother, and died 25th September 1764, in his 61st year, at the house of his friend Mr. Spence of Durham, and was buried in the abbey church at Durham. His works consist of six dramatic pieces of which the Cleone, a tragedy, is much admired, besides public virtue, a poem 1754, 4to. trifles 1745, 8vo. Melpomene, agriculture a poem, the economy of human life, and another book of trifles, collected after his death. He also collected some scattered poems of great merit in 6 vols. 12mo, and also plays by old authors in 12 vols. 12mo, which have lately been reprinted, and introduced to the public by a handsome and well deserved compliment, to the genius, character and integrity of the first editor.

DONSON, Michael, a native of Marlborough, Wilts, son of a dissenting minister. Under the protection of his paternal uncle sir Michael Foster the judge, he studied the law, and was called to the bar 1783. In 1770 he had been made by lord Camden commissioner of bankrupts. Besides a translation of Isaiah with notes published in 1790, and ably defended against the attacks of Dr. Sturges, he wrote the life of judge Foster, for the Biographia phia Brit. and the life of Hugh Farmer, some papers, &c. among the essays published for the promotion of scripture knowledge. He died 1799, aged 67.

DODSWORTH, Roger, an indefatigable topographer, born 24th July 1585, at Newton Grange, St. Oswald, Yorkshire. He died August 1654, and was buried at Rufford, Lancashire. In his laborious researches in the antiquities of his native county he wrote 122 volumes, besides other MSS. which altogether amount to 162 folio. vols. which were never published but are deposited in the Bodleian library. General Fairfax, was, notwithstanding the violence of the times, a great patron of Dodsworth, and to the liberality of his nephew, dean Fairfax of Norwich, the university of Oxford are indebted for this valuable collection.

DODWELL, Henry, a learned writer, born in Dublin October 1641, but of English parents. He came over to England in 1648, and was placed at a school in York, but the death of his father by the plague at Waterford, and of his mother, by a consumption soon after, reduced him to a wretched and indigent situation, from which he was at last relieved by his uncle a clergyman of Suffolk, who in 1654 lent for him, paid his debts, and afterwards had him conducted to Dublin. In 1656 he entered at Trinity college under Dr. Stearne, and became fellow, but in 1666 quitted his fellowship because he would not go into orders, as the statutes required. He then passed over to England, but afterwards revisited Ireland, and in 1674 settled in London, where he soon formed a lasting friendship with several learned men, especially bishop Lloyd. In 1688 he was, without his knowledge and in his absence, elected Camden professor of history at Oxford, of which employment however he was deprived 3 years after for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance. He afterwards settled at Cookham, Berkshire, and separated from the church because new bishops were appointed to succeed such as refused the oath of allegiance. In consequence of his acquaintance with Mr. Cherry of Shottesbrooke, he removed to that village, and after the death of the Dodwells his nephews, whom he nominated his heirs, he married the daughter of the person where he lodged at Cookham in 1694, by whom he had 10 children, six of whom survived him. He was afterwards reconciled to the church, and died at Shottesbrooke 7th June 1711, aged 70. His writings, which are very numerous, and which prove him to have been a man of indefatigable diligence and extensive learning, are on controversial, theological, and classical subjects. The best known of these are—annals of Thucydides and Xenophon,—de veteribus Græcorum, Romanorumque cyclis, obiterque de cyclo Judæorum,—ætatē Christi, dissertationes decem, cum tabulis necessariis 4to 1701, a most excellent book according to Dr. Halley,—an epistolary discourse proving from the scriptures and the first fathers that the soul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or reward, by its union with the divine baptismal spirit, wherein is proved that none have the power of giving this divine immortalizing spirit since the apostles, but the bishops, 1706, 8vo. a work which gave rise to a violent controversy, which was defended by the author in three different treatises against the attacks of Chishull, Norris, and Clarke, &c.—chronology of Dionysius Hali- carnassius—exercitationes duæ, &c.—Julii Vitalis epitaphium, &c.

DODWELL, Henry, eldest son of the preceding, was author of an anonymous pamphlet, "Christianity not founded on argument;" an artful work, in which he attempted to undermine and vilify religion. It was answered by his own brother, and by Leland, and Doddridge. He was brought up to the law, and was a zealous promoter of the society for the promotion of arts, manufactures, and commerce.—His next brother, William, D.D. of Trinity-college, Oxford, was archdeacon of Berks, prebendary of Sarum, and rector of Shottesbrooke. Besides an answer to his brother's pamphlet, he wrote a dissertation on Jephthah's vow—practical discourses, 2 vols.—an answer to Dr. Middleton's free inquiry—defence of the answer against Toll, 1751, &c.

DOES, Jacob van der, a Dutch painter, who died 1673, aged 50. As his temper was gloomy, it is supposed his pictures partake strongly of his feelings. His landscapes are very much admired. His pieces are generally in the stile of Bombaccio.

DOES, Jacob van der, son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam, and died 1659, aged 19, giving, by the few pieces which he finished, the most promising tokens of a great genius in the art of painting.

DOES, Simon van der, brother to the preceding, died 1717, aged 64. His landscapes, portraits, battles, &c. are in a pleasing stile.

DOGGET, Thomas, an author and actor, born in Castle-street, Dublin. He first appeared on the Irish stage, but afterwards came to England, and engaged himself in the Drury-lane and Lincoln's-inn-fields companies, where he was particularly applauded in the characters of Fondlewife, in the Old Bachelor, and Ben, in Love for Love. He was joint manager of Drury-lane with Wilks and Cibber; but gave up his concern, because Booth was forced upon him as fellow-manager in the house; and he retired in the meridian of his reputation, to the private enjoyment of a moderate fortune. He died highly respected, 22d September 1722. In his principles he was a whig, and so strongly attached to the house of Hanover that he left a waterman's coat and silver badge to be rowed for yearly, by six watermen, on the Thames, against the stream, from the Old Swan, London-bridge, to the White Swan, Chelsea, on the 1st of August, the anniversary of George I.'s accession to the throne. He wrote only one comedy, "the country wake," 1696, 4to. better known in its altered form of "Flora, or Hob in the well," a farce.

DOISSIN, Lewis, a Jesuit, who died 1753, aged 32. He displayed great powers in the composition of elegant Latin verse, in his two poems on the art of sculpture and the art of engraving, in which he celebrates, in an animated stile, the immortal labors of Praxiteles, Miron, &c.

DOLABELLA, P. Cornelius, son-in-law of Cicero, was the friend of Cæsar, and became governor of Syria. When besieged in Laodicea by Cassius, he killed himself, in his 27th year.

DOLBEN, John, descended from an ancient family in North Wales, was born at Stanwick, Northamptonshire, 1624, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, church, Oxford. During the civil wars, he bravely espoused the king's side, and was major in his army; but upon the triumph of the republicans, he returned to a collegiate life, and was turned out in 1648. At the restoration he became canon of Christ-church, archdeacon of London, dean of Westminster, and in 1666, bishop of Rochester, and in 1683 was translated to York, where he died 1686. He was an eloquent and admired preacher, and his sermons, delivered before Charles II. and on other occasions, possess merit.

DOLCE, Lewis, a native of Venice, who died there 1568, aged 60. He wrote several poems, and translated some ancient authors, Ovid, Seneca, Euripides, &c. in a style pure and elegant. He published Dialogo della pittura, intitolato l'aretino, Venice, 1557, 8vo. reprinted at Florence 1735—cinque primi canti del Sacripante, 1535, 8vo.—Primalone, 4to.—Achilles and Æneas, 1570, 4to.—poems in different collections, and the life of Charles V.

DOLCE, Carlo, a painter of Florence, who died 1686, aged 70. His St. John, though painted only in his 11th year, was much admired. His religious pieces are very highly finished.

DOLET, Stephen, a learned Frenchman, born at Orleans 1508. He was a printer and bookseller at Lyons, where he published some of his works for the reformation and improvement of the French language. He ventured, however, to give way to licentious and profane ideas in his writings, which drew upon him the vengeance of the inquisition, so that he was condemned to be burnt for atheism. He suffered the dreadful punishment on his birth-day, 3d August 1546. Though some attribute his sufferings to his attachment to Lutheranism, yet Beza and Calvin seem to place him in the number, not of martyrs, but of impious blasphemers.

DOLOMIEU, Deodat, commander of the order of Malta, member of the academy of sciences and of the institute at Paris, was made inspector of the mines. In the pursuit of knowledge he exposed himself to all the inclemencies of the air, the climate, and the seasons, and regarded neither expence nor difficulties for his favorite studies of nature. He was in Egypt with Bonaparte, and on his return was taken prisoner, and confined at Messina, from whence he was liberated by the kind interference of sir Joseph Banks. He died suddenly at Cree, near Macon, in 1802, as he was preparing a scientific excursion to the north, to examine the rocks and the natural curiosities of unexplored regions. He published a voyage to the isles of Lipari, 1781—memoir on the earthquake of Calabria in 1783—a mineralogical dictionary—a treatise on the origin of basalt—memoir on Ætna, &c.

DOMAT, John, a French lawyer, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, 1625. He studied the learned languages and belles lettres at Paris, and applied himself to the law at Bourges, where, though only 20 years old, he was offered, on account of his great proficiency, a doctor's hood. He became a pleader at Clermont, and, as advocate to the king, which he continued for thirty years, he was, for his integrity and extensive abilities, the arbiter of all the affairs of the province. In 1648 he married, and by that marriage had thirteen children. He applied himself to simplify the laws of the state, and to reduce them from confusion to order and regularity; and was so successful in his plan that Lewis XIV. granted him a pension of 2000 livres, and encouraged him in the prosecution. The first volume was published 1689, in 4to. called, "the civil laws in their natural order;" to which three volumes of equal size and value were afterwards added. Domat was the friend of Pascal, whom he assisted in some of his experiments on air, and in other branches of philosophy. He died at Paris 1696. A new edition of his works appeared in 1777, in folio.

DOMENICHINO, an Italian painter, born at Bologna 1581. He was the pupil of Calvert the Fleming, and afterwards of the Caraccis; but he was so slow in his progress that his fellow students called him "the ox." Annibal Caracci observed, upon this ridiculous appellation, that "this ox, by dint of labor, would in time make his ground so fruitful that painting itself would be fed by what it produced"—a prognostic of his future greatness, which was most truly fulfilled. He applied to his work with great study and zeal; and though he wanted genius, yet solidity and judgment, and a strong enthusiastic ardor, made him one of the greatest Italian masters. According to N. Poussin, his communion of St. Jerom and Raphael's transfiguration, were the two best pieces which ever adorned Rome. He also shone as an architect, and built the apostolical palace for Gregory XV. He was reserved, but mild in his manners; but his great merit raised him many enemies, who were jealous of his fame, and envious of his eminence. He died 1641, not without suspicion of poison.

DOMINIC, de Guzman, a Spaniard, born 1170, at Calahorra, in Arragon, known as the founder of the order of the predicants, and the establiher of the inquisition in Languedoc. Before he was born, his mother dreamed she had a dog vomiting fire in her womb; and the dream was fulfilled, when Dominic, followed by fire and sword and the army of Innocent III. preached to the Albigenes, and, with the offer of death or abjuration, converted above 100,000 souls. He was the first master of the sacred palace, an office which at his suggestion Honorius III. established. He died at Bologna 1221, and was afterwards canonized for his great services. The great men of the order were, Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, cardinal Cajetan, Dominicus Soto, Lewis of Granada, &c.; and it is said that the dominicans produced to the church no less than 3 popes, 48 cardinals, 23 patriarchs, 1500 bishops, 600 archbishops, 43 legates, and other inferior agents actively employed in the service of the Romish church.

DOMINICHINI, Lodovico, a native of Placentia, famous for his voluminous translations from ancient authors and other works, which are mentioned in Baretti's Italian library. He was poor, and died 1574.

DOMINIS, Mark Antony de, originally a Jesuit, afterwards bishop of Segni, and lastly archbishop of Spolato, in Dalmatia, in the 16th century. He was very unsettled in his religious notions, though so elevated in the church; and he wrote his famous book, called "de republicâ ecclesiasticâ," in which he assailed the papal power. This work was seen in MS. and corrected by the learned Bedell, who was chaplain to sir Henry Wotton, the ambassador of James I. to Venice, and by his means it was published in London. De Dominis accompanied his friend Bedell on his return to England, and was received with great respect by the English clergy. He was favored by the king, and made dean of Windfor; but, after preaching against the pope, and endeavouring to reconcile and reunite the Romish and English churches, he, with his usual wavering temper, expressed an inclination to return to Rome. He there abjured all his errors 1622, and was received into the pope's protection; but an expression against Bellarmine, who, as he said, had not refuted his arguments, in his answer to him, rendered him suspected to the catholics. He was seized and imprisoned, and died in confinement, in the castle of St. Angelo, 1645. It was afterwards discovered, that his writings and correspondence had been very hostile to the pope, and therefore, by order of the inquisition, his body was dug up, and together with his writings burnt in Flora's field. He wrote besides a treatise, de radiis visus et lucis, &c. in which he was the first who gave a rational explanation of the colors of the rainbow.

DOMITIAN, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor, after Titus son of Vespasian. From a very mild character at the beginning of his reign, he became licentious, debauched, cruel, and vindictive, and was at last assassinated 96, in his 45th year.

DOMITIANUS, Domitius, general of Dioclesian was proclaimed emperor in Egypt 288, and died a violent death two years after.

DONATO, Bernardino, Greek professor at Padua, and other Italian cities, died about 1550. He was the learned author of a Latin dialogue on the difference between Aristotle's and Plato's philosophy, and translated into Latin, besides some of Galen's, Aristotle's and Xenophon's works, the demonstratio evangelica of Eusebius, &c.

DONATO, an architect and sculptor of Florence. He was employed by Cosmo de Medicis, by Venice and other states. His Judith cutting off the head of Holofernes is his best piece. He died 1466, aged 83.

DONATO, Jerom, a Venetian nobleman, eminent for his learning, for his military services, and particularly for his negotiations. He was the successful ambassador in the reconciliation made between his country and pope Julius II. When asked by the pope why Venice claimed the sovereignty of the Adriatic, he answered, your holiness will find the concession, on the back of the record of Constantine's grant to pope Silvester of the city of Rome and of the ecclesiastical states—a bold answer on a donation about doubting which in former times 1478 persons had at Strasburg been sent to the flames. This great statesman died of a fever at Rome 1511, just before the pacification was signed.

DONATO, Alexander, a Jesuit of Sienna, who died at Rome 1640. He wrote a very valuable description of Rome 1639, 4to. called Roma vetus & recens, besides poems in 8vo. Cologne 1630, and other works.

DONATO, Marcellus, an Italian count, who held some important offices at Mantua, and died at the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote a learned work, scholia on the Latin writers of the Roman history 1607, 8vo. Frankfurt.

DONATUS, bishop of Carthage was banished 356. He maintained that the three persons of the trinity are of the same substance, yet unequal.

DONATUS, Ælius, a grammarian of the fourth century, preceptor of St. Jerome, and author of commentaries on Terence and Virgil.

DONATU, bishop of Numidia, founder of a sect after his own name 311, was deposed for supporting Majorinus as a candidate for the see of Carthage against Cecilianus.

DONCKER, Peter, a painter of Gouda, disciple to Jacques Jordaens. He studied at Rome, and died 1668. There was also another painter named John, of the same place, who died young.

DONDUS, or DE DONDIS, Janus, a physician of Padua, furnished Aggregator, from the number of medicines he had made. He was also well skilled in mechanics and in mathematics, and he invented a clock on a new construction, which pointed out not only the hours, but the festivals of the year, and the course of the sun and moon. He found out also the secret of making salt from the wells of Albano, and died 1350. He wrote Promptuarium medicinae Venice, fol. 1481.—de fontibus calidis Patavini agri, 1553, folio—the flux and reflux of the sea.

DONEAU, Hugh, Donellus of Chalons-sur-Soane, professor of law at Bourges and Orleans, was saved from the massacre of Bartholomew by the affection of his scholars, and escaped into Germany, and died at Altorf 1591, aged 64. He wrote commentaria de jure civili, five vols. fol. reprinted at Lucca 12 vols. fol. 1770.—Opera posthuma, 8vo.

DONI, Anthony Francis, a Florentine priest, who possessed great satirical powers, and died 1574, aged 61. His works are, letters in Italian 8vo.—la libreria 8vo.—la Zucca four parts with plates 8vo.—Imond, celesti, terrestri, &c.—Imarmi cive Ragionamenti, &c. 4to.

DONI D'ATTICHI, Lewis, a Florentine noble, whose modesty and learning recommended him to Richelieu, who made him bishop of Riez, and afterwards of Autun. He died 1664, aged 68. He wrote in French a history of the Minims, 4to. a society to which he belonged,—and in Latin the life of queen Joan 8vo.—of cardinal de Beralles 8vo.—and of the cardinals, two vols. fol. 1660.

DONI, John Baptiste, an Italian, who died in his native city of Florence 1647, aged 51. He was professor of eloquence, and member of the Florentine and del crusca academies, and invented a musical instrument called lyra barbarini. He wrote a well known treatise on music in Latin, and other tracts on the same subject in Italian.

DONNE, John, an English poet and divine, born in London 1573, and descended by his mother from sir Thomas More. At the age of 11 he went to Oxford, and after three years' residence he removed to Cambridge, and three years after to Lincoln's-inn. His friends were papists, but he refused to be shackled by their opinions and prejudices, and at the age of 19 he embraced the protestant faith. When 21 he began to travel, and accompanied the earl of Essex in 1596 and 97, against Cadiz and the Azores, and afterwards visited Spain and Italy, and formed the resolution of going as far as Jerusalem, which however he did not do. On his return to England he became secretary to Egerton keeper of the great seal, but his secret attachment and his marriage to the daughter of sir George More, chancellor of the garter, threatened for a time every possible misfortune to him.

him. The father was so irritated that he not only prevailed upon Egerton to dismiss the offender from his service, but he procured his imprisonment, and that of the two brothers, Brooke, the one the minister who had married him, and the other the friend who had given the lady away. He at last liberated himself and his friends from confinement, and was with difficulty reconciled to his father-in-law, who consented to make him a decent allowance. Though not replaced in the favor of Egerton, he applied himself diligently to the study of civil and canon law, and was much respected for his learning and abilities. About the year 1612, he accompanied sir Robert Drury to Paris, and about that time he displayed such ability in a treatise on the oaths of allegiance and supremacy then agitated, that king James highly favored him, and in compliance with his intimation and the request of his friends, he now applied himself to divinity and took orders. James made him his chaplain, and the university of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of D.D. At this time to his great grief his wife died on the birth of her 12th child. He was no sooner ordained than 14 livings in the country were offered to him, which he declined to reside in London, where he became Lincoln's-inn preacher, and two years after was appointed chaplain to lord Doncaster's embassy to Vienna. In 1621, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards he was presented to St. Dunstan in the west and another benefice. His eloquence as a preacher was great, but his enemies represented him as hostile to the king, and therefore he was obliged to vindicate himself before James who expressed himself much pleased with his conduct. He was in 1630 attacked by a fever which brought on a consumption. He preached at court the first Friday in lent, on the words "to God the Lord belong the issues from death," which was considered as his funeral sermon. He died 31st March 1631, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. Dr. Donne was in his character an amiable and benevolent as well as an ingenious and learned man, and lord Falkland said of him that he was "one of the most witty and most eloquent of our modern divines". To his Pseudomartyr he was indebted in some degree for his honors, but it is a book, as Warburton has observed, of little merit, agreeing merely with the opinions of the times, and applauded by James. He published also some poems consisting of songs, sonnets, epigrams, elegies, satires, &c. all printed in one vol. 12mo. 1719. In speaking of these, Dryden has given Donne the character of the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet of the nation. Pope has shown the highest respect to his memory by employing his pen to render his satires into modern numbers and all the graces of his own poetry. He wrote, besides paradoxes, essays, &c. three volumes of sermons, essays in divinity, letters to several persons, the ancient history of the septuagint, biathanatos, or on suicide, &c. His son John was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, he took the degree of LL.D. at Padua, and had the same at Oxford. He died 1662, and was buried in St. Paul's church Covent-garden. Wood represents him as an atheistical buffoon, but adds, that Charles II. valued him as a man of sense and parts. He wrote some frivolous trifles.

DONNE, Benjamin, a mathematician, born 1729, at Biddeford, Devonshire, where for some years he kept a school, and afterwards at Bristol. He was made master of mechanics to the king in 1796, and died two years after, respected as a very ingenious and benevolent character. He wrote mathematical essays in 8vo. treatises on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry, an epitome of natural experimental philosophy, and the British mariner's assistant, and in the first part of his life received 100l. from the society of arts and commerce for his able survey of his native county.

DOOLITTLE, Thomas, a nonconformist, born at Kidderminster 1630, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was for nine years minister of St. Alphage London, from which he was ejected in 1662. He afterwards kept an academy in Monkwell-street, Cripplegate, and officiated among the dissenters till his death, on the 24th May 1707, at the age of 77. He wrote several books of practical divinity. His treatise on the sacrament has been frequently printed, as also his call to delaying sinners. Memoirs of him are prefixed to his "body of divinity," published after his death. His son Samuel was for some time minister at Reading.

DOPPEL-MAIER, John Gabriel, author of some tracts on geography, dialling, astronomy, of the account of the mathematicians of Nuremburg, and of several translations from English mathematical works into Latin and German, died at Nuremburg, where he was professor of mathematics 1750, aged 83. Hewas fellow of the London royal society, and of the academies of Berlin and Petersburg.

DORBAY, Francis, a French architect, who furnished the design of several beautiful works at the Louvre Thuilleries, &c. He was born at Paris, and died there 1697.

DORFLING, a Prussian, who from the profession of a taylor became a soldier, and gradually rose to the highest military honors under Frederic William, elector of Brandenburg. He distinguished himself greatly against the Swedes, and when become field marshal, some envying his elevation observed, that he had still the appearance of a taylor. "Yes", says the valiant Dorfling, "I was once a taylor; I formerly cut out cloth, but now, (clapping his hand to the hilt of his sword,) here is the instrument with which I cut off the ears of them that speak ill of me."

DORIA, Andrew, a noble Genoese, born at Oneille 1468. He embraced the military profession, and signalized himself in Italy, and particularly in Corsica, which island he bravely reduced under the power of the republic. Distinguished as a warrior by land, his countrymen wished to employ his abilities by sea, and accordingly in 1513 he was named captain general of the galleys of Genoa, and soon enriched himself and his brave companions by successful attacks on the pirates of the Mediterranean. The revolutions of Genoa engaged Doria in the service of Francis I. of France, after whose defeat at Pavia, he became admiral to pope Clement VII. Upon the sack-ing of Rome by Bourbon 1527, Doria returned to the French service, and was honorably received by Francis, who granted him a pension and appointed him admiral of the seas of the Levant. His great talents were now employed in establishing the preponderance of the French power in Italy, and the emperor baffled, saw his fleets destroyed and his armies defeated by the genius of this intrepid republican. But when Naples, besieged by the French forces, was ready to submit. Doria changed the face of war. Long viewed with jealousy by the courtiers of Francis, he became suspected to the monarch, who ordered his person to be seized; but Doria's vigilance frustrated the designs of his enemies, and by throwing himself under the protection of the emperor he was received with open arms. Francis in vain, by every sacrifice, endeavoured to regain his confidence, and the emperor on the other hand wished to secure him even by making him the sovereign of Genoa, an office which Doria rejected with noble patriotism. Doria thus successful in preventing the capture of Naples, attacked Genoa, which had fallen under the French power, and though only with 13 galleys and 500 men, he in one night, 1528, made himself master of the place without bloodshed, and was hailed by the grateful Genoese by the endearing terms of father and deliverer of his country. A new and moderate government was established, and Doria, now owner of 22 galleys, and supported by brave and faithful associates, signalized himself in maritime affairs, took Coron and Patras from the Turks, and assisted Charles V. in the reduction of Tunis and Goullette. The expedition against Algiers in 1541, and the affair of Prevezzo undertaken against his advice, proved however very unfortunate, and it has been insinuated that Doria, when opposed to Barbarossa the commander of the Turkish forces, did not display his usual valor, but secretly wished to prolong a war which cemented his influence, and made him a necessary ally. He was loaded with honors for his eminent services by the emperor, and to the marquise of Turin in Naples, was added the dignity of grand chancellor of that kingdom. Engaged to the very last in the service of his country and of his ally, Doria died 25th November 1560, aged 93, poor indeed in fortune but honored by his country, and respected by the whole world. His life was twice attempted by assassins, but their conspiracy failed. Doria, though of a benevolent and humane temper, once yielded to a dishonorable resentment, and ordered de Fresco, a man who had conspired against him, to be sewn up in a sack and thrown into the sea.

DORIGNY, Michael, a French painter and engraver in aquafortis, born at St. Quentin 1617. He was professor of the academy of painting at Paris, and died 1665. His paintings are seen in the castle de Vincennes, and his engravings were of his own pieces.

DORIGNY, Nicholas, an eminent French engraver, whose finest pieces are the bark of Lanfranco, the St. Petronilla of Guerchino, the descent from the cross by Voleterra, the transfiguration after Raphael, &c. He was knighted by George I. and died at Paris 1746, aged 90. His brother Lewis, also a painter, died at Verona 1742, aged 48.

DORING or DORINK, Matthias, a German Franciscan professor, born at Kintz, where he died 1494. He is said to be the author of the abridgment of the historical mirror of de Beauvais continued to 1493. He inveighs with asperity against the vices of the cardinals and popes, and he may be considered as the forerunner of Luther.

DORISLAUS, Isaac, a Dutchman who came from Leyden to England, and by the interest of Fulk lord Brooke, read lectures on history at Cambridge. When expelled by Cofin the vice-chancellor, as suspected of republican principles, he became judge advocate in the royal army against the Scots, but with an unpardonable levity he quitted the king's service for that of the parliament, and assisted, it is said, in drawing up the articles of accusation against his sovereign. Thus recommended by guilt and profligacy to the ruling powers, he went in 1649, as ambassador from the republic to Holland, where he was attacked while at supper by some enthusiastic royalists and stabbed to the heart. His body, by the direction of the parliament, was brought over to England, and buried in Westminster-abbey, but removed at the restoration to St. Margaret's church-yard.

DORMANS, John de, bishop of Beauvais, a cardinal, and chancellor of France under Charles V. died 7th Nov. 1373. He was a liberal patron of letters, and founded the college which bears his name at Paris.

DORNAVIUS, Gaspar, a physician, born at Zigenrick, in Voightland, died very old, in 1631. He is author of some humorous and whimsical pieces,—amphitheatrum sapientiae Socraticae, two vols. folio.—homo diabolus 4to. &c.

DORSCH, Everard, a Dutch engraver on gems of superior abilities. He was born at Nuremberg, and died 1712, aged 63. His son Christopher was equally celebrated, and finished portraits on gems, without the assistance of drawings, with astonishing accuracy. He was also a painter. He died 1732, aged 56, at Nuremberg.

DOSITHEUS, the first heresiarch, a magician of Samaria, who pretended to be the true Messiah, and applied to himself all the prophecies concerning the Saviour. Among his 30 disciples he admitted a woman whom he called the moon. He privately retired to a cave where he starved himself to death that he might persuade his followers that he was ascended into heaven. His followers always staid 24 hours in the same posture in which they were when the sabbath began. They existed in Egypt till the sixth century.

DOUBLET, N an eminent French surgeon, who died at Paris 1795. He wrote some valuable pieces on his profession.

DOUCIN, Lewis, a French Jesuit of Vernon in Normandy. He wrote an history of Nestorianism,—a work against the Jansenists,—and other pieces, and died at Orleans 1726.

DOVE, Nathaniel an ingenious penman, author of "the progress of time," containing verses on the four seasons and the 12 months of the year, with 16 plates. He was clerk in the victualling office, Tower hill, and kept in 1740 an academy at Hoxton. He died 1754, aged 44.

DOUFFET, Gerard, a painter of Liege, born 16th August 1594. He was the pupil of Rubens, and distinguished himself by the accuracy, variety, correctness and sweetness of his pieces. He died about 1660.

DOUGADOS, Venance, a capuchin born near Carcassone 1764. The revolution opened to him a field for the display of intrigue and of ambition, but as the friend of the federalists he was dragged to the scaffold and suffered 1794. He wrote some poetical pieces which possess merit, and have been published at Nice.

DOUGLAS, Garwin, youngest son of the sixth earl of Angus, was born at Brechin in Scotland 1471, and educated at St. Andrew's. He perfected his education by travelling travelling in Italy and Germany, where he cultivated the muses, and merited the acquaintance and commendation of the learned. On his return to Scotland in 1496, he was made provost of St. Giles's church, Edinburgh, in 1515, bishop of Dunkeld to which the rich abbey of Aberbrothick was afterwards added. He was exposed to the virulent persecutions of the times, and came to London, where he died of the plague in April 1522. His chief works, which prove him to be an eminent scholar and poet, are a translation of Virgil's Æneid,—the palace of honor, a poem,—aureæ narrationes & comediæ sacræ,—de rebus Scoticis liber. As Chaucer in England, so he in Scotland is the great forerunner of the revival of learning.

DOUGLAS, William, a Scotch nobleman, commissioned by Robert Bruce, who had made a vow which he could not fulfil, to go on a crusade, to carry his heart to the holy land. Douglas set out after the king's death, 1327; but he perished by the way, with the illustrious Scots who followed in his train.

DOUGLAS, James, an English anatomist, and great practitioner in the obstetric art, in the beginning of the 18th century. He wrote bibliographiæ anatomici specimen, 8vo.—miographiæ comparatæ specimen, 1706—description of the peritonæum, London, 1730—a history of the lateral operation for the stone, 8vo.—and papers in the philosophical transactions. He patronized John Hunter; and died 1742. His brother John was surgeon in the Westminster-hospital.

DOUGLAS, sir Charles, a Scotsman, engaged in the Dutch navy, and afterwards in the English service during the American war. He commanded with reputation in the gulf of St. Laurence, and died 1789, a rear-admiral.

DOUGLAS, James, earl of Morton and Aberdeen, was born at Edinburgh 1707, and distinguished himself by his love of science and literature. He established, when 26, the philosophical society of Edinburgh, and was, in 1733, elected president of the London royal society. The academy of sciences at Paris paid respect to his virtues, by electing him an associate; and as the patron of merit, and an able astronomer, he deserved the good opinion of the learned world. He died 1768, leaving a son and daughter.

DOUGLAS, John, a learned prelate, born in 1721, at Pittenweem, in Fifeshire. From Dunbar school he removed, in 1736, to St. Mary-hall, Oxford, and two years after was elected to an exhibition in Baliol college. He took his first degree in 1741, and then went to Montreal and to Ghent, to acquire a competent knowledge of the French language. As chaplain of the 3d regiment of foot guards, he went in the expedition in Flanders, and was present at the battle of Fontenoy, in 1745. He afterwards attended lord Pulteney in his travels on the continent; and on his return to England, in 1749, he obtained from his patron the donative of Uppington, Shropshire, which he soon after exchanged for the vicarage of High Ercall, in the same county. By the interest of his friends, and by his own merits as an able and acute writer, he rose to higher honors in the church. He was made, in 1760, chaplain to the king; and in 1762 he obtained a canonry of Windfor, which he afterwards exchanged for the residentiaryship of St. Paul's, resigned by him in 1788 for the deanery of Windfor. He had, in 1764, exchanged his Shropshire livings for St. Austin's and St. Faith's, Watling-street; London; and in 1787 he was raised to the see of Carlisle, from which he was translated, in 1791, to Salisbury. His powers as a writer were strong, respectable, and multifarious. His first work was, the vindication of Milton from the charge of plagiarism, against Lauder, 1750—and he afterwards published, the criterion of miracles, 1754, a work of great merit, of which he prepared another edition in 1806—an apology for the clergy against the Hutchinsonians, &c.—the destruction of the French foretold by Ezekiel—several pamphlets against Archibald Bower—a defence of lord George Sackville—a letter to two great men on the approach of peace, &c. Besides these works, he assisted in the publication of lord Clarendon's diary and letters—of Cooke's voyages—of lord Hardwicke's miscellaneous papers, &c. and he also published several political papers in the public advertiser and in other periodical publications. He was, in 1786, elected one of the vice-presidents of the antiquarian society, and was also one of the trustees of the British museum; and after a life thus actively devoted to the cause of literature and religion, retaining his faculties to the last, he died of a gradual decay, without a struggle, 18th May 1807, aged 86, and was buried in St. George's chapel, Windfor. He was twice married; first in 1752, when he became a widower in the short space of three months; and secondly in 1765. By his last wife, daughter of Henry Brudenell Rooke esq. who died two years before him, he left one son and one daughter.

DOUSA, James, a noble Dutchman, born at Northwick 1545. After studying with great reputation at Paris, he returned to Holland, where he married early, and applied himself to political affairs. For twenty years he was curator of the banks and dykes of Holland, and distinguished himself so much at the siege of Leyden in 1574, that the prince of Orange made him governor of the town, and curator of the university founded there. He was most eminent as a scholar, and his genius was displayed in several poetical productions. He also wrote the annals of his country, besides critical notes on Horace, Sallust, Plautus, Catullus, Tibullus, &c. He was in his private character as amiable as he was respected in his public duties. He died 1604, and his memory was honored by the oration of Daniel Heinsius. He had four sons, James, George, Francis, and Theodorus. James was a very extraordinary genius, who attained maturity of wisdom and erudition in the flower of youth. Besides poems of great merit, he wrote at the age of 19, his book de rebus cœlestibus—and his panegyric on a shadow—critical notes on several Latin authors—and assisted his father in his annals. He was made preceptor to the prince of Orange, and librarian to the university of Leyden; but he unfortunately died 1597, in his 26th year, when his abilities promised the noblest additions to the greatness and learning of his country. George was a good linguist, and published an account of a voyage to Constantinople. Francis published Scaliger's epistles—annotations on the fragments of Lucilius, &c. Theodorus published Logotheta's chronicon, with notes, &c.

DOUVRE, Thomas de, a native of Bayeux, raised, for his learning and virtues, by William the conqueror, to the the see of York, where he rebuilt his cathedral. He composed some books on music, and was a great patron and benefactor to his clergy. After being archbishop for twenty-eight years, he died 1100.

DOUVRE, Thomas de, nephew to the foregoing, was also archbishop of York in 1108. He had violent quarrels with Anselm of Canterbury about the precedence of the two sees. He died 1114, greatly respected for his constancy, virtues, and faith.

DOUVRE, Isabella de, of the same family as the preceding, was mistress to Robert the bastard of Henry I. of England, by whom she had Richard, afterwards bishop of Bayeux, 1133. She retired in her old age to solitude and penitence at Bayeux, where she died 1166.

DOW, Gerard, pupil of Rembrandt, was born at Leyden 1613. His pieces which are all small, and to be viewed to advantage, only by the help of a magnifying-glass, possess astonishing expression, and are extremely delicate. He was patient in his labors, and was not less than three days in representing a broomstick, and five in painting a hand. He died in a good old age, but when is not ascertained.

DOWAL, William Mac, a learned Scotsman, born in 1590, and educated for seven years by Nisbet at Musselburgh, and afterwards at St. Andrew's. In 1614 he went to Groningen, where he studied civil law, and took his doctor's degree, in 1625. He was made advocate to the army of count Nassau, and in 1629 and 1635 came as ambassador to Charles I. to support the freedom of the seas about the herring-fisheries. He was made by Charles one of the council of state for Scotland, in which office he was continued by Charles II. with the additional title of ambassador to the United States. He died in London, but when not known, having had two wives, both Dutch women, the last of whom he buried 1652.

DOWNHAM, John, was born at Chester, son of the bishop of that see. He was educated at Cambridge, and is author of that pious and well known book, "the Christian warfare." He died in London 1644.

DOWNING, Calicut, an English divine, doctor of laws, and incumbent of Hackney, Middlesex, and Hickford, Bucks. He was disappointed in his views of higher preferment, upon which he embraced the republican party, and preached some violent sermons, asserting the lawfulness of subjects to take up arms against the king. In 1643 he was a grand covenanter, but died the next year. Some of his sermons have been printed. His son, Mr George, was secretary to the treasury, and commissioner of customs under Charles II.

DRABICIUS, Nicholas, an enthusiast, born 1587, at Stranitz, in Moravia. He became a minister in 1616 at Drakotutz; but the persecutions against the protestants obliged him to fly to Leidnitz, in Hungary, where he turned woollen draper for his subsistence. His improper conduct and frequent ebriety exposed him to the censures of his superiors; but in his 50th year he determined to distinguish himself as a prophet. His visions began in 1638, and though at first little regarded, yet they engaged the curiosity and acquired the respect of the vulgar, and, by denouncing destruction against the house of Austria and the papal power, he inspired with fear even the bravest of generals. He was assisted in his fanatical reveries by Comenius, a man of learning, but weak principles, with whom he published his revelations called

"lux in tenebris." Drabicius was persecuted by the house of Austria, for the ruin which he falsely prophesied against it, and what became of him is unknown. Some suppose that he was burnt as an impostor and false prophet, and others say that he died in Turkey, where he had taken refuge. Comenius published an abridgement of the reveries of Drabicius, Kotterus, and others, at Amsterdam, in 1660, and reprinted it under the title of lux e tenebris novis radiis aucta, &c. 1666.

DRACO, a celebrated Athenian, B.C. 643, whose laws were so severe that they were said to be written in blood.

DRACONITES, John, a Lutheran divine, born at Carlstadt, in Franconia. He was made a bishop in Prussia, and was the learned author of commentaries on the prophets and the gospels, and began a polyglott bible, but died before its completion, 1566.

DRAGUT RAIS, i.e. captain Ragut, the favorite and successor of Barbarossa, was born of obscure parents, in Natolia. In abilities no ways inferior to his master, he distinguished himself in the courts of Naples and Calabria; but being taken by Doria's nephew, he passed seven long years in captivity. In 1560 Doria was besieged in the harbor of the isle of Gerbes; but the artful pirate eluded the vigilance of his enemies, by conveying his galleys across the land, and took the capital of Sicily, to the astonishment of his opponents. In 1566 he assisted Solyman II. against Malta with fifteen galleys, and while reconnoitering, a piece of stone struck by a canon ball gave him so violent a blow on the ear that he died a short time after.

DRAKE, Sir Francis, an illustrious navigator, son of a sailor, and born at Tavistock in Devonshire 1545. He was brought up by his kinsman Sir John Hawkins, and at the age of 18 was purser to a Biscayan trader, and at 20 went to Guinea, and at 22 obtained the command of the Judith. He distinguished himself greatly in the gulph of Mexico under Sir John Hawkins, and projected expeditions against the Spaniards in America, which he executed with great firmness and success, in 1570, and 1572. He afterwards served in Ireland under Walter earl of Essex, and at his death he was recommended by Sir Christopher Hatton to queen Elizabeth, who entered into all his views of attack and discovery. On the 13th of Dec. 1577, he set out on his celebrated voyage, with five small ships, and only 164 able men. Of these ships two were destroyed on the coast of Brazil as unfit, and one returned home, so that only with his own vessel he entered the Straights of Magellan, and coasting along Chili and Peru, he enriched his companions by the plunder of the unsuspecting Spaniards. He sailed as high as the 48 degree north latitude with hope of finding a passage to the European seas, and gave the name of New Albion to the country. From thence he set sail the 29th Sept. 1579 for the Moluccas, and after visiting some savage islands, and enduring many hardships, he doubled the cape of Good Hope on the 15th of March 1580, having then only 57 men and three casks of water. He continued his voyage, and after watering in Guinea, he reached Plymouth on the third of Nov. after an absence of two years and ten months. The glory of sailing round the world, and the vast plunder obtained from the Spaniards, were however viewed with indignation by some who regarded Drake as a common pirate; but but the queen approved the bold expedition of her naval hero, and on the 4th of April 1581, she went on board his ship at Deptford and dined with him, and conferred on him the honor of knighthood. This ship also was preserved to commemorate the glory of the enterpriser, till decaying by time it was broken up and a chair made of the timber presented to the university of Oxford. In 1585 Drake took St. Jago, St. Domingo, Carthage, &c. in the West Indies, and in 1587, he attacked Cadiz and burned more than 10,000 tons of shipping, which he merrily called burning the Spanish king's beard. When the invincible armada approached England, Drake was made vice admiral under lord Howard, and in the encounter he behaved with great courage, though his eagerness to pursue the plunder proved nearly fatal, by his suffering his admiral to be exposed in the midst of the hostile fleet. Fortune however favored the English, and Drake enriched himself and his crew by the seizure of Pedro's galleon, which produced 55,000 ducats of gold. In 1589 Drake was sent to restore Antonio to the kingdom of Portugal, but without success; and he afterwards went to the West Indies where his quarrel with sir John Hawkins disconcerted the plans of the expedition which ended unsuccessfully. These unfortunate events preyed much upon the mind of Drake, he fell into a melancholy, and was carried off by a bloody flux on board his ship near the town of Nombre de Dios 28th January 1596. His death was universally lamented, for he was respected not only as a naval hero, but as a worthy private character. He was twice member of parliament for Boffiney, and afterwards for Plymouth, a town where his name is still revered for the water which he conveyed there in 1587 by a circuitous canal of 20 miles from springs at the distance of eight miles. His widow, daughter of sir George Sydenham, by whom he had no issue, married after his death William Courtenay esq. of Powderham castle.

Drake, James, a physician and political writer, born at Cambridge 1667, and educated there. In 1696 he took the degree of M.D. and became soon after fellow of the royal society and of the college of physicians, but he preferred writing for the booksellers to professional engagement. His "History of the last parliament of king William," 1702, was considered as so severe in his reflections on that monarch, that he was prosecuted by the attorney general, but acquitted. In 1704, upon the rejection of the bill to prevent occasional conformity, he ventured, with Poley member for Ipswich to publish the memorial of the church of England, &c. which highly offended Godolphin, and roused the vengeance of the house of commons, who offered a reward for the discovery of the author, who however, though suspected, remained unattacked. In 1706 he was prosecuted for the publication of Mercurius Politicus, a newspaper which severely reflected upon the conduct of government, and though acquitted through a flaw in the information, he took to heart the asperity of his persecutors, and falling into a fever he died at Westminster the second of March 1707. He wrote, besides the "Sham lawyer," a comedy,—an English translation of Herodotus, never published,—a "new system of anatomy," a work of great merit, published by Dr. Wag-staffe, and again in 1717, in two vols. 8vo. with an appendix 1728,—and notes to le Clerc's history of physics.

Drake, Samuel, fellow of St. John's college Cambridge, published in 1729, in folio, a splendid edition of archbishop Parker's "de antiquitate Britannicæ ecclesiæ, &c."

Drake, William, a physician, born 1687, at York, where he settled after taking his degrees at Christ-church, Oxford. In his old age he collected various records, and published a valuable history of York, with copper-plates, &c. fol. He was the friend of Mead, Fowkes, &c. and died greatly respected 1760 aged 73.

Drake, Roger, D.D. a physician, who afterwards became a popular preacher in London, and was one of the Savoy commissioners. He died after the restoration. He was learned, pious, and charitable, and wrote some sermons besides a sacred chronology.

Drakenberg, Christian Jacob, the well known centenary of the north, was born at Stravenger, Norway, 1624, and died at Aarrhuys in 1770, aged 146. After living in celibacy till his 113th year, he married a widow aged 60. His great old age brought about him many respectable visitors, who were pleased with his good sense, his humility, and the sound state of his faculties.

Drakenborch, Arnoldus, professor of history and eloquence at Utrecht, died 1748 aged 64. He is well known as the editor of Livy, 7 vols 4to. and Silius Italicus with very learned notes.

Dran, Henry Francis le, a famous surgeon and lithotomist, who died at Paris 1770, aged 85. He was author of observations on surgery two vols 12mo.—on gunshot wounds,—on the various modes of lithotomy,—on the operations of surgery, translated into English by Galtaker &c.

Draper, sir William, an English general, son of a collector of the customs at Bristol, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He embraced the military profession, and in the East Indies acquired the rank of colonel. In 1761 he was made brigadier in the expedition against Belleisle, and in 1763 he went with admiral Cornish against Manilla. The place was taken, but the ransom of four millions of dollars, which the governor pledged himself to pay, was resisted by the Spanish government, and the conquerors were thus robbed of their expected reward. Draper, however, was made in consequence of his services, knight of the bath, and on the reduction of his regiment, colonel of the 16th. In gratitude for his education he presented the colors of the conquered fort to King's college. In 1769 he engaged in the controversy with the celebrated Junius, in defence of the marquis of Granby, and his two letters were answered with great spirit and severity by his unknown antagonist, whom however he again attacked under the signature of Modestus. In Oct. 1769, he went to America for his health, where he married miss de Lancey daughter of the chief justice of New York. In 1779, he was made lieutenant governor of Minorca, and on the surrender of the place he exhibited 29 charges against the governor, Murray, 27 of which were deemed frivolous, and for the other two, the governor was reprimanded; after which the accuser was directed by the court to make an apology.

apology to his general, to which he acquiesced. He lived afterwards in retirement, and died at Bath 8th Jan. 1787.

DRAYTON, Michael, an English poet, born at Harshull, in Warwickshire, 1563. He was educated at Oxford, where however he took no degree, and devoted himself early to the cultivation of the muses. In 1593 he published the shepherd's garland, afterwards reprinted under the name of pastorals, and before 1598 he presented before the public his Barons' wars, England's heroic epistles, downfalls of Robert duke of Normandy, Matilda, and Gaveston. Thus distinguished as a favorite of the muses, he welcomed the arrival of James I. in a congratulatory poem, but he met with marked neglect instead of remuneration from the court. In 1613 he published the first part of his Poly-Olbion, a descriptive poem, which in its account of the rivers, mountains, productions, antiquities, and remarkable historical features, contains more correctness and truth of delineation than real and sublime poetry. The metre of 12 syllables is particularly offensive, and the poem is now regarded only for the accuracy of its narrative and of its description. In 1627 Drayton published a second volume of his poems, containing the battle of Agincourt, miseries of queen Margaret, court of fairies, quest of Cynthia, shepherds' lyrena, elegies, and a spirited satire against female affectation called mooncalf. In 1630 another volume appeared called the muses' elysium, etc. Drayton died 1631, and was buried among the poets in Westminster-abbey. Though called poet laureat, it is a complimentary appellation, as Ben Jonson was the laureat of this time. Drayton's works were published in 1748, in one vol. fol. and in 1753 in 10 vols. 8vo.

DREBEL, Cornelius, a Dutch philosopher, born at Alcmæer 1572, died in London 1634. As he pretended to be an alchymist some curious particulars are related with respect to his power to cause rain, cold, &c. by the operation of his machines. To his ingenuity some attribute the invention of the microscope and the thermometer, to which some add the telescope. Among other things he wrote de naturâ elementorum, 8vo. &c.

DRELINCOURT, Charles, a calvinist minister, born at Sedan, July 1595, and educated there and at Saumur. Though a protestant and a powerful enemy against the papists, yet he was universally esteemed and beloved by them there and at Saumur. His discourses as a preacher were very edifying, and his writings particularly consolatory, as interesting the soul in that inward devotion and sincerity of prayer which alone can prove acceptable to the God of purity. Many of his writings, 13 in number, were controversial. Besides these he published consolations against the fear of death, which have passed through more than 40 editions, and have been translated into various languages,—his charitable visits, in five vols. and three vols. of sermons, &c. all equally remarkable for the piety, devotion, and religious assertions with which they inspire the attentive reader. He died the third of Nov. 1669. He married in 1625, and by his wife had 16 children, the first seven of whom were sons, and the rest six sons and three daughters intermixed. The eldest son Lawrence was an able preacher, and his sermons and sonnets were greatly esteemed. He died 1681 aged 50. Henry the second son was minister, and published also some sermons. The third son Charles was born 1633 at Paris, and became M.D. at Montpellier, and was appointed physician to the king's forces in Flanders under Turenne. He was afterwards physician to William and Mary of England, and died at Leyden May 1697, leaving a son of his own name. He was not less esteemed as a private character than as a medical man, as he was humane, pious, benevolent, and learned. His treatises on his profession are highly esteemed. The fourth son of Drelincourt, Anthony, was a physician at Orbes in Switzerland; the fifth died at Geneva studying divinity; the sixth, Peter, died dean of Armagh; the other children died young, except a daughter, who married Malnoc, advocate of the parliament of Paris.

DRESERUS, Matthew, a German, born at Erfurt in Thuringia, 1536. He became professor of rhetoric and history at Erfurt, and afterwards at Jena, and in 1581 accepted the chair of polite learning at Leipsic. He engaged, though unwillingly, in the puerile disputes which in those days divided the attention of the learned between the disciples of Aristotle and of Ramus. He was learned and laborious, and by his influence the confession of Augsburgh, was received in the university of Leipsic. He died 1607. He had been twice married. His writings were chiefly on controversial subjects, and are no longer remembered.

DREVET, Peter, two famous engravers at Paris, who both died there 1739, the father aged 75 and the son 42. Their works are highly esteemed. Claude their relation possessed also merit in the same line.

DREUX DU RADIER, John Francis, an advocate, born at Chateaufort Thimerais 10th of May 1714. He abandoned the bar for the pursuits of literature, but he did not gain much reputation as a poet, as his verses were dull, incorrect, and prosaic. His prose writings are bibliothèque historique politique du Poitou, five vols. 12mo.—l'Europe illustrée,—tablettes, anecdotes des rois de France, three vols. 12mo.—histoires anecdotes des rois, &c. six vols. 12mo.—He died the first of March 1780. Though sarcastic in his writings he was a benevolent man in his character.

DREXELIUS, Jeremias, a Jesuit of Augsburgh, who died at Munich 1638 aged 57. His works were published at Antwerp two vols. fol. He has a curious poem on hell torments, in which he calculates how many souls can be contained in a narrow space in those dreadful regions.

DRIEDO, John, a learned divinity professor of Louvain, who died there 1535. His abilities were engaged in the opposition of the Lutheran Calvinists, and he published 4 vols. folio on theological subjects.

DRINKER, Edward, an American centenary, born Dec. 24th 1680 in a small cabin where the corner of Walnut and Second streets, Philadelphia, now stand. At the age of 12 he went to Boston as apprentice to a cabinet-maker, and in 1745 returned to Philadelphia, with his family, where he lived the rest of his life. He was four times married, and had 18 children, all by his first wife, and before his death he had a grandchild born to one of his grandchildren, being the fifth in succession from himself. He retained all his faculties to the last, though his eyesight failed him some time before his death. He lost all his teeth about 30 years before he died.

died. In his meals he was moderate, but he eat often and never took any supper, and he was never seen in a state of intoxication. His memory continued so perfect that he could relate the minutest events in his youth, and never repeated them twice to the same company. He had the unusual happiness of seeing a place of desolation, the lurking spot of wild beasts and birds of prey, converted to a handsome, populous, and flourishing city, and after living under seven sovereigns, and b. holding the great Penn establish his treaty with the Indians, and the congress sign their alliance with France, he hailed the day which made America a free independent republic. This venerable man, deservedly respected for his virtues in private life, died Nov. 17th 1782, aged 103.

DROLINGER, Charles Frederick, privy counsellor and librarian to the margrave of Baden Durlach, was admired as a poet and scholar. He died 1742, and his poetical works appeared the next year at Basil in 8vo. full of energy, elegance, and correctness.

Drou, N. a French advocate, distinguished for his eloquence as well as humanity. He defended with zeal and ability the cause of the poor as well as of the rich. He died June 1783 much respected.

DROUAI, Hubert, a painter, born at la Rouge, Normandy, died at Paris Feb. 9th 1767, aged 68. He was the pupil of his father, who was likewise a painter, and he enjoyed the sublimest of satisfactions of sharing with his parents and in the bosom of his family the applauses which were liberally bestowed on the exertions of his pencil. By his genius and industry he raised himself from an humble situation to fame and opulence. His son Germain John was a painter of promising abilities, and died at Rome 1790 aged 27.

DROUET, Stephen Francis, a laborious French writer, who edited Moreri and also Lenglet's Methode, &c. He died 1779, aged 54.

DRUMMOND, William, a Scotchman, son of sir John Drummond of Hawthornden, where he was born 1585. He was educated at Edinburgh, and in 1606 he passed over to France and studied civil law at Bourges. He however abandoned the profession of the law for the muses, and for the peaceful retirement of Hawthornden, which soon became disagreeable to him on the sudden death of a young lady to whom he was betrothed. In consequence of this he went to settle on the continent, and resided for eight years between Rome and Paris, and travelled over Germany, Italy, and France. He visited his country afterwards, but soon left it on account of the civil broils of the time. During his retirement he wrote the history of the five Jameses, which was published after his death. He also wrote other pieces which tended to pacify his countrymen, and rouse a spirit of loyalty through the nation. He was intimate with the learned men of the times, with Drayton, Jonson, the marquis of Montrose, &c. He married in 1644, and had three children, and died 1649. His works, consisting of poetry and prose, with his life prefixed, were printed in folio, Edinburgh 1711. His son William was knighted by Charles II.

DRUMMOND, Robert Hay, second son of the seventh earl of Kinnoul, by a daughter of Robert Harley lord Oxford, was born 16th Nov. 1711, at London, and educated at Westminster-school and Christ-church, where he was student. In 1736 he took orders, and the next year was made king's chaplain, and in 1743 was abroad with the king, before whom he preached after the battle of Dettingen. His abilities, and particularly the influence of his relations, ensured his promotion in the church, he became prebendary of Westminster, in 1748 bishop of St Asaph, in 1761 bishop of Salisbury, and soon after was translated to York. He published six occasional sermons, besides a sensible letter on theological study, which was edited in one vol. 8vo. 1803, with his life. He died in 1773 leaving only three of several children by his wife, daughter of Peter Auriol, a London merchant.

DRURY, Robert, was shipwrecked 1762, in the De-grave East indiaman, on the south side of Madagascar, where he remained in slavery 15 years. On his return he published, 1729, a very interesting account of that uncivilized country, which, though extraordinary, is considered as accurate, as it corresponded with the papers of Mr. Benbow who shared the calamity. Three only with Drury escaped the ferocity of the natives.

DRURY, Dru, a jeweller in the Strand, London, better known as fellow of the Linnæan society, and as a naturalist, and an indefatigable collector of curiosities. He died Jan. 1804, and after his death there were found in the neck of his bladder three large oval stones, more than two inches long, and one deep, nearly two ounces in weight. He wrote three volumes on insects. It is supposed that he was descended from Dru Drury a well known character in the reign of Elizabeth.

DRUSILLA, Livia, daughter of Germanicus, disgraced herself by her incestuous commerce with her brother Caligula. She died 38 A.D. aged 29.

DRUSIUS, John, a learned protestant, born at Oudenard 1555. He was educated at Ghent and Louvain, and upon his father's settlement in England came to Cambridge, where he learned Hebrew. His return to France was prevented by the Bartholomew massacre, and he went by invitation to Oxford, where he became professor of the oriental languages for four years, though only 22. He afterwards studied law at Louvain, and settled at Leyden as professor of oriental languages, where he married, and then removed in 1585, in consequence of the scantiness of his salary, to Franeker, where he filled the professor's chair with great credit till his death in 1616. He was very learned in Hebrew, and in the Jewish antiquities, and the text of the old testament, as his works fully evince. He had two daughters and one son. One of the daughters married Curiaander who wrote the life of his father-in-law. His son was so well skilled in the learned languages that he could write at 12 extempore in verse and prose, and at 17 he made a Latin speech to James I. which was much applauded. He died at the age of 21, of the stone. He left some learned works, so excellent that Scaliger declared that Drusius the son knew Hebrew better than his father.

DRUSUS, son of Germanicus, was put to death by Tiberius through the intrigues of Sejanus, A.D. 93.

DRUSUS, M. Livius, an ambitious Roman, murdered for his attempts to recommend and enforce the agrarian law, B.C. 190.

DRUSUS, Nero Claudius, brother of the emperor Tiberius, was honored with a triumph for his victories in Germany, and died B.C. 91, aged 30.

DRUSUS, son of Tiberius and Vipfania, was banished by the intrigues of Sejanus, whom in a fit of resentment he had struck, A.D. 23.

DRYANDER, John, a physician and mathematician of Wetteren in Hesse, lecturer at Marburg, where he died 20th Dec. 1560. His works are valuable on medicine and mathematics, and his discoveries in astronomy and his invention of mathematical instruments are important.

DRYDEN, John, an illustrious English poet, was born of a very respectable family at Aldwinkle near Oundle Northamptonshire, the 9th of Aug. 1631. He was educated at Westminster under Busby, and at Trinity college Cambridge. He early gave proof of superior poetical abilities, and even while at school translated the third satire of Persius, and wrote a poem on the death of lord Hastings. In 1658 he published heroic stanza on Cromwell, and in 1660, Astrea redux, on the restoration of Charles II. In 1662 he addressed a poem to chancellor Hyde, and published his satire on the Dutch. In 1666 appeared his Annus mirabilis, and in 1668, he was, on the death of Davenant, appointed poet laureat and historiographer to the king. He next wrote his essay on dramatic poetry, inscribed to the earl of Dorset, and in 1669, appeared his first play "The wild gallant," which was not well received, but ill success did not however discourage him, as in the space of 25 years he produced 27 plays. He was satirized and ridiculed, in 1671, under the character of Bays in the duke of Buckingham's comedy of the Rehearsal, an attack which he affected to despise, but which he fully repented by representing the duke as Zimri in his Abfalom and Achitophel. In 1679 he published with lord Mulgrave his essay on satire, but as it reflected on the character of the dukes of Portsmouth and lord Rochester, three men were hired soundly to cudgel him for his insolence, in Wills' coffee-house Covent-garden. In 1680 he was concerned in the translation of some of Ovid's epistles, and the next year he published his celebrated poem Abfalom and Achitophel, in which he satirized severely the rebels who espoused the cause of Monmouth against the king. The king appeared under the name of David, Monmouth of Abfalom, Shaftesbury of Achitophel, and Buckingham of Zimri. This poem was deservedly popular, and was translated into Latin verse by both Dr. Coward and the famous Atterbury, but the author never could be persuaded to finish the story, as he was unwilling to shew Abfalom unfortunate. A second part indeed was written by Tate to which Dryden contributed about 200 lines, but far inferior to the first. In 1681 appeared the Medal, a satire against sedition, in consequence of Shaftesbury's acquittal, and the next year Religio laici was published, and in 1683 the tragedy of the Duke of Guise, which proved so offensive to the whigs. The translation of Maimbourg's history of the league was published in 1684, and the next year Dryden changed his religion to please his patron James II. His conduct deservedly exposed him to the ridicule and satire of the wits of the times, and particularly T. Browne, Burnet and Stillingfleet, whose attacks he wished to repel by defending the Romish faith. His Hind and Panther was published in 1687, but while he represents the church of Rome under the former beast, and under the latter the church of England, he betrays weakness of argument, and a gross abuse of poetical talents, and his ridiculous allusions are well and humorously exposed in "the hind and panther transferred to the story of the country mouse and city mouse," by the united labors of Montague lord Halifax, and of Prior. The Britannia rediviva appeared in 1688, and on that year the poet, in consequence of his religion, was removed from the appointment of laureat, which was bestowed on Shadwell. Lord Dorset however behaved with great liberality, and while as chamberlain he dismissed the catholic poet, he allowed a pension out of his own pocket equivalent to the royal salary. The spleen of Dryden on this occasion was discharged with astonishing efficacy on his successor in the Mac Flecknoe, a satire, the severest that has appeared in any country or language. About this time he translated father Bouhours' life of Xavier, and in 1693, he published the Juvenal of Persius, assisted by some of his friends. In 1695 he translated in prose du Fresnoy's art of painting, and two years after his Virgil appeared, a work which has in various editions continued to command the public admiration, and which, as Pope observes, is notwithstanding some human errors the most noble and spirited translation in any language. In 1693 he published his fables ancient and modern from Homer, Ovid, Boccaccio, and Chaucer. Besides these numerous works he was engaged in the translation of some of Plutarch's lives and various other miscellanies. This great man died in consequence of the inflammation in his foot caused by the growing of his nail under the flesh, May the 1st, 1701, and he was interred in Westminster abbey where a monument was erected over his remains by John Sheffield duke of Buckingham. He had married lady Elizabeth Howard daughter of the earl of Berkshire, who survived him eight years, by whom he had three sons, Charles, John, and Henry. The eldest was usher of the palace to pope Clement II. and soon after his return to England was drowned in the Thames near Windsor 1704. He had written some pieces. John was the author of "the husband his own cuckold," a comedy printed 1696. Henry entered into a religious order. It is said in Wilson's memoirs of Congreve, that Dryden's remains were indecently insulted by Jefferies the dissipated son of the chancellor, who upon the pretence of paying greater honor to the deceased poet, stopped the funeral in the midst of the procession, and afterwards disdainfully left it to the care of an undertaker. Dryden's character as a prose writer is as well established as that of a poet. His dedications, essays, prefaces, &c. are very elegant and masterly productions, and display great powers of judgement, criticism, and erudition. His poems prove him one of the greatest poets of his country, and as Congreve says, no man has written in any language, so much and so various matter, and in so various manners, so well. His ode on St. Cecilia's day, and his fables, though composed in the latter part of life, show him in imagination and fire even greater than himself. For the correctness of his prose he owed himself indebted to the frequent reading of Tillotson's excellent writings. His dramatic works are perhaps the least valuable of his poetry, poetry, and he confesses himself to be not very fit for that sort of writing in which his predecessors had shone so superior to himself. The great fault and probably the only fault which criticism can observe in his works is the astonishing rapidity with which he composed, which consequently prevented correctness, and all the accuracy which must arise from frequent meditation, and impartial revision. If he had written but the tenth part of what he has published, his name would have stood high in the list of fame, and if he had applied himself only to one species of the various subjects on which he has treated, still he would have appeared a most respectable and eminent author entitled to preference and distinction. Dr. Johnson's critique on Dryden is well worth the most attentive perusal.

DUAREN, Francis, a French civilian, born at St. Brien in Bretagne 1509. He taught civil law at Bourges, where he died 1559. His works, which are chiefly on law, were published in his life time, Lyons 1554, and after his death a more complete edition appeared by his scholar Cifner 1579.

DUBOCAGE, Mary Anne le Page, a French lady, born at Rouen 1710. She early displayed her poetical powers by a spirited translation into French of Pope's temple of fame, and afterwards of Milton's paradise lost, and of the death of Abel. Her Amazons, a tragedy, was received with flattering applause in 1749, and soon after her Columbiad, an epic poem in 10 cantos on the discovery of America, proved her to be animated by the strongest fire of the muses. She published besides, her travels through England, Holland, and Italy, in the form of letters, and also the composition which obtained the first prize granted by the Rouen academy in 1746. She was member of the learned academies of Rome, Bologna, Padua, Lyons, Rouen, &c. and died August 1802. Her works were collected in three vols Lyons.

DUBOIS, William du, a French prelate, son of an apothecary at Limosin. Though originally but a valet in St. Michael's college at Paris, he rose to consequence by the influence of the regent Orleans to whom he was reader, and afterwards preceptor, and whom he ably supported in all his schemes of licentious pleasure, and of wild ambition. In 1693 he obtained the rich abbey of St. Just, and afterwards became counsellor of state, and in 1717, passed as ambassador to England to sign the triple alliance. He was next appointed minister and secretary of state, presented to the archbishopric of Cambray, in 1721 made a cardinal, and in 1722 raised to the dignity of prime minister. He died 1723, aged 67, leaving behind him the unamiable character of a mean intriguing politician, of an immoral priest, and a designing hypocrite.

DUBOIS, Dorothea, daughter of Annesley, afterwards earl of Anglesea, by Anne Sympson, married a musician, and endeavoured by her writings to reclaim her rights and privileges from her father, who had meanly denied his marriage with her mother, and disowned her as his child. She wrote the divorce, a musical entertainment,—and Theodora, a novel, two vols. 1770, in which she delineates her unfortunate history. She died at Dublin 1774.

DUBOIS, Simon, a painter of Antwerp, who came to England, where he met great encouragement. His battles, cattle, &c. were highly finished. He died 1708.

DUBOS, Charles Francis, a Frenchman, author of the life of Barillon bishop of Lucon. He continued the Lucon conferences in 17 vols. 12mo. and died 1724, dean of St. Lucon, aged 63.

DUBOS, John Baptist, abbot of Refons, died 1742, aged 72. He wrote critical reflections on poetry and painting, two vols. 12mo. critical history of the establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul, besides some political pieces, &c.

DUBOS, Jerome, a Dutch painter, whose representation of hell was finished with such effect that it struck astonishment and terror into the spectators. He lived in the beginning of the 16th century.

DUBOUCHER, Matthew, a native of Dax, who published some law tracts besides a poem on friendship, a drama, and an opera in three acts. He died 1801.

DUBRAU, or DUBRAVIUS SCALA, John, bishop of Olmutz in Moravia, was born at Piltzen in Bohemia, and died 1553. He was employed as ambassador in Silesia, and was the author of some learned works, especially a valuable history of Bohemia, in 33 books, edited 1575, and afterwards improved, Frankfurt 1688.

DUC, Fronton du, Fronto Ducæus, a Jesuit of Bourdeaux, well known as a learned critic and an excellent Greek scholar. He devoted his time to study, devotion, and abstinence. He is the editor of Chrysostom's work, six vols. fol. 1613,—three volumes of controversy,—of the histoire tragique de la pucelle d'Orleans, &c. He died of the stone at Paris 27th September 1624. A stone weighing five ounces was found in his bladder.

DUC, John le, a Dutch painter, born 1636, at the Hague, where he was director of the academy of painting. He was the disciple of Paul Potter, and equaled his master in execution.

DUCAREL, Andrew Coltee, a learned antiquarian, born at Greenwich 1714, and educated at Eton, and St. John's college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. He became member of Doctors' Commons 1743, and married 1749. In 1757 he was made Lambeth librarian under the primate Hutton, and he devoted himself with great care and assiduity in perfecting and improving the catalogues of that valuable collection. Of all his preferments that which pleased him most was his commissariate of St. Catharine's, of which peculiar he has given a very elaborate history, with beautiful engravings. He was so devoted to the pursuit of antiquities, that he generally travelled every year in company with his friend Samuel Gale esquire, with a Camden's Britannia and a set of maps, and by proceeding about 15 miles a day, enjoyed the opportunity of examining every place with leisure and accuracy. He was a very cheerful and hospitable man, and of his knowledge of antiquities the best specimen is his history of Croydon palace, and of Lambeth, besides the account of Doctors' Commons, which he did not live to complete. He died three days after his return from his visitation as official of Canterbury, at South Lambeth, aged 72, 29th May 1785.

DUCART, Isaac, a flower painter, born at Amsterdam. He painted generally on satin, and with extraordinary effect. He died 1697, aged 67.

DUCAS, Michael, a Greek historian, author of a history of the Grecian empire from Andronicus the elder to the fall of the empire. Though his language is harsh and inelegant, yet he relates with accuracy and impartiality. The work was printed at the Louvre, fol. 1649, and translated by Cousin into French 1672.

DUCHAL, James, a dissenting minister, born in Ireland 1697, and educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of D.D. After being 11 years minister of a dissenting congregation at Cambridge, on the removal of his friend Abernethy from Antrim, he succeeded him there, and at his death was chosen minister of the congregation in Wood-street, Dublin. He died 1761. In the decline of life he wrote above 700 sermons, out of which were selected the three vols. 8vo. published 1764. During his life he published a volume of sermons.

DUCHANGE, Gaspard, a French engraver, who died 6th January 1757, aged 97. After engaging on the engraving of Leda, Io, and Danae, without draperies, he executed the driving of the money changers, and the pharisee's supper. The palaces of France are adorned with the best of his pieces.

DUCHAT, Jacoble, a Frenchman, born at Metz 1658. He followed the profession of the bar till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and in 1701, he settled at Berlin, where he died, 1735. He was learned, and he is known rather as an editor than an author. He edited the Menippean satires, the works of Rabelais, &c. and contributed much to the completion of his friend Bayle's dictionary. A book called Ducatiana appeared at Amsterdam 1738, two vols. 12mo.

DUCHAT, Gaspard, a deputy in the French convention, celebrated for his able and manly defence of the unfortunate Lewis XVI. These honorable efforts in the cause of innocence were regarded by the tyrants with envy, and Duchatel falsely accused of holding a treasonable correspondence with the Vendean rebels, was guillotined November 1793.

DUCHATELET-D'HARAUCOURT, Lewis Marie Florent duc, a native of Saumur, who became colonel in the French army, and was one of the deputies in the national assembly. He was imprisoned for his attachment to his royal master on the 10th August, and fell on the scaffold November 1792, aged 66. He left memoirs of his mission as ambassador in England, lately published.

DUCHÉ DE VANCY, Joseph Francis, a French poet born at Paris 29th October 1668. He was patronised by madame Maintenon, and he engaged and ensured universal respect by the mildness of his manners, his inoffensive conduct, and his genuine wit, never directed against virtue or religion. He was member of the academy of inscriptions and belles letters, and died 14th December 1702, aged 37. He wrote three tragedies, Jonathan, Absalom, and Deborah, besides ballets and pieces for the opera, which had great merit, and were received with universal applause. His hymns, sacred canticles, and edifying stories, composed for the pupils at St. Cyr, possess great excellence.

Duck, Arthur, a civilian, born in Devonshire 1580, and educated at Exeter college, and Hart-hall, Oxford. He became fellow of All-souls, and took his degrees in law, and, after travelling through France, Italy, and Germany, he was made chancellor of Bath and Wells, afterwards of London, and then master of the requests. He suffered much during the civil wars for his attachment to the royal family, and died in his retirement at Chifwick 1649. He wrote vita Henrici Chichele, &c.—& de usu et autoritate juris civilis Romanorum in dominis principum Christianorum, an useful book, often reprinted.

Duck, Stephen, a poet, of extraordinary fortune, who from a thresher became the respectable minister of a parish. Though little blessed with education, he was naturally endowed with a strong mind and persevering temper; and at the age of 24 he began to apply himself laboriously to the acquisition of knowledge, and devoted to retired study those few hours which he could spare from the active and menial occupation of a servant. By little and little he purchased a few and necessary books, and, with a scanty library, and great application, he became something of a poet and of a philosopher. The lines of Milton enriched his imagination, and the correctness of Addison's Spectators improved his understanding, and helped him in the regular disposition of his thoughts. By degrees his poetical attempts became respectable; and, by being reported in his neighbourhood, were made known to some of the clergy, and at last to queen Caroline, who, pleased with him, settled a pension of £30 upon him, and thus enabled him not only to live independently, but to take orders; after which he was presented to the living of Byfleet, Surrey. In this new office he behaved with great propriety; he was followed as a preacher, and respected as a man; but his spirits sunk into a dreadful melancholy, and, in an unfortunate moment, robbed of his reason, he threw himself from a bridge, near Reading, into the Thames, and was drowned, May or June 1756. His poems have been published; and though he was not a first-rate poet, yet he possessed merit, and deserved the censure of the cynical Swift.

DUCLOS, Charles Dineau, historiographer of France, and secretary to the French academy, was born at Dinant, in Bretagne, 1705, and educated at Paris. In 1744 he was mayor of Dinant, and in 1755 received a patent of nobility, and died 26th March 1772, respected and beloved. Though considered as one of the philosophers of France, he proved by his conduct, writings, and conversation, that he was moderate in his opinions and the friend of morality and virtue. He never published any thing as historiographer, and observed, that he never would ruin himself by speaking truth, nor debase himself by flattery. His history of Lewis XV. was, after his death, lodged in the hands of the minister. His works are, romances, ingenious and interesting—the confessions of count —the baroness de Luz—history of Lewis XI. 3 vols. 12mo.—memoirs on the manners of the 18th century—Acajou, &c. Though he took Tacitus for his model, he resembles him little in his delineation of characters, and the interest of his narrative. He was also engaged in the dictionary of the academy, and in the continuation of the history of that society.

Duclos, Mary Ann, a French actress, of great merit, born at Paris. She excelled chiefly in the representation of queens and princesses, and for many years engaged the public applause. Her maiden name was Chateaufneuf; that of Duclos was assumed; and she married, in 1730, Duchemin, an actor, from whom she was divorced three years after. She died at Paris 1748, aged 78.

DUCREUX, N. a native of Paris, eminent as a painter. He

He was at Vienna to take portraits of the imperial family. He died at Paris, of an apoplexy, 1802, aged 64.

DUCROISY, Philibert Gassaud, a French actor, intimate with Moliere. It was for him that the poet wrote the excellent character of his Tartuffe.

DUDEFFANT, N. a French lady, well known in Paris for her knowledge of criticism, her elegant taste, and her pleasing and agreeable manners. She was acquainted with all the learned men of the times, who frequented her house. She died 1780, aged 84, the last thirty of which she had been blind.

DUDITH, Andrew, a divine, born at Buda, in Hungary, 6th February 1533, and employed by Ferdinand II. in affairs of importance, and rewarded with the bishopric of Tina, in Dalmatia. He was a man of great learning, and of such application that he is said to have transcribed three times the works of Cicero, to make himself perfect master of his stile and manner. He was deputy at the council of Trent, where he became intimate with cardinal Pole; and at his return he embraced the protestant religion, resigned his bishopric, and married one of the queen's maids of honor, by whom he had a son, who gave him great trouble. After her death he married a second time, and died 23d February 1589. His works on physic, controversy, and poetry, are numerous, and possess merit. He was a man of great mildness, benevolence, and regularity.

DUDLEY, Edmund, a celebrated lawyer and statesman, born in 1462, of a respectable family. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Gray's inn; and he became so respectable for his knowledge of law, and for his general information, that Henry VII. admitted him of the privy council, and made him one of his favorites. In 1494 he married Elizabeth Grey, daughter of viscount l'Isle. In 1504 he was speaker of the house of commons, and two years after he obtained the stewardship of the rape of Hastings. His services to his master were numerous; and it is said that Henry, to fill his coffers, used this artful favorite, who, little regardless of conscience or of reputation, joined with Empson to oppress and harass the people, and by various methods of influence, intrigue, or terror, extorted great fines and ransoms, so that, according to Bacon, they turned law and justice to wormwood and rapine. This conduct, however, did not pass unpunished. Henry was scarce in his grave before the public indignation called for the punishment of his wicked and corrupt ministers; and Empson and Dudley were both yielded up by Henry VIII. and after being attainted and convicted of high treason, they lost their heads on Tower-hill, 18th August 1510. During his imprisonment in the Tower, Dudley wrote "the tree of the commonwealth, by Edmund Dudley esq. late counsellor to Henry VII. the same Edmund being at the compiling thereof prisoner in the Tower, 1 Henry VIII." It is still in manuscript.

DUDLEY, John, son of the above, baron Malpas, viscount l'Isle, earl of Warwick, and duke of Northumberland, was born in 1502. He was restored in blood from the ignominious attainder of his father, and soon became known at court, as the friend of Suffolk, of Wolsey, and of Cromwell, and as the favorite of the king. Henry, pleased with the versatility of his talents, created him viscount l'Isle, and knight of the garter, and afterwards, for his many services and his great courage, appointed him high admiral for life. He also received important grants of church lands, and was nominated one of the sixteen executors of the king's will. On the death of Henry, Dudley was succeeded as high admiral by sir Thomas Seymour, brother to Somerset the protector; but, as an equivalent for his loss of dignity, he was created earl of Warwick, and chamberlain of England. His military abilities were now employed against the insurgents of Norfolk, and, by a well managed negotiation, instead of fighting them, he prevailed upon them to lay down their arms, and to deliver up their leaders. His influence in the cabinet was now so great, that the young king confided much to his advice and authority; he was made duke of Northumberland; and a short-lived reconciliation was effected between him and the duke of Somerset, by the marriage of his eldest son with the latter's daughter. Rivalship, however, could never be extinguished. Somerset, though uncle to the king, was tried, condemned and executed for a pretended conspiracy against Northumberland. The victorious but guilty favorite now succeeded to all the honors of his fallen enemy, he became chancellor of Cambridge, and not only guided the young king, but in consequence of his weak state of health determined to raise his own family to the sovereign power. He with precipitation effected a marriage between his fourth son lord Guildford Dudley, and lady Jane Gray, eldest daughter of the duchess of Suffolk, in whose favor he caused the yielding Edward to settle the succession. No sooner had Edward expired than Jane was conveyed to the tower by her ambitious father-in-law, and on the 10th of July proclaimed queen. Submission to these measures was demanded from Mary, and when the men of Suffolk rose up in her favor, Northumberland advanced with a body of troops to check the insurgents. He soon found however the unpopularity of his measures, when he reached St. Edmundsbury, no supplies arrived to support his plans, and he retired to Cambridge, where seeing his followers deserting his standard, he affected attachment to Mary, and caused her to be proclaimed queen, and threw up his cap into the air, in sign of joy. Mary pleased with her success did not relent towards her enemy, Northumberland was arraigned and condemned, and he lost his head on Tower-hill, after making a profession of the Romish religion 22d Aug. 1553. Thus fell this powerful subject, whose many virtues were lost by a restless and at last fatal ambition, which swept away not only him but the innocent lady Jane and her virtuous consort. Northumberland had eight sons and five daughters, some of whom died before him.

DUDLEY, Ambrose, son of the preceding, was born 1530. He was knighted for his bravery against the Norfolk insurgents, and shared the condemnation of his unfortunate father, but was pardoned by the queen 1544. In 1557, he distinguished himself with his two brothers Robert and Henry, at the siege of St. Quintin, and for his gallant services was restored in blood by the kindness of Mary, and was afterwards under Elizabeth created baron l'Isle and earl Warwick. His services to the country were great, and to his honor it is mentioned that he had no share in the intrigues and disgraceful measures of the times, times, and therefore was deservedly called "the good earl of Warwick." He died in consequence of the amputation of his leg from a wound received in his valiant defence of Newhaven against the French, Feb. 1589. Though three times married, he left no issue.

DUDLEY, Robert, baron Denbigh, earl of Leicester, son of John duke of Northumberland, and brother of Ambrose earl of Warwick, was born 1532. He became a favorite at the court of Edward, and was knighted, and in 1550, he married Amy daughter of sir John Robsart. Under Mary he fell into the same disgrace as his father, and he was condemned, but by the queen's favor pardoned in 1554, and afterwards restored in blood. On the accession of Elizabeth he became a great favorite, and was made knight of the garter, master of the horse, and a privy counsellor, and so much honored by the queen and flattered by the people, that he was called "the heart of the court." Though opposed in some of his measures by the earl of Suffex, he yet shared the queen's favor, and obtained the grant of whatever lands and offices he pleased, to gratify his pride, or the avarice of his friends. Elizabeth, to show how much she esteemed him, proposed him in marriage to Mary queen of Scots, with the intention of admitting him to share her bed, if that unfortunate princess listened to the proposal. Mary however rejected this offer from Dudley, who it is said on the 8th of September 1560 had caused his ill-fated wife to be strangled and thrown down a pair of stairs at Cumnor near Abingdon, that she might not stand in the way of his criminal ambition. In 1564 he was created earl of Leicester with unusual solemnity, and to the honors of chancellor of Oxford and high steward of Cambridge, was added the order of St Michael from the king of France. About 1572 he privately married lady Douglas Sheffield, but though he had by her a son whom he called his base son, and a daughter, he never acknowledged her as his wife, and when he espoused lady Essex, he, after attempting in vain to pacify her, and to silence her pretensions to his hand and heart, endeavoured to cut her off by poison, from which she however escaped, with the loss of her hair and nails. When on her progress, Elizabeth and her suite were sumptuously entertained for 17 days at Kenilworth castle, Warwickshire, a mansion which the earl had obtained from the favor of his mistress, and had embellished at the expence of 60,000*l*. Though Leicester stood so high in the graces of the queen, there were not wanting attempts to destroy his influence and consequence. Elizabeth was highly displeased with his union with lady Essex, of which she had been for some time kept ignorant, and in 1584 a virulent attack was made on the favorite by a work called "Leicester's commonwealth," which exhibited him in the odious character of an atheist, a traitor, a public oppressor, and a monster of ambition, cruelty, and lust. This famous book, considered as so hostile to overgrown ministers, and afterwards republished to bring into disgrace the government of Charles I. and Anne, was read with avidity by the people; but Elizabeth screened her favorite with the shield of her never-ceasing partiality and esteem. In 1585 he went to the Low Countries as governor, at the request of the distracted inhabitants, but his conduct was displeasing to the queen, and he was recalled, and though criminated by his enemies for violence and maladministration, he was reinstated in the royal favor. In 1588 he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury to oppose the Spanish armada, and he there received high and flattering commendation from the queen. He died Sept. 4th, 1588, at Cornbury, Oxfordshire, and was buried with great magnificence at Warwick. This ambitious favorite was endowed with great talents; the influence which he possessed over the queen he maintained by his intrigues and duplicity. He affected regularity and piety to an offensive degree, but when his views were thwarted, neither virtue nor innocence could resist the secrecy of his measures, or the perseverance of his guilt. Poisoning was the favorite recipe to which he had recourse to remove his enemies or rivals. He left the greater part of his estates to his base son Robert.

DUDLEY, Robert, son of the earl of Leicester by lady Douglas Sheffield, was born at Sheen in Surrey 1573. His birth was carefully concealed from the knowledge of queen Elizabeth, as well as of lady Essex, to whom the earl was either betrothed or married. He was sent to school at Osfingham in Suffex, and removed to Christchurch, Oxford, where he became known for his many mental and personal accomplishments. Though he inherited the better part of his father's estate, after the death of his uncle Ambrose, yet dissatisfied with a life of indolence, he projected a voyage to the South seas, which however the government would not suffer to proceed, till Nov. 1594. His first wife was the sister of the famous Thomas Cavendish, and for his second he took Alice daughter of sir Thomas Leigh. In 1605, he commenced a suit to prove the legitimacy of his birth, but in this he was opposed by the lady dowager of Essex, who threatened to prosecute him for a conspiracy. Upon this he retired to the continent, where he assumed the title of the earl of Warwick, for which he was summoned back to England, and on his refusal his property was forfeited to the crown during his life. He settled at Florence, where he was patronised by the duke Cosmo II. and by the influence of his consort, sister to the emperor Ferdinand II. he was created a duke of the Roman empire, and ten years after he was enrolled by pope Urban VIII. among the Roman nobility. These high honors were deserved by the services which he performed for his patrons. He formed the plan for draining the extensive morasses between Pisa and the sea, and by his wise regulations he raised Leghorn from an insignificant town, to a respectable and populous sea port. He lived in great magnificence, and to his titles assumed that of duke of Northumberland. He died at his castle of Carbello, three miles from Florence, Sept. 1659. In philosophy, chemistry, and physics, he was as eminent as in politics. The account of his voyage is published in Hackluyt's collection, and his principal work besides, is "del arcano del mare," &c. Florence 1630, 1646. It is very valuable for its charts and plans, and for projects there offered for the improvement of commerce and navigation. He also wrote a proposition to bridle the impertinence of parliaments, &c. which was submitted to James, and which was intended to pave the recall of the intriguing author to England; but instead of being approved it drew upon him the censure of politicians, and was made a charge of indirect accusation against James and his unfortunate son. Though he left his wife lady Alice and four daughters in England, yet he afterwards, by a dispensation from the pope, married Elizabeth, daughter of sir Robert Southwell, a young lady who had accompanied him in his exile in the habit of a page, and who atoned for the follies and the immodest conduct of her youth, by the exemplary deportment of a respectable matron. By her he had a son, Charles, who called himself earl of Warwick, and four daughters.

DUFFET, Thomas, from the profession of a milliner, rose to the rank of a dramatic writer. He travestied Dryden, Shadwell, and Settle, but his plays, which for a while commanded the public attention, have long since been forgotten. His Mock tempest, Psyche, Emperors of Morocco, are mentioned, but they lived for a day. He flourished in the 17th century, but the time of his death is not mentioned.

DUFRESNE, Abraham Alexis Quinault, a French actor of eminence. The noblest characters of the theatre were exhibited by him with great success, but it is remarkable that in private life, he could scarce forget the authority which he exercised as a theatrical monarch. He died 1767 aged 72.

DUFRESNOY Charles Alphonse, a native of Paris, who acquired some eminence as a painter, and as a poet. He died of a paralytic stroke 1665, aged 54.

DUFRESNY, Charles Riviere, a native of Paris, called grandson of Henry IV. from his great resemblance to that monarch. He was employed about the court, in laying out the garden and pleasure grounds, and when dismissed he became a dramatic writer. His works were published in 6 vols. 12mo. He died very poor 1724, aged 86.

DUGARD, William, son of a clergyman, was born at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, 1606, and educated at Worcester school, and Sydney college, Cambridge. About 1631 he was appointed master of Stamford school, and in 1637 master of Colchester school, and 1644 master of merchant-tailors', London. He was displaced for assisting in the printing of Salmasius's defence, and was imprisoned in Newgate, and his wife and children reduced to poverty, 1650. Upon his release he opened a private school, the same year, and the following September was reinstated at merchant-tailors'. In 1662 however he was ejected for the violation of some of the rules, and opened a school in Coleman-street, where he had 193 scholars. He was a man of great learning, and much and deservedly esteemed as a teacher. He died 1682. His "Lexicon Græci Testamenti" has been improved and edited by Bowyer. He wrote besides a compendium of rhetoric, a Greek grammar, a selection of Lucian's dialogues, &c.

DUGDALE, sic William, an eminent historian and antiquary, born at Shustoke near Colehill, Warwickshire, 12th Sept. 1605. He was educated at Coventry grammar-school, and instructed by his father in civil law and history. In 1623 he married at his father's request, and two years after settled at Blythe-hall near Colehill, on an estate which he purchased. He devoted himself deeply to the study of antiquities, and in 1638 he came to London, and by the influence of his friends Hatton and Spelman he procured an appointment in the Herald's office. In this favorite retreat he had the means of improving his collections, and by the encouragement of sir Christopher Hatton he was employed in taking draughts of the most celebrated of the English cathedrals, which were afterwards deposited in the library of his friends. He was with Charles at the battle of Edge-hill, and at the siege of Oxford, where he was in 1642, made M.A. Upon the reduction of Oxford he returned to London, and after compounding for his estate he applied himself laboriously with his friend Dodsworth in completing their collection from the records of the Tower, and other places. Of his Monasticon Anglicanum the first volume appeared in folio 1655, the second 1661, and the third 1673, a curious collection of all the foundation charters of the dissolved monasteries. His antiquities of Warwickshire were published in 1656, after the laborious researches of 20 years, of which valuable compilation a second edition appeared in 1730 by Dr. Thomas. His history of Saint Paul's cathedral was published in 1658, and it was afterwards greatly improved and edited by Dr. Maynard. At the restoration, he was made norroy king at arms, and in 1677 created garter, and knighted by the king. He died at Blythe-hall, of a cold, 10th Feb. 1686, in his 81st year, and was buried in Shustoke church, where he had erected a tablet of white marble. With his wife, who died 18th Dec. 1681, aged 75, he lived 59 years, and by her he had several children. One of his daughters married Ashmole of antiquarian memory, his sons all died young except John, who was Windfor herald, and norroy king at arms, and was knighted, and died Aug. 31st, 1690. Besides the works already mentioned, sir William wrote the history of draining and embanking fens and marshes, &c. republished 1772, — Spelman's councils from 1066, to 1531, — Spelman's glossarium archæologicum, &c. — origines juridicales, &c. — the baronage of England three vols. fol. which, though the labor of 30 years, is not without inaccuracies, — a short view of the late troubles in England, &c. — the antient usage of bearing arms, &c. — a perfect copy of the summons of nobility to the great councils, &c. Many of his manuscript collections, to the number of 43 vols. in folio, he gave to the university of Oxford, where they are now preserved, besides several books to the Herald's office, London.

DUGOMIER, N. a French general. born at Martinico. In the revolution war he was appointed commander in Italy, and was afterwards successful in retaking Toulon from the English. He next was employed against the Spaniards, and deserted them in various encounters; but he was killed 17th Nov. 1794, at the battle of St. Sebastian. His name was inscribed in the Pantheon.

DUGUAY-TROUVIN, René, a celebrated French admiral, born at St. Maloes, 10th June 1673. He early distinguished himself by his intrepidity and perseverance, and in various encounters with the English and the Dutch, he came off victorious. In 1711 he took Rio Janeiro from the Portuguese, and every where in the Indies, and also in the Mediterranean against the corsairs, he displayed the greatest skill united with the most consummate wisdom. This brave man, honored by the king, and respected by the nation, died at Paris 27th Sep. 1736. His memoirs appeared at Paris, in 4to. by de la Garde.

DUGUET, James Joseph, a French writer, born 1649. He was a priest of the oratory, and went to Brussels to his friend Arnauld, but returned to Paris, where he led a very retired life, and died 1733. He was a man of great learning, and uncommon sweetness of manners, but his firm opposition to the bull unigenitus, exposed him to much obloquy and trouble. He wrote nearly 20 works in French, on theological subjects, in a stile clear, pleasing, and perspicuous.

DUHALDE, John Baptist, a French Jesuit, born at Paris. His historical and geographical description of the empire of China, and Chinese Tartary, in 4 vols. fol. was compiled from the records of French missionaries, a work of great merit. He wrote besides Latin poems—essays—letters—&c. and died at Paris, 1743, aged 60.

DUHAMEL, John Baptist, a French ecclesiastic, born at Vire, 1624, and eminent as a philosopher and a man of science. He published astronomiâ physica—de meteoris & fossilibus—de mente humanâ—de corpore animato—de consensu veteris & novæ philosophiæ— and other learned works, and died 6th August 1706, aged 82.

DUHAMEL DU MONCEAU, Henry Lewis, a learned Frenchman, who devoted himself to the improvement of agriculture and commerce, of the marine, and of mechanical arts. He published various ingenious works, and died universally respected for his abilities and patriotic exertions, 23d Aug. 1782, aged 82.

DUMAN, Lawrence, a professor of philosophy for 38 years at the college du Pleffis. He died canon of Verdun 1730, aged 70. He left a book “philosophus in utramque partem,” of great use in scholastic subtilties.

DULLIUS, Nepos, the first Roman, who obtained a naval victory over Carthage. A column was erected to his honor, B. C. 260.

DUISBURG, Peter de, a native of Duisburg, in the duchy of Cleves, in the 16th century, author of a chronicle of Prussia from 1226 to 1325. It contains many valuable particulars.

DUJARDIN, Charles, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam. He died at Venice 1674, aged 34. He was the able disciple of Bergham, and excelled in the delineation of markets, robbers, mountebanks, and landscapes. His productions are greatly esteemed. About 50 of his engravings in aqua fortis are preserved.

DUKE, Richard, a poet, educated at Westminster and made fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees of M. A. 1683. He was the friend of Otway, and of the poetical wits of the times, and was for some time tutor to the duke of Richmond. His poetry is not very respectable. He wrote a poem on the marriage of Anne and the duke of Denmark. He was made chaplain to the king, prebendary of Gloucester, and obtained the rich living of Witney, Oxfordshire, where he was found dead in his bed; after returning the preceding evening from an entertainment, 10th Feb. 1711. He published a volume of sermons and another of poems.

DULAU, John Marie, a native of Perigueux, who became archbishop of Arles, and was in the states general of 1789. Though he did not venture, through timidity, to speak in favor of moderation, yet he wrote with spirit and ability against the banishment of the priests. He was arrested by the suspicious jacobins, and was one of those wretched victims sacrificed in the prison of the Carmes in Sept. 1792.

DULAURENT, N. a native of Artois, who employed his great abilities on subjects of licentiousness. The best known of his immoral works, is his Compere Matthieu, 3 vols. This worthless ecclesiastic, who proved so great an enemy to religion and morality, died about the end of the last century.

DULLART, Herman, a painter and poet of Rotterdam, the disciple of Rembrandt. He was of a weak constitution, and refused to become one of the magistrates of Rotterdam. He so successfully imitated his master, that their pieces are frequently mistaken one for the other. He was well skilled in music. He died 1684, aged 48.

DUMAS, Lewis, a native of Nîmes, natural son of Montcalm, lord of Candiac. Though bred to the law, he was eminent as a mathematician, and invented the bureau typographique, to teach children reading and writing mechanically, and also another instrument for musical instruction. He wrote an history of Mary queen of Scots, and died 1744, aged 68.

DUMÈRE, Joan, a learned lady, born at Paris. She married very young, and at the age of 17 lost her husband, who fell in Germany at the head of his company. She devoted herself with unusual application to astronomy, and published at Paris, in 1680, “discourses of Copernicus on the mobility of the earth,” 4to. in which she displays great knowledge and extensive erndition.

DUMESNIL, N. a professor of rhetoric at Paris, author of Latin synonyms. He died at Valogne 1802, aged 82.

DUMONT, John, baron of Carlsroon, historiographer to the emperor, fled from France to Holland, upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He wrote “des memoires politiques, &c.” 4 vols. 12mo. an useful performance, which contains every fact of importance from the peace of Munster, to the year 1676—travels in France, Italy, &c. 4 vols. 12mo.—universal diplomatic body, &c. 8 vols fol.—historical letters, &c. He died about 1726 at a great age.

DUMONT, George, a native of Paris, secretary to the French embassy at Petersburg. He was author of history of the commerce of English colonies—present state of English commerce—treatise on the circulation of credit, &c. and died 1788, aged 63.

DUMONT, N. a French painter, surnamed the Roman. He died at Paris 1781, very old. His pieces possess merit.

DUMOUIRIER, Anthony Francis Duperier, a native of Paris, eminent as a commissary in the French armies. He was author of Richardet, a poem, 2 vols.—some comedies translated from the Italian, Spanish, and English,—an opera, &c. He died 1767, aged 60.

DUN, David Erskine Lord, born at Dun, and educated at St. Andrew's and Paris, where he studied the law. He was called to the bar, 1696, and opposed the Scottish union, but was a benefactor to the persecuted episcopal clergy. He was called to the bench 1711, and took the name of Dun. He died at Dun 1755, five years years after he had retired from the court of justiciary, aged 85. His "advices," 12mo. is an excellent performance.

DUNBAR, William, an eminent poet of Scotland, born 1465 at Salton, on the south of East Lothian. He was originally poor, and after travelling as a novice of the franciscan order, he returned home in his 25th year. His "thistle and the rose," was written on the marriage of James IV. of Scotland with Margaret daughter of Henry VII. but whilst he expected ecclesiastical preferment for the offering of his poetry, he unfortunately was disappointed; for the great listen with delight to the flattering compliments of the learned, but seldom reward merit. He wrote besides, the golden terge—the freirs of Berwick—the twa marrit women—and the wedo. His poetry is commended by Warton, as next in rank to Chaucer's and Lydgate's, and Pinkerton, with national partiality, says, that he surpasses the morals and satires of Langland, Chaucer's humor and knowledge of life, Gower's allegory, and the description of Lydgate. His works were published with learned notes by sir David Dalrymple. He died about 1580.

DUNCAN, Mark, a Scotch physician, professor of philosophy, and principal of the Calvinists' college at Saumur. He was invited by James I. to settle near his person, which he declined, and he died 1640 at Saumur, where he had married. He wrote some philosophical works, and a treatise against the possession of the Ursuline nuns of London, which excited some public resentment against him.

DUNCAN, Daniel, an eminent physician born at Montauban in Languedoc, 1649, of a family of Scottish original. The loss of his parents while in his cradle, was compensated by the paternal attention of his mother's brother, Daniel Paul, a learned counsellor of Toulouse, who had him educated at Puy Laurens, and at Montpellier, where under the care of Dr. Charles Babeyrac, he studied eight years, and when 24 he took his degree of M. D. From Montpellier he came to Paris, where he resided seven years, and published his "explication nouvelle & mechanique des actions animales, 1678," which was well received, and the following year he visited London, for business as well as to make enquiries into the effects of the plague of 1665. After a residence of two years he was recalled to Paris, on account of the declining health of his great friend and patron Colbert. About this time he published his "chymie naturelle, ou explication de la nourriture de l'animal," which, when completed in three parts, was read with universal applause. On the death of Colbert he left Paris, 1683, and retired to Montauban with the intention of selling his property and settling in London. Here, however, he continued till the persecution against the protestants forced him for refuge to Geneva, and afterwards to Berne, where he obtained the professorship of anatomy. After residing at Berne eight or nine years, he went to attend the princeps of the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, where, for three years he was treated with the respect due to his merit. At this time he wrote his popular treatise on the abuse of hot liquors, especially tea, coffee, and chocolate, which had lately been introduced into Germany, and he published it afterwards at Rotterdam 1705, at the request of Dr. Boerhaave. His character and the benevolence with which he treated the various protestant emigrants whom persecution drove out of France, recommended him strongly to the king of Prussia, by whom he was honorably invited to Berlin, where, though physician to the household, he staid a little time and removed to the Hague. For 12 years he resided at the Hague and finally settled in London in 1714. He died in London April 30th, 1735, aged 86. This amiable man, so universally respected for his humanity and benevolence, wrote besides the books already mentioned "histoire de l'animal, &c." and left besides several manuscripts on medical subjects. His conversation "says his biographer" was easy, cheerful and interesting, pure from all taint of party scandal or idle raillery; this made his company desired by all who had a capacity to know its value, and he afforded a striking instance that religion must naturally gain strength from the successful study of nature. It is remarkable that for three generations before him medicine found most respectable professors in his family.

DUNCAN, William, a learned writer, professor of philosophy in the Marischal college of Aberdeen. He was born at Aberdeen in July 1717, and was educated there under the celebrated Dr. Blackwell. He came to London in 1739, and there chiefly employed himself in writing for the booksellers. His works appeared generally without his name. He translated some books from the French, and was concerned in that translation of Horace known under the name of Watson. He was the coadjutor of Dr. Johnson, Campbell, and Fordyce, in the preceptor which Doddsley published, and he wrote for his share the logical part. He also translated several of Cicero's orations, and likewise Cæsar's commentaries which appeared in 1752, folio, with fine cuts. In 1753 he removed to Aberdeen where he had been the preceding year appointed professor of philosophy. He died a bachelor May 1st 1760, aged 43. Though a man of no superior genius, he possessed taste, judgment, and good sense, and his abilities were rather solid than shining. He was universally beloved in private life.

DUNCAN, Adam lord, a well known English admiral, born at Dundee of a respectable family. As a younger son he was bred to the sea, and in 1761, was made post captain. He served under Keppel as his captain, and in 1787 was made rear admiral, in 1793 vice admiral, and in 1795 admiral of the blue. His station during the late war was in the North sea to block up the Texel, but in his temporary absence during the mutiny of the fleet, the Dutch escaped from their ports, and were soon brought to an engagement by the English admiral, near Camperdown, within five miles of their own shores. On this celebrated day, 11th October 1797, the Dutch admiral De Winter struck with eight ships to the superior valor of the English, and in reward for his conduct Duncan was created the 21st of the same month viscount Duncan of Camperdown, baron Duncan of Lundie, Perthshire, with a pension of 2000l. on himself and his two successors in the peerage. Lord Duncan, whose character in private life as a man and as a christian, was equal to his bravery as a seaman, died 1804. He was in stature a comely person, full six feet three inches tall, so that he observed jocosely to the Dutch admiral who was likewise a man of tall stature, I wonder how you and I have escaped the balls in this hot battle. During the mutiny of his fleet the admiral addressed the crew of his ship, ship, the Veteran, with a tone of affection and of firmness, and in a speech so sensible and so judicious, as to call forth the admiration even of his rebellious crew.

DUNCOMBE, William, an English writer, born at Stocks, Hertfordshire. In 1726 he married the only sister of John Hughes, whose poems he edited in two vols. 12mo. 1735, and the miscellanies of the other brother Jabez, in one vol. 1737. He translated Racine's Athaliah, which met with applause, and afterwards edited the works of Mr. Needler, and he produced his L.J. Brutus on the boards of Drury lane, and it was published in 1735 and 1747. He besides edited some of Herring's sermons, and published Horace in English verse by several hands 1757. He died 26 February 1769, aged 80.

DUNCOMBE, John, son of the preceding, was born in 1730. He was educated at private schools at Romford and Felsted, where he displayed great regularity, uncommon application, and superior talents. At the age of 16 he was admitted at Benet's college, Cambridge, at the recommendation of archbishop Herring his father's friend. In 1750 he was chosen fellow of his college, and three years after took orders, and became assistant preacher at St. Anne's Soho, where his eloquence as an orator, and his amiable manners in private life, gained him the respect of a populous neighbourhood. In 1757, the primate Herring gave him the livings of St. Andrew and St. Mary Bredman, Canterbury, but the death of that excellent patron, two months after, cut off all hopes of further and more valuable preferment. He married in 1763, the daughter of Mr. Highmore the painter, with whom he enjoyed 23 years of uninterrupted domestic happiness. In 1766, Secker appointed him one of the six Canterbury preachers, and the next primate, Cornwallis, presented him, in 1773, to the living of Herne, six miles from Canterbury. He was also master of Harbledown and St. John's hospitals, which, though places of trust and not emolument, enabled him to display his regard for the poor, and his humane endeavours to relieve their necessities. He was also an active magistrate, and in this office he was the means of encouraging virtue and of checking vice. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke 21st June 1785, from which he never recovered, and died on the 18th of the following January. He left only one daughter. His works are chiefly fugitive pieces published in Doddsley's collection, and in periodical magazines, besides the Seminead, and a poem on the death of Frederic prince of Wales. He also greatly assisted his father in his translation of Horace, and published the seventh satire of the second book in 1752, imitated, and inscribed to R. Owen Cambridge.

DUNGAL, a monk of St. Dennis in the ninth century, supposed to be an Irishman. He was consulted by Charlemagne with respect to the two eclipses of the sun which happened 810, and his answer is preserved in the 10th vol. 4to. of d'Acheri's spicilegium. A tract also by him against the worship of images, may be found in the Bibliotheca patrum 1608, 8vo.

DUNLOP, William, M.A. was born 1692 at Glasgow, where his father was principal of the university. He applied himself for about two years to the study of the law at Utrecht, but abandoned the plan at the representation of Mr. Wishart, and became, by means of his friend, regius professor of divinity and church history at Edinburgh 1716. He distinguished himself much as a preacher, and died of a dropy 1720, aged 28. He published two volumes of sermons 12mo. and an essay on confessions of faith.

DUNLOP, Alexander, M.A. brother to the above, was born 1684, in America, where his father was in exile. He came over at the revolution, and was in 1720 appointed professor of Greek in Glasgow university. He published in 1736, a Greek grammar which still maintains its superiority in the Scotch university, and died at Glasgow 1742, aged 58.

DUNN, Samuel, an English mathematician born at Crediton, Devonshire, where he kept a school for some years, and where he founded a mathematical school. He afterwards removed to Chelsea, where he kept school, and was appointed mathematical examiner of those officers who entered into the East India company's service. He died 1792, author of several mathematical treatises,—an atlas,—treatises on book keeping.

DUNNING, John, lord Ashburton, was born 18th October 1731, at Ashburton, in Devonshire. He rose by his merit at the bar, and greatly distinguished himself in parliament. He was raised to the peerage in 1782, and made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and recorder of Bristol. He died 18th August 1783, leaving only one son.

DUNOD DE CHARNAGE, Francis Ignatius, the learned professor of law at Belançon, his native town, died there 1751. He wrote "memoires of the court of Bourgogne" three vols 4to.—history of the church, &c. of Belançon, two vols. 4to.—treatise of descriptions, &c. His son Joseph, left some notes on his father's works. Peter, a Jesuit of the same family, published a curious work, called the discovery of the town of Antre in Franche Comté.

DUNOIS, John, count of Orleans and Longueville, was the natural son of Lewis duke of Orleans, and born 23d November 1407. He distinguished himself in arms, in the defeat of the earls of Warwick and Suffolk, and in the defence of Orleans, till it was relieved by Joan of Arc. He pursued the English, and took from them Blais Bourdeaux, Bayonne, &c. He was rewarded for his services by Charles VII. who called him the restorer of his country, and gave him large grants of lands, with the office of grand chamberlain of France. This great hero, so respectable also for the virtues of private life, died 24th November 1468, aged 61.

DUNS, John, commonly called Duns Scotus, a celebrated theologian of the franciscan order, born at Dunstable, Northumberland. He became fellow of Merton, Oxford, and then went over to Paris, where his abilities and his acuteness in disputation procured him the appellation of the subtil doctor. He opposed the doctrines of Thomas Aquinas, hence his followers were called Scotists, and his opponents Thomists. He afterwards went to Cologne where he died 1308. It has been said by Paul Jovius that he was attacked by an apoplexy and buried as dead, and that upon his recovery, he languished in a most miserable manner in his coffin till he expired. His works were printed at Lyons 1639, 10 vols. folio, and are now little regarded.

DUNSTAN, St. archbishop of Canterbury, was born in in 924. He embraced the ecclesiastical life, and was made, by Edgar, bishop of Worcester, and afterwards in 959 translated to Canterbury. He was also abbot of Glastonbury. He is well known as a man of intrigue, and of great spiritual power, which he showed with unusual obstinacy in the English court, especially under Edmund. The pope knowing his influence, made him his legate. He died 988.

DUNTON, John, a bookseller, born at Graffham, Huntingdonshire, 14th May 1659. Upon failing in his business as bookseller, after 20 years' success, he began author, and in 1701 was employed in the Post-angel paper. He afterwards began the Athenian Mercury, which was a plan to answer questions, monthly proposed by unknown persons, and which was republished by Bell under the name of the Athenian Oracle 4 vols. 8vo. In 1710 he published his Athenianism, containing 600 treatises, in prose and verse, on all subjects. Though prolix and sometimes obscure as a writer, he yet possesses merit as a satirist, and some of his pieces will be read with pleasure. He also wrote "Dunton's life and errors." He died about 1725.

DUPATY, advocate general, afterwards president of the parliament at Bourdeaux, was born at Rochelle, and died at Paris 1788 not far advanced in life. He distinguished himself as an eloquent and powerful orator, and as an upright magistrate. His historical reflections on penal laws, are a very valuable work. He wrote also academical letters and discourses on Italy, 2 vols. 8vo, 1788. He affected to imitate Diderot, and was deficient in taste. Voltaire with sarcastic self-consequence spoke with indifference of his abilities.

DUPERRAY, Michael, a French lawyer, who died at Paris 1730, aged 90. He wrote some works chiefly on ecclesiastical subjects, &c.

DUPHOT, N. a French general, who after serving with distinction in Italy, was sent as ambassador to the pope. He was there assassinated in 1797, in a popular tumult, and though the pope could not prevent, and was not privy to the commotion, the death of the ambassador was made a pretext by the French for seizing the ecclesiastical states.

DUPIN, Lewis Ellis, a learned, and well known critic, was born at Paris 17th June 1657. He early displayed great partiality for literature, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became doctor of the Sorbonne 1684. He devoted himself to the composition of his great work called "Bibliothèque universelle des auteurs ecclesiastiques," the first volume of which appeared 1686. The boldness however with which he spoke of various writers gave offence to the critics, and the author was obliged by Harlay archbishop of Paris to retract some of his opinions, and to suppress the work in 1693, with the privilege of continuing it under the altered title of Bibliothèque nouvelle. Besides this great work which was brought down in several volumes to the end of the 16th century, Dupin wrote others, the chief of which are—prolegomena to the bible,—notes on the psalms and pentateuch,—a profane history,—a treatise of power ecclesiastical and temporal,—and method of studying divinity, &c. He was professor of the Royal college, from which he was removed in the famous cas de conscience, but afterwards restored. He died at Paris 1719, aged 62.

He was a man of extensive erudition, and of indefatigable application. His ecclesiastical bibliothèque, so valuable for the analytical account of authors and of their writings which it accurately gives, has been translated into English with notes, &c. He corresponded with Wake the English primate about the union of the two churches.

DUPLANIL, J.D. a French physician, who translated various works into French from the English, among which was Buchan's domestic medicine. He died at Paris 1802.

DUPLEIX, Scipio, was born at Condom 1566, and noticed by queen Margaret, who brought him to Paris in 1603, and made him master of requests, and afterwards historiographer of France. In his old age, which he reached without sickness or infirmity, he wrote a book on the liberties of the Gallican church, which he presented to chancellor Seguier for the liberty of printing, but the courtier with unparalleled audacity threw it into the fire, which so shocked the venerable author, that he returned to Condom and died soon after, of deep vexation 1661, aged 92. His works are memoirs of the Gauls 1650 folio. a book of great value,—history of France in 6 vols. folio. not very accurate or impartial—an account of the flatteries heaped on Richelieu, and the violent reflections thrown on the deceased Margaret now no longer the patroness of the author,—Roman history 3 vols. folio. an insipid performance,—a course of philosophy 3 vols. 12mo.—natural curiosity, &c. 8vo. insignificant and often licentious,—the liberty of the French language against Vaugelas, &c.

DUPLEIX, Joseph, a French merchant, appointed in 1730 director of Chandernagore in the East Indies, a colony which, by his wisdom and firmness, he raised from poverty and distress to consequence and opulence. He inspired his countrymen with the spirit of commerce and enterprise, and established mercantile connections with the Red sea, the Maldives, Goa, the Manillas, &c. He was appointed governor of Pondicherry in 1742, and defended the place with uncommon bravery in 1748 for 42 days against the attack of two English admirals. For these services he was rewarded by the French king with the red ribband, and the title of marquis, and by the great Mogul with the title of nabob. He was recalled in 1753 during the war which broke out in the East between the English and the French, in the support of two rivals for the nabobship of Arcot, and he was so hurt at the idea of being called away from the exercise of sovereign power to a private station, and of soliciting the French East India company for the payment of his arrears, that he fell under a dejection of spirits and died soon after. His conduct towards la Bourdonnaye his rival in the East, is the most exceptionable part of his character. Jealousy of power prompted him to use severe measures against him, in 1747, and afterwards Bourdonnaye had influence enough to procure the recall of his prosperous adversary.

DUPORT, James, a learned divine, educated at Cambridge, where he became professor of Greek, and master of Magdalen college. He was raised to the deanry of Peterborough and died 1680. His great erudition as a classical scholar, is evinced in his learned works. He wrote a Greek version of the psalms,—gnomologia Homeri cum duplice parallelismo, Cambridge 1660,—poetica stromata 1676. 8vo,—and lectures published with Needham's Theophrastus' characters, 1712.

DUPORT, Francis Mathurin, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, distinguished himself in the revolution as a violent enemy to the measures of the court. His connection with Orleans at last proved fatal to him, and he suffered under the guillotine 20th of April 1794, aged 46.

DUPPA, Brian, a learned prelate, born 1589 at Lewisham, Kent, and educated at Westminster, and Christchurch, Oxford. In 1612 he was elected fellow of All-souls, and after having travelled in France and Spain, he took his degree of D.D. in 1625, and was in 1629, by the interest of the earl of Dorset, made dean of Christchurch. In 1638 he became tutor to the prince Charles, and to his brother James, and about that time was raised to the see of Chichester. In 1641 he was translated to Salisbury, but he received little benefit from it, and on the suppression of episcopacy he attended his master, especially in the life of Wight, and assisted him it is said in the composition of the Eikon Basilike. He afterwards lived in retirement at Richmond, till the restoration, when he was made bishop of Winchester, and lord almoner. He died in 1662 aged 73, at Richmond in Surrey, a place which he loved, and where he erected and endowed an alms-house. A few hours before he expired, Charles II. visited this venerable prelate, and kneeling by his bedside implored his blessing, which the dying man, placing one hand on the king's head, and raising the other to heaven, gave him with great fervor and piety. He was buried in Westminster abbey. He left many charitable legacies to those places, or societies, with which either by birth, office, or predilection he had been connected. He wrote some things chiefly on devotional subjects, as "a guide for the penitent," "the soul's soliloquies, &c."

DUPRAT, Anthony, an eminent French statesman. He was first at the bar, and rose gradually to the first presidency of the parliament of Paris 1507, and the chancellorship of France 1515. He was tutor to Francis I. when count of Angoulême, and by checking his criminal passion for the wife of Lewis XII. he gained his confidence and patronage. He advised his master, whose necessities were great, to raise money by selling the offices of judicature, and by his suggestion the chamber called Tournelle was established, which augmented the taxes and improved the royal revenue by the oppression of the poor. By the advice of his favorite, Francis also abolished the pragmatic sanction, and established the concordat, by which while the king nominated to vacant benefices, the pope received a large annual income from the churches. This step rendered Duprat a favorite at Rome, he became an ecclesiastic, and from the sees of Meaux, Albi, Valence, Die, Gap, and Sens, which he successively filled, he was honored with the purple 1527. He was afterwards a legate in France, and on the death of Clement VII. it is said he aspired to the tiara, an ambitious step which the French king ridiculed and by no means promoted. This artful prelate, to whom his ambition and his intrigues raised many enemies, died at his chateau de Nantouillet 9th July 1535, overwhelmed with remorse, and worn out by diseases. He was a man of the most ambitious and selfish character, whose whole conduct was guided by interest and avarice. To increase his power or enlarge his fortune he scrupled at no sacrifice on either of fame or virtue, and therefore his death was as unlamented as his life had been guilty. He built at the hotel de Dieu at Paris a hall which still bears his name, on which the king observed that it should have been much larger if it could contain all the poor Duprat had made.

DUPRE, de Guyer, John, a hermit said to have built with only the assistance of his servant the hermitage of Friburg in Switzerland, in the solid rock, the chimney of which rises 90 feet in height.

DUPRE, Mary, a learned lady of the 17th century, born at Paris, and educated by her uncle des Marets de St. Sorlin in the learned languages and in rhetoric, versification and philosophy. She also studied Descartes, and was called the Cartesienne. She was intimate with the learned of her time, and her pieces of poetry and also her prose writings were read with great applause.

DUPRE d'AUNAY, Lewis, a native of Paris, member of several learned academies. He died 1758. He wrote letters of the generation of animals,—traité des subsistances militaires, two vols. 4to.—reflections on the transfusion of blood, 12mo. &c.

DUPRE de ST MAUR, Nicholas Francis, a native of Paris, who died there Dec. the 1st, 1774, aged 80. He was a member of the French academy. He translated Milton's Paradise lost, with Addison's odes, and also Paradise regained, by a Jesuit, four vols. 12mo. He wrote an essay on the coins of France, 1740, 4to. a valuable work,—inquiries on the value of money, &c.—the table of the duration of human life. He was well informed in matters of agriculture, economy, and commerce.

DUPUIS, Claude, a French engraver of merit who died at Paris, 1742 aged 57. His brother Gabriel Nicholas was also an eminent engraver, and died 1771, aged 73.

DUQUESNE, Abraham, a native of Normandy, who distinguished himself in the French navy, in various fights against the Spaniards, the Dutch, the Genoese, &c. He died at Paris the second Feb. 1688, aged 78, much and deservedly respected, not less in his private than his public character.

DURAND, William, a native of Provence, eminent as a lawyer, and afterwards raised to a bishopric by the pope. He died at Rome 1296 aged 59, author of a Speculum juris, &c. a work of merit. His nephew was also a bishop, and wrote on general councils.

DURAND de ST. POURCAIN, William, a French bishop, called from his powers of argumentation the resolute doctor. He was author of commentaries on the sentences and other works, and died 1332.

DURANDE, N. a physician of eminence at Dijon, who published some interesting tracts on his profession. He died at Dijon 1799.

DURANT, Gilles, seur de la Bergerie, advocate in the parliament of Paris. He was one of the nine appointed by the court to reform the customs of Paris. He possessed great talents for ludicrous poetry, and his verses on the ass that had joined the league, and had fallen during the siege of Paris 1590, are much admired. He wrote other humorous pieces, which equally command the approbation of the public, though some are of a licentious tious tendency. Some suppose that he was broke on the wheel, 16th of July 1618, for a libel on the French king, but the sufferer was another person, who with his two brothers endured that savage punishment. Durant's works were printed 1594.

DURANTI, John Stephen, a native of Toulouse, of whose parliament he was advocate-general, and afterwards in 1581 first president. He violently opposed the league, and perished in a tumult which he endeavoured to appease, being shot by a musquet ball 10th of Feb. 1589, and treated with every mark of insult and indignity by the mob. This meritorious martyr had the year before successfully employed his influence to preserve Toulouse from the plague, and he had deserved the affection of his country by his liberality and charity of some institutions which he founded for the education of youth and the relief of indigence. He wrote also a book de ritibus ecclesiæ, printed at Rome 1591 folio.

DURBACH, Anne Louisa, a German poetess, born 1722. From the mean occupation of watching cattle, she raised herself to distinction by the reading of books, and by uncommon application to literature. At 17 she married a woolcomber, but with him and with another afterwards, she was exposed to great poverty, till the age of 40, when her muse celebrated in a triumphal ode the battle of Lowoschutz. This piece was noticed, and recommended to the Prussian monarch, who sent for the poetess to Berlin, and by his patronage placed her above want. Her poems have been published, and possess great merit. She died about 1780.

DURELL, John, a divine of eminence, born 1626 in the island of Jersey, and educated at Merton college, which he left at the beginning of the civil wars, and then passed to Caen where he took his degree of M.A. He was ordained by the bishop of Galloway at Paris 1651, and was afterwards invited by the church of Caen to supply the place of the famous Bochart during his absence at the court of Christina of Sweden, an honorable appointment, which however he did not accept. At the restoration he was chaplain to the king, and preferred to a prebend at Salisbury, afterwards at Windsor, and then at Durham. In 1669 he took his degree of D.D. at Oxford, and in 1677 was raised to the deanry of Windsor. For this preferment he was indebted to his abilities as well as to the partiality of Charles, who was well acquainted with his merits, and had known him in Jersey and in France. He died 1683, aged 58, and was buried at Windsor. His writings were chiefly controversial,—a vindication of the church of England against schismatics—a view of the government, &c. of the church of England, 4to.—besides a translation of the liturgy into Latin and French.

DURELL, David, a native of Jersey, educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards became fellow of Hertford college, of which in 1757 he was made principal. In 1764 he took his degree of D.D. and in 1767 was made prebendary of Canterbury. He served the office of vice chancellor and died 1775, aged 47. He was author of critical remarks on the books of Job, Psalms, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, 4to,—the Hebrew text of the parallel prophecies of Jacob and Moses, relating to the 12 tribes, with a translation and notes, &c. 4to.

DURER, Albert, a celebrated painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg 20th May 1471, of Hungarian parents. After being well instructed in arithmetic, perspective, and geometry, he began to exhibit some of his pieces before the public, and his three graces were the first performance which fixed the admiration of his country upon him, in 1497. He painted little, therefore his pictures are very scarce, and as highly valued. His Adam and Eve are still preserved in the royal palace of Prague, and also a picture of Christ bearing the cross, an adoration of the wise men, and at Frankfort two pieces of the passion and an assumption of exquisite beauty. In the senators' hall at Nuremberg are also still exhibited with national pride, a portrait of Charlemagne, and of some of the emperors, with the 12 apostles. His engravings are highly admired. Instead of the tedious mode of engraving on copper, he first attempted to work on wood, and his first pieces in that way, were the beheading of John the Baptist, and the presentation of his head to Herod, published in 1510. One of his best pieces is said by Vasari to be a St. Eustachius kneeling before a stag. The merit of Durer was not lost in obscurity, he was esteemed by the great, and the emperor Maximilian not only patronised him but granted him a pension and a patent of nobility. He died in his native city, 6th April 1528, and was buried in St. John's church, where his friend Pirkheimer placed an honorable inscription over his remains. Besides his great reputation as an artist, he possessed what is equally valuable, a respectable character in private life. He was cheerful but not licentious in his conversation, the firm friend of virtue and piety, and he never, like some of his fellow artists, employed his talents on any thing that was either obscene or profane. He wrote some books in German, published after his death, on the rules of painting,—institutiones geometriæ, &c. His wife, who was beautiful, but is described by some as a Xantippe, sat to him, and from her features he painted the face of the Virgin Mary.

DURET, Lewis, a physician, born at Beaugé-la-Ville in Brescia. He practised with great success at Paris, and was in the household of Charles IX. and Henry III. He was particularly esteemed by this last monarch, who granted him a pension of 400 crowns of gold, with a survivance to his five sons, and in proof of his great esteem was also present at the marriage of his daughter. Duret died 22d January 1586, aged 59. He was a true follower of Hippocrates, and treated medicine after the manner of the antients. His best work is a commentary on Hippocrates published Paris 1621, folio, after being completed and revised by his son John, who like himself was eminent as a physician. The son died 1629, aged 66.

D'URFEY, Thomas, a facetious English poet. His parents who were Huguenots, left Rochelle before it was besieged by Lewis XIII. in 1628, and they settled at Exeter, where the poet was born. He applied himself to the law, but the liveliness of his genius, and the volatility of his mind, carried him to the cultivation of poetry, and as he possessed the powers of wit and the keenness of satire, his plays were received on the stage with great applause. His facetiousness and easy manners recommended him to the notice of the great, and Charles II. was often seen with this favorite of the muses, most familiarly leaning on his shoulder, or humming over a song with with him. But though popular, his ballads, songs, and plays possessed all the coarseness of wit, licentiousness, and indelicacy which were fashionable in the days of the second Charles, and which better times have happily banished, so that within 30 years after his death, none of his pieces were suffered to appear on the stage. This humorous author, familiarly known by the name of Tom, lived much with the earl of Dorset at Knole, where there is still preserved a picture of him, taken by stealth, as he was sleeping in his chair after dinner, but in the last part of his life he was haunted by poverty, for, regardless of the morrow he had always squandered the present away. To relieve him from distress, the players very generously, at the solicitation of Addison, came forward to perform "the Plotting sisters" for the benefit of the author, who humorously said, he had written more odes than Horace, and four times as many comedies as Terence, and this temporary relief set him above want. He died 26th February 1723, and was buried in St. James' churchyard, Westminster. His age is not exactly known, though it must have been about 70. His sonnets, ballads, &c. are contained in 6 vols. 12mo, and called "Pills to purge melancholy," and they are handsomely recommended by the 29th number of the Guardian, in the 67th number of which work also may be found a humorous account of the author.

DURHAM, James, a Scotch divine, born in West Lothian 1620, and educated in St. Salvador's college St. Andrew's. At the age of 30 by the persuasion of his friends he took orders, and became a very popular and eloquent preacher at Glasgow. He died of a consumption 1658, aged 38. He wrote a commentary on the revelations—discourse on scandal,—sermons on the 53d of Isaiah and the Song of Solomon, &c.

DURINGER, Melchior, professor of ecclesiastical history at Berne, passed his whole life in celibacy, solitude, and melancholy. He fell from the story of his house, which was unfortunately on fire, and died an hour after, 1st January 1723, aged 76. The author of physica sacra, printed at Amsterdam 1732, is much indebted to the labors of Duringer.

DURY OR DURÆUS, John, a Scotch divine, who labored earnestly to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists, but to little purpose. He began about 1634 to travel through Europe, engaged in this gigantic undertaking, and after conferring with the divines of England, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Geneva, and other places, he at last, after 40 years' laborious pursuit, found himself disappointed, and though all commended his spirit and extolled the purity of his intentions, none would resign their opinions and their faith to the decision of their neighbours. It is unknown when he died, but in the last part of his life he was honorably patronised, by Hedwig Sophia, princess of Hesse, who allowed him a comfortable retirement, with a table well furnished, and every convenience. He wrote much in favor of his grand plan, and evinced himself a man of extensive learning, great zeal, becoming piety, but rather fanatical. His letter to Dumoulin, concerning the churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland, under Cromwell, is curious. It is published London 1658, 12mo.

DUSART, a painter of Haerlem, disciple of Adrian

Ostade. He was chiefly great in the description of taverns and low company. He died 1704, aged 39.

DUSSAULX, John, a native of Chartres, who after distinguishing himself in the war of Hanover under Richelieu, devoted himself to literary pursuits. At the revolution he became member of the convention, but his conduct was moderate and humane, and he was one of the 73 proscribed deputies who were imprisoned for opposing the measures of their more violent associates. He was afterwards member of the council of ancients, and president of the national institute, and died at Paris 16th March 1799, aged 71. He published a translation of Juvenal,—de la passion du jeu, 8vo.—éloge de Blanchet,—memoire sur les satiriques Latins, &c.

DUVAL, Peter, geographer royal of France, was born at Abbeville. He died at Paris 1683, aged 65. He studied geography under his learned maternal uncle Sanson, and is the author of some geographical tracts and maps, formerly in great esteem.

DUVAL, Nicholas, a Dutch painter, who died 1732, aged 88. He studied in Italy under Cortona, and was made by William III. director of the academy at the Hague.

DUVAL, Valentine Jamerai, an extraordinary character, born in 1695 at Artonay in Champagne. At the age of 10 he lost his father who was a poor laborer, but thus destitute, overwhelmed, with his mother and her family, by poverty, he began to hope for better times. He hired himself with a peasant of the village, and even in the employment of keeping the poultry yard, he drew the attention of his youthful associates, and by his superior agility guided their innocent sports. In the winter of 1709 he travelled towards Lorraine, and in the cold journey he was attacked by the small-pox under which he must have sunk but for the timely assistance of a shepherd near Monglat, who supplied him with dry bread and water, in a miserable sheep-pen where the breath of the crowded sheep hastened the termination of his disorder by occasioning a strong and lasting perspiration. Recovered from this dreadful malady he went to Clezantine, a village on the borders of Lorraine, where he continued two years in the service of another shepherd, and then became an attendant on brother Palemon at the hermitage of La Rochette near Deneuvre. From this peaceful abode he was soon removed to the hermitage of St. Anne near Luneville, and there employed in the service of four hermits and in acts of charitable hospitality, he learnt to write and with eagerness devoured the books which his indigent abode afforded. His activity was here employed in the pursuit of game which he sold and converted to the increase of his books and knowledge, and his accidental finding of a seal belonging to Mr. Forster, an English gentleman resident at Luneville, which he very honorably advertised, procured him new and solid advantages. Forster rewarded his honesty, and assisted him in the purchase of books and of maps, and his library soon increased to 400 volumes. Here, while one day engaged deeply in the study of a map at the foot of a tree, he was found by the attendants of the princes of Lorraine, and the pertinent and very sensible remarks which he made on the enquiries of his illustrious visitors, engaged so much their attention that they promised mised him their protection, and introduced him to Leopold duke of Lorraine. The young adventurer quitted the hermitage with tears of gratitude, and soon, under the care of the Jesuits of Pont-a-Mousson, he made himself master of his favorite studies, history, geography, and antiquities. His progress here was astonishing, but while he endeavoured once to cure the impetuous passion of love, by hemlock, as he read in St. Jerome, he nearly destroyed himself, and long after felt the terrible effects of this violent remedy. In 1718 he visited Paris in the suite of his patron Leopold, and at his return became his librarian, and also professor of history at Lunéville. In this new office Duval distinguished himself greatly, he was attended by several Englishmen, and particularly by Pitt afterwards earl of Chatham, whose genius and manners he admired, and whose future eminence he prophetically announced. He now found himself raised to comfortable independence, and in the fullness of his heart he showed his gratitude to the hermits of St. Anne his benefactors, by rebuilding and adorning their residence, and enabling them to extend their charities. On the death of Leopold in 1738, he followed his son Francis who exchanged Lorraine for Tuscany, but though Florence afforded him many comforts from the salubrity of its climate, and the rich treasures of its libraries, he yet sighed for his native land. Francis, on his marriage with the heiress of Austria, soon gratified his wishes, and when removed to Vienna he called his respectable attendant near his person, and gave him the care of his collection of medals. In this situation Duval lived respected and beloved, and when in 1751 he was nominated preceptor to the young prince Joseph, he did not offend his imperial patrons by modestly refusing an office so flattering to vanity. He enjoyed good health from the temperance of his habits, and the hard mode of life to which he had inured himself, and devoted himself to the cultivation of literature and to the correspondence of his friends, especially of madame de Guttenberg, lady of the bed-chamber to the empress, a woman whose understanding was similar to his own, and whose goodness of heart like his own was displayed in frequent acts of benevolence and charity. In 1752, Duval visited Paris, and was honorably received by the learned, and on his return passing by Artonay his native village, he purchased the house which the indigence of his sister had sold, and built on the spot where he was born a neat house, which he appropriated to the residence of the public schoolmaster of the place. This venerable and pious character died third November 1775, aged 81, displaying in his last moments that resignation and faith which close the life of a good man.

DUVENKE, Marc Van, an historical painter of Bruges, who died 1729, aged 55. He was the pupil of Carlo Maratti, and painted chiefly for churches, and many of his pieces are still preserved at Bruges.

DYCHE, Thomas, an English clergyman, well known as a schoolmaster, at Strafford-le-bow, and as the author of an English dictionary, spelling book, Latin vocabulary, &c. He died about 1750.

DYER, for James, an eminent lawyer, born at Round-hill, Somersetshire, 1511, and educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and removed to the Middle temple, London. Here by assiduity he distinguished himself, and in 1552, he was made serjeant at law, and elected speaker of the house of commons. In 1556 he was made one of the judges of the common pleas, in 1557 removed to the king's bench, and in 1559 again restored to the common pleas, and the next January he was made chief justice of that court. This respectable and upright magistrate died at his seat of Stanton, Huntingdonshire, 24th March 1581, aged 70. He wrote a large volume of reports, published 20 years after his death, and reprinted often, and deservedly commended by sir Edward Coke. He left also some other law tracts, and, for his learning and great excellence of character, fully merited the eulogium passed on him by Camden.

DYER, William, a nonconformist, ejected from his living of Cholesbury, Bucks, in 1662. He turned quaker the latter part of his life, and died 1696, aged 60, and was buried at Southwark. He wrote some sermons, and theological tracts much in the stile of Bunyan's. They were reprinted 1671.

DYER, John, an English poet, born at Aberglafney, Caermarthenshire, 1700. He was educated at Westminster-school, and returned home to study the law, his father's profession, but he had a greater relish for poetry and design, and therefore he determined to become a painter. In 1727 he published his "Grongar-hill," a beautiful little poem, and afterwards set out for Italy to delineate the antiquities of that celebrated country, and employed much of his time among the enchanting prospects near Rome and Florence. At his return home in 1740 appeared his poem "the ruins of Rome," and soon after, by the advice of his friends, he took orders. He was presented to Calthorp, Leicestershire, which, after a residence of 10 years, he exchanged for Belchford, Lincolnshire. In 1752 he was presented by sir John Heathcote to Coningsby, and in 1756 the chancellor added to it, Kirkby on Bane; but whilst he began to enjoy himself, and prepared the improvements of his parsonage house, and of his garden, the cup of felicity was dashed from his hand, and he was carried off by a rapid consumption 1758, and buried at Coningsby, where no memorial records the virtues of its pastor. He left a widow and four children, one son and three girls. The son, heir to his father's taste and classical knowledge, died in London April 1782, aged 32, as he was preparing to extend his travels to Italy. The "fleece," which was published a little before the poet's death—Grongar-hill—and the ruins of Rome, are the three poems which raised Dyer above mortality. The simplicity of his lines is enriched with true sublimity, and the whole breathe forth the purest flames of benevolence and humanity, and have gained, and will preserve universal admiration. His works were printed in one vol. 8vo. 1761.

YNAMUS, a rhetorician of the fourth century, born at Bourdeaux, which he left on an accusation of adultery. He died 360 in Spain, where he had married a rich widow.

EACHARD, Dr. John, an English divine, born in Suffolk 1636. He was educated at Catharine-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1675 master, the year after which he took his degree of D.D. He died 7th July 1697, aged 61, and was buried in the chapel, where an handsome inscription is placed over his remains. He is well known as the author of the grounds and occasions of the contempt of the clergy and religion inquired into, in a letter to R. L. 1670, which was attacked by several writers, and answered by him. In 1672 he published Mr. Hobbes' state of nature considered, in a dialogue between Philanthus and Timothy, dedicated to Sheldon the primate, which Hobbes never noticed, and perhaps wisely, as his superior powers must have sunk before the wit and raillery of his opponent. These two performances were long in esteem, and deserved the high commendations of Swift. All Dr. Eachard's works were printed complete in 1774.

JAMES John, a native of London, educated at Merchant-tailors' and intended for the ministry among the independent dissenters. A strong defect in the organs of speech rendered it impossible for him to appear with advantage before a congregation, and therefore he employed himself in educating young persons at the expence of the independent fund, and after undertaking the class of mathematics, the learned languages, and philosophy, he filled the chair of divinity with considerable respectability. His learning recommended him to the notice of sir Isaac Newton, and other eminent men, and procured him a seat in The royal society, whose transactions he abridged with the assistance of another person. He died 1744.

EARLE, John, a native of York, educated at Merton-college, Oxford, and made tutor to Charles prince of Wales. He was a great sufferer during the civil wars, and at the restoration was made dean of Windsor, then bishop of Worcester, and in 1663 bishop of Salisbury, where he died two years after. He was author of a translation of the Icon Basilike into Latin—micro cosmography, or a piece of the world characterised in essays and characters, 12mo.—an elegy on Francis Beaumont the poet, &c.

EARLE, William Benson, a benevolent character, born at Shaftesbury, 7th July 1740. He was a man of polished manners, well acquainted with the circle of belles lettres, and in disposition most humane and charitable. He left by his will 2000 guineas to the matrons in bishop Ward's hospital, Sarum, and to various other public institutions in Winchester, Salisbury, Bristol, London, Bath, &c. handsome legacies, expressive of his respect for those foundations, which offer relief to the aged, the weak, the indigent, and the unfortunate. Other legacies also were left for the improvements of the Salisbury concert, and for agricultural purposes. This benevolent man died 21st March 1796, in the Close, Sarum, and was buried without pomp with his ancestors in Newton-Toney church.

EBERTUS, Theodore, a learned professor of Frankfort on the Oder, in the 17th century. His works are, Chronologia sanctioris linguæ doctorum,—elogia jurisconsultorum, &c, 8vo.—Poetica Hebraica, 8vo. 1628.

EBION, the founder of a sect about the year 72. St. John is supposed to have written his gospel against the doctrines of the Ebionites who denied the divinity of our Saviour, and acknowledged as true only a mutilated and interpolated copy of St. Matthew's gospel, rejecting all the other books of the new testament. Some authors suppose that there was no such person as Ebion.

ECCARD, John George d', a German historian and antiquary, born at Duingen, Brunswick, 1670. He was professor of history at Helmstadt, and succeeded his friend Leibnitz in the chair of Hanover 1716. His debts obliged him to leave his situation 1723, and turning Roman catholic he retired to Wurtzburg, where he obtained the office of episcopal counsellor and librarian. He was ennobled by the emperor, and died 1730. His works are Corpus historicum mediæ ævi a Caroli magni tempor. ad finem sæculi xv. two vols. fol. a learned and valuable work,—leges Francorum,—&c.—de origine Germanorum,—historia studii etymologici, &c.

ECHELLENSIS, Abraham, a Maronite professor of oriental languages at Rome. He translated from the Arabic into Latin some of the books of Apollonius' conics, and went to Paris to assist le Jay in the publication of his polyglott bible. He quarreled with le Jay, and also with Flavigny, who had attacked his edition of the bible, and he showed himself wantonly severe and licentiously fatirical. He was recalled from Paris to assist the translating of the scriptures into Arabic, and died at Rome 1664.

ECCLES, Solomon, an English musician, who in the zenith of his fame turned quaker and destroyed his instruments. He now became as ridiculous as before he had been admired, and for a while amused the public by his foolish plans, to reconcile all mankind to one religion. The confinement of a prison at last cured him of his follies, but he died without religion the last years of the 17th century.

EBROIN, mayor of the palace under Clothaire III. and Thierry I. maintained for a while the great power which his intrigues and hypocrisy had obtained, but his pride and cruelty offended the French nobles, and he was at last confined in a monastery. He however escaped, and soon returned with an army to regain his lost influence. His enemies and rivals were sacrificed to his ambition and revenge, and the greatest atrocities were exercised in the name of public justice. This tyrant, execrated by the people, was at last assassinated by Hermanfroi, a noble whose death he meditated, 681.

ECHARD, Jacques, a dominican who was born at Rouen, and died at Paris March 15th 1774, aged 60. He wrote an account of the learned men whom his order had produced, two vols. fol. Paris 1719, and 1721.

ECHARD, Lawrence, an English historian and divine, born at Bassam near Beccles, Suffolk, 1671, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. 1695. He took orders and obtained the livings of Welton and Elkinton, Lincolnshire. In 1706, he published his history of England, from the time of the Romans to James I. in one volume folio, to which he added a second and a third volume 1718, up to the settlement of William and Mary. He wrote also an ecclesiastical history, and an English translation of Plautus and Terence, besides a gazetteer, &c. He was made prebendary of Lincoln, and in 1712 archdeacon of Stowe, and soon after presented to the livings of Rendelham, Sudborn, and Alford, Suffolk. His declining state of health obliged him to go to Scarborough for the waters, but he died by the way, while in his chariot, 16th August 1730. He was an author of great judgment and perseverance, but the labors of more modern and elegant writers have rendered his works obsolete. He was twice married, but had no children.

ECKIUS, John, a learned professor of Ingoldstadt, born in Suabia 1483. He warmly opposed the great leaders of the reformation, and disputed at Leipzig with Luther, before the duke of Saxony, and at Worms against Melancthon. He was a divine of great abilities, warm zeal, and extensive erudition. His writings are chiefly on controversial subjects, in support of the popish supremacy against the protestants. He died at Ingoldstadt 1543.

ECLUSE, Charles de l' Clusius, a physician of Arras, who had the care of the simples of Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. Disliking the life of a courtier, he retired to Frankfort on the Maine, and then to Leyden where he died professor of botany, 4th April 1609, aged 84. His works on botanical subjects were published two vols. fol. Antwerp 1601-5.

ECLUSE DES LOGES, Pierre Mathurin de l' doctor of the Sorbonne was born at Falaife, and obtained the prize of eloquence at the French academy 1743, and died 1775. He edited, but with great partiality, the memoirs of Sully.

EDELINCK, Gerard, an engraver, born at Antwerp 1641. The munificence of Lewis XIV. invited him to France, where he executed in the most finished stile the holy family of Raphael, Alexander in Darius' tent by le Brun, and Mary Magdalen also by le Brun. Some of his portraits are excellent, especially his own. He died 1707, aged 66, at the hotel of the Gobelins.

EDEMA, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born in Friesland.

E D M

He visited Surinam, and afterwards America, to paint the views, the trees, insects, &c. of the country, and came to London 1670. He was much admired for the bold features of his landscapes; and his rocks, mountains, and cataracts displayed awful grandeur. He hastened his dissolution by excessive drinking, and died about 1700.

EDER, George, a learned lawyer of the 16th century, born at Friesingen, and counsellor to the emperors Ferdinand, Maximilian, and Rodolphus. His best work is CEconomia bibliorum seu partionum biblicarum libri quinque folio.

EDGAR, succeeded on the throne of England after his brother Edwy 959, and deserved from his mildness the name of peaceable. He was a warlike prince, and obtained some important victories in Scotland and in Ireland, and also in Wales, where he exacted from the inhabitants a tribute of wolves' heads, which thus cleared the country from those rapacious animals. After the death of his queen Egelflida, he married the beautiful Elfrida, daughter of the earl of Devonshire, whom his favorite Ethelwolfe, overpowered with the love of her beauty, claimed for himself instead of demanding her for his master. Edgar died 975, aged 33.

EDGAR, son of Malcolm III. was king of Scotland, and died 1107. His sister married Henry king of England, and by this union restored peace between the two countries.

EDMER or EADMER, an English benedictine of Canterbury, afterwards abbot of St. Alban's, and bishop of St. Andrew's in Scotland. He wrote the history of his own times from 1066 to 1122, called Historia novorum, and also the life of Anselm and Wilfred and some other tracts. His historia was printed with notes by Selden 1623, and reprinted 1675 by Gerberon.

EDMONDES, sir Thomas, a statesman born in Devonshire about 1553, and introduced at court under the patronage of sir Francis Walsingham. He was employed by Elizabeth in some negociations, but when her ambassador at Paris he was allowed only 20 shillings a day, so that he complains severely of his inability to support the dignity of a royal representative, and adds that "he has not the means wherewith to put a good garment on his back, to appear in honest company."

He was sent in 1599 to Brussels, and was afterwards employed as one of the clerks of the privy council. He was knighted by James I. and engaged in affairs of trust and importance, and afterwards appointed to the offices of comptroller of the king's household, and privy counsellor, and in 1618, of treasurer of the household. In the two first parliaments of Charles I. he sat for Oxford, and some of his speeches are preserved. In 1629, he went as ambassador to the French court, and afterwards retired from office, and died in peaceful privacy 1639. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a negociator, active as a courtier, upright, firm, and incorruptible, as attached to the privileges of his king and country. Some of his papers, which once consisted of 12 vols. folio, have been preserved, and some of his letters are published in Sawyer's three volumes of memorials of affairs of state 1725, and Dr. Birch's View of negociations &c. 1749, 8vo.

EDMONDES, Clement, son of the preceding, was born at Sharwardine in Shropshire, and educated at All-fouls' college, college, of which he became fellow 1590. By the interest of his father he was made secretary for the French to Elizabeth, and afterwards remembrancer of the city of London, master of the requests, and clerk to the council, and in 1617 knighted. He was a man of learning, well skilled in arts and sciences. He wrote observations on the first five books of Cæsar's civil wars 1600, folio, besides observations on the commentaries, &c. He died in St. Martin's in the fields, 12th October 1622, and was buried at Preston near Northampton.

EDMUND, St. king of the East Angles, was for his sanctity made one of the saints of the calendar. He was taken prisoner in 870, by Ivar the Dane, and shot to death with arrows, after being fastened to a tree. He was buried at St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk.

EDMUND, St. a native of Abingdon, who studied at Paris, and for his eminence as a preacher was made archbishop of Canterbury by Innocent III. A quarrel with Henry III. obliged him to leave the kingdom, and retire to France where he died 1240. He was canonized by Innocent IV. 1249.

EDMUND I. son of Edward the elder, succeeded his brother Athelstan as king of England 941, and added Mercia, Northumberland, and Cumberland, to his dominions. He was stabbed to death at Puckle church, Gloucestershire 948, by Leolf, a robber, whom he had banished.

EDMUND II. surnamed Ironside, succeeded his father Etheldred 1016, and took for his partner on the throne Canute who opposed him. He was assassinated at Oxford, by two of his servants 1017.

EDWARD, the elder, succeeded his father Alfred, as king of England 900. He defeated the Scotch and Welsh, and repressed the invasion of the Danes. He erected five bishoprics, and by founding the university of Cambridge, he extended his protection to learning. He died 925, and was succeeded by his illegitimate son Aldestan.

EDWARD, St. or martyr, the younger, son of Edgar the great, succeeded to the English crown 975, and was basely murdered at Corfe castle 978, by his step-mother Elfrida, who wished to place her own son Ethelred on the throne.

EDWARD, surnamed the confessor, son of Ethelred, succeeded his brother Hardicanute 1041. He was a weak and impolitic prince, and suffered his kingdom to be governed by earl Godwin, whose daughter he had married. At his death, unable or unwilling to settle the succession about which he had consulted his friend William of Normandy, he left his kingdom a prey to ambitious factions. He died 5th January 1066, and after the short but unfortunate reign of Harold, he was succeeded the following October by William the conqueror.

EDWARD I. king of England, son and successor of Henry III. was born at Winchester. He was recalled from his expedition in Asia against the infidels to ascend the throne 1272, and he distinguished himself by the vigor and wisdom of his government. The Welsh were subdued, and to reconcile them to their change of master, the king created his own son prince of Wales. In 1286 he was appointed umpire between the rival competitors for the crown of Scotland, and he so artfully conducted himself, that he nearly made the whole kingdom subservient to his power. He died at Carlisle 5th July 1307, aged 68, as he was preparing to march against the Scots, who had revolted against him, and on his death-bed he recommended to his son the prosecution of the war. From the wisdom and equity of the laws which he established, Edward has been called the English Justinian, and to his fondness for war and his expensive levies, the people may be said to be indebted for their liberties, which were cemented by the weight and consequence given to their representatives first called to sanction and to support the measures and the taxes of government. After the death of his first wife, Eleanor, daughter of Ferdinand III. king of Castile, he married Margaret daughter of Philip the hardy of France.

EDWARD II. son and successor of the preceding, was born at Caernarvon, and ascended the throne 1307. He was devoid of that vigor and firmness requisite in the head of a turbulent kingdom, and his ill judged attachment to his worthless favorites Gaveston and the Spencers raised his barons in opposition to his measures and embittered the whole of his life. Not only his people but his own wife, rose up against him, and after the punishment of his favorites he was solemnly deposed by the nobles, and shut up in Berkeley castle, where soon after he was murdered in the most barbarous and insulting manner, 1327, aged 42.

EDWARD III. son of the preceding, was born at Windsor 1312, and ascended the throne on his father's death 1327. After a glorious campaign in Scotland, where Baliol paid homage to him for his crown, he turned his arms against Philip king of France. His successes brought on the celebrated victory of Cressy 1346, in which 30,000 French fell, and after the capture of Calais, peace was reestablished between the two countries. The succession of John on the French throne renewed the war, and in 1357 another dreadful battle was fought at Poitiers, by the black prince, who in the midst of the slaughter took the French monarch prisoner. The arms of Edward had also been successful against the Scotch, and their king David Bruce was taken prisoner, and thus England saw two captive monarchs in her capital. These glorious actions were unfortunately obscured by the misfortunes of the latter end of the king's reign. The monarch abandoned the cares of government to his rapacious ministers, and lost himself in the grossest sensuality. He died 23d July 1377, aged 65, and was succeeded by his grandson Richard II. During his reign England was greatly improved by her connection with the continent, and the arts and manufactures of the Flemish, were transplanted into the island, where the industry and the bold genius of the inhabitants have since cherished and improved them. The order of the garter was established in this reign.

EDWARD IV. son of Richard duke of York, claimed the crown as descended from the second son of Edward III. in preference to the reigning monarch Henry VI. the descendant of a third son of Edward III. This rivalry, which filled the kingdom with blood, had already been disputed in six battles, in one of which Richard the duke of York fell, and in seven others it continued to engage the passions of contending armies, till Edward prevailed, and was crowned at Westminster 1461. His marriage riage with Elizabeth Woodville, disgusted greatly his friend Warwick, who received the surname of king-maker, and the dissatisfaction was so rooted, that another civil war was to decide the dispute. Warwick joining himself to the forces of the deposed Henry, defeated Edward's army at Banbury 1469, and soon after took him prisoner. Edward found means to escape, and Warwick, defeated in his turn, fled to France for new supplies, and soon returned to place Henry from a prison on the throne. In his turn, Edward became a fugitive, but unbroken by misfortunes, he collected forces on the continent, and on his return defeated his enemies, and slew Warwick in the field of battle, and in another fight in Tewksbury park so completely routed the forces of Margaret, the heroic queen of the cowardly Henry, that no further opposition was raised against him. Respectable as a warrior and as a negotiator, Edward became despicable as a monarch, and lost himself in effeminacy, and in the indulgence of the most sensual appetites. He died 9th April 1483, aged 41.

EDWARD V. son of Edward IV. was only 12 years old on his father's death. The guardianship of his minority was entrusted to his uncle Gloucester, whose ambition prompted him to the commission of the foulest crimes. The young monarch with his brother the duke of York, were on pretence of greater safety, conducted to the tower, and soon after barbarously smothered 1483, and the cruel uncle ascended the vacant throne, under the name of Richard III. The bodies of these unfortunate princes were discovered in 1678, and conveyed to a decent burial in Westminster abbey.

EDWARD VI. son of Henry VIII. by Jane Seymour, ascended the English throne, at the age of 10, 1547. His character exhibited strong marks of benevolence, virtue, and humanity, but the goodness of his inclinations was often prevented by the intrigues or the malice of his ministers. He continued the work of the reformation begun by his father, and by the powerful cooperation of Cranmer, nearly settled the religious establishment in the form in which it now exists. To avoid the errors of a popish reign he set aside by his will his two sisters Mary and Elizabeth, and settled the crown on his cousin the lady Jane Grey, but his benevolent wishes failed, and the bloody reign of Mary overturned for a while his excellent institutions. He died of a consumption 1553, aged 16. He showed himself a munificent patron of literature, by the foundation of several schools in the kingdom, and by the liberal endowment of Christ church, Bridewell, and St. Thomas's hospitals.

EDWARD, prince of Wales, surnamed the black prince from the color of his armour, was eldest son of Edward III. He distinguished himself by his valor in the field of battle in the wars of France under his father, especially at Cressy, and afterwards he commanded the English forces on the glorious victory of Poitiers, where he took John the king of France and one of his sons prisoner. Sensible of the deference due to royalty he waited behind the chair of this illustrious prisoner on the evening of the battle, and when he conveyed him to London he entered the capital mounted on a small black horse, while the royal captive was borne by a beautiful white charger richly caparisoned. This warlike prince, who was the idol of the nation, died of a consumption before his father 1376, aged 46; and by a daughter of Edmund of Kent, brother to Edward II. a widow, he left one son Richard, who ascended the throne after the death of Edward III. The crest which he took from the blind king of Bohemia became afterwards the crest of the succeeding princes of Wales, distinguished by three ostrich feathers and the motto Ich dien, I serve. Edward, as benevolent as he was brave, extended his protection to Peter the cruel king of Castille, and received him in Aquitaine, which he had obtained by the treaty of Bretigny; but though replaced on his throne by the expulsion of his usurping brother Henry count of Transmarne, the ungrateful prince forgot his obligation to the English victor, and even refused to defray the expences of the troops which had restored his fortunes.

EDWARDS, Richard, an English writer, born in Somersetshire, 1523, admitted of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and elected student of Christ's church. He was made gentleman of Elizabeth's chapel, and taught music to the children of the choir. He wrote three plays, the first of which is dated 1562, besides poems published after his death in a collection called "a paradise of dainty devises" 1578. He was member of Lincoln's Inn, and in his last illness wrote "the soul's knell," much esteemed. He died 1566.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an English divine, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree 1609. He was a nonconformist, and violently opposed the royalists during the civil wars. He generally preached about London, and at Hertford, and after the fall of royalty, he expressed his disapprobation against the sect of independents, with such freedom that upon the triumphal return of Cromwell to London, he fled to Holland, where he died of a quartan ague, 24th August 1647, aged 48. His writings, which are extremely virulent and abusive, are chiefly in favor of the puritans, and of the presbytery. The most known of these are his Gangrena in three parts,—antapologia &c. Mr. Edwards professes himself to be "a plain open-hearted man, who hated tricks, reserves, and designs, zealous for the assembly of divines, the use of the Lord's prayer &c." He was from his zeal called the young Luther at Cambridge. He had by his wife, who was an heiress, four sons and one daughter.

EDWARDS, John, a divine, of the church of England, son of the preceding, was born at Hertford 26th February 1637. He was educated at merchant-tailors' and St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He took his master's degree 1661, and was soon after ordained, and then undertook the cure of Trinity-church, Cambridge, where his sensible discourses and eloquent delivery procured him a large and admiring audience. In 1668 he went for one year to reside at St. Edmondsbury as lecturer, and on his return to the university, in consequence of some dispute with the society of his college, he removed to Trinity-hall, and then became minister of St. Sepulchre's church there. In 1676 he married the widow of Mr. Lane, of Cambridge, and then went to reside on the small living of St. Peter's, Colchester, where for three years he continued the respected and beloved pastor of his parishioners. In 1697, displeased with the conduct of the Colchester clergy towards him, he removed to Cambridge, where, two years after, he proceeded to his degree of D.D. In 1701 he lost his wife, and some time after he took for his second wife a niece of his first wife's first husband. He died 16th April 1716, aged 79, and his wife survived him thirty-nine years, and died January 4, 1745, aged 81. Dr. Edwards, after his return to Cambridge, applied himself very assiduously to the service of literature. Though he had no collection of books, he drew much assistance from the libraries of the university, and in his writings, which are numerous, showed himself most indefatigable, well skilled in ecclesiastical history, and a subtle and able polemic. That he was occasionally unpopular among the clergy arose from his decided partiality for calvinistic principles, and his bias towards the abjured doctrines of the old puritans. Dr. Kippis has called him the Paul, the Augustine, the Bradwardine, the Calvin, of his age; but though he possessed merit in a very great degree, the commendation is perhaps immoderate. His writings are now little known.

EDWARDS, George, the father of ornithologists, was born at Stratford, Essex, 3d April 1694. He was brought up to trade, but the great powers of his genius began to be developed by the perusal of books on natural history, antiquities, &c. and at the expiration of his apprenticeship, in Fenchurch-street, he travelled abroad, and visited Holland, and two years after, Norway, where his researches were attended with the most unbounded friendship and hospitality from the natives. In 1733 he was, by the recommendation of sir Hans Sloane, chosen librarian of the college of physicians, where he obtained apartments; and he became afterwards fellow of the royal and antiquarian societies, London, and other learned societies abroad. The first of his learned and valuable labors appeared in the history of birds, 4 vols. 4to. in the years 1743, 1747, 1750, and 1751; and in 1758, 1760 and 1764, 3 more 4to. vols. were added, called, "gleanings of natural history;" two most valuable works, containing engravings and descriptions of upwards of 600 subjects in natural history never before delineated. This worthy man died 23d July 1773, aged 81.

EDWARDS, Dr. Jonathan, an English divine, who wrote against the Socinians. He was of Jesus college, Oxford, of which, on the promotion of Dr. Lloyd to the see of St. David, he became principal, 1686. His writings are chiefly controversial, and show him to have been a zealous but bigoted disputant.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an elegant writer. He purchased Turrick, in Bucks, where he chiefly resided; and he died on a visit to his friend Richardson, at Parson's Green, 8th January 1757, aged 58, and was buried in Ellefborough church-yard, Bucks. He distinguished himself as an able critic and a good scholar in his canons of criticism, first printed 1747, and his letter to the author of a late correspondence, &c. which drew upon him the severity of Warburton's vengeance, illiberally wreaked in a note on the Dunciad. He also wrote some sonnets, thirteen of which are preserved in Doddsley's collection, eight in Pearch's, and four in Nichols'. His trial of the letter Y is elegant.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an eminent divine of the church of England, born at Coventry 10th August 1729. He was educated partly at Coventry school, and partly under his father, who was the vicar of St. Michael's, Coventry, and in 1747 he entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He early displayed his knowledge of the learned languages by the publication of a new English translation of the psalms from the original Hebrew, with notes, 8vo. 1755. In 1758 he was chosen master of Coventry grammar-school, and rector of St. John the Baptist in that city; and the same year married the daughter of Stonyer Parrot esq. by whom he had one son, Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge. In 1759 he published his useful work, "the doctrines of irresistible grace proved to have no foundation in the writings of the new testament;" and in 1752 he attacked Dr. Lowth's "metrical Hærianæ brevis confutatio;" and by thus supporting Hare's metrical system, he began a controversy, which was continued for some time, and, after some pamphlets between the rival divines, ended at last in the general opinion of the superiority of Lowth's arguments. In 1766 our author took his degree of D.D. and in 1770, upon obtaining the valuable living of Nuneaton, Warwickshire, from the crown, he retired from Coventry, and fixed his residence there for the rest of his life. The loss of his wife, May 1784, greatly afflicted him, and he never recovered the shock. He died at Nuneaton 30th June 1785, aged 56. Besides the above, Dr. Edwards published two dissertations, on bigotry, and on the interpretation of the new testament, and some very learned notes on some of the idyllia of Theocritus. As a teacher, Dr. Edwards was able and assiduous, and as a minister he was attentive, exemplary, and devout. The habits of a sedentary life, however, rendered him little fond of company, and though the correspondent of some learned men, he was the intimate friend of few, among whom bishop Law of Carlisle was the chief.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, an American, born at Windsor in Connecticut, and educated at Yale college. He was the minister of a presbyterian congregation at New York 1722, and two years after he was made tutor in his college; but resigned in 1726, to assist his grandfather, the minister of Northampton. He was in 1750 ejected by his congregation, for refusing to administer the sacrament to some particular persons; and the next year he went as missionary among the Indians. In 1757 he was made president of the college, New Jersey, and died of the small-pox the next year. He was author of the life of David Brainerd, a missionary—narrative of the work of God in the conversion of many hundred souls in Northampton—the doctrine of original sin defended— inquiry into the freedom of will as supposed to be essential to moral agency—sermons, &c.

EDWARDS, William, a common mason, who, by the strong powers of his untutored genius, acquired great celebrity as a bridge-builder. His bridge over the river Taaff, which is the segment of a circle, the chord of which is 147 feet from the surface of the water, is a remarkable instance of his ingenuity. He was occasionally a methodist preacher; and died 1789, aged 81.

EDWY succeeded his uncle Edred as king of England 955, and married Elgiva, who was related to him within the prohibited degrees. This circumstance proved his ruin, and that of his queen, who was seized by Odo, the archbishop, and, after being branded with a hot iron in the face, to destroy her beautiful features, was banished to to Ireland, where she expired by a most cruel and violent death. The king was also excommunicated, and died in exile 959.

EECKHOUT, Gerbrant Vanden, a painter, born at Amsterdam 19th of August 1621. He studied the manner of his master Rembrandt with such success that his pictures drew equal applause, and possessed equal merit. He preferred historical subjects to portraits, and excelled chiefly in the representation of the feelings of the soul in the features of the countenance. His best pieces are—a Jesus among the doctors,—the infant Jesus in the arms of Simeon,—Abraham dismissing Hagar and Ishmael,—the continence of Scipio,—and a woman looking for the fleas of her dog. He died 22d July 1674, a bachelor.

EECKHOUT, Anthony Vanden, a painter, born at Bruges. He travelled into Italy with his brother-in-law Deylter, and while he executed the flowers and the fruits, his companion completed the figures of the several pictures which were thus conjointly produced. After his return home, Eeckhout purchased an honorable post under the bishop of Bruges; but, to the astonishment of all, he suddenly abandoned his country, where he was loved and patronized, and embarked for Italy. In his way he was carried by a storm to Lisbon, where his works soon recommended him to general notice; and after the residence of two years he married a lady of quality, and of opulent fortune. His rivals, however, viewed his success with jealousy, and as he was riding out in his coach, he was shot with a ball and instantly expired 1695. The causes of this melancholy catastrophe are unknown. His fortune descended to his sister who had married Deylter.

EGBERT, last king of the Saxon heptarchy, and first king of England, was proclaimed monarch of Wessex 800, and of all England in 828. He died 10 years after distinguished for valor and success against his Danish invaders.

EGEDE, John, a Dane, who went as missionary to Greenland 1721, where he resided 15 years. His description of Greenland appeared 1729, and he died 1758. His son Paul assisted him in his endeavours to convert the Greenlanders, and was appointed bishop of the country, and died 1789, aged 81. He republished his father's history, besides a journal about the occurrences of Greenland.

EGERTON, Thomas, an eminent lawyer, natural son of sir Richard Egerton, of Ridley, Cheshire, born 1540. He was educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he assiduously applied himself to the law. In 1591 he was made solicitor general to the queen, in 1592 attorney general, and knighted, and afterwards he rose to the office of master of the rolls, and of keeper of the great seal. James I. in 1603 created him baron Ellesmere, and made him chancellor of England. In 1616 he was elected chancellor of Oxford and made viscount Brackley. He died 15th March 1617, at York-house in the Strand, and was buried at Dodington Cheshire. He left some law manuscripts, and published some observations on his office, its privileges and prerogatives, and a speech concerning the postnati. His descendants now enjoy his estates represented by the earl of Bridgewater.

EGERTON, John, a learned prelate, born 30th November 1721, in London, and educated at Eton, and Oriel college, Oxford. He was son of the bishop of Hereford, and descended from the earl of Bridgewater's family. On taking orders he was presented by his father to the living of Ross, afterwards made archdeacon of Hereford, and the year after prebendary of Hereford. In 1748, he married lady Ann Sophia, daughter to the duke of Kent, and the year after became chaplain to the king, and in 1750 was made dean of Hereford. In 1756 he was consecrated bishop of Bangor, and by diploma from Oxford made LLD. In 1768 he was translated to Lichfield, and in 1771 to the see of Durham. These high and rapid preferments were not undeserved. The bishop possessed among his many virtues the manners of conciliation and humility, and by a temperate condescending conduct he restored peace and good will among the political contending factions which unhappily divided his county when he succeeded to Durham. By hospitality and affability he recommended himself to his clergy, and by his anxious concern for the general improvement of agriculture and the encouragement of useful projects through the diocese, he rendered himself deservedly popular, and greatly beloved. The respectability of the pastor, and the comforts of the poor were always nearest his heart, therefore his patronage was extended only to the virtuous and good, and his charity tended to encourage humble poverty in honest pursuits and in industrious diligence. This very virtuous and venerable prelate, after a life usefully spent in distributing liberally and judiciously the many favors which Providence, had placed at his command, died at his house Grosvenor-square, London, 18th January 1787, and was privately buried in St. James's church. His lordship was married to his second wife Mary sister of Sir Edward Broughton in 1782, who survived him without issue. Though well educated, and with a mind stored with all the learning of antient and modern times, he published only three sermons preached on public occasions.

EGGELING, John Henry, a native of Bremen, who travelled over Europe to encrease his knowledge and enlarge his mind. On his return he was made secretary to his republic, and died respected 1713, aged 74. He wrote explications of medals and other antient monuments.

EGINHART. Vid. ÆGINHARD.

EGMONT, Lamoral count, one of the lords of the Low Countries, born in Holland 1522. He distinguished himself in the service of Charles V. in Africa, and also under Philip II. at the battles of St Quintin and Gravelines where he was general of horse. Though attached to his sovereign he seemed unwilling to assist in the enslaving of his country, and therefore being suspected by the duke of Alva of favoring the cause of the prince of Orange, and moreover hated by the tyrant for his superior abilities, he was beheaded by the governor's order at Brussels 5th June 1568, together with Philip de Montmorency count Horn. On this dreadful occasion the French ambassador wrote to his court that he had seen that head fall which had twice made France to tremble, and Philip observed that the heads of falcons were of greater account than many thousands of frogs. Some others of the family were equally illustrious in arms. The count's last descendant died 1707, aged 38, in the service of France.

EGMONT, Justus Van, a painter, born at Leyden 1602. He travelled early, and resided a long time in France, where he was painter to Lewis XIII. and XIV. and and one of the 12 elders in the establishment of the academy for painting and sculpture. He returned to Antwerp, where he died eighth January 1674, and his wife June 1685.

EGHATIUS, John Baptist, a learned man, born at Venice 1473. He was pupil to the famous Politian, and like him he contributed by the force and excellence of his instructions to the revival of learning. When grown old, the republic paid him the highest honors for his eminent services in education, and for his virtues, and decreed that his stipend should be continued, as public teacher, and that he should be exempted from all taxes. The works which he published are numerous, but they do not exhibit any marks of superior excellence, as the abilities of the author consisted chiefly in an astonishing retentive memory, in a striking ready elocution, and in a convincing mode of conveying instruction. This respectable man died at Venice 1553, leaving his estate and fine library to the three illustrious families of Molino, Lauredano, and Bragadeno. His works are orations,—epistles,—a poetical panegyric on Francis I. of France,—de Romanis principibus vel Cæsaribus,—de exemplis virorum illustrium,—on the origin of the Turks, &c.

EHRET, George Dionysius, a German, eminent as a painter of flowers. After painting for Mr. Clifford of Holland, the beautiful figures of the Hortus Cliffortianus, he came to England, where he met with great encouragement, and was made member of the royal society. One hundred of his botanical figures appeared in the Plantæ selectæ. He died 1770, aged 60.

EISEN, Charles an artist, who died poor at Brussels, January 4th 1778. He made excellent designs for Fontaine's tales 1762, for Ovid's metamorphoses 1767, for the Henriade, &c.

EISENGREIN, Martin, D.D. a native of Stutgard, chancellor of the university of Ingoldstadt, died 1578. Though he gloried in abandoning the party of anti-christ, with the protestants, he afterwards altered his opinion, embraced the popish religion, and became a violent supporter of its tenets. His writings were mostly controversial.

EISENSCHMIDT, John Gaspar, a German mathematician and physician, born at Strasburg, where he died 1712, aged 56. He was intimate with du Verney, Tournefort, and other learned men. He wrote a treatise on the weights and measures of various nations, and the value of ancient coins, and a treatise on the figure of the earth.

EKINS, Jeffery, D.D. an English divine, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He held successively the rectories of Quainton, Sedgfield, and Morpeth, Durham, and was made dean of Carlisle. He published a translation of Apollonius Rhodius' loves of Jason and Medea, 3 vols. 4to. 1771, and died 1791.

ELBEE, N. d', a native of Poitou, for some time engaged in the service of Saxony. During the revolution he espoused the cause of his suffering countrymen in la Vendée, and put himself at the head of the royalists there, 1793, and, by the most masterly manœuvres, the greatest intrepidity, and the most consummate prudence, he succeeded in defeating all the republican forces sent for his destruction. After the victories of Grolleau, Thonars, Saumur, Chatenay, Cliflot, &c. he was unfortunately defeated at the battle of Chollet, and retired to Noirmontiers, where he was taken, and condemned to be shot. This extraordinary man, the bravest and the most formidable of the royalists of la Vendée, was then aged 42.

ELBENE, Alphonfus d', a native of Florence, bishop of Albi, died 8th February 1608, in an advanced age. His works are, de regno Burgundiæ & Arelatis, 4to. 1602—de familiâ Capeti, 1595, 8vo. &c. He was succeeded as bishop by his nephew Alphonfus, who quitted his dignity, in the civil troubles of Languedoc, and died at Paris, counsellor of state, 1661.

ELBŒUF, René de Lorraine, marquis d', seventh son of Claude duke of Guise, died 1566. His grandson Charles married Catharine, the daughter of Henry IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrées, and died 1657. These great and illustrious characters were concerned in the intrigues and tumults of the French court under Richelieu and Mazarin. The last male descendant of this noble house was Emanuel Maurice, duc d'Elbœuf, who died in France 1763, aged 86. He is particularly known as the discoverer of Herculanum. As he had served the emperor in Naples, he settled there, at Portici, and being offered pieces of ancient marbles, to ornament his villa, by a peasant, who found them in digging a well, he purchased the ground and by carefully making excavations Herculanum was discovered.

ELBRUCHT, John van, a painter, born at Elbourg, near Campen, 1500. He settled at Antwerp, where some of his pieces are preserved, especially, in the Fishmongers' chapel, the miraculous draught of fishes. His landscapes, human figures, and his stormy sea, were admirable.

ELEANOR, DUCHESS OF GUIENNE, succeeded her father, William IX. in 1137, though only 15, and the next year she married Lewis VII. king of France, whom she accompanied to the holy land. Lewis was a character full of oddity and superstition, and when he cropped his hair, and shaved his head, at the infliction of Peter of Lombardy, who told him that God hated long hair, he soon appeared ridiculous, and consequently despicable to his wife, who was playful and volatile. His conduct, it is said, produced inconstancy, and Eleanor passed many guilty hours in the company of her uncle, Raymond prince of Antioch, and of Saladin, a Turk, of commanding appearance; and when Lewis complained of her levity, on his return to France, a quarrel arose, and a divorce ensued, 1152. Six weeks after, Eleanor married Henry duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. of England, by whom she had four sons and a daughter. Guienne and Poictou, the dowry which she brought to her husband, afterwards proved the source of those dreadful wars which for three centuries deluged France with English blood. Eleanor gave up, in 1162, Guienne to her second son, Richard, and died 1204, a nun in the abbey of Fontevault. Her history was published at Rotterdam by Larrey, 1691, 12mo. Her quarrel with her husband, who had an adulterous intercourse with the fair Rosamond of Clifford, in Woodstock-park, incited her to encourage the rebellion of her sons against their father, and at last procured her imprisonment for sixteen years.

ELEAZAR, high-priest of Judea after his brother Simon, 292 B.C. It is said that he gave Ptolemy Philadelphus a copy of the bible, which was by order of the monarch translated by 70 persons, and is now known by the name of the septuagint.

ELEUTHERIUS, a native of Nicopolis, made pope 170. He opposed the Valentinians with great zeal, and died 185.

ELI, the high-priest and the judge of the Israelites, B.C. 1156. was regardless of the licentious conduct of his sons, Hophni and Phineas, against whom the anger of the Lord was announced in a vision revealed to the young prophet Samuel. The aged father heard the threatened punishment with resignation, and when the ark of God was taken by the Philistines, and his two sons slain in battle, he, at the melancholy report, fell back from his feat, and broke his neck, the 93d year of his age.

ELIAS, Matthew, a painter, born at Peene, near Cassel, of obscure parents, 1658. As he was one day keeping the only cow belonging to his widowed mother, Corbeen, the famous painter, observed him making a fortification of mud by the road-side, and, pleased with the regularity of his works, and the attitude of his figures, he stopped, and prevailed upon him to come to Dunkirk and live with him. Here he engaged the affection of his friend and patron, by his great application and his superior abilities; and at the age of 20 he was enabled to go to Paris, further to improve himself. His pieces soon gained the public attention; but though courted and flattered, Elias never forgot his gratitude and respect to his kind benefactor. He married at Paris, and was appointed professor at St. Luke, and raised to other respectable offices. He afterwards visited Dunkirk, and settled there, employing his pencil in adorning the churches and chapels of that part of France. He lived always with the same regularity and temperance. Mild in his manners, inoffensive in his conduct, he was seldom seen but at church and in his work room. He worked till the last period of life, and expired 22d April 1741, aged 82, highly respected. He had only one son, who died doctor of the Sorbonne at Paris; and he never had more than one pupil, Carlier, as he rather discouraged the attempts to painting, which were attended with great trouble, and often unrewarded. Though correct and grand in his drawings, he failed in his draperies; and some of his female figures are represented without judgment and without taste.

ELIAS, Levita, a German rabbi, of the 16th century. He taught Hebrew at Venice and Rome, and was a very learned man and a most judicious critic. He published, lexicon Chaldaicum, 1541, folio—traditio doctrinæ, 1538, 4to.—some Hebrew grammars—nomenclatura Hebraica, 1542, 4to.—collectio locorum in quibus Chaldaus paraphrastes interjecit nomen Messia Christi, &c. 1572, 8vo.

ELICH, Lewis Philip, a native of Marburg, known in the 17th century for his foolish book, de magia diabolicâ, which was cancelled by the magistrates, but afterwards published at Frankfort under a different title, 1607. He now avoided persecution by flight, and turned Roman catholic. He published another book at Frankfort, 1609, de miseriâ hominis, &c. He was immoral and impious in his sentiments, and his conduct has been warmly attacked and exposed by his opponent, Tandler, professor of medicine at Wittenberg.

ELICHMAN, John, a native of Silesia, who practised physic at Leyden, and was well acquainted with sixteen languages, and, according to Salmalius, superior to every European in the knowledge of Persian. He wrote in Arabic, de usu Arabicæ linguæ in medicinâ, 1636—a dissertation de termino vitæ, &c. 1639—and a Latin translation of Cebes' picture, printed at Leyden, 1640, with a Greek and Arabic version.

ELIEZER, a rabbi, of the 8th century, said by some to be contemporary with Christ. His valuable "chapters, or sacred history," were translated into Latin, with notes, by Vorstius, 1664, 4to.

ELIJAH, an illustrious prophet of Israel, under Ahab and Abaziah. After suffering great persecution from queen Jezebel, he was taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, 895 B.C. and left his mantle and his prophetic powers to his servant Elisha.

ELIOT, Thomas, a native of Suffolk, sheriff of Cambridge under Henry VIII. He chiefly resided at Cambridge, and was the author of the first dictionary, Latin and English, ever published in England. He died 1546.

ELIOT, John, a puritan, born in Devonshire or Cornwall, and educated at Cambridge. He went to America in 1631, and established a grammar school and an independent congregation at Roxburg. In his zeal to make converts, he applied himself to learn the Indian language, 1646, and, as a voluntary missionary, he converted many of the natives to the Christian religion, and, to enlarge their understanding, translated into their language the bible, and some popular tracts. He died at Roxburg 1689.

ELIOTT, for John, a native of Peebles, of obscure origin. He showed great application in his youth, and, by the direction of his father-in-law, he became well acquainted with Latin and Greek. He was first employed in the shop of an apothecary in the Hay-market, London, and quitting this, for more venturous services, he went to sea as surgeon. A rich prize soon rewarded his labors, and enabled him, on his return to London, to assume the air and the name of physician. He was in this new character befriended by sir William Duncan, and soon gained reputation and opulence. His address greatly recommended him, and though he was neither very learned nor very ingenious, he however became one of the most popular physicians in London; his fees amounted to little less than £5,000 a-year; and such was his consequence, that he was created a baronet, by the influence of madame Schwellenberg and lord Sackville. Thus raised to eminence, and patronized by the prince of Wales, and courted by the great, sir John showed that he knew well how to use the favors of fortune. His hospitality was very great; but while the friend of the witty and the learned, while courted by M^r Pherfon, Horace Walpole, Astle, Townley, Whitefoord, Armitrong, and others, he did not forget the labors of his profession, nor did he, while attending the opulent, disdain to administer to the poor without fee or reward. It is supposed that the hospitable treats with which he delighted his friends, and the pleasures of the table, in which he moderately indulged, hastened the decay decay of his constitution. In the languishing hour of sickness he tried in vain the waters of Bath and other places, and sea voyages. He died suddenly, at Brocket-hall, it was imagined, from the rupture of one of the larger vessels, and was buried at Hatfield, 1787. He left a handsome fortune, to be divided among his eight surviving children.

ELIOTT, George Augustus, the brave defender of Gibraltar, was born at Stobbs, Roxburghshire, 1718, the youngest of the nine sons of Sir Gilbert Eliott, of an antient family, said to have accompanied the conqueror in his invasion of England. He was educated under a private tutor, and then went to Leyden, where he made great progress in military science, which he completed at the école royale of La Fere in Picardy. He afterwards served in the Prussian service, and on his return to Scotland in his 17th year, he entered as volunteer in the 23d regiment of foot. The next year he went into the engineer corps at Woolwich, and then by his uncle's interest became adjutant of the second troop of horse grenadiers. He went with this highly disciplined regiment into Germany, and was at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded. After rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel in this regiment, he resigned his commission as engineer, and was soon after made aid de-camp to George II. In 1759 he quitted his regiment to raise and discipline the first regiment of light horse called after him Eliott's, and with them in the character of brigadier general, he went in an expedition to the French coast, and afterwards to Germany, where discipline, activity, and enterprize reflected the highest honor on the general, and on the men. He was recalled from Germany to be second in command in the expedition against the Havannah, where his intrepid courage in the action, and his great humanity towards the conquered, were eminently displayed. At the peace, the gallant regiment was reviewed in Hyde park by the king, who was so pleased with their appearance and so grateful for their valor that he bestowed upon them the appellation of royals. In 1775, general Eliott succeeded A'Court as commander in chief in Ireland, but before he had completely taken possession of his office, he was nominated governor of Gibraltar, an appointment for which, by his habits, his intrepidity, and his experience, he was well calculated. While he established in the garrison a severe but salutary system of discipline, he exhibited to his soldiers an example for them to follow. He inured himself to the severest privations, he eat no flesh, nor drank wine, but lived on vegetables and water; he never slept more than four hours at a time, and therefore the abstemiousness and the vigilance of the general were soon seen and imitated as the best qualifications of a good soldier. Thus persevering, active, vigilant, he maintained the honor of his country, and defended a barren rock with victorious success against the combined forces of Spain and France. The skill and valor displayed in the memorable siege of 1782, had fixed upon the gallant commander and his brave garrison the eyes and the admiration of the world, and therefore on his return to England, at the peace, he was greeted by the nation with acclamations, by the senate with thanks, and by the king with the honorable reward of a peerage by the title of lord Heathfield, baron Gibraltar. This illustrious veteran died at his chateau, at Aix-la-Chapelle, of a second attack of the palsy, sixth July 1790, in his 73d year, at a moment when he was preparing to return through Leghorn to his favorite garrison. His remains were brought over to England, and buried at Heathfield, Suffex, where a handsome monument is erected. Lord Heathfield had married Ann daughter of Sir Francis Drake, who died 1769, leaving a son, who succeeded to his father's honors, and a daughter married to J. T. Fuller of Bailey-park, Suffex.

ELIOTT, Richard, an English divine, born at King's bridge, Devon, and educated at Bene't college, Cambridge, where he proceeded A.B. and took orders. He was expelled from St. George's chapel, Hyde-park, for printing a sermon on salvation by faith without works, and afterwards became minister of a dissenting congregation, Glass-house yard, Aldersgate street. He died suddenly in his pulpit 1789. He published some controversial tracts and sermons, and defended himself against the attack of Dr. Dodd, about his discourse on faith.

ELISHA, a prophet among the Israelites. He was called from the plough to become the servant of Elijah, and afterwards when his master was carried up to heaven in a chariot of fire, he received his mantle and was appointed his successor. He was highly respected by the people of Judea and by the Syrians, who frequently consulted him. He died at Samaria about 830. B.C.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by Ann Boleyn, was born seventh September 1533. She was declared illegitimate by her capricious father, but her dying mother recommended her to the care of Parker afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, by whom her principles of religion were fixed, and her mind cultivated and improved. She lived in privacy and retirement, but on Mary's accession she was imprisoned and nearly sacrificed to the queen's bigotry by the influence of bishop Gardiner, who represented her as the future prop of protestantism. Philip, however, interceded for her, as he already marked her for his second wife on Mary's decease. She was drawn from prison to sit on the throne 1558, and thus educated in the school of adversity, she came to govern a gallant and rising nation, and by her wisdom and energy to fix their destinies on the most glorious basis. With a soul heroic and magnanimous, an understanding polished by the knowledge of literature and of the learned languages, she yet possessed the weakness of her sex, and loved to be admired and courted for the elegancies of her dress, and the beauties of her person. Prudent and discerning in all her measures, she proceeded with caution in her determination to establish the protestant religion, she treated the catholic party with tenderness, and professed a great willingness to be on amicable terms even with pope Paul IV. Before she ascended the throne the king of Sweden made proposals of marriage to her, which she rejected. Philip her brother-in-law was equally unsuccessful, and the duke of Anjou who for a while seemed to be treated with partiality and affection, was dismissed at last with coldness and indifference. Her parliament indeed interfered, but she declared that she was wedded to her people, and that she wished her tomb-stone to record that after reigning so long she had lived and died a virgin queen. Authors have been puzzled to account for this settled aversion to the marriage state, and whilst some have suggested that this coldness of constitution arose from natural causes, others have intimated that her hours of retirement were not always devoted to continence. The suspicions are wanton, false and illiberal; though she was beautiful and young, and loved entertainments, dress, and pleasure, though she selected the handsomest and best shaped men, such as Leicester and Essex, for her favorites, yet nothing can be advanced with truth against the chastity of her character. Though she had favorites, in no instance is it mentioned that she forgot her rank or the dignity of her sex, and indeed there were so many watchful eyes about her court and person, that had she been incontinent, her weakness would have been divulged, and her amours recorded to posterity. That she wished to govern her favorites, and by them her people, by the soft influence which female charms possess over the heart is probable: but when it is considered that when settled on her throne she was nearly 30, that the warmer passions of youth had subsided, and that her great ambition was to rule without a superior or rival in the affection of her subjects, the wonders of her celibacy will cease. She was fortunate in the choice of her ministers, but though she could depend on Cecil and on Walsingham, she yet loved business, and regarded the prosperity and happiness of the nation as her immediate care. It is unnecessary here to mention the glorious events which marked her reign. The most indelible blot however, on her character, is her treatment of the unfortunate Mary, whom as her rival in beauty, and as her presumptive heir she hated. Instead of pitying her misfortunes indeed, she deceived her; and instead of granting her liberty, or replacing her on her throne, she ignominiously led her to a scaffold, and then meanly pretended to blame the horrible proceedings as the act of her ministers. After an illustrious reign of 44 years four months and six days, and after seeing her people grown powerful in arms, successful in extending navigation and commerce, and distinguished in science and literature, this great princess died 24th March 1603, aged 70. Never, says a Jesuit, did a crowned head better understand the art of government, and commit fewer errors in it, during a long reign. Her aim was to reign, to govern, to be mistress, to keep her people in subjection. She was not a warlike princess, but she knew so well how to train up warriors that England had not for a long time seen a greater number of them, nor more experienced.

ELIZABETH, of Austria, daughter of Maximilian II. was married to Charles IX. of France 26th November 1570 at Mezieres. The dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew overwhelmed her with grief, but as she never meddled in the public affairs of the kingdom, she avoided the dangers of politics and retained the affections of her capricious husband, who on his death-bed tenderly recommended her and her daughter to the kindness of Henry IV. king of Navarre his successor. Thus respected and beloved in France, as a most virtuous wife and most benevolent queen, she retired to Vienna after her husband's death, and though her sister-in-law, Margaret of Navarre, was different from her in temper and character, yet she honored her with her friendship, and sent her two books she had written with her own hand, one on the word of God, and the other on the remarkable events that had occurred during her residence in France. She died at Vienna, in a convent which she herself had founded, 1592, aged 38, deservedly beloved and sincerely lamented.

ELIZABETH, Petrovna, daughter of Peter the Great, was born 1709. Her rank and personal attractions made her an object of admiration among her neighbours, and among her suitors are mentioned Lewis XV. of France, Charles Augustus bishop of Lubeck, Charles Margrave of Anspach, Kouli Khan, and Lewis of Brunswick, but she rejected all. She did not however dislike favorites, as her amours were frequent, and as she declared to her confidantes she never was happy but in love. She ascended the throne of Russia in 1741, and received the appellation of humane, because she made a vow that no capital punishment should be inflicted during her reign. Severities however were practised, the public prisons were filled with wretches who frequently expired under tortures, and Elizabeth herself gave a strong example of cruelty, in condemning two ladies of her court, women of beauty and rank, the countess Bestuchef and Lapookin, to receive 50 strokes of the knout, in the open square of Petersburg, to have their tongues cut out, and to be banished to Siberia for divulging the secret amours of the empress. Though thus given to private incontinence, Elizabeth pretended to be a strict devotee; she was scrupulous in her yearly confessions at Easter, she expressed contrition for her faults, and was most punctual in all the external offices of religion. She died 25th December 1761, in the 21st year of her reign and 52d of her age. The punishment of torture, which hitherto was permitted, was abolished gradually by her successors.

ELLER DE BROOKHUSEN, John Theodore, physician to the king of Prussia, was born at Pletzkau in Anhalt-Bernburg, and died at Berlin 1760, aged 71. He was a man of great learning and of extensive experience in his profession. He wrote a Latin treatise on the knowledge and treatment of diseases, translated by Le Roy into French.

ELLIGER, Ottomar, son of a physician, was born at Gottenburg 18th September 1633. His father wished to make him a scholar, but nature had formed him for a painter, and at last the inclination of the son prevailed, and under Daniel Seghers the Jesuit of Antwerp, he soon displayed superior excellence in painting flowers and fruit. He was invited to Berlin, where he became a great favorite at court. His pieces are much admired in Germany. The time of his death is unknown.

ELLIGER, Ottomar, son of the preceding, was born at Hamburgh 16th February 1666. He studied under his father, and under Michael Van Musscher, at Amsterdam, but his great master was Laireffe. Instructed by him he soon imitated his copies, and taking nature for his model, he finished his pictures in a stile pleasing to the man of taste as well as the scholar. In his backgrounds he introduced the finest remains of Egyptian, Grecian, or Roman architecture, and every where displayed correctness of conception and sublimity of genius. His best pieces are the death of Alexander, and the nuptials of Thetis and Peleus, made for the elector of Mentz, which the prince wished to reward by granting the painter a handsome pension, and making him his principal painter. These honors Elliger refused, preferring liberty to the the service of the greatest potentates. The latter part of his life was clouded by intemperance and debauchery. He died 24th November 1732, aged 60.

ELLIS, Clement, M. A. a native of Cumberland, brought up under his uncle, Potter, bishop of Carlisle. He afterwards went to Queen's college, Oxford, and at the reformation obtained the living of Kirkby-western, Notts, and in 1693 the prebend of Southwell. He died 1700, aged 70. He was learned and exemplary as a divine, and wrote the genteel dinner,—the scripture catechist,—the self deceiver, &c.

ELLIS, John, an English poet, born in the parish of St. Clement Danes, London, 22d March 1698. As his father was a man of an eccentric, unsettled character, and his mother a fanatical dissenter, who punished him severely even for looking at a top on Sunday, his education was little attended to, though his application made up fully for the deficiencies of parental care. He was placed in the office of Taverner, a scrivener, in Threadneedle-street, where, besides the knowledge of his business, he heard and attended to the classical instructions which young Taverner, an idle scholar of Merchant-tailors' school, regularly received from his fond father. With this indolent youth, after the father's death, Ellis was united in partnership, and from his imprudence he was a great sufferer, and was long involved in difficulties, which injured his peace of mind, and prevented his prosperous settlement in the world. His literary qualifications introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned, and among his friends of merit and virtue he could number Mr. Fayington of Cambridge, Dr. King of Oxford, Moses Mendez esq. and Dr. Johnson. Though for seventy years he wrote, without however publishing, small poetical pieces, he did not neglect his business, and, as a scrivener of probity and moral honesty, he was the agent of many respectable families. In 1750 he was elected a common councilman of London; an office which he retained till his death. He was also for many years deputy of his ward, and four times elected master of the scriveners' company, and so highly esteemed by that respectable body that a picture of him was hung up in their hall. By temperance and exercise he attained a great age, though he had a weakness in one of his eyes, which, in his 86th year, passed to the other in a singular manner, which he has described in a letter to his friend Dr. Johnson. The last year of his life was clouded with distress, from which however his friends extricated him, by relieving him from indigence, in consequence of his having incautiously trusted some money, perhaps the whole of his property, into the hands of an artful villain, who was a bankrupt. Cheerful and strong even to the last, he was capable of walking twenty and even thirty miles a-day even to his 85th year. He died gently, sitting in his chair, the 31st December 1791, in his 94th year, and was buried on the 5th of January, in St. Bartholomew's church, Exchange, attended by a great number of persons, who paid this last respect to his memory. As he had been brought up a dissenter, he soon saw with disgust the hypocrisy of the sect, and instead of following them, he expressed the strongest aversion for them. His hours of relaxation were always employed in walking; and when questioned why he neglected to go to church, he replied, "Nathan walked with the Lord." To the character of an honest, upright, and independent man, he added that of poetical merit; and though his pieces possessed not superior sublimity, yet they were distinguished for neatness, elegance, spirit, and naiveté. Many of his poems were long preserved in manuscript. Besides some pieces to be found in Doddsley's collection, he wrote a translation of Dr. King's templum libertatis—a Hudibrastic travesty of Maphæus—the South Sea dream—the furrprize, or the gentleman turned apothecary—a translation of some of the epistles and of the metamorphoses of Ovid,—some parts of Æsop's fables, of Cato, and others.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, a native of Crowell, Oxfordshire, who turned quaker, by the influence of Isaac Pennington, and thus lost the protection of his father. He was for some time reader to Milton, and exposed himself to persecution on account of his religious tenets, which he ably defended. He wrote a sacred poem on the life of David—an history of the old and new testaments—besides an edition of George Fox's journal, &c. He died 1713, aged 74.

ELLYS, Anthony, an English prelate, born in 1693, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. In 1724 he was vicar of St. Olave's, Jewry, rector of St. Martin's, Ironmonger's lane, the next year prebendary of Gloucester, and in 1728 he took his degree of D.D. In 1752 he was made bishop of St. David's, and died at Gloucester 1761, and was buried in the cathedral there. Besides three occasional sermons, he published, in 1736, a plea for the sacramental test, &c. 4to.—remarks on Hume's essay on miracles; and left unpublished tracts on the liberty, spiritual and temporal, of protestants in England, &c. the first part of which was printed 1763, the second in 1765. These works prove the author to have been a man possessed of learning, of candor, of benevolence, and every Christian virtue.

ELMACINUS, George, an Egyptian, of the 13th century, author of a Saracen history, from Mohammed to the year 1118. He professed himself to be a Christian, and held places of honor under the caliphs; but the favorable manner in which he speaks of the muslimans, of Mohammed, and of his religion, suggests a suspicion that he had little of the Christian besides the name. This history has been translated from the Saracen into Latin by Erpenius, and completed by Golius, Leyden, 1625, folio, and into French by Vattier, Paris, 1657; but both translations are very incorrect.

ELMENHORST, Geverhart, a critic, of Hamburg, who died 1621. He published Cebes, Leyden, 1618, and distinguished himself by his learned notes on Minutius Felix, and other ancient authors.

ELMENHORST, Henry, author of a German treatise on public spectacles, Hamburg, 1688, 4to. He does not consider them as injurious to manners. This subject has been treated by Rousseau and d'Alembert.

ELPHINSTONE, William, a Scotch divine, born in the county of Stirling 1432, and educated at St. Salvador's, St. Andrew's, and at Paris, where he studied the law. On his return home he took orders, and became archdeacon of St. Andrew's, provost of St. Giles, Edinburgh, and bishop of Aberdeen. In 1483 he went as ambassador to France, and in 1489 to Henry VII. of England; and in 1495 he was made chancellor of Scotland. The death of king James, at the battle of Flodden-field, 1512, so overpowered his spirits that he died soon after, aged 81. He was a munificent benefactor to the university of Aberdeen, and his learning is evinced by the history of Scotland, a MS. copy of which is preserved in the Bodleian.

ELSHIMER, Adam, a celebrated painter, born at Frankfort on the Maine 1574. Though the son of a taylor, he by his industry was enabled to go to Rome, where he soon became a distinguished artist. His landscapes, histories, and night-pieces, are so highly finished, so scarce, and so valuable, that they are to be seen only in the collection of princes. He was a man of a melancholy disposition, and died 1610.

ELSNER, James, a Prussian, professor of theology and oriental languages at Lingen, and afterwards master of Joachim's school, Berlin. In 1730 he became pastor of one of the Berlin churches, and was made member of the academy of sciences, and confessor of the royal consistory. He wrote observationes sacre in novi testam. libros Utræ. 1720, 1728—explanation of the epistle to the Philippians—state of the Greek church in Turkey, 8vo. 1737. He died 1750, aged 58.

ELSTOB, William, a learned divine and Saxon linguist, born at Newcastle 1673, and educated at Eton and Catharine-hall, Cambridge. He afterwards removed to Queen's college, Oxford, and thence was chosen fellow of University, where he was tutor. In 1702 he became rector of St. Swithin and St. Mary Bothaw, London, where he died, twelve years after. He published Lupus Saxon history translated into Latin, and also Ascham's Latin letters, and wrote an essay on the great affinity and mutual agreement of the two professions, law and divinity. He was engaged also in the laborious edition of the Saxon laws, with notes, &c. which he did not live to complete, and which was finished by Dr. Wilkins, 1721.

ELSTOB, Elizabeth, sister of the preceding, born in 1683, was well skilled in the Saxon language. She retired, after her brother's death, to Eveham, Worcestershire, where she kept a small school. By lord Oxford's interference, she obtained from queen Caroline an annuity of £21; but after the death of her majesty she was again reduced to poverty, and though skilled in eight languages, she was obliged to become a governess. She was then engaged in the duchess of Portland's family, where she continued seventeen years, and died at Bultrode 30th May 1756. She gave an English translation to the homily, which her brother published from the Saxon 1709. In 1715 she published a Saxon grammar, and, as Rowe Mores observes, "she was the indefessa comes of her brother's studies, a female student of the university, upon a genteel fortune, but pursuing too much the drug called learning."

ELSWICH, John Herman d', a Lutheran divine, who was born at Rensburg, Holstein, and died at Stade 1721, aged 37. He published Simonius' book de literis pereuntibus, with notes,—Launius de variâ Aristotelis fortunâ, &c.

ELSYNCE, Henry, an English gentleman, appointed, by Laud's interest, clerk of the house of commons. He was born at Battersea 1598, and educated at Westminster and Christ-church, Oxford. He spent some years in travelling; and when appointed clerk to the commons, he displayed such correctness and ability in his office that he was respected by all parties, and consulted on every occasion. He resigned this honorable office when he saw the determination of parliament to try the king; and he retired to his house at Hounslow, where he died, 1654. To learning, and the knowledge of French and Italian, he added the noble character of an honest man. He published "the ancient method and manner of holding parliaments in England," 1663, reprinted 1768, and wrote a tract concerning the proceedings in parliament, never published, and other things.

ELVIUS, Peter, a native of Upsal, secretary to the Stockholm royal academy of sciences. He was eminent for his knowledge of mathematics and his love of science. He made surveys of the Swedish lakes, and of the coasts of the country, besides observations on the heavenly bodies, from Uraniburg; and he constructed also some ingenious machines worked upon by water. He wrote a journal of a tour in Sweden, published, Stockholm, 1751. He died 1749, aged 39.

ELWES, John, of saving memory, was son of a brewer in Southwark, of the name of Meggot. Though he lost his father when 4 years old, he was sent to Westminster-school, where he continued ten or twelve years; from whence he went to Geneva, where, for three years, he distinguished himself in dividing the palm of horsemanship with Mr. Worsley and sir Sydney Meadows. On his return to England he visited, in the assumed garb of a miser, his uncle, sir Harvey Elwes, who lived in Essex, and whose sole pleasure was the hoarding up of money. He afterwards succeeded to his fortune, which was little less than £250,000, and, agreeable to his will, changed the name of Meggot for that of Elwes. He was then 40 years old; but though known, for the last fifteen years, in all the circles of fashion and dissipation in London, he did not, upon the acquisition of such an ample fortune, to which indeed his own was equal, launch out into the extravagancies of the times, but, following his uncle's example, he determined to encrease it with all his power. He was naturally fond of gaming, and did not give it up till late in life. "He has been known," as his biographer has observed, "after sitting up a whole night at play, for thousands, in elegant apartments, ornamented with the most splendid decorations, and with waiters at his call, to walk out about 4 in the morning, and proceed to Smithfield, to meet his own cattle coming to market from Thoydon-hall, Essex, where he had a farm. Forgetful of the scenes which he had just left, this singular man would stand there, often in the cold and rain, disputing with a carcase-butcher for perhaps a shilling. Sometimes, when the cattle did not arrive at the hour he expected, he would walk on, in the mire and dirt, to meet them, and more than once he has gone the whole way to his farm, without stopping, though 17 miles from London. Denying himself every earthly comfort, he would walk home to London in the rain, sooner than pay a shilling for a coach; he would sit in wet clothes, rather than have a fire to dry them; he would eat his provisions in the last state of putrefaction, sooner than have a fresh joint from the butcher; and he wore a wig for a fortnight, which I," says the biographer, "saw him pick up from a rut in a lane." Yet when this inordinate passion of saving did not interfere, he performed very kind offices, and even went a great way to serve those who applied to him. In 1774, when aged 60, he was elected member for Berkshire, and for twelve years served the county, the most independent man in the house of commons. He came in without expence, and therefore expected no favor, and voted as in the purest days of parliamentary representation. In 1788 he began to feel the infirmities of age, but with the strongest antipathy to the drugs and pills of apothecaries, he endeavoured to support life by regular exercise and by temperance. In November 1789 nature seemed exhausted, and, no longer able to walk, he crept into his bed on the 21st, and on the 26th expired, without a groan, leaving, besides entailed estates at Marcham, Berks, in Essex, &c. upwards of £500,000 to his natural sons. Though, however, so fond of money, he never did an unjust action to encrease his store. He was cruel to himself, and benevolent to others. To others he lent much, to himself he denied every thing.

ELXAI, or ELXÆUS, founder of a sect among the Jews in the 2d century, commanded his followers, whenever they prayed, always to direct their faces towards Jerusalem. As he was an enemy to continence, he obliged all followers to marry. This sect spread around Jordan, Palestine, and Arabia, was not extinct till the 4th century.

ELYOT, Thomas. Vid. ELIOT.

ELYS, Edmund, a native of Devonshire, educated at Baliol college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and published some divine poems and miscellanea, in Latin and English verse, 1658. In 1659 he succeeded his father as rector of East Allington, Devonshire, from which he was afterwards ejected as a nonjuror. He was a man of extensive learning. His pamphlet against Tillotson's sermons on the incarnation, and his volume of letters, were much admired. He died after 1693.

ELZEVIUS, celebrated printers at Amsterdam and Leyden, inferior to the Stephens in learning, but superior to them in the neatness and elegance of their small characters. There were five brothers, Lewis, Benaventure, Abraham, Lewis, and Daniel. Lewis became known at Leyden 1595, and was the first who marked the distinction between v consonant and u vowel. Daniel, though he left some children in his profession, was the last of his family distinguished over other printers. He died 1681. The catalogue of their editions was printed at Amsterdam 1674, 12mo. Their Virgil, Terence, and Greek testament, are most beautiful and valuable books.

EMANUEL succeeded John II. as king of Portugal 1495, and distinguished himself by the liberal manner in which he patronized commercial adventures among his subjects. Their ancient privileges were restored to the nobility; and, by the persevering boldness of the Portuguese, the way to India by the Cape was discovered by Gama; Brazil was visited in 1501 by Cabral, and a regular intercourse was established with the kingdom of Congo and the other states on the African coast. This popular monarch, deservedly called the great, died 1521, aged 53.

EMEBRAET, a Flemish painter, who, after living some time at Rome, settled at Antwerp, and acquired distinction in landscape painting. His best piece is in the church of the Carmelites at Antwerp. He lived in the middle of the 17th century.

EMERI, Sebastian, an advocate in the parliament of Paris, in the 16th century, known for his independent spirit in refusing to defend the dukes of Angoulême against the constable of Bourbon. His severe satire against Poyet, afterwards chancellor of France, who espoused her cause, procured his banishment from court. He retired in disgust to a monastery, where he died, devoted to the services of religion.

EMERSON, William, an eminent mathematician, born, 14th May 1701, at Hurworth, in the county of Durham. He for a while followed the profession of his father as schoolmaster; but, either from dislike to the employment, or warmth of temper, he resigned it, and lived satisfied with a small paternal estate of about 60l. or 70l. a-year. His mind had been well cultivated. He was not only a general scholar, but well skilled in classical learning, and knew something of physic. With a noble independence of mind, his manners, as well as his dress and conversation, were singular and eccentric. His dress, when in company, consisted of a flaxen wig without a single crooked hair in it; his shirt had no opening before, but buttoned close at the collar behind; his waistcoat always open before, except the lower button; and his coat, the only one he had, always open; with one hat, which served him the whole of life, as he gradually lessened the flaps, bit by bit, as it lost its elasticity. He always walked, though he kept a horse; and when pressed by the duke of Manchester, who often was delighted to pay him a visit, to get into his coach, he would answer, "Damn your whim-wham I had rather walk." When he had any thing for the press, he walked to London, and corrected every sheet himself. He was very fond of fishing, and generally stood up to his middle in the water while engaged in it. After hard study he retired to the ale-house for relaxation, and there procured whomever he could to drink and to talk with him. He was a married man. He lived very healthy, till 1781, when, being afflicted with the stone, and apprehending his dissolution, he sold all his books to a York bookseller. He expired 26th May 1782, aged near 81. His publications were sixteen in number, and all on mathematics, fluxions, algebra, optics, navigation, and mechanics. They are considered as very learned and accurate, as he never advanced a proposition before he had first tried it in practice.

EMILIANO, John, an Italian philosopher and physician, of the 16th century, author of a tract published at Venice, 1584, 4to. called historia naturalis de ruminantibus et ruminacione.

EMLYN, Thomas, a learned English divine. He was born at Stamford, Lincolnshire, 27th May 1663, and educated by his parents for the ministry among the dissenters. After being at a private school, he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where however he staid little time, and removed to Doolittle's academy, near London. He became, in 1683, chaplain to the countess of Donegal, and went over to Belfast in Ireland, and lived in her family even after her marriage to sir William Franklin. He was here so much respected and beloved that his patron sir William offered him a living in England, which he refused, in consequence of his adherence to the nonconformist doctrines. The troubles of Ireland, however,

ever, soon put an end to his peaceful retirement, and these, together with some domestic quarrels, occasioned the breaking up of lady Donegal's family, so that Emlyn returned to London about 1688. Though he occasionally officiated, he acquired no permanent settlement till May 1689, when, on the invitation of sir Robert Rich, one of the lords of the admiralty, he undertook the care of a dissenting congregation at Leostoff. Here he continued about a year and a half, and applied himself to the examination of the then warmly disputed trinitarian controversy. With Manning, a neighbouring nonconformist, he deeply studied the subject; but he did not agree with his friend in embracing Socinian doctrines, but inclined in opinion to Arianism. The flight of James II. from Ireland allowed the dissenters to re-establish their regular congregations, and Emlyn, who was well known as a preacher in Dublin, was invited to settle there by his friend Boyse, and to share with him the labors of the ministry over his congregation in Wood-street. Emlyn consented, and in 1691 removed to Dublin, and three years after he married a rich widow of the name of Bury. In this active scene he displayed great powers of eloquence as a preacher; he was universally followed; and he ensured the public esteem by his discourses, especially by that pathetic sermon called funeral consolations, which he delivered in consequence of his wife's death. This event, which happened 1701, and was followed by the death of his mother, and soon after of a son, affected him most bitterly; but to domestic calamities was now to be added public persecution. His opinions with respect to the Trinity began to be suspected by some of the neighbouring ministers, and he openly declared his sentiments, and after much disputation he was suspended from his office, and persuaded abruptly to leave the country. He came in consequence to London, where he published his case; but, after ten weeks' absence, he determined to return to Dublin to his family, and there roused the indignation and the animosity of all parties against him by the publication of his "humble inquiry into the scripture account of Jesus Christ, or a short argument concerning his deity and glory, according to the gospel." This book, which, whatever were its merits or demerits, ought to have been candidly examined, drew the arm of the law upon its author. He was arrested at the instance of the dissenters, his book was seized, and he was tried, and found guilty of blasphemously asserting that Jesus Christ was not equal to God the Father, to whom he was subject, and that with a seditious intention. He was accordingly sentenced by the lord chief justice to suffer a year's imprisonment, to pay a fine of 100*l.* to the queen, and be confined till paid, and to find sureties for his future good behaviour. The ignominy of the pillory was not added to this sentence, as he was a man of letters; but he was conducted round the four courts to be exposed with a label on his breast. After two years' confinement the fine was reduced to 70*l.* and he was liberated. He returned to London, where he occasionally preached among the dissenters; but by the death of some of his friends and supporters, his congregation was diminished, and at last he retired to peaceful solitude, where he engaged himself in polemical divinity. He was engaged with several divines in controversy about various parts of scripture, especially about the authenticity of the 7th verse of St. John's 5th chapter 1st epistle, which he maintained to be surreptitious; an opinion which several learned men have adopted. Though his enemies were numerous, yet he had several invitations to take an active part in the ministry, particularly at Exeter; but all these he rejected, satisfied with his retirement, and the partial assistance which he occasionally gave his friends. He was much esteemed by Dr. Samuel Clarke, who visited him with real friendship and undisguised confidence. Emlyn died 30th July 1743, aged 79. He was buried in Bunhill-fields, and his funeral sermon was preached by his friend Mr. Forster, and he is represented as "one of the highest examples of substantial unaffected piety, of serious rational devotion, of a steady unshaken integrity, and an undaunted Christian courage." His writings, which are numerous, and on controversial subjects, are even now held in estimation by some, who have embraced his opinions as an unitarian or high arian. Some memoirs of his life were also published by his son, Sollom Emlyn, in 1746, prefixed to a collection of his works, 2 vols. 8vo. Sollom Emlyn was a counsellor, and edited lord Hale's history of the pleas of the crown, 2 vols. folio, 1731, and died 1756. His son, Thomas, is a barrister, and fellow of the royal society.

EMMA, daughter of Richard II. duke of Normandy, married Etheldred king of England, with whom she fled, on the invasion of the Danes. She afterwards married Canute; and when her son Edward, called the confessor, ascended the throne, she reigned conjointly with him. Her enemy the earl of Kent opposed her; and when she appealed for assistance to her relation the bishop of Winchester, she was accused of criminal intercourse with that prelate; a circumstance, from which she extricated herself by walking barefoot, and unhurt, over nine burning ploughshares, after the manner of the times.

EMMIUS, Ubo, a professor of Groningen, born at Gretha, in East Friesland, 1547. He studied successively at Embden, Bremen, Rostock, and Geneva, and at his return was appointed rector of Norden college, 1579. He was however expelled from his office, for refusing to subscribe the confession of Augsburg, and 1588 he became rector of Leer college, which he raised to high eminence and distinction. In 1594 he was appointed over Groningen college, and when it was changed, in 1614, into an university, he was selected to be professor of history and Greek. After a life usefully and honorably spent in the service of the public, this worthy and learned man died at Groningen 1625, leaving several children by two wives. He was author of several works, the most known of which are, Vetus Græcia illustrata, 3 vols. published after his death—history of William Lewis count Nassau—decades rerum Friscarum, &c.—chronological and genealogical works—vita et sacra eleusinia Davidis, Georgii, &c.

EMPEDOCLES, a philosopher of Sicily, who followed the doctrines of Pythagoras, B.C. 444. He wrote tragedies, &c. and refused the sovereign power over his country, offered him by his fellow citizens. According to the more received opinion, he threw himself into the crater of mount Ætna.

EMPEREUR, a well known French engraver, in the 18th century, whose best pieces are, the triumph of Silenus.

Silenus and the bathers, after Vanloo—Aurora and Tithonus, and the rape of Europa, after Pierre—Pyramus and Thibbe, from Natoire, &c.

EMPEREUR, Constantine I, of Oppyck, in Holland, was professor of Hebrew at Leyden, and died 1648, at an advanced age. His works are chiefly translations of Jewish and Talmudical books, which display deep research and great knowledge of oriental literature. He wrote also de mensuris templi, 4to. 1630.

EMPOLI, Jacopo da, an historical painter of Empoli, born 1554. He studied Andrew del Sarto's works, and rose to great eminence. He died 1640.

EMPORIUS, a learned rhetorician in the 7th century. His writings on his art were printed, Paris, 1599, 4to.

EMPSON, sir Richard, the favorite of Henry VII. was son of a sieve-maker at Towcester, Northamptonshire. His conduct in raising the king's revenues, and the oppressions of which he was guilty, rendered him unpopular, and in the beginning of the next reign, he was beheaded, with his friend and coadjutor Dudley, 1510.

ENCOLPIUS, the favorite of the emperor Alexander, whose history he wrote. The work is not extant, though a translation of it was introduced to the world by Thomas Eliot, in the reign of Henry VIII. who said he had obtained the original Greek manuscript from a Neapolitan called Puderic. It is however considered as an imposition upon the public, probably attempted in consequence of the success of the similar fraud of Guevara, who pretended to give the life of Marcus Aurelius taken from an old manuscript.

ENFIELD, William, a native of Sudbury, educated at Daventry, under Dr. Ashworth, and made in 1763 the minister of a dissenting congregation in Liverpool. He was in 1770 tutor in belles lettres to the Warrington academy, and afterwards, in 1785, settled as pastor of a dissenting meeting at Norwich, where he died, 1797, aged 56. He published two volumes of sermons, of considerable merit—an history of Liverpool—institutes of natural philosophy—prayers and hymns—an history of philosophy, 2 vols 4to.—biographical sermons—the speaker, a popular school book—and, since his death, 3 vols. of sermons have appeared, with his life by Dr. Aikin.

ENGELBRECHT, John, a German Lutheran, born at Brunswick 1599. After working as a clothier, he became, in 1622, a fanatical visionary, and gained the attention of the vulgar by his pretended intercourse with spirits, angels, and devils, and even with Christ himself, who, as he said, showed him his five holy wounds. As heaven and hell were thus open to his view, he received divine letters from above, and was called the mouth of the Lord. He died, neglected and despised, in 1641. His doctrines have been revived by Swedenborg, who appears to have been a more rational, though equally eccentric, fanatic.

ENGHELBRECHTSEN, Cornelius, a painter, born at Leyden 1498. He studied the works of John Van Eyck, and was the first Dutchman who painted in oil. His Christ on the cross, his Abraham's sacrifice, and his descent from the cross, are preserved in the church of Notre Dame du Marais; but his best piece is a picture with two sides, designed for the tombs of the barons Lockhorst, representing the lamb of the apocalypse. This great painter died at Leyden 1533, aged 65.

ENGHELRAMS, Cornelius, a painter in water colors, born at Malines 1527. His works, which are on religious subjects, are scattered about Germany; but his principal pieces are in the church of St. Rombout, representing the works of mercy. He died 1583, aged 56.

ENGHIEN, duke of, son of the duke of Bourbon, and grandson of the prince of Condé, was seized in the night at his seat at Ettenheim, in the territories of the elector of Baden, by an armed force, by direction of Bonaparte, and hurried to Paris. This atrocious step was followed by a mock trial, and the prince condemned for having carried arms against his country during the tyrannical reign of Robespierre. The sentence of his judges was carried into execution in the night of the 22d of March 1804, and he was shot in the wood of Vincennes. He died with heroic resignation, and rejoiced in his last moments that the soldiers who shot him were not Frenchmen, but the mercenary hirelings of the body guard of his bloody murderer.

ENGLISH, Hester, a Frenchwoman by descent, was eminent for fine writing in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Her performances are preserved in libraries and private hands. One of her pieces was preserved by Mr. Cripps, surgeon, London, called, "Octonaires upon the vanitie and inconstancie of the world, written by Ester Inglis, the firste of Januarie 1600." It is an oblong 8vo. French and English verse, the French in a print hand, the English, Italian or secretary, curiously ornamented with flowers and fruits, painted in water colors, containing on the first leaf her own picture in a small form, with the motto, "de Dieu le bien, de moy le rien." At the age of 40, she married Bartholomew Kello, a North Briton, by whom she had a son, educated at Oxford, and who died 1700, minister of Speckshall, Suffolk. One of her MSS. preserved in the Bodleian, is dedicated to her very singular friend Joseph Hall, bishop of Norwich.

ENJED M, George, an ingenious unitarian of Hungary, who died 1597. He wrote a learned book, called explicatio locorum scripturæ veteris et novi testamenti, ex quibus dogma Trinitatis stabiliri solet, 4to.

ENNIUS, Quintus, a famous old Latin poet, born in Calabria about 237 B.C. He was the first Roman who wrote in heroic verse. His poems have perished.

ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, an eminent writer, born in Italy about 473. The loss of an aunt, at the age of 16, reduced him to poverty, from which he was relieved by marrying a lady of fortune and quality. He afterwards altered his mode of life, and took orders; and his lady also retired to the seclusion of a religious life. His writings raised his reputation, and in 511 he was advanced to the bishopric of Pavia, and was afterwards engaged to negotiate an union between the western and eastern churches. Though unsuccessful, he displayed great prudence as a negotiator. He died at Padua 521. His works were published by Scottus at Tournay 1610, and at Paris by Sirmond 1611, with notes to illustrate the history of the age of the author. Another edition was published in 1696 at Paris, and one at Venice 1729, folio.

ENOCH, son of Jared, and the seventh from Adam, is celebrated in the holy scriptures for his integrity and virtues, for which he was taken up to heaven without dying, B.C. 3017, in the 365th year of his age. The prophecies of Enoch are preserved, but are regarded as apocryphal.

ENSENADA, Zeno Somo de Silva, marquis de la, an able minister of Spain. From obscurity and the office of a book-keeper to a banker, he rose to places of honor and trust; and being ennobled by the king, took the name of Ensenada (nothing in itself), either from modesty or from laudable ostentation. He was intimate with Farinelli, who, like himself, had risen from obscurity to consequence; and when dismissed from office, by the intrigues of the duke of Huescar, his friend had the boldness to reflect upon the severity of the measure in the presence of the queen. Though never reinstated in the office and influence of prime minister, he yet retained in privacy the esteem and good will of his sovereign. He died 1755.

ENT, George, an ingenious physician, born at Sandwich, Kent, 6th November 1604, and educated at Sydney college, Cambridge. He afterwards travelled, took his degree of M.D. in Padua, and at his return home was elected fellow, and afterwards president, of the college of physicians, and, at the restoration, knighted by Charles II. He died in London 13th October 1689, and was buried in St. Lawrence church, Jewry. He was eminent not only for extensive practice, but great learning. As the friend of Harvey, he wrote apologia pro circulatione sanguinis, contra Amilium Parifanum, 8vo. 1641—animadversiones in Malachie Thruston, M.D. diatribam de respirationis usu primario, 8vo.—& observationes ponderis testudinis, &c.

ENTICK, John, an English clergyman, and school-master at Stepney, well known as the author of a Latin and of a spelling dictionary. He also wrote a history of the war terminated in 1763, 5 vols. 8vo. and a history of London, 4 vols. 8vo. abridged from Stow and Maitland, and other works. He died 1780, and was buried in Stepney church-yard.

ENTINOPE, an architect of Candia, in the 5th century, one of the chief founders of Venice. He fled from the invasion of the Goths, in 405, and concealed himself in the marshes on the borders of the Adriatic, and the house he built there was the beginning of the republic. The people of Padua sought the same residence afterwards, and twenty-four houses were erected there in 413. The house of Entinope was afterwards converted into a church, dedicated to St. James, and still exists in the Rialto.

ENZINAS, Francis, a native of Burgos, 1515, known also by the name of Dryander and du Chesne. He became a disciple of Melancthon, and at Wittenberg turned protestant, as his brother, John Dryander, had done. He translated the new testament into Spanish, for which he was imprisoned fifteen months; and escaping from imprisonment, he fled to Calvin at Geneva, 1545. He wrote a history of the Low Countries, and of Spain, which forms part of the protestant martyrology printed in Germany. His brother was burnt at Rome as a heretic, 1545.

EOBANUS, Elias, surnamed Hefus, as born in an open field near Hesse, 1448, was professor of belles letters at Erfurt, Nuremberg, and Marburg. Though a good poet, an elegant scholar, and a learned man, he was very fond of drinking, and he is said to have conquered a hard German drinker by emptying a bucket of beer. He possessed all the ease and elegance of Ovid, though he was inferior in imagination. He died October 5, 1540, aged 52. His works are, Latin translations, in verse, from Theocritus and from Homer—elegies—fylvæ,—bucolics, much esteemed—epistolæ, &c. The poems were published under the name of Poematum farragines duæ, Halle, 1539, 8vo. and Frankfort, 1564, 8vo.

EON de l'Etoile, a fanatic of Britany. Taking advantage of his name, he thought himself the son of God, and the judge of quick and dead, per eum qui justificaturus est vivos et mortuos. He gave rank to his followers, calling some angels and some inferior spirits; and as he bribed those who were sent to seize him, it was considered by the vulgar that it was impossible to apprehend him. He was brought before pope Eugenius at the council of Rheims in 1448, and pretended, that when he held up to heaven the forked stick in his hand, two thirds of the world were under the power of God, and the other of himself, and when he turned the stick to the earth, that his authority extended over two parts and that of God only over one. He died wretched in prison, and some of his followers chose to be burnt rather than abjure.

EON DE BEAUMONT, Charlotte-Genevieve-Timothée d', a native of Tonnerre sur Armançon, born 5th October 1728. She was brought up as a boy by her parents, who wished at her birth to have a son, and, after going through the labors of a school and college education, she was recommended to the court, and sent three times as ambassador to Russia. She afterwards served in the army under marshal Broglie, and behaved with unusual courage, and after the peace of 1762, she was sent as secretary to the embassy in London, and also succeeded as ambassador. A wager determined her sex in London, and before the king's bench she declared herself to be a woman. The pension she had received was continued by the French king, but on condition she assumed the dress of her sex. This extraordinary woman died in 1790. She published tracts relative to the negotiations in which she had been engaged.

EPAMINONDAS, a Theban general of great celebrity. He defeated the Spartans at the battle of Leuctra, and afterwards fell nobly at Mantinea, B.C. 363.

EPAPHRODITUS, a bishop of Philippi, who carried the contributions of his country to the saints of Jerusalem, and brought back St. Paul's epistle to his church, A.D. 62.

EPE'E, Charles Michael de P', a French ecclesiastic, celebrated for his most humane efforts to restore the deaf and dumb to the blessings and the enjoyment of society. By his salutary instruction, these unfortunate members of the community have been enabled to acquire the knowledge of even six different languages, they have become profound mathematicians, and ready calculators. This worthy worthy and most benevolent man, after receiving the most honorable marks of esteem and gratitude from the empress of Russia, the emperor of Germany, the king of France, and the whole of Europe, died at Paris, February 1790. He was succeeded in his benevolent institution by l'abbé Sicard.

EPHORUS, an historian of Cuma, the pupil of Isocrates. His works are lost.

EPHRAIM, son of Joseph, was adopted, with his brother Manasseh, among the tribes of Jacob. He was born in Egypt about 1710 B.C.

EPHREM, St. a father of the church, born at Edessa, or Nisibis according to some. He devoted himself to the monastic life, and refused to be a bishop. He wrote several books in Syriac, which are highly esteemed. They have been translated, and were edited at Oxford, in folio, 1708. Ephrem was a man of great charity, and of uncommon chastity, so that he would not even fix his eyes upon a woman. He died 378, and ordered the monks who attended him to keep his garments as relics, but to bury him without funeral pomp. His works were edited at Rome, 1747, 6 vols. fol.

EPICHRMUS, a Pythagorean bishop of Cos, said to have invented the letters © and x. He died aged 97.

EPICIE, an eminent French engraver. His pieces in the cabinet de Crozat are highly esteemed; but his finest performance is considered to be the bas-haw having the picture of his mistress taken, after Carlo Venloo. The heads in this piece are most beautifully engraved. The time of his death is unknown.

EPICURETUS, a stoic philosopher, born at Hierapolis in Phrygia. He wrote, in the age of Domitian, Enchiridion, a work abounding in excellent rules of morality, translated from the Greek by Mrs. Carter.

EPICURUS, founder of the sect which bore his name, was born at Gargettus, near Athens, 342 B.C. His summum bonum was pleasure, but pleasure produced and tempered by virtue, a system which has been much misrepresented and abused. He died aged 73.

EPIMENIDES, a poet of Crete, said to have slept at one time fifty years.

EPIPHANIUS, a father of the church, bishop of Salamis. He died 403.

EPIPHANIUS, a writer of the 6th century, who translated the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret.

EPIPHANIUS, son of Carpocrates, was the author of a heresy. He supported the necessity of a community of women, and attempted to vindicate some of his opinions from the words of St. Paul, which mention that before the law there was no sin. He was after death revered as a saint, and had a temple at Sama in Cephalenia consecrated to him.

EPISCOPIUS, Simon, an able divine, born of protestant parents at Amsterdam, 1583, and educated there and at Leyden. During the controversy between Gomarus and Arminius about predestination, he embraced the opinions of the latter, and was consequently exposed to persecution and obloquy, and considered as the public disturber of the church. He was ordained in 1610, and two years after was appointed divinity professor at Leyden, in the room of Gomarus. In 1615 he went to Paris; but this journey, undertaken for purposes of curiosity, was viewed with suspicion by his enemies, and he was on his return accused of concerting with father Cotton the ruin of the protestant church and the United States. He was consequently obliged to appear before the synod at Dort, and because he and his friends refused to submit to the authority of arbitrary judges, they were deposed from their functions, and banished from the territories of the commonwealth. He retired to Antwerp, and in his banishment employed his pen in the support of his opinions, and in severe attacks upon the popish tenets. He afterwards visited Paris; and in the revolutions of party zeal and religious persecution he was again permitted to return to Holland, in 1626, where he became minister of the remonstrants' church at Rotterdam. In 1627 he married, and in 1634 he was chosen rector of the college founded by his sect at Amsterdam. He died 4th April 1643, of a retention of urine, a dreadful disorder, which had two years before carried off his wife. As the moon was under an eclipse at the moment of his death, his friends, in the wildness of their grief, considered it as the emblem of the church, which lost its brightest light by the departure of that shining luminary Episcopus. Though a man of great learning and vast erudition, Episcopus did not always act with that humility of temper and moderation so becoming a Christian. His character was highly respected by Grotius, who always carried with him his theological institutions; and even Mabillon, though a papist, has spoken much in his commendation. As an Arminian, and the leader of the remonstrants, he was engaged in severe controversies, in which he displayed commanding eloquence and ardent zeal. His works have appeared in 2 vols. folio, the first published in his lifetime, and the last after his death, under the care of Limborch, who had married his brother's daughter.

EPENDORF, Henry, a German noble, who acquired celebrity by his dispute with Erasmus. He was born near Friburg, a city of Misnia, and though he boasted of his nobility, he was the son of a plebeian. He reflected with vulgar severity on the illegitimate birth of Erasmus, who in his turn retorted against his adversary and censured him for his petulance, falsehood, and defamation. The interference of friends at last produced a reconciliation, but it was momentary, and a war of letters arose more fierce and inveterate than before. These things are to be lamented in the life of men of literary merit and christian virtue, but too many unfortunately forget their character and profession while intent to repel or avenge an injury. The time of Eppendorf's death is not recorded.

ERASISTRATUS, a Greek physician, known for discovering the passion which Antiochus had conceived for his mother-in-law. He is said to have first dissected human bodies.

ERASMUS, Desiderius, a most illustrious character in the republic of literature, and in the cause of religion, was born 28th October 1467, at Rotterdam. His father Gerard, who lived at Tergou, fell in love with Margaret daughter of Peter a physician of Lovenbergen, and after mutual promises of marriage, which were never realized, the lovers forgot themselves in criminal intercourse, and gave gave birth to two sons. One of these died early, and the other was called Gerard after his father, a name which he exchanged for Desiderius, which in Latin signifies the same as Gerard in Dutch, that is, amiable. The conduct of Gerard gave such uneasiness to his relations that they determined to make him an ecclesiastic, but he fled from their pursuits to Rome, where he maintained himself by transcribing ancient authors. In this distant retreat he was falsely informed by his friends that his beloved Margaret was no more, and in despair he devoted himself to that profession, to avoid which he had abandoned his home, and became a priest. On his return to Tergou, however, he was astonished to find his Margaret alive, but displeased as he was with the meanness of his relations, and attached by the tenderest feelings to the first object of his love, he abstained from all improper intercourse, and Margaret herself, faithful to her first vows, led ever after a life of seclusion and celibacy. Gerard now devoted himself to the education of his only son, and saw with admiration the opening of those powers, which, according to Rhenanus the master of Deventer college, would some time prove the envy and wonder of all Germany. His studies at Deventer where had for his friend and fellow-student pope Adrian VI. were interrupted by the plague, which proved fatal to his mother, who from excessive affection had accompanied her son to this seat of learning. The death of Margaret was followed by that of Gerard, who through grief could not survive the woman in whom all his affections had centered, and Erasmus now an orphan, was removed from Deventer to Tergou, about the age of 14, and placed under the care of guardians, who wished to obtain possession of his small patrimony by devoting him to the seclusion of a monastery. He was first sent to a convent at Bois-le-duc, where, as he says, he lost three years of his life, then removed to Sion near Delft, and afterwards to Stein near Tergou, where, overpowered by the unceasing solicitations of his guardians, he became a regular canon 1486. In the retreat of a convent, which, as he describes, is a place of impiety rather than of religion, where every thing was done to which a depraved inclination could lead, under the sanction and mask of piety, and where it was hardly possible for any one to keep himself pure and unspotted, Erasmus could not long be confined. He was introduced to Henry a Bergis, archbishop of Cambray, who wanted a learned secretary on his visit to Rome; but though the journey was laid aside by the prelate, Erasmus determined not to return to the convent, but after being ordained priest at Utrecht 1492, he set out for Paris in 1496, to prosecute his studies. To maintain himself he instructed some pupils, some of whom were Englishmen, and among them William Blunt, lord Montjoy, who ever after treated him with respect. In 1497 he left Paris, and was kindly received at Cambray by the bishop, who had however violated his promise of supporting him while in the capital of France. The same year he visited England under the patronage of his pupil lord Montjoy, and he entered at St. Mary's college, Oxford, where, in the company and conversation of Colet, Grocyn, Linacer, Latimer, and More, he devoted himself to classical studies, and especially to the learning of Greek, which now began to revive in England, and of which he knew nothing. After nearly a year's residence, he returned to Paris, and in consequence of the plague which prevailed in that city, he passed to Orleans, and in 1498, completed his Adagia. The kindnesses he had experienced in England could never be forgotten, and he again, in 1499, visited for a little time that country, which he describes as abounding with humanity, politeness, and learning. His Adagia was published at Paris 1500, and to it he added a panegyric on England, and soon after he printed his book de copia verborum, & de conscribendis epistolis. But whilst rising in literary fame, and devoted zealously to the cultivation of literature, Erasmus was poor; and though he flattered his patrons, he found them indifferent, and frequently regardless of his necessities. The prelate of Cambray pretended to be offended with him, lord Montjoy's assistance was slow, and from the marchioness of Vere, and Antonius a Bergis, abbot of St. Bertin, he could receive little but fair words and unmeaning promises. It was his intention to study divinity in Italy, but this plan he did not immediately adopt, as in 1502, he was pursuing theological studies at Louvain, under his friend Adrian Florent, afterwards Adrian VI. In 1503, he published his "Enchiridion militis Christiani," which assailed the corruptions and the superstition of the Romish church. He had now applied closely for three years to the Greek, and he displayed his proficiency by publishing some translations from Greek authors. One of Plutarch's treatises he dedicated to Henry VIII. the Hecuba of Euripides to archbishop Warham, and Lucian's Toxaris to Fox bishop of Winchester. He now travelled to Italy, and taking his degree of D.D. at Turin, he proceeded to Florence, and was present at the pompous and triumphal entry of pope Julius II. into the conquered city of Bologna, a ceremony which excited his surprize and indignation, when he compared the meek entry of the lowly Jesus into Jerusalem, to the splendid magnificence of his proud vicegerent. After staying about a year at Bologna, he went to Venice, where Aldus printed a new improved edition of his Adagia, and of his translations from Euripides, Terence, and Plautus. At Padua he superintended the education of Alexander the natural son of James IV. of Scotland, then nominally appointed archbishop of St. Andrew's. He afterwards passed to Sienna, and to Rome, where he was received with all the respect and deference due to his merit and learning by the cardinals and great men of the city. The solicitations which he had to settle there, particularly from the pope himself and from cardinal Grimani, were so pressing, that he would have accepted them, had he not previously engaged to return to England. Going back therefore to Sienna, where he had left his royal pupil, he parted with him at Cumæ, and had afterwards the misfortune to hear that he had perished in the bloody battle of Flodden field 1513. From Italy, Erasmus passed through Constance, Brisgau, Strasburg, Holland, and Antwerp, and arrived in England in the beginning of 1510. Though flattered with expectations, and promised an honorable settlement by his friends, he found himself greatly disappointed, and regretted seriously he had not fixed his residence at Rome. While in England he lodged in the house of sir Thomas More, where in the course of a week he wrote his "encomium moriæ," in which he lashed the indolence and the follies of the church of Rome. He afterwards went to Cambridge upon the invitation of Fisher bishop of Rochester and chancellor of the university, by whose recommendation he was appointed lady Margaret's divinity professor, and also professor of Greek. How long he continued in these offices is not known, he had unfortunately a fondness for wandering, which distracted the plans of his best friends, and the poverty which still persecuted him in the midst of his literary reputation, rendered him easily dissatisfied with the slow progress of preferment, which, while it frequently falls rapidly on the head of persons of no merit, with difficulty overtakes those whose services have been most active and successful in the cause of science and of virtue. In 1514 Erasmus was in Flanders, and was flattered with the title of counsellor to Charles of Austria at the court of Brabant, and in 1515 he went to Basil, with the intention of printing there, his new testament, his epistle of St. Jerome, and other works. The new testament appeared in 1516, and as it was the first time it was printed in Greek, it drew upon the editor the envy and the censure of ignorant and malevolent divines. But to his labors, perhaps more than to any other man, was learning indebted for its revival. The comprehensive powers of his mind were employed not only in producing before the public correct editions of respectable writers, but in rousing by his various compositions the attention and improving the taste of mankind, after a gloomy period of ignorance, superstition, bigotry, and persecution. While thus engaged in the cause of literature, the opinions of the world were agitated by the opposition of Luther to the papal authority, and the principles of the church of Rome. It was expected that Erasmus would have zealously joined the reformer, as in his Enchiridion he had ridiculed the popish ceremonies, and as he was considered by many "to have laid the egg which Luther hatched;" but though solicited by Luther, he declined to take a share in the dispute, and expressed his hopes that a reconciliation might be effected. This timidity from Erasmus was agreeable to neither party, who eagerly wished each for his great abilities to defend and support their cause, and therefore while he pretended on one side to be well affected towards the pope, and on the other hand, commended the conduct and talents of Luther, and declared that he learned more from one page of his, than from all the volumes of Thomas Aquinas, he at last found that his wavering disposition exposed him to the odium and persecution of all. In 1518 he was invited with offers of great presents from Henry VIII. to settle in England, but he was suspicious of Wolsey, and thanked the king in general terms. At last to answer the expectations of some of his friends, Erasmus attacked Luther on free will, and bestowed high encomium on the book which Henry VIII. had published against the reformer, but these things appeared feeble to the catholics, and the publication of the Colloquia, proved that the author had no objection to ridicule the indulgences of the pope, and the vicious follies of his monks. The book, though full of wit, and good sense, was afterwards condemned by the faculty of theology at Paris, and prohibited by the pope. On the succession of Adrian VI. to the chair of St. Peter, Erasmus congratulated his old friend and school-fellow, but though repeatedly invited by him to come to Rome, with every offer of patronage and protection, he refused to trust himself into the hands of men whom he had in his writings and conversation offended, and with justice, for he soon discovered that the advice which he offered about healing the dissensions of the church, was received at the Vatican not only with indifference, but with evident marks of displeasure. The latter part of his life was spent chiefly at Basil, where his laborious studies, the precarious state of his health, and the malevolent reflections of his enemies, all tended to enfeeble his constitution. Though exasperated by Luther, who in his answer to his book, in a mixture of compliment, scorn, ridicule, and invective, called it "an excrement in a golden dish," and displeased with the philippics of Julius Scaliger against his "Ciceronianus," he still preserved that neutrality which either the love of ease, or more properly cowardice, had suggested him to follow. It is said that as his health declined he was flattered with a cardinal's hat, and with the highest preferment of the court of Rome, which no doubt would have been lavished upon him, but he firmly resisted. He died at Basil 12th July 1536, aged 69, and was buried there in the cathedral, where a Latin inscription is placed on his tomb. Basil still retains her respect for the ashes of this great man, the house in which he died is shown with enthusiastic ceremony, and his cabinet containing his ring, his seal, his sword, knife, pencil, and his will written by himself, and his picture by Holbein, is still visited with veneration by the curious. Rotterdam also has not forgotten the celebrity she derives from giving birth to her favorite citizen. The house in which he was born is marked out to the admiration of the traveller by a becoming inscription, the college bears the name of Erasmus, and a beautiful copper statue erected in 1622, in an open part of the city, points out with how much pride the inhabitants reckon Erasmus in the number of their fellow-citizens. The person and the manners of Erasmus have been faithfully delineated by his friend Beatus Rhenanus, and his features are most correctly expressed by the pencil of Hans Holbein. Great and respectable as the character of Erasmus is, he had his failings. Too fickle in his attachments, and irresolute in his opinions, he has been censured by le Clerc for luke-warmness, timidity, and unfairness in the reformation. Though disgusted with the superstition and hypocrisy of Rome, his meek spirit was equally hurt by the violence and animosity of the reformers, and perhaps the prejudices of his early education may be ascribed, the conduct he pursued in not warmly embracing the tenets of Luther. Indifferent to the success or jealousy of the labors of the reformers, Erasmus claims the gratitude of posterity by the number and excellence of his writings, in the composition of which he spent a long and laborious life, in opposing ignorance and superstition, and in promoting literature and true piety. His works which are very numerous and which display the eloquence and the graces of Cicero, were correctly published in 10 vols. folio, by le Clerc. The life of Erasmus has been given to the world by Dr. Jortin.

ERASTUS, Thomas, a physician and divine, born at Baden 1524. He was educated at Basil, and afterwards studied at Bologna, and after 10 years spent in Italy he returned to his native country. He practised physic with great great reputation at Henneberg, and at the court of Frederic III. elector palatine, and became professor of physic at Heidelberg university. The disputes about the real presence at the sacrament engaged his pen, and he attended the conference held on the subject between the divines of Wirtemberg and of the palatinate, and he eloquently maintained that the words flesh and blood are to be used metaphorically. He retired to Basil afterwards, where he died 31st December 1583. Of his books on divinity the best known is "de excommunicatione ecclesiastica," published after his decease, which was attacked by various divines, who wished to maintain that the censures of the church extended beyond this life.

ERASTOSTHENES, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, librarian at Alexandria. He first discovered the method of measuring the earth's circumference, and died B.C. 194.

ERCHEMBERT, a Lombard, in the ninth century, who from a soldier became a benedictine monk, and retired to the monastery of Monte Cassino. He wrote a chronicle of the Lombards from 774 to 888, which is supposed to be lost, but an abridgment of it was published by Caraccioli, at Naples 1620, in 4to. and by Camillus Peregrinus 1643, 4to.

ERCILL-YA-CUNIGA, Don Alonzo d', a Spaniard, in the service of Maximilian. He was at the battle of St. Quintin under Philip II. in 1557, and afterwards travelled through France, England, and Italy. Animated with romantic bravery he went to the attack of the Indians who had revolted in Chili and Peru, and he defeated them, and made his adventures the subject of his poem called Araucana. This poem, which consists of 36 cantos, contains many tedious repetitions, but it abounds in bold descriptions, and possesses all the charms of animated poetry. The best edition is that of Madrid 1632, in 12mo.

ERCKERN, Lazarus, a German, superintendant of the mines of Hungary, the Tyrol &c. He published an useful work on metallurgy, at Frankfort 1694, which has been translated into Latin.

ERCOLE, a painter, son of Carl Antonio, the pupil of his uncle Julio Cesare. He was patronised by the court of Savoy, and died 1676, aged 80.

EREMITA, Daniel, a native of Antwerp, intimate with Scaliger, and by his introduction with Casaubon. He went with M. de Vic the ambassador to Switzerland, and by his persuasion was converted to the Romish religion. He was insinuating in his manners, but without principle, and in his conversation very licentious. He was by his intrigues recommended to the great duke of Florence, and obtained a pension for his verses on the marriage of the duke with Magdalen of Austria 1608. He went in the suite of the duke's envoy to Germany, and made himself ridiculous on his return by the bold and shameless untruths which he delivered. He became afterwards a deist, and died at Leghorn 1613. His opera varia were published at Utrecht by Grævius, among which were his four books, de aulicâ vitâ ac civili, written with elegance, ease, and purity of style. He wrote besides Latin poems, & relatio de itinere Germanico, &c.—& de Helveticorum, &c. situ, &c.

ERIC IX. king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, after Margaret 1412, married the daughter of Henry IV. of England. His pilgrimage to the holy land and his captivity in Syria disordered the affairs of his kingdom, and on his return to Europe he found the Swedes dissatisfied with his government, and the Danes anxious to revolt from him, because he wished to render their crown hereditary and not elective. Though he attempted to maintain his authority by arms, he found opposition unavailing, he was solemnly deposed 1439, and retired to Pomerania where he died in privacy 1459. He wrote in his exile an history of Denmark to the year 1288.

ERIC XIV. succeeded his father Gustavus on the throne of Sweden, and became the unsuccessful suitor of Elizabeth queen of England. His marriage with the daughter of an obscure peasant, rendered him unpopular and his people dissatisfied. His cruelties encreased the general dissatisfaction, and he was at last obliged to resign the crown 1568, and died in confinement 1578.

ERIC, Peter, a Venetian admiral, who seized in 1584 a vessel which was carrying the widow of the bashaw of Tripoli to Constantinople with all her treasures. Not satisfied to obtain the gold, he put to death the sailors, and offered violence to the females, and then cut their bodies to pieces and threw them into the sea. This barbarity was punished, and Eric was beheaded by order of the Venetian senate, and his plundered riches restored to Amurath emperor of Turkey.

ERIGENA, John Scotus, a celebrated scholar in the ninth century, born at Ayr in Scotland, though others give him a Welch, others an Irish, origin. Eager in the pursuit of knowledge, he quitted his native country where only ignorance and superstition prevailed, and travelled into foreign lands, and at Athens so perfected himself in classical and oriental literature and science that he proved the greatest philosopher and most learned man of the age. At the invitation of Charles the Bald he resided for some years at the French court, and the king offered him the most munificent and honorable patronage, and bore with the severity of his raillery with good humour and most forgiving composure. As the monarch and the philosopher sat one day opposite each other at table, Charles asked him in a merry mood, Pray what is between a scot and a sot? Nothing but the table, answered the bold courtier. The king heard the rebuke without being offended, but laughed heartily. Scotus in this happy retreat wrote some works at the recommendation of his royal patron, but though all admired his learning, the clergy were offended with the boldness with which he attacked their notions of predestination, and the doctrine of transubstantiation. His books therefore were regarded as heretical by Wemlo archbishop of Sens, and as they seemed to contain all the errors of Pelagius, they were attacked by Prudentius bishop of Troyes, and by Florus a deacon of Lyons. His next work was a translation of the works of Dionysius, which the Greek emperor had sent as a present to Charles, and which Erigena at the request of his sovereign presented to the world in a Latin dress. The work, as being considered though falsely the labor of Dionysius the Areopagite the first christian preacher of France, was received with gratitude by the western clergy, but as it attacked in some passages the acknowledged faith of the Romish church, pope Nicholas sent a threatening letter to the French king, desiring the banishment of Erigena and his appearance at Rome. Charles had too much regard for his learned friend than to trust him into the hands of the pope, he therefore permitted him to escape to England. Here he was employed under Alfred in restoring literature in Oxford. According to Tanner he was in 879 professor of mathematics and astronomy in that university, and in consequence of some dispute, after three years' residence he retired to Malmesbury, where he opened a school. His severity in this place was said to be so great that his pupils murdered him with iron bodkins, the instruments with which they then wrote, though some imagine that the atrocious deed was committed at the instigation of the monks, who were jealous of Scotus for his learning and heterodoxy. This event is placed in the year 883, by some in 884, and by others in 886, but by Mackenzie in 874, ten years after his return to England. The most celebrated of Scotus' works is his treatise on the division of nature, published from the MS. by Dr. Gale 1681, Oxford. It is written with great acuteness and metaphysical subtilty, and must rank its author if not among atheistical philosophers, yet among fanatical enthusiasts.

ERINNA, a Grecian poetess, cotemporary with Sappho.

ERIZZO, Lewis and Mark Anthony, two brothers of a noble Venetian family. They conspired in the murder of their uncle a senator of Ravenna 1546, to obtain his great riches. Their bloody deed was discovered by a soldier who was an accomplice, and Lewis was beheaded and Mark died in prison.

ERIZZO, Paul, a noble, of the same family, governor of Negropont. When obliged to capitulate to the Turks, on condition of having his life spared, Mahomet II. disregarding his promises, ordered him 1469 to be sawn in two, and cut off, with his own hands, the head of his daughter, who indignantly refused to gratify his licentious passions.

ERIZZO, Sebastian, a noble Venetian, author of an Italian treatise on medals, 4to, Venice 1571. He wrote also—des nouvelles en six journées 1567, 4to, and trattato della via inventrice e dell' instrumento de gli antichi, Venice 1554. He died 1585.

ERKIVINS, a famous architect of Steinbach, who died 1305. He began the erection of Strasburg tower, which was not completed till 1449.

ERLACH, John Lewis, a native of Berne, of the head of the six families of that name, so illustrious in Switzerland. He chose a military life, and so distinguished himself in the service of France, especially in the taking of Brisach 1639, and at the battle of Lens 1648, that Lewis XIV. made him commander in chief of his troops on the defection of Turenne. He died 1650, aged 55, at Brisach, of which he was governor, when the French monarch was preparing to send him as a negotiator to Nuremberg, and to bestow upon him greater marks of honor and of confidence.

ERNESTI, John Augustus, a native of Tennstadt, professor of theology at Leipsic, and afterwards of ancient literature, and eloquence. He died 1781, aged 74, universally respected for learning, and indefatigable zeal in the service of literature. Besides excellent editions of Cicero, Xenophon, Suetonius, Homer, Tacitus, Callimachus, &c. with learned notes, he published institutio interpretis Novi Testamenti. Leips. 1761,—opuscula orationum, orationes, prolationes & elogia, 8vo.—opusculorum, oratorum novum volumen, 8vo. 1791,—opuscula critica, 8vo, &c.

EROSTRATUS or ERATOSTRATUS, an Ephesian, who to acquire celebrity, set the temple of Diana on fire B.C. 356.

ERPENIUS, Thomas, or Van Erpe in Dutch, a learned writer, born at Gorcum in Holland 11th September 1584. He studied at Leyden, where he took the degree of doctor in philosophy 1608, and afterwards travelled for four years into England, France, Italy, and Germany. His extensive learning, and the fame of his works made him known to the learned of Europe, and among his friends and correspondents were Casaubon, Joseph Scaliger, Bedell, Vossius, &c. In 1612 he was appointed professor of Arabic and of oriental languages at Leyden, where he died of a contagious disease 13th November 1624. His abilities were so much admired that he was earnestly solicited to settle in England, also in Italy, and in Spain, and his knowledge of Arabic was so correct that the emperor of Morocco showed his nobles, as a curiosity for its elegance and purity, a letter in Arabic, which he had received from him, as the interpreter and corresponding secretary of the states of Holland, to the powers of Asia and Africa. Though he was but 40 years old at the time of his death, yet he published 19 various works, on oriental history, and on subjects connected with his professorship, in which he displayed the great powers of his mind, and the vast stores of his retentive memory.

ERSKINE, Ralph, a Scotch divine, born at Alloa, 1628, and educated there and at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M.A. He was made minister of Falkirk in 1654, but ejected for nonconformity 1662, and when afterwards imprisoned by the persecution of his enemies, he was liberated by the influence of his kinsman, the earl of Mar. On the reestablishment of the presbytery by the toleration act of James II. he was made 1690 minister of Churnside, Berwick, where he died 1696, aged 68. He left some Latin MSS. on difficult passages of scripture, never published.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, son to the preceding, was born 1680, in the prison of Bas, where his father was confined in the persecutions of the times. In 1701 he took his master's degree at Edinburgh, and the next year was ordained minister of Portmoak, Fifeshire, from whence he removed in 1728 to Stirling. In 1747, in consequence of some disputes with the clergy, he joined the seceders called burghers, and died at Stirling 1755, aged 75. Four volumes of his sermons were printed at Glasgow, 1762, 8vo. and a fifth at Edinburgh 1765.

ERSKINE, Ralph, brother to the preceding, was born at Roxburgh 1682, and educated at Edinburgh, where he took his master's degree 1704. He was minister of Dunfermline, Fifeshire, 1711, and was deposed by the general assembly 1734, for joining the seceders. He died 1751, aged 69, much respected as a divine and as a preacher. His works were published 2 vols. fol. 1760, consisting of a polemical treatise, gospel sonnets, and above 200 sermons, &c.

ERSKINE,

ERSKINE, James, lord Alva, was born at Edinburgh 20th June 1722, and made one of the barons of the Scotch exchequer 1754, which he resigned in 1761, on being appointed to the supreme civil court of Scotland. He assumed the name of lord Barjarg, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Alva. He died at Drumthugh, near Edinburgh, 13th May 1796. He was twice married, and had children only by his first wife, two sons and two daughters.

ERKLEBEN, John Christian Polycarp, a native of Quedlinburg, who studied at Gottingen, and gave lectures in physic, the veterinary art, and natural history. He was an able naturalist, and his principles of natural history in 8vo. 1768, are particularly admired. He died 1777, aged 33.

ERYCEIRA, Ferdinand de Meneses count d', was born at Lisbon 1614, and distinguished himself in military affairs, as governor of Penicha and of Tangiers. He was also an able historian, and wrote the history of Tangiers, fol. printed 1723,—history of Portugal, 2 vols. folio. from 1640 to 1657,—and the life of John I. king of Portugal.

ERYCEIRA, Francis Xavier de Meneses count d', great-grandson of the foregoing, was born at Lisbon 1673, and died 1743. He was known also as a literary and military character. He was honored by several princes, and many learned men, and by the present of their works and other munificent donations, he increased the valuable library of his ancestors with 15,000 new volumes, and 1,000 manuscripts. He wrote above 100 different publications, the best known of which are his memoirs on the value of the coins of Portugal,—reflections on academical studies,—58 parallels of illustrious men,—and 12 of illustrious women,—the Henriade of Voltaire translated, with observations, &c. 4to. &c.

ERYTROPILUS, Rupert, a German divine, in the 17th century, minister of Hanover, who wrote a methodical commentary on the history of the passion—and catenæ aureæ in harmoniam evangelicam, 4to.

Es, James Van, a painter of Antwerp, well known for his pictures of birds, flowers, fishes, and fruit. His lobsters, crabs, oysters, &c. are incomparable, and in his grapes, nature is so skilfully imitated, that the stones are visible through the skin.

ESAU, son of Isaac and Rebecca, sold his rights of primogeniture to his brother Jacob, who afterwards, also obtained by artifice his father's blessing. This conduct of Jacob proved so offensive to Esau, that he meditated his death, but though he caused him to fly into Mesopotamia, he was afterwards reconciled to him. He was the father of the Edomites, and died about 1710 B.C. aged 126.

ESCALO, Mastin de P., was elected podestat of Verona 1259, but though prudent and humane in the administration of affairs, he raised himself enemies by whom he was assassinated 1273. The sovereign authority remained however in his family, and his descendant Mastino III. added Vicenza, Brescia, and even Padua to his dominions. His tyranny at last was repressed by the Venetians, and he died 1387, after a life of cruelty and perilous adventures. The families of l'Escalo and the Carraras of Padua had long and bloody contests, but Verona at last became independent till overpowered by the intrigues of her neighbours.

ESCALQUENS, William, capitou of Toulouse 1326, rendered himself known by causing himself to be carried in a coffin, with all the funeral pomp of a departed saint, to the cathedral, and after the completion of the solemnity, inviting the attendants of this ridiculous ceremony to a sumptuous entertainment. The circumstance was agitated by the bishop and clergy in full council, and it was forbidden to practise such superstitious ceremonies on pain of excommunication. Charles V. however renewed it in Spain about 200 years after.

ESCOBAR, Bartholomew, a learned Jesuit, of Seville, who went to America as a monk employed in works of charity. He died at Lima 1624, aged 66. He wrote some religious pieces in Latin, scarce known in Spain.

ESCOBAR, Marine d', a native of Valladolid, who died 9th June 1633, aged 79, and is known as the foundress of the reconciliation of St. Bridget in Spain. Her memoirs have been written in folio, by father Dupont, her confessor.

ESCOBAR, Anthony, a Spanish Jesuit, surnamed of Mendoza, who died 4th July 1669, aged 80. His works, which are theological, in 16 vols. folio, and his principles of morality in 7 vols. fol. have been ridiculed by Pascal.

ESCOUBLEAU, Francis d', cardinal de Sourdis, archbishop of Bourdeaux, was a great favorite with pope Leo IX. and his four successors. He was a warm advocate for church discipline. He died 8th February 1686, aged 53.

ESCOUBLEAU, Henry d', brother and successor to the preceding, as archbishop of Bourdeaux. He was at the siege of Rochelle, under Lewis XIII. and at the retaking of the isles of Lerins under Harcourt. He quarrelled with the duke of Epemon, who struck him a blow, which was punished by the excommunication of the guilty lord, which disgrace however was removed by his falling on his knees before the haughty prelate. He died 1645.

ESQUIRE, N. de P., one of the generals of la Vendée, remarkable for his loyalty, courage, and virtues. With a small force he defeated the more numerous army of the republicans at Thouars, but unfortunately was wounded at the battle of Chollet, and died in consequence of the wounds 1794, aged 26.

ESPAGNAC, John Baptist Joseph de Sapuguet Damarzil baron d', a French general, born at Brive-la-Gaillarde 25th March 1713, and died at Paris 28th February 1783. He signalized himself in the campaigns of Italy, and Bavaria, and was made major-general of the army under marshal Saxe, and as governor of the Hotel-des-invalides he introduced some useful regulations. He wrote several books on the military profession, among which are his campagnes du roi, 1745, &c. 4 vols. 8vo. essai sur la science de la guerre, a valuable work, 3 vols. 8vo. Histoire du marechal de Saxe, 3 vols. 4to, &c. He had four sons and a daughter by his wife baroness de Beyer.

ESPAGNANDEL, Matthew P., an eminent sculptor, who, though a protestant, adorned several of the Paris churches, churches, and also the park of Versailles, by his works. He lived at the conclusion of the 17th century.

ESPAGNE, John d' a native of Dauphiné, who came to England in James' reign, and officiated as minister of a French protestant congregation in London, till the restoration. He wrote a treatise of some merit on popular errors in religion, with some strictures on Calvin's principles, dedicated to Charles I. His works appeared together in 2 vols. 12mo. 1674, Hague.

ESPAGNET, John d', president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, became known by his Enchiridion physicæ restructæ, in which he establishes a complete system of physics contrary to the tenets of Aristotle. He considers earth and water to be the only elements, and he places the real fire of the world in the sun, which he calls the eye, not only of the universe, but of the Creator. He wrote also arcanum hermeticæ philosophiæ opus, on the philosopher's stone, &c. In 1616 he published an old manuscript, called le Rozier des guerres, of which an earlier edition had appeared in 1523.

ESPAÑOLET, Joseph Ribera l', a Spanish painter, born at Xativa, in Valencia 1580. He studied the manner of Caravaggio, and surpassed him in correctness. In poverty he was extremely happy in his delineations, but prosperity rendered him indolent, and regardless of his art. The countenances of his figures were extremely expressive, and he was particularly successful in the representation of terror, anguish, and ferocity. He was patronised at Naples, where he died 1656, aged 76. His chief works are preserved in the Escurial and at Naples.

ESPARRON, Charles d'Arcussia Visconti d', a provençal nobleman, who wrote a valuable treatise on hawking and falconry, 4to. Rouen 1644, amusements to which he was very partial.

ESPEN, Zeger Bernard Van, was born 1646, at Louvain, where he became professor of laws. His observations on the formulary, and on the bull unigenitus, proved the sources of great bitterness to him, so that to avoid persecution, he retired to Maastricht, and afterwards to Amersfort, where he died 2d October 1728, aged 83. His works which are considered as valuable, especially his jus ecclesiasticum universum, were published at Paris 1753, in 4 vols. folio.

ESPECE, Claude d', a native of Chalons-sur-Marne, rector of the university of Paris, and doctor of the Sorbonne. He attended the cardinal de Lorraine in Flanders, and likewise at Rome 1555, where he displayed so much eloquence as an orator, that the pope, Paul IV. wished to bestow on him a cardinal's hat, which he refused. He died of the stone at Paris 5th October 1571, aged 60. He was a man of great learning and moderation. He wrote some commentaries on Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus, and some controversial tracts. His Latin works were printed 1619, folio, Paris.

ESPER, John Frederic, a native of Drossenfeld, in Bayreuth, who studied at Erlangen, and applied himself to botany and natural history. He wrote an accurate description of the lately discovered zoölites of unknown animals, and of several caverns, &c. Nuremberg fol. 1774, a method of determining the orbits of the comets, and other celestial bodies, without astronomical instruments and mathematical calculations, &c. He died 1781, aged 49.

ESPERIENTE, Philip Callimachus, a native of St. Germaniano, in Tuscany, who under Pius II. formed an academy, the members of which assumed Greek or Latin names. Under Paul, Pius' successor, the academy was considered as an assembly of seditious men, and the founder therefore fled to Poland, where he became preceptor to the children of king Casimir III. He was also employed as ambassador to Constantinople, Vienna, Venice, and Rome, and on his return to Poland, an accidental fire destroyed his house, library, and manuscripts, and overwhelmed him with grief. He died soon after at Cracow 1496. His works are commentarii rerum Persicarum, folio.—historia de iis quæ a Venetis tentata sunt, Persis & Tartaris contra Turcas movendis.—Attila historia de rege Vladislao, 4to.

ESPREMENIL, James Duval d', a Frenchman, born at Pondicherry, the nephew and heir of Duval de Leyril, the governor of the city, and the accuser of Lally. He became an advocate, and counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and was remarkable for his violent proceedings during the revolution. He was guillotined April 23d 1794. He was asked by his old opponent Chapelier, as he was going to the scaffold with him, To which of us two are the shouts of the mob addressed? To both, replied D'Espremenil. He wrote remonstrances, published by the parliament 1788,—nullity and despotism of the assembly, 8vo.—actual state of France, 1790, 8vo.

ESPRIT James, an agreeable writer, born at Beziers 1611. For five years he was member of the oratory which he quitted, and afterwards became, by his wit, sense, and elegant manners, the friend of Seguier, Rochefoucault, and Conti. He was member of the French academy, and died 1678, aged 67. He wrote paraphrases on the psalms, the fallacy of human virtues, 2 vols. 12mo. which is a commentary on Rochefoucault's reflections.

ESSARS, Pierre des, a French nobleman, who served in the Scotch army against the English, and was taken prisoner in 1402. On his return to France he attached himself to the duke of Burgundy, by whom he was raised to places of trust and honor, but he became suspected of partiality to the duke of Guienne, and fled to Cherbourg of which he was the governor. In 1413 he secretly returned to Paris, and was thrust into the bastille, and soon after condemned, and he lost his head, 1st July 1413. His body was interred in the Mathurins' church, by his widow, who obtained the restitution of his property.

ESSARS, Charlotte des, countess of Romorentin, and daughter of lieutenant-general des Essars in Champagne, was a lady of great beauty. She was in England with the countess de Beaumont, and on her return to France she was introduced 1590 to Henry IV. by whom she had two children, afterwards legitimated. She afterwards lived with Louis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, by whom she had a son called the chevalier de Romorentin, and she married in 1630 marshal de l'Hopital, known under the name of Hallier. Her wishes to advance her son Romorentin by her intrigues proved fatal to her, as she fell under the resentment of the French king and Richelieu, by whom she was arrested, and placed in confinement where she died 1651.

ESSEX, James F.A.S. was born 1723, and distinguished himself himself by his great knowledge of architecture. He repaired and improved King's college chapel, Cambridge, and the cathedrals of Ely and Lincoln, besides other colleges in Cambridge, which will remain lasting monuments of his great skill and judgment. His proposals for publishing plans and sections of King's college chapel, appeared in the Brit. Topog. vol. i. p. 237, and he enriched that valuable collection with many other curious and ingenious communications. He died 14th September 1784, in his 61st year, at Cambridge, his native town, where his father had acquired some property as a carpenter.

ESTAING, Charles Henry count d', a French admiral, born in Auvergne. He was under Lally in the East Indies, and escaped from an English prison, by breaking his parole. He was commander of the French squadrons in the American war, and he took Grenada. At the revolution he became member of the assembly of notables, and was at last guillotined 29th April 1793, as a suspected character.

ESTAMPES, Anne of Pisseleu duchess of, a woman of great beauty, daughter of de Heilli. She attended as maid of honor, Louisa of Savoy when she went to meet her son Francis I. of France at Madrid, and she was no sooner seen than loved by the amorous monarch. Though Francis forgot himself in the arms of his favorite mistress, he yet attempted to cover her dishonor by marrying her to one of his flatterers, whom he created duke of Estampes. In the declining years of the monarch, the dukes, who still possessed the influence of her charms, entered into correspondence with the emperor Charles V. to counteract the views of the dauphin afterwards Henry II. and of his mistress Diana de Poitiers; and by informing the foreign monarch of the plans of the court she gained his confidence, and ensured his promises towards the duke of Orleans, the dauphin's brother, whose cause she espoused. By her perfidious communications Charles, at the head of an almost mutinous and famished army, was enabled suddenly to take Epernay and Chateau-Tierri, where the magazines of the French troops were deposited, without apprehensions of attack; and as no measures were taken by the dauphin without consultation with Francis, every secret was imparted to the faithless mistress, and by her to the enemy, so that the ruin of the kingdom seemed inevitable. A quarrel however arose between Charles and Henry VIII. of England, and the peace of Cressy saved France. After the death of Francis the worthless favorite returned to her country seat, and was saved from the prosecution of her husband, who wished to punish her for adultery, by the interference of the reigning monarch. She died a protestant.

ESTAMPES, Leonor d', bishop of Chartres in 1620, and in 1641 archbishop of Rheims, was zealous in the assembly of the French clergy, against the Jesuits 1626, who in two publications had attacked the authority of the king, in church affairs. The censure of d'Estampes was however resisted, and the French clergy showed such influence, that in the states general of 1614 the tiers etat could never obtain the declaration, "that no power, temporal or spiritual, has the right to dispose of the kingdom, and to dispense the subjects from their oaths of fidelity." The monks, however, were silenced by pope Benedict XIV.

ESTCOURT, Richard, a native of Tewksbury, Gloucestershire, who at the age of 15 escaped from his friends and joined a company of strolling players at Worcester, where he first appeared on the stage in women's clothes, in the part of Roxana in Alexander the great. His disguise did not prevent his discovery, he was pursued to Chipping-Norton, by his father, who immediately bound him to an apothecary in Hatton-garden, London. In this engagement he continued till business failed him, though others declare, he quitted his master abruptly, and wandered about the country for two years. He went afterwards to Ireland, where he was well received, and appeared at Drury-lane for the first time, in the part of Dominic in the Spanish Fryar. His chief merit consisted in mimicry. Without great powers of his own, he could imitate with wonderful success the greatest players of the times, though he frequently offended the audience by the introduction of sentences which the author never wrote. He became, by his manners and conversation, a great favorite of the town, and when the chief wits and leading men of the times, and among them the duke of Marlborough, erected the beef steak club, Estcourt was appointed providore, and wore, as the badge of his office, a gold gridiron suspended from his neck, by a green silk ribbon. Some years before his death he quitted the stage. He died 1713, and was buried at St. Paul's Covent-garden. He left two dramatic pieces, Fair example, a comedy, 1706, 4to, and Prunella, an interlude 4to.

ESTHER, a Jewess, mistress to Casimir III. king of Poland, in the 14th century, from whom she obtained great privileges for her nation.

ESTHER, a Jewish maid, of the tribe of Benjamin, whom Ahasuerus king of Persia took for his wife, after his divorce from Vashti. She had the good fortune to defeat the machinations of Haman against her nation, and she saw her cousin Mordecai raised to the same honors which the fallen favorite possessed. This great deliverance of the Jews was celebrated by a particular feast called Purim. The Ahasuerus of scripture is supposed to be Darius son of Hytaspes.

ESTIUS, William, a native of Gorcum in Holland, divinity professor, and chancellor of Douay university, where he died 1613, aged 71. He was author of commentaries on the epistles two vols.—annotations in præcipua & difficiliora scripturæ loca, fol.—martyri Edmundi Campiani, &c.

ESTOILE, Pierre de l', grand auditor of the chancery of Paris, died 1611. From his MSS. were published his journal of Henry III. beginning May 1574 to August 1589, improved by du Fresnoy 1744, five vols. 8vo.—Journal of the reign of Henry IV. four vols. 8vo. improved also by du Fresnoy. These works are valuable, and illustrate the private history of France. The author, under the character of ease and openness conceals a severe and sarcastic disposition.

ESTOILE, Claude de l', son of the preceding, was member of the French academy 1632, and died 1652, aged 54. He was one of the five authors consulted by Richelieu in the making of his bad plays. D'Estoile wrote some poems and plays, and it is said that, like Moliere

Moliere and Malherbe, he read his pieces for the stage to his maid servant, on whose approbation proceeding from simple and ingenuous motives, he could depend. His odes are published in the recueil des poetes Francois, 1692, five vols. 12mo.

ESTOUTEVILLE, William d', of an illustrious Norman family, was archbishop of Rouen, and a cardinal. He reformed the university of Paris, and enjoyed the confidence of Charles VII. and Lewis XI. and was a man of great firmness of character, and of the strictest integrity, and very charitable. He died at Rome 22d December 1483, aged 80. Besides his archbishopric he held six bishoprics in France and Italy, four abbeys, and three grand priories, and was dean of the cardinals.

ESTRADES, Godfrey count d', marshal of France and viceroy of America, was also an able negotiator. He was ambassador in England in 1661, and the next year he negotiated with Charles II. for the evacuation of Dunkirk, which he effected though contrary to the wishes of the English parliament. In 1666, he had a dispute with Vatteville the Spanish ambassador, about precedence in London, and the year following he negotiated the peace of Breda, and in 1673, assisted at the conferences of Nimeguen. He died 26th February 1686, aged 79. His negotiations were printed at the Hague 1742, nine vols. 12mo. from the originals, which consisted of 22 vols. folio.

ESTRE'ES, John d', page to Queen Anne of Britany, was afterwards grand master of the artillery of France, and died 1567, aged 81. He distinguished himself greatly in several battles and especially at the taking of Calais 1558. He improved the manner of casting cannon. He was the first gentleman of Picardy who embraced the protestant religion.

ESTRE'ES, Francis Annibal d', son of the preceding, was born 1573, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and was made bishop of Laon by Henry IV. He soon however quitted the church for the army, and distinguished himself at the taking of Treves, and by other military exploits. He was made duke, peer, and marshal of France, and was employed in 1636, as ambassador to the court of Rome, where he offended the pope Urban and his nephews, for which he was recalled. He died at Paris 5th May 1670, aged 98. He wrote in an unadorned stile, but with great fidelity, memoirs of the regency of Mary de Medicis, printed 1666, 12mo. and relation of the siege of Mantua in 1630, and another of the conclave which elected Gregory XV. pope, 1621.

ESTRE'ES, Cesar d', cardinal, abbot of St. Germain des Prés, was son of the preceding, and was born 1628. He was made bishop of Laon 1653, and produced a reconciliation between the pope's nuncio, and four of the French bishops who resisted his authority. He was afterwards employed by the French king at the court of Bavaria, and also at Rome, where he skilfully conducted himself to procure the elections of the popes Alexander VIII. Innocent XII. and Clement XI. He accompanied Philip V. when he took possession of the Spanish throne, and he died 18th December 1714, aged 87, respected as an able negotiator, a benevolent man, and an agreeable companion.

ESTRE'ES, Gabrielle d', sister of Francis Annibal

d'Estrées, became the favorite mistress of Henry IV. who saw her first in 1591, at the castle of Cœuvres. The king was so partial to her that to please her he embraced the popish religion, and determined to marry her, though he was himself married to Margaret de Valois. While engaged in procuring the divorce, Gabrielle died suddenly 10th April 1599. It was suspected that she was poisoned by the financier Zamet, as her head the day after her death was so distorted that her beautiful features had totally disappeared. During her amours she had married d'Amerval, lord of Liancourt, with whom however she never cohabited. She had three children by Henry. The king put on mourning for her, and honored her memory as if she had been a queen. Though passionately fond of her, Henry did not however forget his duties to his subjects; and when Gabrielle was displeased with some of his ministers, and solicited their dismissal, he firmly replied that he would sooner part with 10 mistresses than one of his favorite and long-tried servants.

ESTRE'ES, Victor Marie d', vice-admiral of France, after his father John, was born 1660. He bombarded Barcelona and Alicant 1691, and again in 1697 he besieged Barcelona. In 1701 he was made commander in chief of the French and Spanish fleets, and in 1703 was created marshal of France, and afterwards grandee of Spain, and knight of the golden fleece. He was a man well acquainted with literature, and he was member of several learned bodies. He died at Paris 28th December 1737, aged 77.

ESTRE'ES, Lewis Cesar duke d', marshal of France and minister of state, was born 1st July 1695. His father was Francis Michael le Tellier de Courtanvaux, and by his mother he was descended from John count d'Estrées, vice-admiral of France. He first distinguished himself in the war against Spain, and afterwards in the war of 1741, where, at the blockade of Egra, the battle of Fontenoi, the sieges of Mons and Charleroi, and the victory of Lafeldt, under marshal Saxe, his bravery was conspicuous, and his services were most meritorious. In the war of 1756 he was placed at the head of the French forces in Germany, and he gave battle to the duke of Cumberland at Hastenback, and paved the way for the success of Clostersefen, which Richelieu, who superseded him through intrigue, obtained over the Hanoverians. He was made a duke in 1763, and died 1771, second January, aged 76, leaving no children behind him.

ETHELBERT, king of Kent, became a christian by the preaching of Austin, who came to England at the invitation of Bertha the queen, daughter of Caribert king of France. He enacted a code of laws, and died 616, in the 56th year of his reign.

ETHELBERT, second son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbald as king of England 860, and was a popular and benevolent prince.

ETHELRED, son of Edgar, was king of England, after his brother Edward the Martyr 978. To deliver himself from the oppressive tax which he paid to the Danes, called Danegelt, he caused those unfortunate foreigners to be all murdered, in consequence of which Sweyn the Danish king invaded the kingdom, and obliged him to fly to Normandy. After Sweyn's death he resumed his authority and died 1016.

ETHELWOLF, king of England 838, went to Rome to improve the education of his son the great Alfred. He died 857, and was buried at Winchester.

ETHEREGE, George, a dramatic writer, born 1636, of an antient family in Oxfordshire. It is supposed that he studied at Cambridge, and afterwards applied himself to the law at one of the inns of court in London. His comedy of "The comical revenge, or love in a tub," appeared in 1664, and recommended him to the wits of the times, to Charles duke of Dorset, Villiers duke of Bucks, Wilmot earl of Rochester, sir Car Scroop, Sedley, Saville, &c. in whose company he shone as a man of humor, lively in his conversation and of a refined taste. His second play appeared with equal applause in 1668, called "She would if she could," and the last in 1676, called the "Man of mode, or sir Fopling Flutter." Of these three plays the last was the most finished, and as it represented the characters and censures on the vices of some of the fashionable men of the times, it was for some time very popular. His gaiety and intemperance rendered him poor, but to recruit his finances, he paid his addresses to a rich old widow, who however refused to marry him except he was knighted, and to make her a lady therefore, and obtain her fortune, he solicited the honor of knighthood, which was conferred about 1683. Etherege whose manners were so fascinating that he was humorously called gentle George, and easy Etherege, was greatly patronized by the duchess of York, in whose household he was, and by whose influence he was sent ambassador abroad. He was at Ratisbon in 1688, where, after entertaining some company, and probably drinking with more freedom than prudence, he tumbled down stairs and broke his neck, though some accounts state that he followed his master James II. to France upon his abdication, and died soon after. Etherege had no children by his wife, but he had a daughter by Mrs. Barry the actress, with whom in those days of licentiousness and general depravity he lived. Besides his plays he wrote various sonnets, songs, and short poems, which with great ease and elegance contain the voluptuous descriptions, and the immoral levities which were so fashionable in the reign of Charles II. His comedies, though very popular, are not free from licentiousness; and however we may admire the politeness of the dialogue, the spriteness of the conversation, the faithful delineation of the characters, and the interesting intricacies of the plots, yet the loose tendency and the impurities of the whole cannot escape the severest censures of every friend of virtue and morality. Sir George Etherege had a brother who was a soldier in the wars of king William, and who died at Ealing in Middlesex, about the third or fourth of George I.

ETHRYG, George, or Etheridge, or Edrycus, a native of Thame, Oxfordshire, educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1539. In 1553 he was appointed king's Greek professor, but in Elizabeth's reign he was dismissed from the office in consequence of the persecution which he had encouraged against the protestants in Mary's reign. He then practised medicine at Oxford with success, and engaged in the education of young persons of his persuasion, though he was exposed to severe trials on account of his popish tenets. He was living in 1588, but the year of his death is unknown. He excelled in the knowledge not only of the Greek and Hebrew, and of medicine, but also of music. Some of his musical compositions and of his Latin poems are extant in manuscript.

ESTLAGER, Christopher, a writer of Steirmark, in the beginning of the 18th century. He wrote Synopsis rei nummarie veterum, Steyer 1724, 12mo.

ETTMULLER, Michael, a physician, born at Leipzig 26th May 1644, where he took his degree of M.D. 1666. After travelling through France, England, Holland, and Italy, he was appointed assessor of the medicinal faculty 1676, and in 1681 professor of botany. He died in consequence of an unsuccessful operation in chemistry March 9th, 1683. He wrote several things on medicinal subjects, and some of his works were published by his son at Frankfort 1708, and afterwards by professor Cyrrillo, five vols. fol. Naples 1729.

ETTMULLER, Michael Erne St. son of the preceding, was born at Leipzig 26th August 1673, and educated there and at Wittemberg. He took his degree of M.D. at Leipzig 1699, after visiting England, Holland, and Germany, and was elected professor of anatomy and surgery at the Lazaretto, Leipzig 1706, and after many honorable appointments, he was made in 1730, director of the imperial academy of naturæ curiosorum, and died 25th September 1732. He published his father's works, with a preface, and wrote several learned and curious treatises on medical subjects.

EVAGORAS, king of Cyprus, was defeated by the Persians, and was assassinated 374 B.C. His grandson of the same name, was deposed by his uncle Protagoras, and at last put to death by Artaxerxes Ochus.

EVAGORAS, a Greek writer in the age of Augustus, author of an history of Egypt, &c.

EVAGRIUS, a monk of the fifth century, author of Altercatio Simonis Judæi & Theophili Christiani.

EVAGRIUS, a bishop of Antioch, whose election was disputed by Flavianus. He died 392.

EVAGRIUS, Scolasticus, an historian of Epiphania, in Syria in the sixth century, author of six books of ecclesiastical history from 431, to 594, printed Paris 1544, and edited again Cambridge 1726, fol.

EVAGRIUS, Ponticus or Hyperborita, a monk of the fourth century, surnamed Ponticus, from the place of his birth. He was archdeacon of Constantinople, and wrote some treatises, in which he espoused the tenets of Origen.

EVANGELISTA, a capuchin of Canobio, in the Milanese, who was general of his order, and died after his return from the council of Trent 1595, aged 84. He was also a learned civilian, and wrote consulta varia in juro canonico, &c.—Annotaciones in L.L. decretalium, Milan 1591.

EVANS, Cornelius, son of a Welchman by a Provence woman, was born at Marseilles. During the civil wars he played the part of an impostor and came to an inn at Sandwich in 1648, pretending that he was the prince of Wales who had escaped from France. When the imposition was discovered he was sent to Newgate, but he had the dexterity to extricate himself from confinement, and though search was made after him, it never was known what became of him.

EVANS, Arise, a Welch conjuror, brought up at Oxford. He took orders, and resided on a curacy at Enfield, in Staffordshire, from which place he fled on account of the irregularities and the immorality of his conduct. He came to London in 1632, where Lilly learned astrology under him. He was considered as so powerful in the management of supernatural beings, that he was solicited by lord Bothwell, and sir Kenelm Digby, to show them a spirit. At the appointed time when all were within the magical circle, and after some invocations, Evans was suddenly carried out of the room and thrown into a field at Battersea-causey near the Thames, where he was found by a countryman the next morning a sleep. These astrological incantations were the fashionable study in the reign of Elizabeth and James I. and when nobles and learned men lent their influence to the profession, it is no wonder the vulgar believed them. Evans died about the time of the rebellion.

EVANS, Abel, known best by the name of Dr. Evans the epigrammatist, was of St John's college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1699, and of D.D. 1711. He was intimate with the wits and poets of the times, especially Pope, dean Swift &c. He was vicar of St. Giles' Oxford, and burfcar of his college. His poetry is now forgotten. A good specimen of it may be seen in Nichols' select collections, especially his "apparition," &c. and Vertumnus," and some epigrams.

EVANS, John D.D. a dissenting minister born in Shropshire 1680. He was ordained minister of a meeting in Shropshire, and in 1716, succeeded Dr. Williams as pastor in Petty France, Westminster. He was popular as a preacher. He printed some occasional sermons, but his 38 sermons on the christian temper is his best work, in great esteem with many divines. He died of the dropsy 1732, aged 52.

EVANS, Caleb, a native of Bristol, where his father was a dissenting baptist minister. He became also himself a preacher and instructed young people for the dissenting ministry. He was made D.D. by the king's college, Aberdeen, and died 1791, aged 54. He published scripture doctrine of the son and holy spirit.—hymns for public worship,—addresses to serious professors of Christianity—the doctrine of atonement or Christ crucified.

EVANS, Evan, a native of Cardiganshire, educated at Jesus college, Oxford. Though a clergyman he obtained no preferment, but unfortunately addicted himself to intemperate drinking, and died 1790, aged 60. He published two vols. of sermons by Tillotson and others, translated into Welch.—the love of our country, an English poem,—dissertatio de bardis, with specimens of Welch poetry, 4to.

EVANSON, Edward, a native of Warrington, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; after which he became curate to his uncle at Mitcham, Surrey, and then obtained in 1768, south Mimms living, Middlesex. In 1770, he was presented to the living of Tewksbury, Gloucestershire, and afterwards to Longdon, Worcestershire. His conduct in these parishes, and the alterations which he presumed to introduce in the liturgy and in the forms of the church duty, highly offended his auditors, but though he escaped the punishment of the ecclesiastical law, from some irregularity in the proceedings adopted against him, his unpopularity continued to encrease and he resigned his livings in 1778. He afterwards resided at Mitcham, where he took some pupils and he died at Colford, Gloucestershire, 25th September 1805, aged 74. He published without his name in 1772, the doctrines of a trinity and the incarnation of God, examined on the principles of reason and common sense, &c.—the dissimilitude of the four generally received evangelists 1792, 8vo.—Argument against and for the observance of Sunday &c.—letter to Dr. Priestley,—reflection on the state of religion in christendom &c.—and he was also engaged in a controversy with bishop Hurd, on the subject of prophecy. An account of the prosecution established against him was published 1774, fol.

EVANTIUS, an old Latin poet, who wrote "de ambiguis, five hybridis animalibus" generally printed with Petronius & Achrosticon in funus genitoris sui Nicholai, inserted among the works of Eugenius of Toledo.

EVANTUS, called also Evantius, Eventius and Aventius a bishop of Vienne in the sixth century. He assisted at several councils and died 586.

EVARISTUS, bishop of Rome 100, was martyred nine years after. He gave to the emperor an excellent apology for the christian religion.

EBULIDES, a philosopher of Miletus, author of some comedies, and a tract against Aristotle.

EUCHADIUS, Augustinus, a Latin historian, author of "vitæ octo imperatorum et descriptio Danubii," preserved in the library at Vienna.

EUCHARIUS, or HOUCARIUS, Eligius, a divine and poet of Ghent, who studied at Paris, and then settled in his native country, in the beginning of the 16th century. He wrote the lives of St. Levinus, Coleta, and Bertulfus—a comedy of the patience of Chryseleis—panegyric of St. Agnes and Catharine—and some other works.

EUCHERIUS, archbishop of Lyons, was canonized for his great piety. He assisted at some councils, and wrote various works, in the ascetic taste of the times; and died about 454.

EUCLID, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, whose books of geometry are well known. Ptolemy was among his pupils. He flourished B.C. 300.

EUCLID, a philosopher of Megara, the disciple of Socrates, and the founder of the sect of wranglers.

EUDÆMON, John Andrew, a Jesuit, born in the island of Candia, died at Rome 1625. The best known of his works is "admonitio ad regem Ludovicum XIII." 4to. which was censured by the Sorbonne and the assembly of the clergy, and answered by Garasse.

EUDÆS, John, brother of the historian Mezerai, was born at Rye, in the diocese of Sees, in 1601. In 1643, he founded the congregation of the Eudists, which greatly encreased in Normandy and Britany. He died at Caen 19th August 1680, aged 79, and left several devotional works.

EUDOCIA, or ATHENAS, an Athenian lady, daughter of the philosopher Leontius. When left little property by her father, who bequeathed his inheritance to his two sons, she went to Constantinople, and became the favorite of the empress Pulcheria, and in 421 married the emperor Theodosius, who in a fit of jealousy divorced her. She retired upon this to Jerusalem, where she died, devoted to religious duties, 460. She wrote some Greek poems, &c.

EUDOCIA, or EUDOXIA, surnamed Macrembolitissa, ascended the imperial throne of Constantinople at the death of her husband, Constantine Ducas, 1067. One of her generals, Romanus Diogenes, conspired against her; but the empress condemned him to death, and afterwards, struck with the elegance of his person, she pardoned him, and when he had retrieved his character by valor and fidelity, she made him her husband. In 1071, her son Michael proclaimed himself emperor, and shut up his mother in a monastery, where she ended her days in devotion.

devotion and study. Some MSS. of her writing on mythology, &c. were preserved in the French king's library.

EUDOCIA, Feodoreuna, daughter of the boyar Feodor Lapookin, was made, 1689, the first wife of Peter the great, whom he chose out of the hundred young girls that he had by proclamation assembled at Moscow. Her complaints against the infidelity of her husband produced her disgrace. She was hurled from the throne, divorced in 1696, and confined in a convent at Sufdal. In her retirement she formed an intimacy with general Glebof, and, trusting to the predictions of a fanatic bishop, she expected the death of her husband, and her restoration to power under the reign of her son. Peter was informed of her plans, and she was scourged by two nuns, and then immured in the convent of Nova Ladoga, and afterwards in the fortress of Shluffelburgh, from which she was released at the accession of her grandson, Peter II. at whose coronation she was present. She died in the monastery of Devitz, 1731, aged 59. Glebof was cruelly put to death by order of the inhuman Peter, and with his last breath he asserted his innocence, and that of the injured empress.

EUDOXIUS, an Arian of Arabisso, in Lesser Armenia, bishop of Germanicia, and then of Antioch, from which he was deposed. He was made patriarch of Constantinople by Constantius, and died 370, at Nicæa. He wrote a discourse on the incarnation of the word.

EUDOKUS, of Cnidus, studied in Egypt with Plato, and opened a school of philosophy at Athens.

EVELYN, John, a learned writer, descended of an ancient and respectable family, in the county of Salop. He was born at Wotton, in Surrey, 31st October 1620; and after being educated at Lewes grammar-school, he entered at Baliol college, in 1637. At the beginning of the civil wars he obtained permission to travel, from king Charles himself, and in 1644 he left England. To enlarge his mind by observations on the manners and habits of various countries, to examine accurately their commercial and agricultural concerns, and the curiosities, the productions, the antiquities, the arts, and the sciences, of every place, was the great and the commendable object of his intentions; and to these pursuits, so honorable to himself, and so advantageous to his countrymen, about seven years of his life were devoted. In 1647, while at Paris, he married Mary the only daughter of sir Richard Browne bart. the king's minister at the French court; and on his return to England, in 1651, he fixed his residence at her seat, at Sayes Court, near Deptford, in Kent. Attached by choice to a life of retirement, he had little concern with public affairs; but after the expulsion of Richard Cromwell from the protectorate, he was zealously engaged in promoting the restoration of the royal family, and his services were acknowledged by Charles at his return. At the establishment of the royal society, in 1662, Mr. Evelyn was appointed one of the first fellows, and counsel; a distinction to which he was entitled by his virtues and the great merit of his works. In 1664 he was made one of the commissioners of the sick and wounded, and was afterwards appointed one of the commissioners for the rebuilding of St. Paul's. In 1669 he visited Oxford, where he was honored with the degree of LL.D. This was granted out of respect, not only to his great abilities and universal beneficence, but the active part which he had taken in procuring the Arundelian marbles, which, by his intercession with lord Henry Howard, were handsomely presented to that learned body, for which he, together with the noble donor, received the thanks of the university by their delegates. About this time he was nominated one of the members of the board of trade; and under James II. he was one of the commissioners to execute the office of lord privy seal; and after the revolution he became treasurer of Greenwich hospital. This great and good man died in the 86th year of his life, 27th February 1706, and was interred at Wotton, in a stone coffin, over which was this inscription: "That living in an age of extraordinary events and revolutions, he had learned from thence this truth, which he desired might thus be communicated to posterity, that all is vanity which is not honest, and that there is no solid wisdom but in real piety." His wife survived him till 9th February 1709, in her 74th year, and she was deposited in a stone coffin near him. By her he had five sons and three daughters. All the sons except one died young, and only one daughter survived him, Susannah, married to Mr. Draper, of Addiscombe, Surrey. Mr. Evelyn's works amount to more than 25 various publications, besides communications and other papers inserted in the transactions of the royal and other societies. Of these, the most known are his sculptura, or the history and art of chalcography and engraving in copper, with an ample enumeration of the most renowned masters and their works, with the new manner of engraving, or mezzo-tinto, communicated by his highness prince Rupert to the author of this treatise, London, 1662, 8vo. a very learned and valuable work, edited again in 1755, and highly commended by Mr. Walpole—Sylva, or a discourse of forest trees, and the propagation of timber in his Majesty's dominions; to which is annexed, Pomona, concerning fruit-trees, &c. 1664, folio, a popular work, which, as the author says in the second edition, 1669, was the cause that more than two millions of timber trees had been furnished in the three kingdoms. The sixth edition of this excellent book was published by Dr. A. Hunter of York, enriched with notes and a life of the author, 1776. He wrote also a parallel of ancient architecture with the modern, &c. the third edition of which appeared in 1733, folio—kalendarium Hortense, 1664, a publication many times edited, and from which all modern gardening books are borrowed—public employment and active life preferred to solitude, in reply to sir George Mackenzie's book on a contrary title—the perfection of painting demonstrated from the principles of art, &c.—a philosophical discourse of earth, relating to the culture and improvement of it for vegetation, &c.—mundus muliebris, or the lady's dressing-room unlocked, and her toilet spread, in burlesque—Numata, a discourse on medals, ancient and modern, with some account of heads and effigies, &c.. Besides these, he planned, but never completed, a general history of all trades—also elysium Britannicum. It was a happy addition to the virtues and extensive powers of mind which he possessed; that he was in easy and independent circumstances, which left him no wish unsatisfied which a man of worth and virtue could form. His library was large and selected; his grounds and gardens about his mansion were neatly cultivated, and adorned with all the embellishments of nature and art which his fertile genius could suggest; and among his friends he could number the greatest and the most ingenious and learned men of the times. His services to literature and mankind have been celebrated by Cowley, Joseph Glanville, Dr. Wotton, bishop Burnet, Roger North, &c. and, among foreigners, by Morhoff and others. He was also an artist, for "if he had not been," says Mr. Walpole, "I should have found it difficult to deny myself the pleasure of allotting him a place among the arts he loved, promoted, patronized. If I have once or twice criticised him, they are trifling blemishes, compared with his amiable virtues and beneficence. It may be remarked, that the worst to be said of him is that he knew more than he always communicated. His life was a course of inquiry, study, curiosity, instruction, and benevolence. The works of the Creator, and the mimic labors of the creature, were all objects of his pursuit. He adored from examination, was a courtier that flattered only by informing his prince, and was really the neighbour of the Gospel, for there was no man that might not have been the better for him. He promoted the royal society, he obtained the Arundelian marbles for the university of Oxford, and he proposed to Mr. Boyle the erection of a philosophical college for retired and speculative persons, and he had the honesty to write in defence of active life against Mr. Mackenzie's essay on solitude. He knew that retirement in his own hands was industry and benefit to mankind, in those of others laziness and inutility."

EVELYN, John, son of the preceding, was born at Sayes-court, near Deptford, 14th January 1654. In 1666 he went to Oxford, under the care of Dr. Bathurst, of Trinity-college, but did not till two years after become a member of the university. When little more than 15, he wrote that elegant Greek poem which is prefixed to the second edition of his father's Sylva. The powers of genius thus early displayed were cultivated with the greatest attention, and gave birth to some other original pieces of poetry, inserted in Dryden's miscellanies. He also translated, in elegant language, the four books of gardens from the poems of Renatus Rapinus, 1673—besides Alexander's life, from Plutarch, inserted in the 4th volume of Plutarch, by several hands—and the history of the grand visiers, &c. with the secret intrigues of the seraglio, 1677, 8vo. He married Martha daughter of Richard Spenser esq. by whom he had two sons and three daughters. He was one of the commissioners of the revenue in Ireland, and died in the flower of his age, in London, 24th March 1698, aged 45. His eldest son and two daughters died infants; the other daughter married the eldest son of lord chancellor Harcourt; and the son married, 1705, the daughter of Mr. Boscawen, and was in 1713 created a baronet. He was a commissioner of the customs, and fellow of the royal society.

EVERDINGEN, Cesar van, a Dutch painter, born at Alcaer, died 1679, aged 73. His victory of David over Goliath, in the church of Alcaer, is his best piece. His nephew Albert was eminent as a landscape painter. He died 1675, aged 54.

EUGENE, Francis, prince of Savoy, was born in 1663. He was son of Eugene Maurice, general of the Swis and Grisons, governor of Champagne, and earl of Soissons, by Olympia Mancini, niece of cardinal Mazarin. He was early intended for the church, and received an abbey from the French king, as a step to a cardinal's hat; but the death of his father, before he was 10 years of age, altered the prospects of his future life. The unjust banishment of his mother to the Low Countries raised his indignation; and as Curtius and Cæsar seemed more favorite authors with him than all the divines of the church, he panted for military employments, and when refused by the king he removed to Vienna with his brother Philip. The emperor received them with great courtesy, and from that time the two brothers, rejecting the offers of France, determined to become the faithful subjects of the imperial house. They soon distinguished themselves against the Turks; but the death of Philip, whilst bravely fighting, left Eugene to avenge his fall, and to conduct his regiment to victory. In 1683 Eugene displayed astonishing powers of valor in the presence of the princes and generals of the Austrian troops, in the raising of the siege of Vienna; and at New Lausel and Buda his bravery again became so conspicuous, that the duke of Lorraine, in presenting him to the emperor, said, "May it please your majesty, this young Savoyard will some time or other be the greatest captain of the age." The declaration of war against the empire by Lewis XIV. called forth all the abilities of Eugene; he was removed from the less important campaign against the Turks, to resist the French; and he so effectually blocked up Mantua that for two years his enemies were unable to advance a single step in Italy. The peace between Savoy and France, in 1696, enabled Lewis to negotiate with Eugene; but the offer of the government of Champagne, of a marshal's baton, and of an annual pension of 2000 pistoles, could not shake his fidelity to the emperor. His attachment was so well tried, that he was made commander in chief of the imperial forces in Hungary where he completed the campaign by the total defeat of the Turkish army, commanded by the grand seignor in person, 1697. In this famous battle, fought at Zenta near Peterwaradin, the Turks lost 20,000 men killed, 12,000 drowned, and 6000 prisoners, besides oxen, camels and horses, and a booty which amounted to several millions of pounds sterling, whilst the Germans had no more than 430 men killed. The peace of Carlowitz, in 1699, was thus insured by the valor of Eugene, and put an end to a war of 15 years, but new laurels awaited the hero, on the death of the king of Spain. While France claimed the succession, the emperor set forth also his title to the crown, and Eugene was sent to Italy to oppose the French forces under Villeroy. Though inferior in numbers, Eugene obtained the superiority in every encounter, and planning his measures with such wisdom that he surprised Cremona, and carried Villeroy away his prisoner by a coup de main. To the imperialists were soon added the English, who viewed with jealousy the elevation of the duke of Anjou to the throne of Spain, and resented the acknowledgement of the pretender for king of England by Lewis. Eugene at the head of the imperial council of the war, and in the field, displayed his usual abilities, and the battles of Schellenburg, Blenheim, Turin, &c. became the scenes of the superior powers of his mind and of the successful execution of his plans. His influence was so great that his enemies determined to cut him off by poison. He accordingly, in 1710, received a letter, enclosing a paper poisoned to such a degree that it made him, and three more who touched it, read ready to swoon, and killed a dog upon the spot upon his swallowing the noxious contents. In 1712 he came over to England, to induce the court to continue the war; but he was surprised to find his friend and comrade Marlborough in disgrace, and a new ministry totally averse to his measures. He however received the honor due to his rank and merit; he was magnificently feasted in the city of London; he received a sword worth £5000 from the queen, which he wore on her birth-day; but in the midst of the compliments paid him he still showed his respect for Marlborough, by taking his abode solely with him. Unsuccessful in London as a negotiator, he returned to the armies, where he was forced to act upon the defensive, to check the advance of the French forces into Germany. In March 1714 he signed with marshal Villars preliminary articles of peace, which were the September following concluded by a solemn treaty. He was received at Vienna in the most flattering manner by the emperor; but, in the bosom of peace, new victories awaited him. The Turks began to threaten the imperialists in 1716, and Eugene, placing himself at the head of the army in Hungary, defeated them with dreadful slaughter, and took Temeswaer, of which they had had possession 164 years, and afterwards besieged and reduced Belgrade. After the peace with the Turks, Eugene had little to do with the disputes between Spain and the emperor. In 1733 he was, however, engaged in the wars between the imperialists and the kings of France, Spain, and Sardinia, where his usual prudence and success were eminently displayed. He died at Vienna 10th April 1736, aged 73. His death was sudden, as the preceding day he had entertained company, and he is supposed to have been choaked in the night by a strong defluxion of rheum. This heroic general deserved equal commendation in the character of a private man. He was affable, modest, generous, and humane. He was also the patron of learned men, and himself no indifferent scholar. Thomas à Kempis' book, de imitatione, was the constant companion of his travels and campaigns, and he wisely observed, with Gustavus Adolphus, that a good Christian always made a good soldier. His collection of books, pictures, and prints, is preserved in the imperial library. His funeral sermon was preached by cardinal Passionei, nuncio at Vienna, from these words of Maccabees, "Alexander, son of Philip the Macedonian, made many wars, took many strong holds, went through the ends of the earth, took spoils of many nations. The earth was quiet before him. After these things he fell sick, and perceived that he should die."

EUGENIUS I. St. pope, after Martin, 654, died three years after, 1st June. He was a pious and benevolent pontiff.

EUGENIUS II. succeeded Pascal I. 824, and died three years after, 27th October. He supported the water ordeal, and was an advocate for image worship, though it was condemned by the council of Paris.

EUGENIUS III. was made pope 1145; but, dissatisfied with the tumultuous conduct of the Romans, he retired to Pisa, and thence to Paris, and to Rheims, where he called a council. He died at Tivoli 7th July 1153.

EUGENIUS IV. Gabriel Condolmero, a Venetian, elected pope 1431, after Martin V. He had a violent dispute with the council which had assembled at Basil, and issued a bull to dissolve it; but the bishops resisted his authority, and he was at last obliged to assent to their resolutions, and to confirm them. Another council at Ferrara was equally obstinate, though the pope proposed a reconciliation and union between the eastern and western churches, supported by the presence and authority of the emperor John Palæologus, and of several Greek bishops. The sudden breaking out of a plague dispersed the council, which removed to Florence; but the terms of pacification which were there adopted were soon violated. The council of Basil presumed to depose the pontiff, and to appoint Amadeus VIII. duke of Savoy, in his room, under the title of Felix V.; but the cause of the dishonored Eugenius prevailed, and he died at Rome in the full enjoyment of his privileges, 1447, aged 64.

EUGENIUS, a grammarian, whom count Arbogastus proclaimed emperor in Dauphiné, after the death of Valentinian the younger, 392. Though successful in his first attempts upon Milan, and in his invasion of Italy, he was soon after defeated by Theodosius, and fell in battle, 394.

EULER, Leonard, an illustrious mathematician, born at Basil 14th July 1707. His father, Paul Euler, who was protestant minister of Riehen, intended him for the ministry, and he instructed him himself in mathematics, for the ground work of all other improvements; but the genius of the son was bent to philosophical pursuits, rather than theology. Encouraged by the Bernouillis, he soon followed them, 1727, to Peterburgh, where Catharine I. had founded, in 1723, an academy of sciences, and in 1727 he was appointed adjutant to the mathematical class of the academy. His different publications on the nature and propagation of sound, on curves, on the calculus integralis, the movement of the celestial bodies, and other useful subjects, had already raised his reputation, and ranked him among the greatest of philosophers. The powers of his mind were indeed astonishing. While his fellow academicians asked four months to complete an important calculation, he finished it in three days, but so intense had been his application that it produced a fever, which robbed him of the sight of one of his eyes. He gained, in 1740, with Maclaurin and D. Bernoulli, the prize of the academy of Paris, on the nature of tides; and the labors of these three illustrious men, thus adjudged equally meritorious, traced the effects, though by different roads, to the same causes. In 1741 he removed to Berlin, at the invitation of the king of Prussia, and assisted the monarch in the establishment of an academy of sciences, whose memoirs he enriched by valuable communications. Still indefatigable, he produced his theory of the motions of the planets and comets, the theory of magnetism, the theory of light and colors against Newton's system of emanations, and the theory of the equilibrium and motion of floating bodies and the resistance of fluids. In 1773 also he published his theorie complete de la construction et de la manœuvre des vaisseaux, which valuable work was translated into all languages, and was rewarded with 6000 livres from the French king, as his theorems before had been rewarded with £300 from the British parliament. His labors of thirty years on the most intricate subject of infinitesimals were communicated to the public by his "introduction to the analysis of infinitesimals," and followed by lessons on the calculus integralis, and differentialis. Thus engaged in the cause of science, and for the benefit of mankind, he continued in the enjoyment of health to a good old age, and while arranging his thoughts on the motion of the aerostatical globes, and conversing with his friend Lexell on the new planet, he was suddenly attacked by a fit of apoplexy, as he played with one of his grandchildren at tea-time. The stroke was sudden, and immediately fatal. "I am dying," were his last words, and a few hours after he expired, 7th September 1783, aged 76 years 5 months, 3 days. Besides the works already enumerated, there are many others, equally valuable, on geometrical and philosophical subjects. He was a man, indeed, as his impartial and eloquent eulogist, Fufs, has mentioned, of astonishing powers, great and extensive erudition, and of such retentive memory that he could repeat the whole of the Æneid, and in one night he calculated in his head the six first powers [of all the numbers above 20, which he repeated the next day most correctly to his astonished friends. Affable, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, he could abandon the most abstruse studies to mix with the general amusements of society, and, with unusual vivacity, enter into all the trifles and the frivolous anecdotes which often fill up the vacuum of company. His piety was ardent but sincere, he loved mankind, and defended the great truths of religion with earnestness and fidelity. He was twice married, and was father of thirteen children; four of whom only survived him. The eldest son was his assistant and successor; the second, physician to the empress; and the third lieutenant-colonel in the artillery; the daughter married major Bell. These four children gave him 38 grandchildren, among whom he was viewed as a venerable and deservedly respected patriarch. The list of his works makes 50 pages, 14 of which contain the MS. works. The printed works amount to 38 volumes, and are found in the Petersburg, Paris, Berlin acts, &c.

EULOGIUS, a patriarch of Alexandria, intimate with Gregory the great. He wrote against the Novatians, and died 608.

EULOGIUS, the martyr of Cordova, put to death by the Saracens, 859, after being elected, but not consecrated, archbishop of Toledo. He wrote a history of some martyrs, &c.

EUMATHIUS, a Greek writer of amatorial compositions. He wrote Ismenias and Ismene. The age in which he lived is unknown. He is sometimes called Eustathius.

EUMENES, a celebrated general of Alexander the great. He was at last overpowered in the dissensions which divided the generals of Alexander, and put to death by Antigonus, 316 B.C.

EUMENES, a king of Pergamus, B.C. 263. His nephew, of the same name, was king, 197 B.C. and reigned 38 years.

EUMENIUS, an eminent orator, about 310 A.D.

EUNAPIUS, a physician of the 4th century, a violent enemy of Christianity. He wrote the lives of philosophers and sophists, the history of the Cæsars, &c.

EUNOMIUS, a native of Cappadocia, in the 4th century, disciple of Ætius, and founder of a sect called Eunomians, who denied the essential deity of Christ. He was made bishop of Cyzicum, 360, but was several times banished for his fanatical opinions, and died very old, 394, after experiencing a great variety of sufferings.

EUPHEMIA, Flavia Elia Marcia, the concubine and then the wife of the emperor Justin I. died without children, 523. She showed herself a great and benevolent princess on the throne.

EUPHEMIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople, who quarrelled with the popes about the insertion of names among the saints, and was banished by Anastasius to Ancyra, where he died, 515.

EUPHORION, a Greek poet and historian of Chalcis, in Eubœa, B.C. 274. There were two other writers of the same name.

EUPHRANOR, an Athenian painter and sculptor, B.C. 352.

EUPHRATES, a heretic of the 2d century. He and his followers imagined that our first parents were deceived by Christ, in the form of a serpent, and therefore they paid divine honors to serpents, and thence were called ophites, or serpentarians. There was a platonic philosopher of this name under Perdiccas, and another, a stoic, in the age of Adrian.

EUPOLIS, a comic poet, of Athens, B.C. 435, said to have been thrown into the sea by Alcibiades, because he had written a play to satirize him.

EVREMOND, St. Charles de St. Denis lord of, a well known French writer of a noble family in Normandy, born at St. Denis le Guast, April 1st, 1613. He was educated in the college of Clermont, Paris, and at Caen, and being a younger son, was intended for the law, but his inclinations turned to a military life, and before he was sixteen he obtained an ensigncy. He signalized himself in the army, and was as well known for his politeness and literary accomplishments, as for his valor in the field, so that the duke of Enghien admiring his character made him lieutenant of his guards to have him near his person. He was at the siege of Arras in 1640, and served in the campaigns of Rocroy and Friburg, and was wounded in the knee, in the battle of Nortlingen. After the taking of Fumes in 1646, the duke commissioned him to convey the news to the court, and to concert with Mazarin measures for the siege and reduction of Dunkirk, but he was in 1648, for some satirical remarks dismissed from the confidence and friendship of the duke, who unfortunately loved railery, but was not magnanimous enough to pardon it. He was afterwards reconciled to the court, and the king, well acquainted with his merits, made him in 1652 a major general, and granted him a pension of 3000 livres a year. He served in Guienne under the duke of Candale, and after a confinement of three months in the bastille for reflections on Mazarin's character, he was permitted to attend the campaign of Flanders in 1654. In 1657 he fought a duel with the marquis de Force, which proved so offensive to the court, that he retired into the country, till his friends could procure his pardon. In the campaign of 1649 he served in Flanders, and soon after he accompanied Mazarin in the negotiation and conclusion of a treaty with the Spanish ministry. Of this journey and negotiation he gave a written account to the marquis of Crequi, which contained such severe reflections on the character of Mazarin, and such odious charges of sacrificing the honor of France, to private interest, that the composition was considered as treasonable, and though the cardinal was dead, the writer was obliged to fly to Holland, in 1661, from the persecution of the court. From Holland he immediately passed to England, where he had been sent the year before by the French king to congratulate Charles on his restoration, and he was received with great courtesy by Buckingham, and the English nobility. Devoting himself here to literature, and the society of his friends, he did not however forget his native country, and he solicited his return from the court, but to no purpose. He afterwards visited Flanders, Spa, and Liege, and wished to fix his residence in Holland, but the invitations of Charles, by the hands of sir William Temple and lord Arlington, prevailed upon him to return to England where the king granted him a pension of 300*l.* a year. On the death of Charles he lost his pension, and his applications to the French king for pardon, by the means of his friend Crequi, proved ineffectual; but though deserted by his country, he refused to accept near James's person the honorable office of private secretary of the cabinet. The revolution proved more favorable to his interests, William honored the illustrious stranger with his friendship, and while he liberally patronized him, he delighted in his conversation, and eagerly heard from him the recital of the wars and adventures of his youthful days. At last the French king relented, and offers of reconciliation were sent by count Grammont, but St. Evremond now refused to quit a country where he had been so hospitably treated, and where his old age and infirmities could meet with a continuation of long experienced comforts. He died on the 9th of September, 1703, of a frangury, in his 95th year, and were buried in Westminster-abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory. St. Evremond was an accomplished gentleman, and though his morals were not rigid, he was generous in his conduct, humane and benevolent. Though suspected by Bayle of being a free-thinker, he always professed the Romish faith; and though occasionally giving a loose to satire, and making pleasure the sole business of life, he never spoke with jocularly, or indecorous freedom of religion or morality. Common decency, says he, and the regard due to one's fellow-creatures, will not suffer it. He describes himself as a philosopher equally remote from superstition and impiety, a voluptuary, who has no less aversion for debauchery than inclination for pleasure, who lived in a condition despised by those who have every thing, and envied by those who have nothing, but relished by those who make reason the foundation of their happiness. He is well pleased with nature, and does not complain of fortune, he hates vice, is indulgent to frailties, and laments misfortunes. He searches not after the failings of men to expose them, and only finds out the ridiculous in them for his own diversion. Of his works, which consist of light pieces of poetry and prose, and the best edition is that of Amsterdam 1726, 5 vols. 12mo. with two other volumes of pieces attributed to his pen, with his life prefixed, by des Maizeaux. They have been translated, London, 1728, 3 vols. 8vo.

EURIPIDES, a Greek tragic poet, born at Salamis about 480 B.C. Only 19 of his sublime tragedies are extant.

EURYDICE, wife of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, and was the mother of Philip, the father of Alexander, and conspired against her husband.

EURYDICE, daughter of Aridæus, was put to death by Olympias, with the rest of her family.

EUSDEN, Lawrence, an English poet, descended from an Irish family, and born at Spottsworth in Yorkshire, where his father was rector. He was educated at Trinity college Cambridge, and upon taking orders, was made chaplain to lord Willoughby de Broke. He was also patronized by lord Halifax, and by the duke of Newcastle, whose marriage with lady Henrietta Godolphin he celebrated in verse, for which the duke, on Rowe's death, appointed him laureat 1718. This elevation was viewed with jealousy by the contemporary bards; and Pope, without any known cause, assigned to the laureat a distinguished place in his Dunciad. Eusden died at his rectory at Coningsby, Lincolnshire, 27th September 1730. One of his biographers has asserted that in the latter part of his life, he became a very great drunkard, but perhaps without authority. He left a MS. translation of Tasso. Some of his poems are preserved in Nichols's select collection.

EUSEBIA, abbess of St. Cyr, or St. Saviour's, at Marfeilles, who is said to have cut off her nose, to secure herself from the brutality of Saracen ravishers. Her nuns followed her example, but they were all murdered by the disappointed barbarians, 731. A similar story is related of an abbess of Coldingham in England.

EUSEBIUS, a Greek bishop of Rome, after Marcellus, 310. He violently opposed the readmission of lapsed christians to the communion, for which he was banished to Sicily by the emperor Maxentius, and died the same year.

EUSEBIUS, Pamphilus, an ecclesiastical historian, born at Palestine, and made bishop of Cæsarea 313. He opposed Arius, though his personal friend, and died about 338. He wrote the life of Constantine,—an ecclesiastical history, &c.

EUSEBIUS, a bishop of Berytus, and afterwards of Constantinople, who died 341.

EUSEBIUS, a bishop of Emesa, in Syria, author of some homilies. He died 360.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Vercell, in Piedmont, strenuously defended Athanasius, and died 371.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Samosata, favored but afterwards opposed Arianism, and died by the fall of a tile 358.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Doryleum in Phrygia, was deposed by the Eutychians, whom he opposed, 449.

EUSTACHE, David, a protestant minister, of Montpellier, sent in 1669 by the synod of Ludun, to address the French king. His speech to the monarch on this occasion was much admired. He was author of some theological and controversial tracts.

EUSTACHIUS, Bartholomew, an Italian physician of the 16th century, born at San-Severino. He settled at Urbino, and afterwards at Rome, where his anatomical tables were engraved 1552, though not published till 1714, and the second edition 1728. His opuscula anatomica were republished by Boerhaave 1707. He died 1570.

EUSTATHIUS, a Romish saint, bishop of Bœrea and Antioch. He was banished by Constantius for opposing the Arians, and he died at Trajanopolis 360. His writings are lost.

EUSTATHIUS, a learned Greek commentator on Homer and Dionysius the geographer. He was bishop of Thessalonica and died about 1194.

EUSTROCHUM, a Roman lady, like her mother Paula, well skilled in Greek and Hebrew. She was a disciple of St. Jerome, and lived in a monastery at Bethlehem, from which she fled during a persecution, and died 419.

EUSTRATIUS, a bishop of Nice, whose commentaries on Aristotle's analytics and ethics, have been published at Venice 1534, and 1536, and Paris 1543. He lived in the 12th century. There was a priest of Constantinople of that name in the sixth century, author of a work on the state of the dead.

EUTHYMIUS, an Isaurian, made patriarch of Constantinople, by Leo VI. 906, and displaced by Alexander II. He died in exile 910 or 911, and was buried at Constantinople.

EUTHYMIUS, Zigabenus, or Zigadenus, a Greek monk of Constantinople, the favorite of Alexius Comnenus. He wrote, at the emperor's command, Panoplia dogmatica orthodoxæ fidei, or the whole armour of the orthodox faith, against heretics. He wrote nine other works besides. The time of his death is unknown, though it was after 1118.

EUTOCIUS, a Greek mathematician of Ascalon, in Palestine, who wrote commentaries on the conics of Apollonius, published in Halley's edition. He wrote also commentaries on Archimedes, published at Oxford 1792. He is a very learned, accurate, and judicious commentator. He flourished in the sixth century.

EUTROPIUS, Flavius, a Latin historian, secretary to Constantine. He wrote an epitome of the Roman history.

EUTROPIUS, an eunuch, minister to Arcadius. He was consul 399, but proved in his conduct so tyrannical, that he was banished, and afterwards beheaded.

EUTYCHES, abbot of a convent near Constantinople, opposed violently the Nestorians, and maintained in his zeal that Christ's body was an aerial form, and therefore not human. These notions were censured in the council of Constantinople 448, and Eutyches was deposed, though another council was summoned to reverse the sentence; and a third composed of 630 bishops confirmed the sentence of the first, and declared that in Christ were united two natures without mixture or confusion.

EUTYCHIANUS, pope, a native of Tuscany, successor of Felix 275, and succeeded in 283, by Caius, on his martyrdom.

EUTYCHIUS, a monk of Amasea, made patriarch of Constantinople by Justinian, 553, and deposed by him 564. He was restored by Tiberius II. and died 585, aged 73.

EUTYCHIUS, a Christian author, born at Cairo 876. He practised physic with great success among the Mahometans, and afterwards became, in 933, patriarch of Alexandria, and exchanged his name of Said Ebn Batrick for its Greek correspondent word Eutychius. He wrote, in Arabic, annals from the beginning of the world to 900, curious, but not always authentic. He wrote also, de rebus Siciliæ, preserved in MS. in Cambridge public library; and died 950. An extract from his annals relating to the church of Alexandria appeared, in Arabic and Latin, at Oxford, by Selden, 1642, 4to. and the whole annals were published, Arabic and Latin, by Pocock, 1659, 4to.

EUZORIUS, a deacon of Alexandria, deposed and condemned by the council of Nice for his attachment to the tenets of Arius. He satisfied Constantine on articles of faith afterwards, and was made bishop of Antioch 361. He baptized Constantius, and died 376. — Another of the same name was bishop of Cæsarea.

EWALD, John, a native of Copenhagen, who, in the hopes of seeing the world, embraced the military profession, and became a serjeant in the Prussian service. He afterwards deserted from his regiment, and returned to Denmark, where he studied divinity, but did not enter into orders. Poetry was his favorite pursuit, and, to enlarge his understanding, he studied the best English poets. He wrote poems in the style of Ossian—Adam and Eve, a dramatic poem—a theatrical piece called the fisherman—and other poems, which possess great merit, and rank high in the temple of poetry. He died 1781, aged 38, and his works were collected together at Copenhagen in 1791, in 4 vols.

EXPILLI, Claude d', president of the parliament of Grenoble, was born at Voiron, Dauphiny, and died at Grenoble 1636, aged 75. He was a writer of some merit, though better known as an upright magistrate. He published pleadings, Paris, 4to. 1612—poems, 4to. 1624—a life of Bayard, 1650—a treatise on French orthography, 1618, fol.

EXUPERIUS, a Romish saint, bishop of Toulouse, distinguished for his charity in the time of a famine. After parting with all his property, he sold the gold and silver utensils of the church, to supply the necessities of the poor. He died about 417.

EYCK, Hubert Van, a painter, born at Maseik on the Maese, died 1426, aged 60. He painted much for Philip the good, duke of Burgundy, his friend and patron.

EYCK, John van, brother and disciple to the preceding, died 1441, aged 71. He is supposed to be the inventor of painting in oil, which he discovered by mixing linseed oil in the composition of a brilliant varnish. The secret was conveyed to Italy by one of his pupils, and divulged to the world. He is sometimes called John of Bruges. His historical pieces and landscapes are much admired.

EYKENS, Peter, a painter of Antwerp, born 1599. His last supper, and John preaching in the desert, are admired pieces, preserved in the churches at Antwerp.

EYMAR, A. M. d', a deputy from Forcalquier to the states-general in 1789, evinced his attachment to the opinions and the system of Rousseau, as a lover of republicanism. He was sent as ambassador to Piedmont, and discovered the treaty which the Sardinian king had made to espouse the cause of the confederates against France; and in consequence of this, by his intrigues, he forced the unfortunate monarch from his Italian dominions. He was afterwards prefect of Leman, and died at Geneva 1805. He wrote some small tracts, not devoid of merit.

EZEKIEL, the third of the greater prophets, was son of Buzi, and descended from Aaron. He was a captive at Babylon with Jehoiachim king of Judah, 597 before Christ, and there he wrote his prophecies, on the banks of the Chebar. His style, according to bishop Lowth, is bold, vehement, and tragical, abounding with figurative expressions, and worked up occasionally to a degree of tremendous dignity. He foretold to his people the coming of the Messiah, and their restoration.

EZEKIEL, a Greek Jew and poet, author of some tragedies on scripture subjects. Large fragments of his tragedy of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt are preserved by Clemens of Alexandria and Eusebius. It is supposed that he flourished about 300, or according to some 200, years before Christ.

EZRA, one of the descendants of Aaron, son of Seraiah. He shared the captivity of Babylon, and was permitted by Artaxerxes to conduct a colony of his countrymen to Jerusalem, and to rebuild the temple and establish the laws of Moses, about 467 before Christ. A book bearing his name in the bible, and two in the apocrypha, are preserved. He died in Persia, or according to Josephus at Jerusalem.

FABER, John, a German divine, born in Suabia, and, from one of his works against the reformers, called the Mallet of Heretics. He was made, 1526, confessor to Ferdinand, king of the Romans, and in 1531, advanced to the see of Vienna, where he died 1542, aged 63. He owed his elevation to his zeal in the defence of the papists against Luther and his adherents. His works, which display warmth and fluency of language, are contained in 3 vols. folio, Cologne, 1537-1541.

FABER, Basil, a zealous Lutheran, born 1520, at Soraw in Lusatia. He was teacher in the schools of Nordhausen, Tennstadt, and Quedlinburg, and rector of Erfurt. His chief, and most valuable work is Theaurus Eruditionis Scholasticæ, published 1571, and improved afterwards by Cellarius and others. The best edition is 2 vols. fol. 1735. Faber died 1576.

FABER, Antonius, Vid. FABRE, Anthony.

FABER, Jacobus, Vid. FEVRE, James.

FABER, Nicolaus, Vid. FEVRE, Nicolas.

FABER, Tanaquil, Vid. FEVRE.

FABERT, Abraham, an officer, who raised himself, by his extraordinary merit, to the dignity of marshal of France under Lewis XIV. He distinguished himself in 1635, at the siege of Turin 1640, when he was badly wounded, at the siege of Perpignan 1642, and in 1654 at the taking of Stenai. As he was not duly qualified by nobility of ancestors, he refused the collar of the royal order, observing, he would not be decorated with a cross, with his soul disgraced by an impotence. Though brave, he was childishly addicted to astrological calculations.

FABIAN, Robert, a merchant of London, sheriff and alderman of his native city, where he died 1512. He had some skill in Latin and English poetry; but his chief work is his "Chronicle of England and France," first printed 1516, and again 1553, 2 vols. folio. The first volume begins with Brute and ends at the death of Henry II. and the second, which is very valuable, ends 1504. Stow calls the work a painful labor, to the great honor of the city, and of the whole realm. Because he spoke too plainly of the revenues of the church, Wolsey caused as many copies of the book as possible to be destroyed. Fabian was buried at St. Michael's, Cornhill.

FABIAN, a saint of the Romish church, made pope 326. He was active in the dissemination of Christianity and the building of churches, and he suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Decius.

FABIUS, Maximus Rullianus, a Roman, master of the horse to the dictator Papirius. He triumphed over seven nations, and was himself dictator, B. C. 287.

FABIUS, Maximus Quintus, an illustrious Roman, who opposed Annibal in Italy, and in consequence of his dilatory, but salutary measures, was called Cunctator. When the senate refused to ratify a ransom of prisoners on which he had agreed, he sold his estates to pay the money. He died B. C. 203.

FABIUS, Piſtor, the first Latin historian mentioned among the Romans, B. C. 225.

FABRE, Jean Claude, a priest of the oratory of Paris, who died there 1753, aged 85. He is known as a laborious, but not judicious, compiler. He wrote two dictionaries, an indifferent translation of Virgil, and a continuation of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, and some articles in Richelet's Dictionary.

FABRE, N. a native of Languedoc, famous for his filial piety. When his father was condemned to the gallies for his adherence to Calvinism, in 1752, he, unperceived, took his place among the condemned, and remained for six years in confinement, till this virtuous sacrifice was made known to Mirepoix, the governor of the province, who liberated him, and presented him to the court as an illustrious character.

FABRE D'EGLANTINE, Philip Francis Mazaire, was born at Carcassone, 28th Dec. 1755, and, with a restless spirit, became successively an actor, a comic writer, and a statesman. In the convention he was the friend and confidential associate of Danton, Des Moulins, and the other promoters of the massacres, and of the miseries of France, and though originally poor, he soon became very rich. Robespierre, who viewed his assumed consequence with jealousy, hurled him from his eminence before the revolutionary tribunal, and he was guillotined 5th April 1794. He wrote some plays which possess merit, and he is particularly known as the person who recommended and introduced in France that puerile calendar which combated the habits, the opinions, and the prejudices of the rest of Europe.

FABRETTI, Raphael, a learned antiquary, born at Urbino in 1619. He studied at Cagli and Urbino, and then practised at Rome as an advocate. He was sent by cardinal Imperiali to negotiate, into Spain, and he conducted himself there, with such success and ability that he was made procurator fiscal of the kingdom. After 13 years' residence in Spain he returned to Rome, where he was appointed judge of appeals to the capitol, and afterwards auditor of the legation of Urbino, under Cerri the legate. Some time after he was engaged in drawing up the apostolical briefs to the pope's vicar, and lastly was secretary of the memorials to pope Alexander VIII. After Alexander's death he devoted himself to his favorite pursuits, the study of antiquities, and with his horse, to which his friends gave the name of Marco Polo, he made excursions in the neighbourhood of Rome to visit and examine whatever was most rare, curious, and valuable. Innocent XII. had such respect for him that he drew him from his retirement to make him master of the secrets of the pope's temporal state. He died 7th Jan. 1700. He published these valuable works, De Aquis & Aquæductibus Veteris Romæ Dissertationes tres, 4to. 1680 — De Columnâ Trajanâ Syntagma, &c. fol. 1683. Jasithei ad Gronovium Apologema, in ejusque Titivitiâ, five de Tito Livio Somnia Animadversiones 1686, 4to. — Inscriptionum Antiquarum, &c. Explicatio, fol. 1699, &c. He was learned, and in his researches indefatigable.

FABRI, Honoré, a learned jesuit, born at Bellay, near Lyons, 1607; professor of philosophy at Lyons, and penitentiary at Rome, where he died 1688. He wrote several large works on theology, optics, plants, &c. and he is said by some to have discovered the circulation of the blood before Harvey.

FABRIANO, Gentile da, an historical painter of Verona, who merited to be raised to the honors of Venetian nobility, and died 1412, aged 80.

FABRICIUS, Caius, a Roman general, who obtained some victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and indignantly rejected the offers of Pyrrhus, who attempted to bribe his integrity. He afterwards discovered to Pyrrhus the plot which his physician had formed to poison him. He died B. C. 250.

FABRICIUS, George, a learned German, born at Chemnitz, in Misnia, 1516, and famous for his Latin poetry. He travelled to Italy as tutor to a nobleman, and at Rome he composed his work called Roma, containing an interesting, and very animated description of that city. After returning home, he was for 26 years master of the school of Meßlein, where he died 1571. His poems, which are written with great powers of genius, and in the most elegant and correct language, appeared at Basle 1567, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote also some odes, hymns, &c. besides prose works, such as the Annals of Meßlein, in seven books, Origines Saxonicae, 2 vols. folio, &c. 2 vols. on the affairs of Germany, &c.

FABRICIUS, Jerome, an Italian physician, called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth. He studied languages at Padua, and acquired his medical knowledge under Fallopius. He practised for 40 years at Padua, and with such repute that Venice, sensible of his great merits, settled an annual pension of 1000 crowns of gold on him, besides the honor of a golden chain, and of a statue. He died about 1603, and left 2 vols. folio, the one on surgery, published Holland 1723, and the other on anatomy, Leyden, 1738.

FABRICIUS, William, a surgeon, born near Cologne, who became public physician at Berne, where he died 1634, aged 74. He wrote tracts on gangrene and sphacelus — on burns, on gun-shot wounds, on lithotomy — Six Centuries of Observations and Cures, &c. 1606, in 4to. His works were all published at Frankfort in fol. 1682.

FABRICIUS, John Lewis, a native of Schaffhausen, professor of theology and philosophy at Heidelberg, and also ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector. He was author of tracts De Viis Dei, et quousque sunt similes Viis Hominum — De Symbolicâ Dei Visione — on Infant Baptism, &c. He died at Frankfort 1697, aged 58.

FABRICIUS, John Albert, a learned German, born at Leipzig, 11th Nov. 1668, and educated at Quedlinburg. He showed astonishing powers of application, and after staying five years in the house of his friend Meyer at Hamburg, he was chosen professor of eloquence in that city 1699, and created D. D. at Kiel. He was invited by the langrave of Hesse-Cassel, to settle in his dominions, but to great was his reputation at Hamburg, that the senators prevailed upon him, by a superior salary, not to relinquish his residence among them. This most indefatigable scholar, equally admired for his modesty, and the simplicity of his manners, died at Hamburg, 3d April 1736. Of his numerous works, the most useful are Bibliotheca Latina, five Notitia Auctorum Veterum Latinorum quorumcunque Scripta ad nos pervenerunt, 2 vols. 4to. republished by Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo. — Bibliotheca Græca, five Notitia Scriptorum Veterum Græcorum, quorumcunque Monumenta Integra, aut Fragmenta, Edita extant, tum Plerorumque ex MSS. & Deperditis, 14 vols. 4to. — Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Collectus, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. 1719. — Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti, 2 vols. 8vo. 1722, and 1723. — Bibliographia Antiquaria, five Introductio in Notitiam Scriptorum qui Antiquitates Hebraicas, Græcas, Romanas, & Christianas Scriptis illustraverunt, 4to. 1716. — Delectus Argumentorum, & Syllabus Scriptorum qui veritatem Relig. Christi adversus Atheos, &c. asseruerunt, 4to. 1725. — Salutaris Lex Evangelii, &c. 4to. 1731. — Bibliotheca Mediæ & Infimæ Latinitate, 5 vols. 8vo. 1734, and 6 vols. 4to. 1754, Padua.

FABRICIUS, Vincent, a learned German, born at Hamburg 1613. He wrote Latin poetry with great ease, and elegance. He was counsellor to the bishop of Lubec, and afterwards syndic to the city of Dantzic, where he became burgomaster, and was 13 times deputy to Poland. He died at Warsaw, during the diet of the kingdom, 1667. The first edition of his poems was printed 1632 at the recommendation of his friend Daniel Heinfius; but the best is that of Leipzig 1685, under the care of his son.

FABRICIUS, Baron, a German writer, the favorite of Charles XII. with whom he resided as envoy of the court of Holstein, during that monarch's captivity at Bender. He was afterwards in the service of Stanislaus of Poland. He was also in the service of George I. and he accompanied him in his last journey to Hanover, so that the king actually died in his arms. Fabricius is known for his interesting letters, which give an account count of Charles XII. while resident in Turkey. They have been translated, and they appeared in London 1761, 8vo.

FABRICIUS, Charles, a painter, born at Delft. His house was destroyed by the blowing up of a powder magazine, and he with his pupil Spoors perished. He was in the flower of youth, and promised the fairest talents for fame.

FABRONI, Angiolo, a native of Marradi in Tuscany, educated at Fienza and at Rome. He was made by Peter Leopold prior of St. Lorenzo's church at Florence, and afterwards curator of Pisa university. He wrote an account of the learned men of Italy in the 17th and 18th centuries, of which 18 vols. were published, and one was left unfinished. He published also an account of Cosmo, Lorenzo, and the other illustrious members of the house of Medicis, besides some religious tracts, &c. He died at Pisa 1802, aged 70.

FABROT, Charles Hannibal, a French lawyer, born at Aix in Provence, 1580, where he became advocate and professor of law. In 1617 he came to Paris, and in 1637, he was prevailed upon by Seguier the chancellor who granted him a pension, to give an edition of the Basilicæ, or constitutions of the Eastern emperors. This great work appeared in 7 vols. fol. 1647, with a Latin translation and notes, and two years after he published Cedrenus, Nicetas, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Constantine Manasses and Glycas, in 2 vols. fol. with curious notes. In 1658 he published the works of Cujacius, revised and with notes, 10 vols. fol. His great application brought on disorders, which put an end to his life, 1659. He wrote besides notes on the Theodosian code, and a treatise against Salmafius, &c.

FACCIOLATI, Giacomo, an Italian orator and grammarian of Padua, who died 1769, aged 87. He edited Cicero's Oration pro Quinct. and wrote some philological and other learned works.

FACHETTI, Pietro, an eminent painter of Mantua; who died at Rome 1613, aged 78.

FACINI, Pietro, an historical painter of Bologna, who died 1602, aged 42. He was pupil to Annibal Caracci. His Christ with the three disciples, and Mary weeping at the death of Lazarus, is in the Wilton collection.

FACIO, Bartholomeo, a learned Italian, born at Spezia near Genoa. He was secretary to Alphonso king of Naples, and intimate with Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius II. He died about 1457. He wrote de Bello Veneto Claudiano, seu inter Venetos & Genuefenses, anno 1391, 8vo. 1578 — de Rebus ab Alphonso Neapolit. gestis, Libri decem — de Humanæ Vitæ Felicitate ad Alphonsum. Neap. Reg. — de Viris Illust. sui Temporis, 1745. His enmity to Laurentius Valla was almost proverbial.

FACUNDUS, bishop of Hermianum in Asia, known for his defence of the three chapters, at the council of Constantinople, 547. In consequence of his zeal on this occasion, and in favoring the Nestorians, he was banished by Justinian, but in his exile he still defended his opinions, and wrote so less than 12 books addressed to the emperor.

FADLALLAH, or Chodsa Raschid Addin, a Persian historian, visier to Cazan the sultan of Taurus. He wrote at the desire of his master, an History of the Moguls, finished 1294, to which he added a supplement. The first part of the work appeared in French by la Croix.

FAERNUS, Gabriel, a native of Cremona, known as a critic and a poet in the 16th century. He was the favorite of cardinal de Medicis, afterwards Pius IV. He wrote Latin elegies, besides pieces of criticism, and notes on Terence, so valuable that Bentley has inserted them whole in his edition of that poet. He wrote also in Iambic verse 100 fables, so much in the style of Phædrus, that Thuanus has accused him of concealing from the world that Latin fabulist then unknown, to procure celebrity for his own composition; but of his 100 fables only five treat the same subjects as Phædrus, and therefore the idea of either deceit or plagiarism is puerile. Faernus died at Rome 1561.

FAGAN, Christopher Bartholomew, a French comic writer, who died 1755, aged 53. He was like his father clerk in a public office at Paris, and devoted his leisure to poetry. Of his works collected in 4 vols. 12mo. 1760, the most approved comedies are, the Rendezvous, and the Ward, written in a delicate and lively style. Though a man of genius, he was averse to business, negligent of his dress, and very shy.

FAGE, Raimond de la, a self taught genius in drawing with the pen, or Indian ink, born at Lisle-en-Albigeois in Languedoc. He was highly complimented by Carlo Marat, but his intemperance ruined his prospects; as his time was generally spent at the alehouse, where he frequently discharged his bills by producing a sketch. He died 1690, aged 42.

FAGIUS, Paul, a protestant minister, born at Rheinzabern in Germany, 1504. His German name was Buchlein. He was educated at Heidelberg and Strasbourg, and after making great proficiency in Hebrew, which then was become fashionable, he undertook in 1527 the care of a school at Isna where he married. He afterwards abandoned this employment, and entering into orders he distinguished himself in 1541 by his zeal in administering to the necessities and comforts of the poor, during the plague which raged at Isna and the neighbouring places, from the infection of which he happily escaped. He afterwards preached at Strasbourg, and became professor at Heidelberg, where he published some works for the advancement of Hebrew literature. During the persecution of the protestants in Germany he was invited to England by Cranmer, where he came with Bucer in 1549. These two learned men were then engaged at Cambridge to complete a new translation of the bible, Fagius of the Old, and Bucer of the New Testament. This was never completed, as Fagius died of a fever at Cambridge, in Nov. 1550, and Bucer about a year after. The bodies of these two protestant divines were dug up and burnt under the gallows, in the ignominious reign of Mary. Fagius wrote on the Hebrew language and on the Targums.

FAGNANI, Prospero, an Italian, secretary to the holy congregation, and author of a commentary on the five books of the decretals. He died 1678, aged 80.

FAGNANO, Julius Charles, count of, marquis of Tofchi, a native of Sinigaglia, who published at Pesaro 1750, his works in 2 vols. 4to. in which he treats in a clear manner of the discoveries of the property and of the use of the geometrical curve, called the Lemniscate. He died 1760, aged 70.

FAGON, Guy Crescent, an eminent physician, born at Paris. He early supported the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and gained the royal approbation by his indefatigable researches in collecting plants on the Alps, and in the South of France. He was made professor of botany and chemistry in the royal gardens, and gradually rose to be physician to Lewis XIV. in 1693. It was by his advice that the king sent Tournefort to collect plants in the East. Though of a delicate constitution he lived by proper regimen to the age of 80, and died 1718, leaving two sons, one of whom became a bishop, and the other a counsellor of state.

FAGUNDY, Stephen, a Portuguese jesuit, author of Quæstiones de Christianis Officiis et Calibus Conscientiæ, in Ecclesiæ Præcepta — de Justitiæ, &c. He died at Lisbon 1645, aged 68.

FAHRENHEIT, Gabriel Daniel, an ingenious experimentalist, born at Dantzic, 14th May, 1686. He was intended for commerce, but his genius was bent to philosophical pursuits. In 1720 he improved the thermometer by substituting mercury for spirits of wine, and fixed the extremity of his scale at the point of cold, which he had observed in Iceland in 1709, but at Petersburg the cold has been known forty degrees below the ° of this thermometer. The English in general have adopted his scale, but the French adhere to Reaumur's. He travelled through Holland and on the continent in pursuit of knowledge, and died 16th Sep. 1736. He wrote a Dissertation on Thermometers 1724.

FAILLE, William de la, a syndic of Toulouse, who died 1711, aged 96. He wrote an interesting though inelegant history of his native city, 2 vols. fol.

FAIRCLOUGH, Samuel, a native of Haveril, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge. He was minister of Barnardiston, and afterwards of Ketton, Suffolk, and was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He was a most amiable character in private life, and though he disapproved of some things in the liturgy, he was the friend of episcopacy. He published a sermon preached at sir Nat. Barnardiston's funeral, and some other tracts, and died 1678, aged 84. His son Samuel was ejected from Houghton Conquest rectory, Bedfordshire, and died 1691, and his other son Richard was also ejected from Wells living, Somersetshire, and died 1682.

FAIRFAX, Edward, an English poet in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, son of sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, Yorkshire. He early displayed poetical talents, and according to Dryden himself a judge of merit, he deserved to be ranked above Spenser in point of harmony. His first attempt was a translation of Tasso's Godfrey of Bouillon, a performance very respectable, and highly valued by the wits of the times, and esteemed greatly by James and Charles I. He wrote also some eclogues, besides controversial treatises on the pope's infallibility, &c. and deserved the amiable character of a modest, benevolent man, who preferred solitude and peace to the war and tumults of the times. He died about the year 1632, at Newhall, between Denton and Knareborough. His son William translated Dionægenes Laertius into English.

FAIRFAX, Thomas lord, eldest son of Ferdinando lord Fairfax, was born at Denton, Yorkshire, 1611. He early devoted himself to the profession of arms, and after serving in Holland under lord Vere with great credit, he embraced the party of the presbyterians in the civil war, and fought against the king. He was engaged in the North where he suffered some defeats, especially at Adderton moor 1643, but he retrieved his affairs and his fame in the battle of Marston moor, and for his services was entrusted with the chief command of the army on the resignation of lord Essex. He contributed greatly to the king's defeat at Naseby 1645, and afterwards marched to the reduction of the West. In 1648 he succeeded to the title on the death of his father who had like himself been very active in the cause of the parliament, and the same year he reduced Colchester, and, much to his disgrace, ordered the brave defenders sir George Lisle and sir Charles Lucas, to whom he had promised pardon, to be shot. On the king's trial it was supposed that he would interfere, but during the execution he was kept at a distance from the dreadful scene, engaged with col. Harrison, by the intrigues of Cromwell, in the hypocritical attitude of offering up prayers to God. After the destruction of royalty he favored the views of the usurper, he was made doctor of laws at Oxford, and treated with unusual ceremony in London, but when offered by the parliament the command of the army against the revolted presbyterians of Scotland, he pertinaciously refused it, and it was granted to Cromwell. He afterwards lived in retirement, and at the restoration he was reconciled to the king, and went to the Hague to congratulate him on the change of the republican government. He wrote an interesting account of his public life, and died 1671.

FAIRTHORNE, William, an English painter, who became a soldier during the civil wars, and being taken at Basing-house was banished for refusing to swear allegiance to Cromwell. He studied abroad under Champagné, and on his return home applied himself chiefly in engraving, in which he also excelled. He wrote a book "upon drawing, graving, and etching," celebrated by Flatman the poet, and died at Blackfriars 1691, aged 75. His son William acquired celebrity by mezzotinto engraving.

FAISTENBERGER, Anibony, a painter of Inspruck, who died 1722, aged 44. His landscapes, cascades, rocks, and rivers, were all in a masterly style. His younger brother Joseph was equally eminent in landscape painting.

FALCANDUS, Hugo, a respectable and accurate historian of Sicily, who published an account of the affairs of his afflicted country for 23 years under William I. and II. His preface was written 1126. The time of his death is unknown.

FALCONBERG, Mary, countess of, the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and second wife of Thomas viscount Falconberg. She possessed great beauty, and so much spirit and activity that, as Burnet observes, she was more worthy to be protector than her brother. On Richard's deposition she exerted herself strenuously strenuously for the restoration of Charles II. with whom her husband was in great favor. She died 14th March, 1712.

FALCONE, da Benevento, secretary to pope Innocent II. was author of a Chronicle or History of Naples from 1102 to 1140.

FALCONER, William, a Scotsman, who came to London in 1762, where he published "the Shipwreck," in three cantos, a very ingenious and pathetic poem. He wrote also that useful compilation the Marine Dictionary, 4to. His merits recommended him to the patronage of the great, and especially of the late duke of York. As he was a sailor he unfortunately perished in the Aurora in 1769. This ship was proceeding to the East Indies with Messrs. Vanfittart, Scrafton, Ford, and other gentlemen, and after touching at the Cape of Good Hope, was never heard of.

FALCONET, Camille, a French physician, the friend of Malebranche, born at Lyons, 1671. He was elected in 1716 into the French academy, and from his excellent collection of nearly 500,000 volumes, he liberally enriched the royal library with such books as were deficient. He lived to the age of 91 in 1762, and is supposed to have, like Fagon, prolonged life by his medical skill. He wrote a translation of Villemont's Systema Planetarum — an edition of the Pastorals of Daphnis and Chloe, translated by Amyot — an edition of Desperier's Cymbalum Mundi, besides Dissertations.

FALCONIA, Proba, a Latin poetess in the age of Theodosius, born at Horta in Etruria. She wrote from Virgil a poetical canto, containing the History of the Creation, and of the Life of our Saviour.

FALDA, Giovanni Baptista, an Italian engraver of the last century, whose etchings in aqua fortis are much admired. His views of palaces, fountains, &c. in Rome, are esteemed very curious.

FALETI, Jeronimo, a poet of Savona, near Genoa, who published in 1557 a poem on the Wars of Charles V. and other poems. He was also distinguished as an orator, historian, and statesman, and was employed as ambassador to Venice by Hercules, duke of Ferrara.

FALIERI, Ordelafo, a doge of Venice, who went with a fleet in 1102 to assist Baldwin of Jerusalem in the conquest of Syria. On his return he conquered Dalmatia, Croatia, and other provinces, and afterwards lost his life at the siege of the revolted city of Zara in Dalmatia, 1120.

FALIERI, Marino, a doge of Venice, 1354, who conspired to make himself absolute by the assassination of all the senators. His plot was discovered, and he lost his head at the age of 80, and more than 400 of his associates were hanged.

FALK, John Peter, a learned Swede, born at Westrogothia, and educated at Upsal, where he studied medicine and also botany under Linnæus. He was made professor of botany in the Apothecaries' garden at Petersburg, and keeper of the natural history cabinet, and he published Observations on his Travels, 3 vols. 4to. 1785, Petersburg. In a fit of melancholy, to which he was often subject, he unfortunately destroyed himself, 1774, aged 47.

FALKENSTEIN, John Henry, a native of Franconia, made, in 1714, director of the academy of noblemen at Erlingen. He was next in the service of the bishop of Eichstadt, and afterwards of the margrave of Anspach. He left the protestant for the Roman catholic religion, and died 1760, aged 78. He published the Antiquities of Nordgan in the diocese of Eichstadt, 3 vols. folio, and other works on ecclesiastical and antiquarian subjects.

FALKLAND, lord, Vid. CARY.

FALLE, Philip, author of the History of Jersey, where he was born 1655. He entered, at the age of 14, at Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Alban hall. He was rector of St. Saviour's in the island, and came over as one of the deputies of the states to William and Mary. He also published three sermons preached at St. Hilary's, 1692, Whitehall, 1694, and before the lord mayor, 1695.

FALLOPIUS, Gabriel, a celebrated Italian physician and anatomist, born at Modena, 1490. He travelled through Europe, and afterwards practised with the greatest success and reputation. He was professor of anatomy at Pisa, 1548, and three years after at Padua, where he died 9th Oct. 1563, aged 72. He made various discoveries in anatomy, and especially the tubes by which the ova descend from the female ovarium into the uterus, called from him "Fallopian tubes." His works, which are all on subjects of medicine and anatomy, were published in 3 vols. fol. Venice, 1584 and 1606.

FALS, Raymond, a medal engraver, born at Stockholm, 1658. He settled at Paris, where he obtained a pension of 1200 livres, and died at Berlin, 1703.

FALSTER, Christian, a Danish critic of Flensburg, the time of whose death is not accurately ascertained. He wrote Supplementum Linguae Latinae, 1717 — Animadversiones Epistolicae — Quæstiones Romanae — Cogitationes Philologicae — Sermo Panegyricus, &c. Vigilia prima Noctium Ripensium — Amœnitates Philologicae, 3 vols. — the 14th satire of Juvenal translated into Danish, 1731.

FANCOURT, Samuel, a dissenting minister, born in the West of England. He settled at Salisbury, where for 20 years he took some pupils, and had the care of a congregation; but his writings against Calvinism exposed him to persecution, and driven from his residence, he came to London. About the year 1740, or 1745, he established the first circulating library in the kingdom; but, however, his plans did not succeed to his wishes, and after advertizing for subscribers, and offering to teach the classics, so as to enable his pupils to write and speak fluently in 12 months for 12 guineas, he sunk into poverty and neglect, and from the corner of one of the streets of the Strand, where he had a shop, he retired to Hoxton square, where his indigence was relieved by the charitable contributions of his friends. He died 8th June 1768, aged 90. As a preacher it is said that he was zealous and persuasive, without being popular or eloquent. His publications, which were numerous, are mentioned in the Gent. Magazine, 1784, p. 274.

FANNEUS,

FANNIUS, surnamed STRABO, a Roman, who is known by his law to curb the extravagance of his countrymen. His son was an elegant orator. An historian of the same name in Trajan's age, wrote an account of Nero's reign now lost.

FANSHAW, fir Richard, an English gentleman, 10th son of fir Henry Fanshaw, of Ware park, Herfs, where he was born 1607. After studying at Cambridge, he travelled on the continent, and in 1635, was engaged in the service of Charles I., who sent him as envoy to Spain. In 1644 he attended the king at Oxford, and was made by the university doctor of laws, and afterwards appointed secretary to Charles prince of Wales, whose wanderings he shared in the West of England, and in the islands of Scilly, and Jersey. He was treasurer of the navy under Rupert, in 1648, and was created 1650, a baronet by Charles II., and sent as envoy to Spain. He was taken at the battle of Worcester, and imprisoned in London, from which however he was liberated in consequence of a severe illness, by giving bail. In 1659, he visited the king at Breda, by whom he was knighted, and at the restoration, he was made master of requests, and secretary of the Latin language. He afterwards was ambassador in Portugal, to negotiate the marriage of Charles and the infanta Catharina, and on his return 1663, he was sworn of the privy council. He was in 1664 sent as ambassador to Philip IV. of Spain, with whose success he concluded a treaty of peace in 1665. He died at Madrid 16th June 1666, of a fever, as he was preparing to return home. His body was embalmed, and brought over to England, and deposited in All Saints' church Hertford, and afterwards removed to a new vault in Ware church. He had by his wife Anne, daughter of fir John Harrison, six sons, and eight daughters, of whom only one son, and four daughters survived him. Though engaged in political affairs, he found time to write some respectable pieces, and among them a translation in rhyme of Guarini's Pastor Fido, 1646, a translation of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess, into Latin verse — Odes of Horace, translated into English — Virgil's fourth Æneid — and Camoëns' Lusiad, translated into English, besides some poems, and original letters, published during his embassies in Spain and Portugal, 1702.

FARDELLA, Michael Angelo, an eminent professor of natural history, and astronomy at Padua, was born at Trapani in Sicily, and died at Naples 1718, aged 68. He wrote several works, now little known.

FARE, Charles Augustus, marquis de la, a captain in the French guards, better known as a writer and as the author of Memoirs and Reflections on the reign of Lewis XIV. 12mo. and of some little pieces of poetry which possess genius and merit. He began to be a poet when 60 years old, and died 1712, aged 68.

FAREL, William, an able reformer, born at Gap in Dauphiné 1489. He studied with great assiduity at Paris the Hebrew and Greek tongues, but soon after he became a teacher, the spirit of persecution against the protestants drove him from France. He went to Strasburg, and then to Switzerland, and he successfully engaged with the duke of Wirtemberg, to introduce the reformation into Montbéliard, Aigle, Morat, and other places. He afterwards went to Geneva, but his violence against popery was resisted by the clergy, and he retired, though in 1534 he was recalled. In 1538 he was again banished from Geneva with Calvin, and retired to Basil, and then to Neuchâtel. Zealous in the cause of reformation he labored assiduously as a preacher, and though exposed to a thousand dangers from persecution and from the jealousy of the papists, he escaped them all, and after increasing his proselytes at Metz and the neighbouring places, he visited Calvin on his death-bed at Geneva 1564, and expired himself the next year on the 13th Sept. at Neuchâtel. At the age of 69 he married, an event in his life which exposed him to the ridicule of his enemies. Erasmus among others has spoken of him severely, but rather unjustly, when he calls him a false, virulent, and seditious evangelist. Nothing could, indeed, resist the zeal of Farel, though surrounded by drawn swords, though interrupted by the ringing of bells, and by the clamors of his enemies he yet preached boldly and successfully, and made as many converts as any of the reformers. He wrote some few things on controversial subjects.

FARET, Nicholas, one of the first members of the French academy, known more for the excellent statutes which he formed for the new Institution, than the books he wrote. He was the friend of count d'Harcourt and Vaugelas St. Amand, and died 1646, aged 46.

FARIN, Emanuel de Sousa, a Portuguese knight, who accompanied Rodrigo, as ambassador to Rome. He died at Madrid 1650, aged 60, reduced to poverty, by his negligence of his property. He wrote poems in a manly and nervous style, collected into seven volumes after his death, besides moral and political discourses, commentaries on the Lusiad of Camoëns, a history of Portugal to the reign of Henry the cardinal, and Portuguese Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. Though a Portuguese, he preferred the Castilian language to his own.

FARINACCIO, Prosper, an Italian lawyer, born at Rome, died 1618, aged 64. His works in 13 vols. fol. are much esteemed at Rome. They are all on law subjects.

FARINATO, Paul, an Italian painter born at Verona 1522. His mother died in giving him birth, and he and his wife both expired at the same moment in 1606. One of his paintings in St. George's church, Verona, is as much admired as that of Paul Veronese, which is placed near it. He was equally eminent as an orator, sculptor, and architect, and it is said that he was also a good swordsman.

FARINELLI, Vid. Broschi.

FARINGDON, Anthony, an English divine, born at Sunning, Berks, 1596. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor, and afterwards he was vicar of Bray, near Maidenhead, 1634, and divinity reader in Windsor chapel. In the civil wars, he was ejected from his parish, and reduced to great poverty, till invited by fir John Robinson, alderman of London, to officiate at St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street, London, where he died Sep.

1658. He published in 1657, a folio volume of his sermons, dedicated to his patron Robinson, and after his death two other folio volumes of his MSS. sermons, were published by his friends.

FARMER, Hugh, a dissenting minister, educated under Dr. Doddridge. He settled at Walthamstow, and lived in the house of his friend Mr. Snell, where he died 5th Feb. 1787. He wrote a dissertation on Miracles, 8vo. — a treatise on the Worship of Human Spirits among the Heathens, 8vo. — on Christ's Temptation, 8vo. — and on the Demoniacs, 8vo.

FARMER, Richard, a learned native of Leicester, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor, and took his degree of M. A. 1760. In 1766 he published his valuable essay on the Learning of Shakespear, in which he maintains that the bard obtained his knowledge of ancient history and mythology from translations and not from original classical authors. He was in 1767 made one of the Whitehall preachers, and in 1775 he was elected master of his college, and then took his degree of D. D. He obtained afterwards a prebend, and the chancellorship in Lichfield cathedral, the place of librarian in Cambridge, and afterwards a prebend of Canterbury, which he exchanged for a residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He had collected materials for the history of his native town, which however he gave together with the plates to his friend Mr. Nichols, for his Leicestershire history. He died 1797, aged 62, and his valuable collection of scarce and curious books was sold by public auction, after his death.

FARNABY, Thomas, an eminent grammarian, born in London 1575. He was servitor of Merton college, Oxford, and was seduced by the jesuits, and persuaded to leave his country and religion, and retire to Spain. Tired of the discipline of his new instructors, he at last with difficulty escaped, and went a voyage with sir Francis Drake, and sir John Hawkins 1595. He afterwards served as a soldier in the Low Countries, and then returned to Cornwall, poor and destitute. He settled at Martock, Somersetshire, where he taught grammar with great success, and then came to London, where he met with much encouragement, and had not less than 300 pupils. In 1616, he took his master's degree at Cambridge, and was admitted ad eundem at Oxford, and about 1636, on account of the sickness prevalent in London, he removed to Seven Oaks, Kent, where his usual success attended him, and enabled him to purchase an estate there, and another in Suffex. During the civil wars, he became obnoxious to the parliament, because he had said it was better to have one king than 500. He was therefore imprisoned in Newgate, and though his enemies wished to transport him to America, he was removed to Ely house Holborn, where he continued till within a year of his death. He died 12th June 1647, and was buried at Seven Oaks. His works were Notæ ad Juvenalis & Persii Satiras, 1612. — Notæ ad Senecæ Tragædias 1613 — ad Martialis Epigr. 1615 — ad Lucani Pharsalia, 1618 — Index Rhetoricus, &c. 1625 — Florilegium Epigrammat. Græc. 1629 — Notæ ad Virgil. 1634 — Systema Grammatic. 1641, &c. His works display every where great erudition, and his notes, says Boyle, are of great use, being short, learned, and designed to clear up the text.

FARNESE, Peter Louis, son of pope Paul III. by a secret marriage, before he became a cardinal, was made duke of Parma, and Placentia. His debaucheries, and the tyranny of his government, rendered him so unpopular, that he was assassinated at Placentia 1547, two years after his elevation.

FARNESE, Alexander, eldest son of the preceding, was born 1520. He was made bishop of Parma, by Clement VII., and advanced to the purple in 1534, by his grandfather Paul III. by whom he was employed as ambassador to Germany, France, and the Low Countries. His talents as a negotiator were very great, and he was respected for his learning, as well as patronage of literature, and of learned men. He died at Rome, 1589. Charles V. said of him when dean of the sacred college, that if all the members resembled him, the college would be the most august assembly in the world.

FARNESE, Alexander, third duke of Parma, was nephew to the cardinal. He distinguished himself at the siege of Lepanto, and at the taking of Antwerp, and succeeded in 1578, John of Austria, as governor of the Low Countries. He received a mortal wound at Rouen, when it was besieged by Henry IV. of France, and he died at Arras, 1592.

FARNEWORTH, Ellis, an English divine born at Bonteshall, Derbyshire, where his father was rector, and educated at Chesterfield and Eton, and then at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was presented to the rectory of Carlington, Derbyshire, 1762, by dean Yorke, and died there 25th March, 1763. He wrote the Life of pope Sixtus V. from the Italian of Leti, folio, 1754. — Davila's History of France, 2 vols. 4to. 1757. — Machiavel's works translated 1761, reprinted 1775, 4 vols. 8vo.

FARQUHAR, George, an eminent comic poet, son of a clergyman, born at Londonderry, 1678. He was educated at Dublin college, and afterwards engaged himself with a company of players. In this employment, at the representation of Dryden's Indian Emperor, he was nearly converting the play into a real tragedy, for forgetting to exchange his sword for a foil, he, as Guyomar, wounded his antagonist Vasquez so dreadfully that from that moment, he in terror bid adieu to the stage. He came to London in 1696, and at the repeated solicitations of Wilks the actor, he turned his thoughts to the composition of a theatrical piece. His opportunities of study and meditation were improved by the kindness of lord Orrery, who gave him a lieutenant's commission in his regiment. In 1698 his first comedy appeared, called "Love in a Bottle," and was well received. In 1700, "the Constant Couple, or Trip to the Jubilee," was acted, and gave Wilks the opportunity of displaying sir Harry Wildair with all the gaiety, animation, and vivacity of the character. The same year Farquhar was in Holland, and he has given a facetious and interesting account of the place and people in two letters. In 1701, appeared "sir Harry Wildair, or the sequel of of the Trip to the Jubilee," which was received with uncommon approbation. He published in 1702, miscellanies, or collections, of poems, letters and essays, and the next year came out his "Inconstant, or the Way to Win him." In 1704 appeared his "Stage Coach," the next year "the Twin Rivals," and in 1706 "the Recruiting Officer" dedicated to "all friends round the Wrekin" a hill near Shrewsbury, where he had observed on a recruiting party, the manner in which clowns are inveigled into the army, and the milk maids are robbed of their virtue and happiness by the arts of military men. His last comedy was "the Beaux's Stratagem," the great success of which he did not live to see, as the unkindness of a courtier, who had promised, and forgot, to patronize him, and the pressure of his debts broke his heart. He died April, 1707, before he had reached his 30th year. He had married in 1703, a lady who had fallen in love with him, and who to gain the affections of a needy and dissipated suitor, had falsely represented herself as a woman of great opulence. He married, but though bitterly disappointed, he never upbraided his wife with the artifice, but became a tender and indulgent husband. He left two daughters whom in his papers he had recommended to the friendship and patronage of Wilks. Wilks became a father to them, he procured a benefit for each of them, and continued his parental fondness, even after they were settled in business. For the success of his comedies, Farquhar is indebted to the natural delineation of his characters, the interesting tendency of his plots, and the flowing graces and sprightliness of his wit. The same popularity attends them now as upon their original production, though it is to be lamented that a licentiousness and spirit of indelicacy much to be censured are observed throughout, to be attributed not so much to depravity of heart in the author, as to the impure taste of the age in which he wrote.

FASTOLFF, for John, a valiant general, of an ancient family, born at Yarmouth in Norfolk, about 1377. He attended the duke of Clarence, as lieutenant of Ireland, about 1405 and 1406, and in 1408 he married a rich widow of that kingdom, and soon after went over to France, where, under the English regency, he was promoted to places of trust and honor. He returned home 1440, covered with laurels bravely won in the field, and in his private conduct now he exhibited the hospitable, generous, and benevolent man. He bestowed large legacies on Cambridge to build the schools of philosophy and civil law, and was a most liberal benefactor to Magdalen college, Oxford, founded by his friend Wainfleet. He died 1459, aged upwards of 80, according to what Caxton his contemporary has mentioned. Shakespeare has been severely censured for abusing this great and good man under the character of sir John Falstaff. The age and the name of these two knights are so different, that the apparent coincidence must be purely accidental. Fastolff, as is well observed, was a young and grave, discreet and valiant, chaste and sober commander abroad, and eminent for every virtue at home; but the Falstaff of the poet is an old, humorous, vamping, cowardly, lewd, lying, drunken, debauchee. It is besides to be recollected that Shakespeare's Falstaff was first acted under the name of sir John Oldcastle, though modern critics dispute it.

FAVART, Charles Simon, a Parisian, known for his operas, which are numerous, and deservedly admired. He died at Paris 1793, aged 83.

FAVART, Marie Justine Benoitte, a famous French actress, wife of the preceding, born at Avignon, 1727. Her maiden name was du Roncerai. She was never surpassed in the sensibility, ease, and liveliness of her comic characters. She died at Paris, 1772.

FAUCHET, Claude, a French antiquarian, historiographer to Henry IV. He died 1601, aged 72, overwhelmed in debts. The monuments of his extensive reading and deep researches are found in his Gaulish and French Antiquities — a treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church — on the Origin of Knights, Armorial Bearings, and Heralds — Origin of Dignities and Magistracies in France. These works printed together in 4to. 1610, are curious, but so inelegant that, it is said, the perusal of them gave Lewis XIII. a distaste for reading.

FAUCHET, Claude, a native of Dorne in the Nivernois, who became vicar-general to the archbishop of Bruges, and preacher to Lewis XVI. The theatrical manner, and ridiculous affectation of his delivery, however, offended the devotion of the monarch, and in consequence of this disgrace, Fauchet, at the revolution, was most hostile to the government. He was one of the most active in the destruction of the Bastille, and preached a thanksgiving sermon on the event, and in his enthusiastic conduct showed himself so forgetful of his character and profession, that he called Jesus Christ the first sans culotte of Judæa. These extravagancies rendered him popular with the mob; he was deputy from Calvados in the national assembly and in the convention, and became the constitutional bishop of Bayeux. He was at last accused as a disaffected person before the revolutionary tribunal, and guillotined 1793, in his 49th year. He wrote a panegyric on St. Lewis, before the French academy — a funeral Oration for the duke of Orleans — Discourse on Universal Manners — Eloge on Benjamin Franklin, &c.

FAUCHEUR, Michael le, a French protestant divine, admired as a preacher at Montpellier, Charenton, and Paris. After hearing him discourse on duelling, marshal de la Force said; "if a challenge was sent to me, I would refuse it." He died universally regretted, at Paris, 1667. He wrote a treatise on Oratorical Action — sermons in 8vo. — Christian Prayers and Meditations — a treatise on the Eucharist, against cardinal Perron, Geneva, folio.

FAULKNER, George, a printer of eminence, the first who raised his profession in Ireland to credit and respectability. He was the friend of dean Swift, and of lord Chesterfield, whose letters to him under the name of Atticus, are much admired. He had the misfortune to break his leg, in consequence of which Foote, with more humor than good breeding, introduced him in his Orators, 1762, in the character of Peter Paragraph. The insult was felt, and Faulkner commenced an action against the mimic, which, however, was dropped by the interference of lord Townshend. He raised himself to opulence by the success of his "Journal," and was universally respected for his fair and upright conduct in his profession. He died alderman of Dublin, 28th Aug. 1775.

Peter

FAVOLIVS, Hugo, a Dutch physician and poet, author of Hodoeporicon Byzantium, in three books, published at Louvain, 1563. He died 1585.

FAVORINUS, a Platonic philosopher in the age of Adrian. He was born at Arles in Gaul, and taught at Rome.

FAVORINUS, Varinus, originally Guarini of Favara, near Camerino in Italy, the place of his birth, was a disciple of Politian, and became a Benedictine monk. In 1512 he was keeper of the Medicean library of Florence, and in 1514 was made bishop of Nocera, and died 1537. He published in 1523 his Greek Lexicon at Rome, one of the first of modern Lexicons, compiled from Suidas, the Etymologicum Magnum, Hesychius, &c. the best edition of which is that of Bartoli, fol. Venice 1712. He wrote besides, Cornucopia et Horti Adonidis — and Stobæus' Apophthegmata, translated.

FAUR, Guy de, lord of Pibrac, a native of Toulouse, eminent as an advocate, and sent by Charles IX. as ambassador to the council of Trent, where he manfully defended the liberties of the Gallican church. In 1565 he was made advocate general in the parliament of Paris, and in 1570, counsellor of state. In 1572 he vindicated the massacre of St. Bartholomew, no doubt compelled by his superiors, as his own character was mild, humane, and far from vindictive. He made peace between the court and the protestants under Henry III. whom he had accompanied to Poland, when he was elected king there. He possessed great influence with his master, and was created one of the chief presidents of the court of law. He died 1584, aged 56. He published some speeches, but he is best known by his "Quatrains," or Moral Stanzas of four lines, so much admired at that time, that they were translated into all languages, and into English by Sylvester.

FAVRE, Anthony, Faber in Latin, a profound lawyer, born 1557 at Bresse. He was governor of Savoy, and was engaged in several negotiations between that dukedom and France. He died 1624. He wrote 10 vols. fol. on jurisprudence and civil law, besides quatrains preserved among those of Faur, lord of Pibrac.

FAVRE, Claude, Vid. VAUGELAS.

FAUST, Vid. FUST.

FAUSTA, Flavia Maximiana, second wife of the great Constantine, caused by false accusation the death of Crispus her son-in-law. She was suffocated in a bath for her incontinence 327.

FAUSTINA, Anna Galeria, daughter of Ann. Verus, and wife of Antoninus Pius, disgraced herself by her debaucheries, and died 141. Her daughter was equally licentious.

FAUSTUS, an English monk of the 5th century. He was abbot of the monastery of the Lérin islands 433, and in 466 made bishop of Riez in Provence. He wrote a homily on Maximus, his predecessor in the bishopric. He was banished from his see in 481, and died soon after.

FAWCETT, sir William, an English general, born at Shipden hall near Halifax, Yorkshire. He received his education at a grammar school in Lancashire, and early embraced the military profession, and served in Germany during the seven years' war under Eliot and Granby. His abilities were applauded by the king of Prussia, who made him liberal offers to accept a command in his army, but he preferred the service of his native country, and was gradually promoted to the rank of a general, and made knight of the bath, colonel of the third regiment of dragoon guards, and governor of Chelsea hospital. He died 1804, and was buried with great military pomp in Chelsea college chapel. He translated from the French count Saxe's reveries, or Memoirs on the Art of War, 4to. 1757 — Regulations for the Prussian Cavalry, from the German, 1757 — Regulations for the Prussian Infantry, and the Prussian Tactics, 1759.

FAWKES, Francis, an ingenious poet, born in Yorkshire 1721, and educated at Leeds school, and afterwards at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. Upon taking orders he settled at Bromham, Yorkshire, and then removed to Croydon, Surrey, where Herring the primate noticed him, and gave him in 1755 the vicarage of Orpington, with St. Mary Clay, Kent, which he exchanged in 1774 for the rectory of Hayes. He died 26th Aug. 1777. He published an ode inscribed to his patron Herring, and lamented his death in 1757 in a pathetic elegy. His poems appeared by subscription 1761, in 8vo. but his chief merit was translation, as is evinced by his spirited versions of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, and Musæus, 1760, 12mo. — and the Idyllia of Theocritus 1767, 8vo. His Apollonius Rhodius appeared 1780. A Bible with notes was published in his name.

FAYDIT, Anselm, a Provençal poet, or troubadour of celebrity, noticed by the princes of his time, for his wit and the elegance of his manners. He was relieved from indigence by the liberality of Richard Cœur de Lion who admired his poetry, and he died at Aix 1220. He wrote a poem on the death of his benefactor Richard, the Palace of Love, imitated afterwards by Petrarch, besides comedies, one of which "Heregia dels Prestes," reflected severely on the corruption of the church.

FAYDIT, Peter, a priest of the oratory, who was born at Riom in Auvergne, and died there 1709, aged 60. He is known for his satirical attacks on great characters, especially Bossuet and Fenelon for his Telemachus, and his Illustrations of Ecclesiastical History, 8vo. — his treatise on the Trinity, &c.

FAYETTE, Louisa de la, a French lady of great celebrity. She was maid of honor to Anne of Austria, and enjoyed the confidence of Lewis XIII. without fullying her good name or her virtue. So great was her influence upon this monarch that she reconciled him to his queen, and when she had thus served the man whom she respected, she retired uncontaminated to a convent, and took the veil. Lewis visited her in her retreat, but she resisted every invitation to the court. She died in her convent, universally beloved, and deferredly admired for that uncommon display of virtue and self-command which, in a young and beautiful woman, could resist the most flattering offers of distinction and of rank, and sacrifice the world, and her innocent attachment to a king, to the meek spirit of devotion.

FAYETTE, Marie Madeleine, countess of, daughter of Aymer de la Vergne, governor of Havre de Grace, and wife of count de la Fayette, is celebrated for her knowledge of literature and of the fine arts, and her intimacy with Rouchefoucault, Huetius, Menage, Segrais, and other learned men. She died 1693. Though abused for levity of conduct by the author of the Memoirs of Madam de Maintenon, she is represented by madam de Sevigné as a woman of respectable and exemplary character. She wrote Zaïde — La Princesse de Cleves — La Princesse de Montpensier, romances — Memoires de la Cour de France 1688 and 1689 — Histoire d'Henriette d'Angleterre — divers portraits, &c. These works are still esteemed. She is the first, says Voltaire, who exhibited in her romances the manners of people of fashion in a graceful, easy, and natural way.

FEATLY, Daniel, or FAIRCLOUGH, an English divine, born at Charlton, Oxfordshire, March 1582. He was educated at Magdalen college school and Corpus Christi, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1602. He distinguished himself so much by his extensive knowledge of school divinity, and by his eloquence as a preacher, that he was sent as chaplain to sir Thomas Edmund's embassy to France, where he continued three years. He became, in 1613, rector of Northill, Cornwall, and chaplain to Abbot the primate, who made him rector of Lambeth. In 1617 he took his degree of D. D., and afterwards received from his patron, the primate, the rectory of All-Hallows, Bread street, London, which he exchanged for Acton, and he was the last provost of Chelsea college. He suffered much in his property by the civil wars, and hardly escaped with his life, as he was seized and imprisoned in 1643, for opposing the covenant. He grew so weak and dropical from the confinement that he was permitted to remove to Chelsea college, where he died April 1645. He was a very able disputant, and a most smart scourge, says Wood, of the church of Rome. He published nearly 40 works, all of the polemical kind, besides "Cyanea Cantio," 1629, and the scholastic duel between him and king James.

FECHT, or FECHTIUS, John, a Lutheran divine of Brisgaw, who settled at Dourlach, and afterwards at Rostock. He died 1716, aged 80. He wrote a History of Cain and Abel, with notes, &c. 8vo. — a treatise on the Religion of the modern Greeks — another against the Superstitions of the Mals, &c.

FECKENHAM, John de, so called as being born of poor parents near that forest in Worcester-shire. His right name was Howman. His promising abilities were observed and improved by the priest of his parish, and he was educated carefully in the monastery of Evesham, and afterwards at Gloucester hall, Oxford, where, in 1539, he took the degree of B. D. He was afterwards chaplain to bishops Bell and Bonner, and in 1549 he was committed to the tower for refusing, it is said, to administer the sacraments after the manner of the protestants. On Mary's accession he was released, and raised to distinction in the church. In 1554 he disputed at Oxford with Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, before they suffered martyrdom; but though favored by the papists, he exercised every office of benevolence and kindness towards the suffering protestants. In 1556 he was made D. D. by the university of Oxford, in compliment to his great learning, and his many private virtues, and the same year he was appointed abbot of Westminster. On Mary's death, Elizabeth, before her coronation, sent for him, and as he had interested himself warmly in her favor during the last reign, she acknowledged his services, and offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury if he would conform, which he resolutely refused. In the queen's first parliament he was the last abbot that sat there, and he then spoke so boldly against the reformation, that he was sent to the tower in 1560. He continued in custody, either in the house of some bishop, or in a public prison, the rest of his life; but though he acknowledged the queen's supremacy, he never would conform to the reformation. He died a prisoner in Wisbech castle, in the isle of Ely, 1585. Though a violent papist, he was a most humane and charitable man, whose mildness, piety, and goodness of heart, have been warmly commended by Camden, Fuller, Burnet, Dart, and Reyner. His works were chiefly sermons and controversial tracts, now little regarded.

FEIJOO, Benedict Jerom, a Spanish Benedictine, who attempted by his writings and example, to correct and reform the vitiated notions of his countrymen. His Teatro Critico, in 14 vols. 4to. is a work of great merit, which, with great freedom and spirit, censures the ignorance and licentiousness of the clergy, and exposes the futility of pilgrimages, pretended miracles, and superstitious exorcisms. This unusual boldness against the prejudices of the times proved very offensive to the church, and the author was, with difficulty, saved from the horrors of the inquisition. He died 1765.

FEITHIUS, Everard, a learned German, born at Elburgh, in Guelderland. After devoting himself with great assiduity to literature at Berne, he returned home; but the invasion of the Spaniards under Spinola so terrified him, that he retired to France, where he taught Greek, and was honored with the friendship of Casaubon, Thuanus, Du Puy, and other learned men. As he walked one day at Rochelle, attended by a servant, he was invited into a house by one of the citizens, and from that moment, it never could be known what became of him, though the mysterious occurrence was diligently enquired into by the magistrates of the place. He was then young, but had given great specimens of superior learning. Of his MS. works were published Antiquitatum Homeriarum Libri Quatuor, 12mo. Leyden, 1677 — De Atheniensium Republica — De Antiquit. Atticis, &c. very learned and interesting.

FELBIEN, Andrew, counsellor and historiographer to the French king, was born at Chartres 1619. He improved himself at Paris, and also at Rome, where he attended as secretary de Fontenay-Mareuil, ambassador to that court from France. On his return he was patronized by Fouquet and Colbert, and placed by the king in offices of respectability and importance. He was one of the first members of the academy of inscriptions and medals, and died June 11th, 1695, aged 76, leaving five children. His principal works are Entretiens sur les Vies & les Ouvrages des plus Excellens Peintres, Anciens & Modernes, 5 vols. 4to. — Les Principes de l'Architecture, de la Sculpture, & de la Peinture, avec un Dictionnaire des Termes Propres, de ces Arts, de l'Origine de la Peinture, &c. — Descriptions of several Entertainments given by the King, &c. — the Conferences of the Royal Academy of Painting, &c. — the Description of the Abbey de la Trappe, &c. His Dialogues on the Lives of the Painters is the work most admired. It is elegant and profound. In his private character Felibien was very amiable, a good man, not ambitious, but possessed of every christian virtue. He first gave the name of Great to Lewis XIV. in the inscriptions of the Hotel de Ville.

FELIBIEN, John Francis, succeeded his father in all his appointments, and inherited all his taste and knowledge of the fine arts. He wrote an Historical Collection of the Lives and Works of the most celebrated Architects, 4to. 1687 — Description of Versailles ancient and modern, 12mo. — Description of the Church of Invalids, fol. 1706 and 1756. He died 1733.

FELIBIEN, James, brother of Andrew, was archdeacon of Chartres, and died 25th Nov. 1716. He wrote Des Instructions Morales — and Pentateuchus Historicus.

FELIBIEN, Michael, son of Andrew, was of the congregation of St. Maur, and was engaged to write the History of Paris, which he did not live to complete. It was finished by Lobineau, 5 vols. fol. 1725. He died 10th Sept. 1719, aged 53. He had published, in 1706, the History of the Abbey of St. Denys, in folio.

FELIX, was the governor of Judea before whom Paul preached with such effect as to cause him to tremble. He was recalled by Nero for his oppression.

FELIX, bishop of Urgella in Spain, supposed with his friend Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, that Christ was son of God only by adoption, an opinion which drew upon him the resentment of Charlemagne, and his deposition from his see. He died an exile at Lyons, 815.

FELIX I. pope after Dionysius, 269, was put to death 274, and canonized. His epistle against Sabellius and Paulus Samosatenus is preserved.

FELIX II. was, in 355, elevated to the papal chair by Constant, during the exile of Liberius. On the return of his rival, Felix, supported by the authority of Constant, wished to retain his office conjointly with him, but the Romans exclaimed, "one God, one Christ, one pope," and he retired to exile, and died 365.

FELIX III. successor of Simplicius, quarrelled with the emperor Zeno, in defence of the privileges of the Western church, and died 492.

FELIX IV. a native of Beneventum, was raised to the papal chair after John I. 526, and died four years after. He was a prelate of great piety and exemplary goodness. He was the first who introduced extreme unction in the church.

FELL, Dr. John, a learned prelate, born at Longworth, Berks, 23d June, 1625. He was educated at Thame school, and at the age of 11 was admitted at Christ-church, Oxford, where his father was dean. During the civil war, he bore arms for the king, and for his loyalty he was expelled from the college, and lived in retirement till the restoration, when he was made prebendary of Chichester, and canon and dean of Christ-church. He was very liberal to his college, and built the tower over the principal gate, into which in 1683 he caused to be removed the bell called great Tom, said to have been originally brought from Oseney abbey. In 1666, and the three following years, he served the office of vice-chancellor, and by his indefatigable attention he contributed much to restore the good order and ancient discipline of the university. In 1675-6 he was made bishop of Oxford, without giving up his deanery, and now, besides charitable contributions, he applied a large part of his income to the rebuilding of Cuddeforden palace. He died 10th July, 1686, and was buried in Christ-church cathedral, where an inscription by Aldrich, his successor, marks his grave. He wrote the Life of Dr. Hammond, 1660 — Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxon. 2 vols. folio, translated from Wood's — Alcinoi in Platoniam Philosophiam Introductio — In Laudem Muses Carmen Sapphicum — St. Clement's two Epistles to the Corinthians, Greek and Latin — Allestree's Life — sermons — an edition of Cyprian's works, and other classics. The bishop's father, Dr. Samuel Fell, was born in St. Clement Danes' parish, London, 1594, and was educated at Westminster and Christ-church. He was successively minister of Freshwater, isle of Wight, chaplain to James I. prebendary of Worcester, dean of Lichfield, and in 1638 dean of Christ-church. He died 1st Feb. 1648-9, of a broken heart, in consequence of the murder of his royal master. He wrote Primitiæ, seu Oratio, &c. 1626, and Concio Latina ad Baccalaureos, &c. 1627.

FELL, John, a dissenting minister, born at Cockermouth, 1732. He was originally a taylor; but after living in that employment in London, he acquired some knowledge of the classics, and became pastor of a congregation at Beccles, Suffolk, and afterwards Thaxted, Essex. He was afterwards tutor at an academy at Homerton, from which he was dismissed, says his biographer, for reading a newspaper on a Sunday. A subscription of 100 guineas was made that he should preach sermons on the evidences of Christianity. Four only of these discourses were delivered at the Scots' church, London Wall, when the preacher fell a victim to a dropsy, 13th Sept. 1797. The sermons were continued and published by Dr. H. Hunter. Fell was the author of Answers to Farmer's Essay on the Demoniacs — and his treatise on the Idolatry of Greece and Rome — Genuine Protestantism — an Essay on the Love of one's Country — a Letter to Burke on the Penal Laws — an Essay on English Grammar, &c.

FELLER, Joachim Frederic, a learned German, born at Leipzig, 1673. He was secretary to the duke of Weimar, and travelled much to visit foreign libraries. He died 1726. The best known of his works is Monumenta Varia Inedita, Jena, 1714, in 12 numbers, 4to. He wrote also Miscellanea Leibnitiana — Genealogy of the House of Brunswick.

FELLER, Francis Xavier, an ex-jesuit, born at Brussels. He wrote an Historical and Literary Journal from 1774 to 1794, at Luxemburg — a Geographical Dictionary — Observations on Newton's Philosophy — and Buffon's Epochs of Nature examined — an Historical Dictionary, 8 vols. 8vo. Liege, said by the editors of the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, to be pirated from their own work. He died at Ratibon, 1802, aged 67.

FELLTHAM, Owen, an English writer born in the reign of James I. in Suffolk, where his family had been settled for several generations. Few particulars are known of his history, though it appears that his learning and virtues recommended him to the notice of the earl of Thomond, in whose family he lived for some years in easy and honorable dependence. He wrote Resolves, Divine, Moral and Political, a work of great merit, and singular excellence, of which the 12th edition appeared in 1709, in 8vo. This book so valuable for its refined sentiments of morality, its pointed delineations of duty, and its interesting tendency to instruct the mind and improve the heart in the road of virtue, has lately been edited with a few alterations by Mr. Cumming, and deservedly recommends itself to universal perusal. Feltham wrote besides some prayers for the use of lady Thomond's family, &c. The time of his death is unknown, though he was living in 1677.

FELTON, John, an Englishman, known in history as the assassin of Villiers, duke of Buckingham, 1628, a crime which he committed out of fanatic zeal, in the full persuasion that he thus served God and man. He was tried and executed for the foul deed. He had been a lieutenant in the army which besieged the isle of Rhé, and because he did not succeed to a company on the death of his captain, who was slain in the attack, he quitted the army in disgust, and became a bigoted dissatisfied puritan. His grandfather of the same name, had, in the reign of Elizabeth, affixed on the palace gates of the bishop of London, the bull of Pius V. by which the queen was declared a heretic, and her subjects incited to rebellion. He was tried and executed for this conduct, 1570. His son Thomas, was a Franciscan, and came to England as a missionary, for which he was executed 1588.

FELTON, Henry, principal of Edmund hall, Oxford, dedicated to his pupil, the duke of Rutland, his Dissertation on reading the Classics, and forming a Just Style, a work of merit. He wrote also a volume of sermons, and died 1739.

FENELON, Francis de Salignac de la Motte, archbishop of Cambray, was born of an illustrious family at the castle of Fenelon in Perigord, 6th Aug. 1651. He was educated at Cahors, and afterwards finished his studies at Paris, and began early to acquire popularity as a preacher. At the age of 24 he took orders, and in 1686, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he was sent by the king at the head of the missionaries who were to convert the protestants of the coast of Saintonge and the Pays de Aunis, who had not yet submitted to the influence of military force. In 1689 he was appointed tutor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and he displayed such abilities in the education of these princes, that the king in gratitude for his services gave him the abbey of St. Valery, and soon after the see of Cambray, to which he was consecrated by Bossuet 1695. In 1697 he was exposed to religious persecution, by the publication of his explication of "the maxims of the Saints concerning the Interior Life," in which he supported the claims of Madame Guyon, to exalted devotion, and her mystical interpretation of Solomon's song. There was little in her book that merited attention, but as Fenelon defended her cause, his authority alarmed some of the French prelates, and conferences were held for some months between him and Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, Noailles, bishop of Chalons, and Tronçon, superior of St. Sulpicius. Fenelon was offered to sign a recantation of his opinions, and when he refused, the affair was referred to the king, and then to the decision of the pope, who in condemning the archbishop's book, declared that he had erred from excess of love of God, and his opponents, from excess of love of their neighbour. This affair to which such importance was attached, was supposed to arise from the wish of preventing the appointment of Fenelon to the office of almoner to the dukes of Burgundy, which was immediately filled by Bossuet. Fenelon with true christian meekness submitted to the decision of the pope, and read the sentence, and his recantation in his own diocese, where, by his exemplary life, he gave lustre to the episcopal office. He afterwards assisted the Jesuits, in their successful attack against the Jansenists, and procured the disgrace of Noailles their patron, and the condemnation of their writings. The work from which Fenelon derives immortality is his "Telemachus". It was indeed exposed to the jealousy of Lewis and his courtiers, who pretended to see the character of Madam de Montepan in Calypso, of Mademoiselle de Fontanges, in Eucharis, of the duchess of Burgundy, in Antiope, of Louvois in Protefilaus, of James II. in Idomeneus, and of Lewis XIV in Sesostris, but though its publication was prohibited in France, it appeared at Paris surreptitiously in 1699, and in a corrected form at the Hague 1701. Such is the merit of the work, that it ranks, though in prose, among epic poems, and by the elegance of its style, and the sublimity of its moral, it has secured universal applause, and has been translated into all the modern languages of Europe. The last part of Fenelon's life was spent in the conscientious discharge of the pastoral office, in his diocese, where his benevolence, and goodness of heart, gained him the affection and gratitude of his people, and his reputation tion the respect even of his enemies, for Marborough, when victorious in the country, ordered the lands of the great and good Fenelon to be spared. This amiable prelate died 7th Jan. 1715, aged 63. Besides his Telemachus, and his Explication of the Maxims, he wrote some other valuable works, a treatise on the Education of daughters, 12mo. much admired — Dialogues of the Dead, 2 vols. 12mo. — Dialogues on Eloquence, and the Eloquence of the Pulpit, 12mo. — Lives of ancient Philosophers, abridged 12mo. — Spiritual Works, 4 vols. 12mo. — a Demonstration of the Existence of God, 12mo. — Directions for the Conscience of a King — sermons, &c.

FENTON, Elijah, an English poet, the youngest of 12 children, born at Shelton, near Newcastle, under-Lane, Staffordshire. He was educated at Cambridge, but his opposition to government prevented his entering into orders, and he became usher in Mr. Bonwicke's school at Headley in Surry. He afterwards was master of Seven Oaks school, and next was appointed secretary to lord Orrery, and tutor to his son lord Boyle. By Pope's recommendation he was placed as an useful assistant, near Craggs, secretary of state, whose early death prevented his comfortable settlement. Though not rich he ended his life in ease and tranquillity, and died at the house of lady Trumbal, East-Hamstead, Berks, 13th July 1730. He published in 1709, "Oxford, and Cambridge verses", and in 1717, a volume of his own poems, and in 1723, his tragedy of Mariamne, collected out of Josephus. He also assisted Pope in the Odyssey, and translated the first, fourth, 19th and 20th books. He also edited Waller's poems, with notes, and published a life of Milton, commended by Dr. Johnson. Fenton though of no superior genius as a poet, yet possessed great merit, as the choice and friendship of Pope fully testify. His epitaph was written by Pope, and the praises bestowed on him are not overcharged, for he was an honest man, unenvied by rivals, mild, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, and he lived "content with science, in the vale of peace".

FENTON, ſir Geoffrey, an eminent writer, descended from a good family in Nottinghamshire. He served queen Elizabeth in Ireland, where he became member of the privy council 1581, and where he married the daughter of Dr. Robert Weston, lord chancellor of the island. He was afterwards appointed to the secretaryship of the lord lieutenant, and continued in that responsible office under all the changes of government. He died 19th Oct. 1608, in Dublin, at the house of the earl of Cork, who had married, in 1603, his only daughter. He translated Guicciardini's Wars of Italy, dedicated to queen Elizabeth, besides Golden Epistles from Guevara's works, &c.

FERAJUOLI, Nuzio, an Italian painter, born in 1661. He was pupil to Luca Giordano, and is eminent for the beauty and correctness of his landscapes, and the transparency of the waters.

FERDINAND I. emperor of Germany, second son of the archduke Philip, was born at Medina, in Castile, 1503. He was crowned king of Hungary, and Bohemia 1527, on the death of his brother-in-law, Louis the younger, the last king, and in 1531 he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1558 he succeeded as emperor, on the abdication of his brother Charles V. He governed with moderation and prudence, and after making peace with the Turks, and producing a reconciliation between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, he died of a dropsy at Vienna, 25th July 1564, aged 61.

FERDINAND II. archduke of Austria, and son of Charles, duke of Stiria, was made king of Bohemia 1617, and of Hungary 1618, and raised to the imperial throne 1619. His subjects of Bohemia revolted, and placed on the throne Frederic V. elector Palatine, but Ferdinand attacked, and defeated them at the battle of Prague 1620, and the dukedom of the usurper was given to Maximilian, duke of Bavaria. The fortunes of the unfortunate Palatine, were supported by Christian, king of Denmark, but the victories of Tilly, the imperial general, rendered his opposition hopeless, and obliged him to sue for peace 1629. These brilliant successes roused against Ferdinand, the king of France, and Gustavus Adolphus, of Sweden, and the imperial general was defeated at Leipzig 1631, though soon after the Swedish conqueror fell covered with glory in the celebrated battle of Lutzen. The battle of Nortlingen in 1634, proved favorable to the cause of the Germans, and the following year tranquillity was restored among the rival powers. Ferdinand died at Vienna, 8th Feb. 1637, aged 59.

FERDINAND III. surnamed Ernest, eldest son of the preceding, was made king of Hungary 1625, of Bohemia 1627, and of the Romans 1636, and elected emperor on his father's death. He pursued the same plans of ambition and aggrandizement as his father, but in his war against the Swedes, his troops were defeated by Bernard duke of Weimar, who in four months gained four important victories. The French under the great Condé supported the Swedish arms, and Ferdinand was besieged in Ratibon where he held a diet of the empire. In 1645 another battle was fought and won by Condé at Nortlingen on the same spot where the Swedes had been 11 years before defeated. Tranquillity was at last restored to the empire by the peace of Westphalia, 1648, and the treaties of Osnaburg and Munster, which granted Pomerania to the Swedish monarch, and made him one of the members of the Germanic body, and tolerated the Lutherans and Calvinists in the midst of the Roman Catholic religion. The emperor died 1657, aged 49. He was three times married.

FERDINAND I. king of Castile and Leon, surnamed the Great, was son of Sancho III. king of Navarre. He defeated in battle Alphonso king of Leon 1037, and caused himself to be crowned king of Leon, and of the Asturias, the next year. He next marched against the Moors, took several of their towns, and penetrated into the heart of Portugal, and afterwards he attacked his brother Garcias king of Navarre, whom he deprived in a decisive battle, of his crown, and of his life. He died 1065, and divided his kingdom among his sons, and thus created causes for civil wars.

FERDINAND II. younger son of Alphonso VIII. king of Leon and Castile, made war against the Portuguese, and took their king Alphonso Henriquez prisoner. He made the wisest and most temperate use of his victory, and died 1187, after a reign of 30 years.

FERDINAND III. St. son of Alphonso IX. obtained the crown of Castile by the abdication of his mother Berengere 1217, and ascended the throne of Leon on his father's death 1230. He made successful war against the Moors, and took Cordova, Murcia, Seville, Xeres, Cadiz, &c. and died 1252, as he was meditating an invasion of the kingdom of Morocco. He was a wise monarch, and he established some salutary laws for the protection of his subjects, and the more impartial administration of justice. He was canonized by Clement X. 1617.

FERDINAND IV. succeeded to the throne of Castile 1295, at the age of 10. His minority was governed by the prudent administration of his mother Mary. He made war against the Moors, and against Grenada, and died suddenly 1312, aged 27.

FERDINAND V. surnamed the Catholic, was son of John II. king of Arragon. He married in 1469 Isabella of Castile, and thus united the two kingdoms of Castile and Arragon. He made war against Alphonso king of Portugal, and defeated him at Toro 1476, and he next turned his arms against the kingdom of Grenada, which he totally subdued after a war of eight years, and thus put an end to the Moorish power, which for 800 years had flourished in Spain. Ambitious and enterprising, Ferdinand next turned his arms against Navarre, and by means of his brave general Gonsalvo of Cordova, he conquered part of the kingdom of Naples, but whilst his dominions were thus enlarged in Europe and in Africa, a new continent submitted to his power by the great discoveries of the immortal Columbus. Ferdinand left four daughters, and died 1516.

FERDINAND VI. surnamed the Wise, was son of Philip V. and Mary of Savoy, and succeeded his father 1746. He was a most benevolent prince, he restored liberty to prisoners, he extended his forgiveness to deserters and smugglers, and appointed two days in the week when he freely gave access to his subjects, and redressed personally their grievances. He engaged in the war of 1741, and in the peace of 1748 he obtained for one of his brothers the crown of the two Sicilies, and for the other the duchies of Parma and Placentia. In his government he was prudent, and deservedly popular, industry was encouraged, abuses were reformed, and canals were made to convey plenty and commerce through the country. He died without children at Madrid 10th Aug. 1759, aged 46.

FERDINAND I. succeeded in 1458 to Alphonso of Arragon as king of Naples and Sicily. Though he protected commerce, and encouraged the liberal arts among his subjects, yet he was unpopular on account of his debaucheries and cruelties. He died little regretted 1494, aged 70.

FERDINAND, king of Portugal after Peter 1367, died 1383. He assumed the title of king of Castile after the death of Peter the Cruel, and in consequence was engaged in war with Henry of Transjama, whose daughter he was obliged to marry to re-establish the general tranquillity. He was again unfortunate in another war, though supported by the English.

FERDINAND I. grand duke of Tuscany after his brother Francis II. 1587, was eminent for his wisdom in the government, and for the vigor with which he made war against the pirates who disturbed the commerce of his subjects in the Mediterranean. He died much respected 1609.

FERDINAND II. grand duke of Tuscany, succeeded Cosmo II. and gained the respect of the neighbouring princes, by the firm neutrality which he maintained during the wars between France and Spain. He ably supported the Venetians in their war in Candia, and died 1668 after a reign of 48 years.

FERDINAND of Cordova, a learned Spaniard of the 15th century, who was not only well skilled in the logic of Aristotle, and the learning of the ancients, but an accomplished master in the polite arts, so that he passed among the vulgar for a magician. He wrote de Artificio Omnis Scibilis — and Commentaries on Ptolemy's Almagest, and on the Bible.

FERDINAND LOPEZ, a Portuguese who went to the East Indies in the 16th century, and interesting account of his voyage, &c.

FERDINAND, Charles, a native of Bruges, known as a poet and philosopher. He died at Paris 1494, author of a treatise on the Tranquillity of the Soul.

FERDINAND, John, a jesuit of Toledo, author of Divinarum Scripturarum Thesaurus, fol. 1594. He died at Valencia 1595, aged 59. Another of that name was a Dominican of Arragon, who published a commentary on Ecclesiastes, and died 1625.

FERDINAND DE JESUS, a Carmelite monk in Spain, very eloquent, so that he was surnamed the Golden mouthed. He wrote Commentaries on Aristotle, the Bible, &c. in the 17th century.

FERDINANDI, Epiphanius, a native of Obianto, eminent as a physician. He wrote Observationes et Casus Medici — de Vita Propaganda — de Peste — Theorematum Medica, &c. He died 1638, aged 69.

FERDONSI, Hassan Ben Scharf, a Persian poet, whose epic poem called Schanameh is very celebrated. It is the labor of 30 years, and consists of 60,000 verses, each of which is a distich. It contains the annals of the kings of Persia. He died at Thous 1020.

FERG OR FERGIRE, Francis Paul, a painter, born at Vienna 1689. He studied under Hans Graaf and Grient, and improved himself by travelling. He came to London where he was much esteemed, but an imprudent marriage ruined all his expectations. He was found dead at the door of his lodging 1740, worn out with disease and wretchedness. His landscapes are beautifully enriched with ruins of castles and towers.

FERGUS I. king of Scotland, son of Fergus king of the Irish Scots. It is said that he assisted the Scots in repelling the Picts, and that for his services he was elected king. He was drowned as he returned to Ireland 404.

FERGUSON, Robert, a divine, ejected from the living of Godmarham in Kent, for nonconformity 1662. He afterwards kept a school, and then devoted himself to politics, and became a court spy. He was next the associate of the unfortunate Monmouth, whom as it is thought he betrayed, as he was fickle in his attachments, and faithful to no party. He wrote the Interest of Reason in Religion, 8vo. — a Discourse concerning Justification, &c. and died poor 1714.

FERGUSON, Robert, a native of Edinburgh, who studied divinity, but preferred poetry and literary fame to all other pursuits. He obtained a place in the sheriff clerk's office Edinburgh, but dissipation abridged his days, and he died insane in the lunatic asylum of Edinburgh 1774, aged 24. His pastoral, humorous, and lyric poems have been edited in Dr. Anderson's collection.

FERGUSON, James, an ingenious Scotchman, self taught as a philosopher, born of poor parents at Keith in Banffshire, 1710. He was for four years a common shepherd, and in this solitary employment he marked accurately the position of the stars with a thread and bead. His ingenuity was observed and encouraged by his opulent neighbours, who had him instructed in arithmetic, algebra, and geometry, and under the patronage of sir James Dunbar for many years he supported himself by drawing and taking portraits. His ingenuity was so great that after the accidental sight of a watch and of a clock, he made one of each with wood. In 1744 he came to London, and in consequence of his astronomical rotula to shew the new moon and eclipses, he was introduced to the learned and ingenious, and made fellow of the Royal society. He was a man of inoffensive manners, mild and benevolent in his character. The present king at his accession granted him a pension of 50l. a year, and occasionally took great delight in his conversation. He invented some useful instruments, and died 16th Nov. 1776. He wrote "Select Mechanical Exercises," 1773 — Introduction to Electricity, 1770 — to Astronomy, 1772 — treatise on Perspective, 1775 — and Astronomy Explained on Newton's Principles, edited for the fourth time 1770 — Lectures on Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Hydraulics, Pneumatics, &c. edited the fifth time, 1776, &c.

FERGUSON, William, a Scotch painter, who died 1690. He travelled into Italy, and excelled in representing dead birds, game, and still life.

FERMAT, Peter, an eminent mathematician, born at Toulouse 1590, where from his knowledge of the law he became counsellor in the parliament, and an upright magistrate. As a philosopher he may be said to have prepared the way for the Infinites of Newton and Leibnitz, and to have introduced new geometry. He was connected with Descartes, Huygens, and Pascal, and died 1664. His works highly valued were published at Toulouse, 2 vols. fol. 1679. His son Samuel was eminent as a literary man, and wrote some learned dissertations.

FERMOR, William count Von, a native of Phaskow, the son of a Scotchman. He like his father, was in the Russian service, and greatly distinguished himself against the Turks. In 1755 he was commander of the Russian forces, and for his services in defeating the Prussians he was made count of the empire by the emperor Francis. He defeated the king of Prussia at the famous battle of Zorndorff, and afterwards took Berlin. He died 1771, aged 64.

FERNANDEZ, Anthony, author of Commentaries on Isaiah, and the Visions of the Old Testament, was superior of the Portuguese jesuit missionaries in India, and died in Portugal 1628.

FERNANDEZ, Benedict, a Portuguese jesuit, author of Commentaries on Genesis, and on St. Luke's Gospel. He died at Lisbon 1630.

FERNANDEZ, Alphonsa, a Spanish Dominican, author of an ecclesiastical history of his own times, and of other works. He died about 1640.

FERNEL, John Francis, physician to Henry II. of France, was born at Montdidier in Picardy 1506. He applied himself to study with the most indefatigable zeal at Paris, and he made such progress that his lectures on philosophical subjects were greatly admired for eloquence and erudition. He afterwards studied physic, and when admitted to practice, he divided his time between his patients and his books, allowing himself scarce five hours of rest in 24. When invited to court by the king, whose friendship and good opinion he had secured by curing one of his favorites, he excused himself, and when solicited to accept honors and places of emolument, he modestly refused, and preferred the retirement and studies of private life to every other pursuit. On the death of the king's first physician, he was at last obliged to settle at the court, but the sudden death of his wife who fell a sacrifice to her grief in leaving her relations to come to live at Fontainebleau, so affected him that he died within a month after, 1558. He wrote several works on medical subjects in high repute, as he was considered one of the great restorers of medicine. His practice was so great that his gains were yearly 12,000 livres.

FERNOUILLOT DE FALBAIRE, Charles George, a French author, who died May, 1801, aged 74. He wrote some articles in the Encyclopedie, besides dramatic pieces of considerable merit.

FERRACINO, Bartolomeo, a self taught mechanic, born at Bassan in Padua 1692. He was a sawyer, and his invention of a saw which worked by the wind recommended him to the notice of the great. He built a famous bridge over the Brenta in his native town, and died soon after the completion 1764. An account of his life and inventions was published by Memo, Venice.

FERRAND, James, a French physician of Agen. He wrote a book "on the Distemper of Love," Paris, 1622, which in treating of the passion as of a bodily disease, and of the frequent uneasiness, and fatal consequences of its pleasures, shows the great erudition of the author.

FERRAND, Lewis, a French lawyer, born at Toulon 1645. He was an advocaté of the parliament of Paris, and died there 1699. His works, which are neither accurate nor brilliant, are chiefly on religious subjects.

FERRAND, Anthony, a counsellor of Paris, who died there 1719, aged 42. His madrigals, songs, epigrams, &c.

&c. are well known. He was the rival of J. B. Rousseau in poetry.

FERRAND, James Philip, a French painter in enamel, was born at Joigni in Burgundy, and died at Paris 1732, aged 79. He wrote a treatise on Enamel Painting, and another on Miniatures, 12mo.

FERRANDUS, Fulgentius, a deacon of Carthage, who died before 551. He was disciple of St. Fulgentius, and wrote some books, enumerated by Cave.

FERRAR, Robert, a native of Halifax, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made bishop of St. David's by the influence of Cranmer, to whom he had been chaplain. He was imprisoned on suspicion in Edward's reign, and under Mary he was burnt as a heretic at Caermarthen, 1555.

FERRAR, Nicholas, a native of London, son of an East India merchant. He was educated at Cambridge, and after travelling on the continent, he was made secretary to the Virginia company, and in 1624 elected member of parliament, and directed, with two others, to draw the impeachment against lord Cranfield, the treasurer. He soon after retired to Little Gidding, Huntingdonshire, where he established a protestant monastery, and devoted himself to devotional pursuits. In 1626 he took deacon's orders, and died 1637. He had translated from the Spanish Valdeffo's Considerations on Religion.

FERRARI, Lewis, a native of Milan, who studied under Cardan, and became professor of mathematics at Bologna, where he died 1565, aged 45. He is known for his invention of the method of resolving biquadratic equations.

FERRARI, Antony Mary Zachary Bartholomew, founder, with James Morigia, of the order of the Barnabites at Milan, 1520, confirmed by pope Paul III. 1535. This order flourished greatly. Ferrari died superior of his foundation, 1544.

FERRARI, Ottaviano, an Italian author, born at Milan, 1518. He was much respected as a professor of ethics and politics at Venice, Padua, Milan, and other places of Italy. He died at Milan, 1586, considered for his learning as a second Aristotle. He wrote de Sermonibus Exotericis, 1575 — de Origine Romanorum, 1607 — a Latin translation of Athenæus, and Notes on Aristotle.

FERRARI, Francisco Bernardino, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Milan, 1577. He was a doctor of the Ambrosian college, and he was encouraged by the archbishop of Milan to travel not only to improve himself, but to make a collection of books. This valuable selection, made in Spain, Italy, and in other countries, laid the foundation of the Ambrosian library. Ferrari died at Milan, 1669, aged 92. He wrote de Antiquo Ecclesiasticarum Epistolarum Genere Libri tres, 1613 — de Ritu Sacrarum Ecclesiæ Catholicæ Concionum Libri tres, 1620 — de Veterum Acclamationibus & Plausu Libri septem, 1627. These works are very curious, and display the great erudition and deep researches of the author.

FERRARI, Ottavio, of the same family, was born at Milan, 1607, and educated at the Ambrosian college, of which he became professor of rhetoric at the age of 21, on account of his great proficiency. Six years after he was invited by the republic of Venice to Padua, where as professor of Greek, of eloquence, and politics, he collected a great number of pupils, and restored the declining reputation of the university. His learning was so extensive, and his fame so deservedly established, that Christina of Sweden honored him with presents, and Lewis XIV. settled on him a pension of 500 crowns for seven years. He died 1682, respected for his amiable manners, and that sweetness and humanity of character which procured him the name of Pacificator. His works are chiefly on classical antiquities, the most known of which is Origines Lingux Italice, fol. 1676, a subject treated before by Scaliger, in 24 books, now lost.

FERRARI, John Baptist, a jesuit of Sienna, who published a Syriac Dictionary, 4to. 1622, to explain the Syriac words in the bible. He wrote also de Malorum Aureorum Cultura, & de Florum Cultura, 1633, and 1646, and died 1655.

FERRARI, Giovanni Andrea, a painter of Genoa, who died 1669, aged 70. He excelled in the representation of flowers, fruits, &c.

FERRARIENSIS, a general of the Dominicans, who died 1528. His real name was Francis Sylvestre. He wrote on Philosophy, &c.

FERRARS, George, a learned man, born of an ancient family near St. Alban's, 1512. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's inn, and soon distinguished himself as an advocate under the patronage of Cromwell, earl of Essex. He became afterwards a favorite with Henry VIII. and his arrest, when he was member of parliament for Plymouth, created such confusion, that in the event, it established the privileges of the members of the house. On the fall of Somerset under Edward VI. he was named lord of misrule, to entertain the public with pastimes, and for 12 days he exhibited at Greenwich all the pomp and magnificence of assumed greatness, to the satisfaction of the court, and the gratification of the populace. Ferrars possessed such versatile talents, that though the religion of the court frequently changed at the caprice of the sovereign, he continued still a favorite with all, and died a protestant at Flamstead, Herts, 1579. He wrote the History of queen Mary, which was inserted in the chronicle under the name of Richard Grafton. He also contributed to the poetical work called "the Mirror for Magistrates," published 1559 — the Fall of Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice, &c. — the tragedy of Thomas Woodstock, duke of Gloucester — tragedy of king Richard II. — the story of Eleanor Cobham, &c.

FERRARS, Edward, a Warwickshire poet, educated at Oxford. He was a favorite with Henry VIII. and died 1564. He wrote according to Wood, some comedies and tragedies.

FERRARS, Henry, of the same family as the preceding, was educated also at Oxford, and made large collections for the history of his native county. His valuable papers laid the foundation of Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire. He was esteemed by Camden, and distinguished himself also as a poet. He died 1633, aged 84, leaving behind him, says Wood, the character of a well-bred gentleman, a good neighbour, and an honest man.

FERRAUD, N. a native of Daure, near the Pyrenees, who was a deputy in the convention, and distinguished himself by his enmity to the monarchy. He was commissary in the armies of the Rhine, where he behaved with coolness and intrepidity, and on his return to Paris, when opposing the attack made on the convention, 26th May, 1795, he was shot through the heart with a pistol. His murderer was executed, and the convention appointed a day to celebrate his obsequies.

FERREIN, Antony, a French anatomist, who died at Paris 1769, aged 76. He published lectures which he had read on medicine, and lectures on Materia Medica, each 3 vols. 12mo.

FERRERAS, Don John of, a Spanish divine, born at Labanizza 1652, and educated at Salamanca. His wit and learning recommended him to the court, from whose favors he refused the pressing offer of two bishoprics. He was made member of the academy of Madrid 1713, and appointed librarian to the king. He contributed much to the Spanish Dictionary, published by the academy 1739, in 6 vols. fol. He died 1735, leaving several works in philosophy, divinity, and history, the best known of which is his history of Spain, translated into French, by Hermilly, 10 vols. 4to.

FERRETI, or FERRETUS, a poet and historian of Vicenza, of the 14th century, who contributed much to the revival of learning in Europe. He wrote an history of his own times from 1259 to 1328, in seven books, and other works in verse and prose, in Italian.

FERRETI, Emilio, an Italian lawyer, born at Caselfranco, Bologna 1489. He was employed at Avignon, by Leo X. to whom he was secretary. He died at Avignon 1552. His Opera Juridica were published after his death.

FERRETY, Giovanni Batista, a Benedictine monk of Vicenza, who published at Verona, in 1672, "Musæ Lapidariæ," in folio, which contain inscriptions from ancient monuments. The time of his death is unknown.

FERRI, Paul, a learned divine, born at Metz 1591, and educated at Montauban. He became a minister in his native town, and gained popularity by his eloquence, and his dignified address as a preacher. He zealously employed himself to reconcile the protestants, and for these benevolent motives he was accused by his enemies of being bribed by Richelieu to form a coalition of the two religions. He died 1669, of the stone, and more than 80 calculi were found in his bladder. He published, 1616, Scholastici Orthodoxici Specimen, a book approved by Du Plessis Mornay — Vindiciæ pro Scholastico Orthodoxo. 1619 — and General Catechisme de la Reformation, 1654.

FERRI, Ciro, a painter, born at Rome 1634. He was the disciple and happy imitator of Peter de Corona, and the excellence of his pieces, on which he set a very high price, recommended him to the patronage of pope Alexander VII. and of his three successors.

The duke of Florence also granted him a pension to finish the imperfect pictures of Cortona, and honorably nominated him chief of the Florentine school. Ferri was equally great as an architect, and several palaces and altars at Rome were raised from his designs. It is said that he died through chagrin at seeing the superior coloring of Bacici's picture of angels near his own works in the palace of Navona, 1689, at the age of 55.

FERRIER, Arnaud de, a lawyer, born at Toulouse 1506, and, from the greatness of his abilities, called the Cato of France. He was professor of the university, and afterwards counsellor of the parliament of Toulouse, and he was, in 1562, deputed by the French king to the council of Trent, where the boldness of his harangues in favor of his master offended some of his Italian hearers. He afterwards went to Venice, where he assisted father Paul in the collection of materials for the History of the council of Trent. He was at heart a protestant, and professed it at the solicitation of Du Plessis Mornay. He was made chancellor to the king of Navarre, and he formed the design to declare the French king head of the church, after the example of England. He died in his 79th year. He wrote some works.

FERRIER, Jeremy, a divinity professor at Nîmes, who, from protestant, became papist, even after declaring in a public disputation that Clement VIII. was Anti-christ. He was afterwards made state counsellor to the French king, and he attended him in Britany in 1626. He was patronized by Richelieu, and wrote some tracts, especially "Catholique d'Etat," in favor of his religion and principles. He died of a hectic fever 1626. He had a large family, but only one daughter, who married Tardieu, and of whom some anecdotes are recorded in Boileau's tenth satire.

FERRIER, Lewis, a poet, born at Avignon. He was imprisoned for some licentious verses in his "Preceptes Galantes," but liberated by interest. He wrote Anne of Britany, Adrastus, and Montezuma, tragedies, which, in a feeble style, have some pathetic passages. He died in Normandy 1721, aged 69.

FERRIER, John, a jesuit of Rodez, in Rouergne, confessor to the French king after Annat, in 1670. He opposed the Jansenists, and wrote his famous book, on probability, against them. He died 1674.

FERRIERES, Claude de, a doctor of civil law at Paris, who wrote several valuable books on jurisprudence. His compositions enriched the bookellers, but left him and his family very poor. He died 1715, aged 77. His works are, the Jurisprudence of the Justinian Code — of the Digest — of the Novellæ, &c. His son Claude Joseph wrote a Dictionary of Law, 2 vols. 4to. 1771.

FERRON, Arnauld du, a lawyer of Bourdeaux, who died 1563, aged 48. He wrote in elegant Latin in the style of Terence, and continued to the reign of Francis I. the Latin History of France by Paulus Æmilius the Veronese. It was published at Paris 1555, and very highly esteemed for curious and interesting details.

FERTE', Henry de Seneferre Marechal de, a famous general general under Lewis XIII. and his successor, distinguished at the siege of Rochelle 1626, and at the battles of Rocroi and Lens. In 1650, he defeated the duke of Lorraine, at the battle of St. Nicholas, and was made marshal of France, but in 1656, he was taken prisoner, at Valenciennes, by the Spaniards. He died 1681, aged 82, respected as a warrior, but inferior to Turenne, whose fame he envied.

FERUS, John, a superior of the Gray Friars, at Metz, known as a preacher, and as an able commentator on the bible. His works which favor the protestants, are inserted in the Index Expurgatorius. He died 1654.

FESTUS, Porcius, was the proconsul of Judea, before whom the apostle Paul appeared, and by whom he was on his appeal sent to Rome.

FESTUS, Pompeius, an ancient grammarian, author of a Tract de Significatione Verborum, abridged from Flaccus.

FETTI, Dominico, a painter born at Rome, 1589, and educated under Ludovico Civoli, of Florence. He studied and imitated the paintings of Julio Romano, and was patronized by the duke of Mantua, whose palaces he adorned with his highly finished pieces. He ruined his constitution by licentious indulgences at Venice, and died in his 35th year. His pictures are very scarce, and much sought after. His sister, a nun, was also a good painter, and she adorned her convent, at Mantua, with some of her pieces.

FEVARDENTIUS, or FEWARDENT, Francis, a Franciscan friar of Coutances, Normandy, born 1541. He was a furious and bigoted opposer of the protestants, against whom he preached with great virulence. Even the third and fourth Henries were objects of his attack, and against them he directed all his thunder from the pulpit. He published the five books of Irenaeus, corrected and illustrated with learned notes, and edited the last time at Paris, 1639. He wrote also controversial tracts. He died 1641.

FEUILLE'E, Lewis, a French naturalist, born in Provence 1660. His great abilities were honorably employed by Lewis XIV. in different parts of the world, to advance the knowledge of natural history, and at his return he received a pension, and an observatory was built for his residence at Marseilles, where he died 1732. He wrote a journal of observations physical, botanical, &c. on the Coasts of South America, 3 vols. 4to. and presented the French king with a large folio of curious drawings, &c. executed in the south-seas.

FEUQUIERES, Anthony de Pas marquis of, a native of Artois, distinguished as a general, and made a marshal for his services in Germany. He wrote Military Memoirs, 4 vols. 12mo. in which he spoke with unusual severity against the general officers of his age, and died 1711, aged 63.

FEURBORN, Justus, a German protestant of Westphalia, author of several theological works in Latin. He died rector of the university of Gießen 1656, aged 69.

FEVRE, Claude, a French painter, who died in London 1675, aged 42. His portraits, flowers, historical pieces, &c. were much admired.

FEVRE, Guy le, sieur de la Boderie, a poet, born in Lower Normandy. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and published some works in Syriac and Chaldee, and assisted in the editing of Montanu' Polyglott bible. He died 1598, aged 57.

FEVRE, Anthony le, brother to Guy, was employed near the person of Henry IV. of France, and sent as ambassador to England, and to other countries. He died 1615, aged 60. His memoirs appeared at Paris, 5 vols. 12mo.

FEVRE, Nicholas le, a French jesuit, author of a treatise on true religion — and a critical examination of Bayle's works. He died 1755.

FEVRE, James le, or Jacobus FABER, a learned Frenchman, born at Estampes, in Picardy 1440. He was suspected of protestantism, and therefore exposed to persecution, and after taking refuge at Meaux, Blois, and Guienne, he at last found a safe retreat at Nerac, under the protection of Margaret, queen of Navarre, sister of Francis I. He died there 1537, nearly 100 years old. Though not professedly a protestant, he yet disapproved of many of the tenets of the church of Rome, and he held a conference with Bucer and Capito, at Straßburg, about the reformation of the church. In 1512, he published a translation of St. Paul's epistles, with notes, and gave the rest of the New Testament in 1522, with copious commentaries. Though the intimate friend, and correspondent of Erasmus, he quarrelled with him in consequence of some disputed passages in scripture, and Erasmus, much to his honor, after repelling the attack, solicited the continuance of his friendship. It is said that he was murdered in his bed, after weeping in the presence of queen Margaret, and lamenting that he had not, like many of his disciples, had the fortitude to become a martyr in the defence of his opinions.

FEVRE, Nicolas le, or Nicolaus FABER, an ingenious and learned man, born at Paris, 2d June 1544. In his youth, he had a dreadful accident, while cutting a pen, a small piece of the quill flew into his eye, and caused such acute pain, that he lifted, in sudden anguish, the knife to his eye, and struck it out of the socket. He studied the civil law at Toulouse, Padua, and Bologna, and after residing 18 months in Rome, he returned to Paris, and applied himself to belles lettres. His edition of Seneca, appeared in 1587, with learned notes. He also devoted some time to mathematics, and with such success that he discovered the falsity of Scaliger's demonstration of the quadrature of the circle. On the accession of Henry IV. to the crown, he was made preceptor to the duke of Condé, and after the king's death, he held the same office in the education of Lewis XIII. He died 1611. His works, which are few, were collected after his death by his friend le Begue, in a 4to. vol. 1614. Paris. He was not indeed anxious to appear as an author, but he was more willing to communicate instruction and intelligence to those who enriched the world with literary productions, and therefore for his liberality, and for his modesty, and the amiable qualities of a private character, he is deservedly commended by Baillet, Lipsius, and others.

FEVRE, Tanaquil, or Tannequi, a learned man, father ther of Madame Dacier, was born at Caen in Normandy 1615. After studying with the greatest success at home, and under the care of his uncle, he went to Paris, and was soon recommended to the patronage of Richelieu, who settled a pension of 2000 livres upon him, to inspect the books published at the Louvre. The death of his patron, and the neglect of the next minister Mazarine, altered his plans of life, and he turned protestant, and accepted a professorship in the university of Saumur. Here his learning and his reputation drew pupils from all quarters, but an unfortunate assertion that he could pardon Sappho's love for her own sex, since it produced a beautiful ode, proved the cause of a dispute with the university, and at last in 1672, he was invited to remove to Heidelberg. A fever however prevented his departure, and he died 12th Sep. 1672. He left a son of his own name, who was a protestant divine in Holland, and at London, but became a Roman catholic at Paris, and published a Traité de Futilité Poétique 1697, and besides Madame Dacier, another daughter married to Paul Bauldri, professor at Utrecht. Faber was agreeable in his person, but rather effeminate, as to appear with neatness, he procured gloves, &c. from London, and essences from Rome. He published among other books, Luciani de Morte Peregrini Libellus, 4to. 1653. Diatribe Flavii Josephi de Jesu Christi Testimonium suppositum esse 1655, 8vo. — Epistolarum Pars Prima, 1659, Secunda, 1665 — a short account of the Lives of Greek poets — the life of Theseus, from Plutarch — Methode pour Commencer les Humanités Grecques & Latines — editions of Xenophon's Convivium, of Plato's Alcibiades, of Plutarch's de Superstitione, besides notes on Apollodorus, Longinus, and other classics.

FEVRE, Roland le, a painter, born at Anjou, though called sometimes a Venetian. His naked figures were much admired. He stained marble curiously. He died in England, 1677.

FEVRET, Charles, a French civilian, born at Saumur 1583. He studied the law at Heidelberg under Godefroy, and in 1607 he returned to Dijon, where he married Anne Brunet of Beaulne, by whom he had 19 children, 14 of which were born in eight years. He was a popular advocate at Dijon, and became counsellor of the three estates of the province. When Lewis XIII. came to Dijon to punish an insurrection, Fevret was the only person considered as capable to plead the cause of the insurgents, and to petition the monarch, and so eloquent and persuasive was his address that the king desired him to print it, and forgave the rebels. His abilities rendered him universally known, the princes of Condé appointed him their counsellor, and he held the same honorable office also with Frederic Casimir the palatine of the Rhine. He died at Dijon 1661, aged 78. He published 1645 a Latin treatise de Clariss Fori Burgundici Oratoribus — and in 1653 his famous "Traité de l'Abus," which has been frequently reprinted. He also translated Pibrac's Quatrains into Latin verse, &c.

FEUSTKING, John Henry, a native of Holstein, who became professor and doctor of divinity in the university of Wittemberg. He was also confessor to the elector of Saxony, and counsellor to the duke of Saxe Gotha, and died 1713, aged 41. He wrote various works in German and in Latin.

FEVRET DE FONTETTE, Charles Marie, great grandson of the preceding, was born at Dijon 1710, and became eminent as a lawyer, and obtained a pension from government. He was member of the academy of belles lettres, and was laboriously employed in editing "le Long's Bibliothèque Historique de la France," which he enlarged from one to five large fol. vols. He died 1772.

FEYDEAU, Matthew, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Paris 1616. He was a zealous Jansenist, and died in exile at Annonai in Vivares 1694. He wrote "Meditations on Providence, and the Mercy of God," under the name of Pressigny, and the "Catechism of Grace," &c.

FIASELLA, Dominico, an Italian historical painter, who died 1669, aged 80. He was also called Sarenza from the place of his birth near Genoa.

FICHARD, John, a lawyer and syndic, of Frankfort on the Mayne, where he died 1581, aged 69. The best known of his works are, Virorum Qui Superiori Nostroque Sæculo Eruditione et Doctrinâ Illustrés atque Memorabiles Fuerunt, Vita, 1536, 4to. — Vita Juris-consultorum, 1565 — Onomasticon Philosophico-Medico Synonymum, 1574 — de Cautilis, 1577 — Concilium Matrimoniale, 1580.

FICINUS, Marsilius, a learned Italian, born at Florence 1433, and educated at the expence of Lorenzo de Medicis, to whom his father was physician. He distinguished himself as an able scholar, a great philosopher, physician, and divine, and under the patronage of his friends Lorenzo and Cosmo de Medicis, he resorted in the West the study of the platonic philosophy, and translated not only his favorite author Plato, but also Plotinus, Proclus, Iamblicus, Porphyrius, &c. Though originally a sceptic, the eloquent preaching of Savanorola brought him to a due sense of religion and of religious duties, but like many of the learned of his time he still remained devoted to astrology. By care and a proper regimen he supported his naturally feeble constitution to the age of 66. He died at Correggio 1499, and soon after, as Baronius gravely affirms, appeared according to his promise to his friend Michael Mercatus, to prove thus the immortality of the soul. His writings sacred and profane are very numerous, they were collected and printed at Venice 1516, and at Paris 1641, in 2 vols. folio.

FICORONI, Francesco, a Roman medallist, who died 1747, aged 83. He wrote several works, in Italian, on medals and antiquities, published at Rome.

FIDANZA, Johannes, a philosopher, poet, and theologist of Tuscany, called also St. Bonaventure, and from his learning stiled the seraphic doctor. He died 1274, aged 53, author of some books now little known.

FIDDES, Richard, an English divine, born at Hunmanby near Scarborough, Yorkshire 1671. He entered at Corpus Christi college, and afterwards removed to University college, Oxford, and after taking his bachelor's degree he returned to Yorkshire, where in 1693 he married. In 1694 he was presented to the living of Halfham, but the marshy situation of the place proved so injurious to him that he was suddenly deprived of his speech, and never after completely recovered it. Thus disabled from performing his duty, he came to London 1712, and no longer able to shine as before as an eloquent preacher, he determined to maintain himself by his pen. By the friendship of Swift he was recommended to lord Oxford who made him his chaplain, but the hopes of preferment and independence vanished at the death of the queen and the changes of the ministry. By the recommendation of Dr. Radcliffe his relation, he took his degree of B. D. and afterwards was honored with that of D. D. by the university. He died at Putney 1725, aged 54, leaving in destitute circumstances his wife and six children. Of his writings the most known are, "a Body of Divinity Explaining the Principles and the Duties of Natural and Revealed Religion, 2 vols. fol. — 52 Discourses — and the Life of Cardinal Wolsey, in fol. These works appeared under the patronage of a large subscription, but their popularity was severely attacked. Stackhouse found great fault with the body of divinity, and for the life of Wolsey the author was acrimoniously censured in the London journal, as being a friend to popery, and the secret enemy of the reformation. Dr. Knight afterwards in his life of Erasmus repeats the accusation, and charges Fiddes with favoring the claims of the pretender, as he wrote his book in the house and under the eye of Atterbury, whose opposition to the Hanoverian family was then very unpopular. These charges may now be considered as puerile, Fiddes wrote for his bread, but he certainly wrote for a party, and while he wished to please one part of the nation, he was sure that his compositions would be viewed with a jaundiced eye by the other.

FIELD, Richard, an English divine, born at Hempstead, Herts 1561, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Magdalen hall, and soon distinguished himself as a preacher and a powerful disputant, so that in 1594 he became reader to Lincoln's Inn society, from one of whose members he obtained the living of Burrowclere, Hants. In 1598 he was appointed chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and under James her successor, he was made successively canon of Windfor, and dean of Gloucester. The bishopric of Oxford was intended for him, but he died before the appointment was conferred in form, 21st Nov. 1616, aged 55. He was a man highly respected for his learning, and anxiously devoted to the healing of dissensions in the church, so that at one time James wished to employ his great abilities to produce a reconciliation between the Lutherans and Calvinists of Germany. The first time the king heard him preach he quaintly observed, "this is a Field for God to Dwell in," and almost in similar words he was styled by Fuller, "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a Field which the Lord hath blessed." The most famous of his works is his, "Four Books of the Church," augmented with a fifth in the second edition, which appeared 1610. His memory was retentive to a surprising degree, so that whatever he read he accurately remembered. He was not, however, only a learned man, but he was most universally, benevolent, exemplary in his family, religious in his behaviour, and in every thing a good christian.

FIELDING, Henry, the celebrated novelist, was born at Sharpsham park, Somersetshire, 22d April, 1707. His father was a lieutenant-general in the army, and grandson to an earl of Denbigh, and his mother was daughter of the first judge Gould. Young Fielding was educated at home, under the care of Mr. Oliver, a clergyman, whom he afterwards turned to ridicule in the humorous but coarse character of parson Trulliber in Joseph Andrews. He then went to Eton, where he formed an early intimacy with the future leading men of the age; with Lyttelton, Fox, Pitt, Hanbury Williams, and others, and then, when 18, he passed to Leyden, where he devoted himself to the study of civil law for two years. Being ill supplied with money by his father, who had taken a second wife, and had another rising family to provide for, he returned to London, and in that scene of dissipation, regardless of the calls of temperance and of virtue, he gratified every passion, and laid the seeds of future evils and of lasting infirmities. With a straitened purse he soon found that something must be done for bread. He therefore commenced author, and produced his first dramatic piece, "Love in several Masques," 1727, which, together with "the Temple Beau" the next year, drew forth the applauses of crowded audiences. He was not, however, always successful, and he ventured to publish one of his pieces, bearing in the title "as it was damned at the theatre royal, Drury-lane;" but the severity of criticism, and the frowns of disapprobation were unheeded in the friendship and patronage of the great and powerful, especially of the duke of Argyle, and lord Lyttelton. About the year 1734 he married Miss Craddock at Salisbury, a woman of great beauty, and a fortune of about 1500l. but this, together with the estate of Stower, Dorsetshire, which fell to him by his father's death, and which might with economy have rendered him comfortable and independent, was quickly squandered away in expensive hospitality, and an improper show of equipage and magnificence, and at 30 Fielding found himself poor, and destitute of every resource. He now applied to the law, and in due time was called from the Temple to the bar, and began to make a respectable figure in Westminster hall; but the frequent attacks of the gout, and all the diseases engrafted on a licentious youth, prevented the success which his abilities fairly promised. To maintain himself and a wife and children whom he tenderly loved, he again had recourse to his pen, and various pamphlets and tracts were ushered into the world anonymously. In the full vigor of genius he produced his Joseph Andrews, and Tom Jones, novels so universally admired, as to be above the praise of his biographer. His "Wedding Day," however, did not meet on the stage the success which he expected, and while he meditated on the gloomy aspect of his affairs, the death of his wife came to embitter the cup of his affliction, and it proved so poignant, that his friends dreaded the loss of his senses. By time he recovered the severity of the blow, and he began again to struggle against fortune.

fortune. He undertook to contribute to two periodical papers, but reduced as his income was, he found great assistance in the appointment of justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex, which was procured by the influence of his friends, and which, though unpopular and odious, was discharged by him with impartiality and attention. In the busy avocation of this office he planned and executed his Amelia, a work very respectable, but certainly inferior to Tom Jones. His constitution was now so enfeebled, that his friends advised his removing to the softer climate of Lisbon, and two months after he arrived there, he died, 1754, aged 48. Yet though weak, and laboring under the attacks of disease, he employed his pen in the humorous journal of his voyage to Lisbon, published in London 1755. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote an Essay on Conversation — on the Knowledge and Characters of Men — a Journey from this World to the next — the History of Jonathan the Wild, &c. His dramatic pieces are 26 in number, and the whole of his works has been published in several sizes, with an Essay on his Life and Genius, by Arthur Murphy. He left a second wife with four children. His biographer, who views his character with the partiality of a friend, and the candor of an historian, attributes much in the history of Fielding's life to slander and defamation; but he wisely observes that quick and warm passions should be early controuled, and that to their licentious indulgence the author of Tom Jones sacrificed his health, his happiness, and the prospect of a lengthened life. When poor he was no longer the master of his actions, and he had often recourse for subsistence to those measures which his honor disowned, and his pride regarded with shame. So fatal to all happiness and to peace is the wild indulgence of those passions which providence has given to man for his comfort if decently enjoyed, and for his misery if riotously abused. Some years after Fielding's death, the French consul at Lisbon, de Meyrionnet, offered to erect a monument over his grave, but the English factory, roused by the generous views of a stranger, discharged a debt due to departed literary merit.

FIELDING, Sarah, third sister of the preceding, was born 1714, and died unmarried 1768. She possessed the abilities and genius of her brother, which she evinced in the Cry, and in David Simple, and in the letters published as from the principal characters of the work. She also translated Xenophon's Memorabilia.

FIELDING, sir John, the fourth half brother to Henry Fielding, was his successor in the office of Westminster magistrate. Though blind from his youth, he discharged his duty with great activity and impartiality, and for his services to the public received the honor of knighthood 1761. He published various tracts on subjects of police, charges to the grand jury, essays on important subjects, but it is supposed that most of these appeared under his borrowed name, and that he wrote nothing but Cautions against the Tricks of Sharpers, 1777. He died at Drompton, Sept. 1780.

FIENNES, William, lord Say and Sele, born at Broughton, Oxfordshire, 1582, was educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow as related to the founder. He was raised from the dignity of baron to that of viscount, by James I. but in the reign of his successor he showed himself violent, inconstant, and vindictive. In the long parliament of 1640, he was very active with Hampden and Pym, and though made master of the court of wards, he slighted all reconciliation with the king, so that he was attainted of treason for not attending the king's person at Oxford. After the king's death he left the presbyterians whom he had hitherto supported, and joined himself to the independents, and during the usurpation he was created one of Cromwell's peers. At the restoration he was greatly noticed by Charles II. made lord privy seal, and lord chamberlain, though, as Wood observes, he had been a grand rebel for 20 years, and while others who had been reduced to a bit of bread for his majesty's cause, were left to pine and languish under insult and disappointment, and though a promoter of the rebellion, and in some respect accessory to the murder of Charles, he died quietly in his bed 14th April, 1662, and was buried with his ancestors at Broughton. He is called by Whitlock a man of great parts, wisdom, and integrity, and Clarendon, allowing him the same merit, describes him as ambitious, the enemy of the church, and a violent and dangerous leader of the discontented party. He wrote some political tracts, besides an attack against the quakers, who it seems were numerous and troublesome in his neighbourhood.

FIENNES, Nathanael, second son of the above, was born at Broughton, 1608, and like his father educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He travelled on the continent, and at Geneva, and in Switzerland confirmed that aversion which he derived from his father against the church. At his return he was made member for Banbury, and displayed the same violence against the royal party as his father. During the civil wars he was colonel of horse, under Essex, and governor of Bristol, which he too easily yielded to the assault of prince Rupert, for which he was condemned to lose his head. His father's influence, however, saved him, and he left the army disgraced, but still virulently animated against the king. He joined the independents like his father, and when Cromwell became protector, he was made one of his privy council, and sent among his lords. At the restoration he retired into the country, and died at his seat of Newton Tony near Salisbury, 1669. He wrote some things in support of Cromwell's usurpation, and in another tract defended his conduct at Bristol. Clarendon represents him as an able man, and in council inferior only to the great Hampden.

FIENUS, Thomas, a physician, born at Antwerp 1566. He travelled over Italy, and at his return was made professor of physic at Louvain, and physician to the duke of Bavaria. He died at Louvain 1631. He wrote "de Viribus Imaginationis," in which he relates a curious story of a hypochondriac who thought himself so large that he could not get out of his room, — de Formatione & Animatione Fœtus — Apologia pro eodem — de Cauteriis — Libri Chirurgici.

FIESCHO,

FIESCHO, John Lewis, a noble Genoese, who conspired against Andrew Doria, with the intention of delivering the gallees to the French, and of making himself sovereign in the room of his rival. He was drowned in the attempt 1st Jan. 1547, and the plot abandoned by his associates, and his family banished from Genoa to the fifth generation. He was then only 22 years old.

FIGINO, Ambrozio, a painter born at Milan, the disciple of Lomazio. His descent from the cross is seen at Wilton and much admired. He died 1590.

FIGELIUS, Edmundus, a learned Swede, professor of history at Upsal. He wrote a book de Statu Illustrum Romanorum, 1656, and died 1676.

FILANGERI, Gaetano, a native of Naples, who studied, but never practised the law. He was in 1777 employed about the court as gentleman of the bed-chamber, and as an officer of marine, and in 1787 was raised to an office in the college of Finance. He wrote a popular work on legislation, the first vol. of which appeared in 1780, and the 8th in 1791. He died 1787, aged 35.

FILELFO, Francis, or PHILEPHUS, Vid. PHILEPHUS.

FILESAC, John, doctor of the Sorbonne, and dean of the faculty of theology at Paris, died 1638. His works appeared 1621, 3 vols. 4to.

FILICAJA, Vincentio di, an elegant poet of Florence, who died 1707, aged 65. He was senator in his native city, and his wants were honorably and liberally relieved by Christina, queen of Sweden. His poems, which are in a delicate and refined style, were collected by his son in folio, and reprinted at Venice, 3 vols. 12mo. 1747.

FILMER, sir Robert, an English writer born at East Sutton in Kent, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He died 1688. He wrote the Anarchy of a limited and mixed Monarchy, — "Patriarcha," in which he proves the original government to be monarchical, derived from the patriarchs, and heads of families, — and "the Freeholders Grand Inquest." His Patriarcha was attacked by Locke.

FINÆUS, Orontius, Finé, professor of mathematics in the college founded by Francis I. at Paris, was born at Briançon, Dauphiné, 1494. By his genius and application he recommended himself to the notice of the great, but though as a mathematician, and as a man of letters he was highly respectable, yet he was pinched by poverty, and at his death in 1555, he left his wife and six children in very reduced and distressed circumstances. He invented a clock in 1553, and pretended that he had found out the quadrature of the circle. His works were collected in 3 vols. folio. 1532, 1542, and 1556.

FINCH, Heneage, earl of Nottingham, son of sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London, was born in 1621. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, and at the Inner Temple he assiduously applied himself to the study of law. He was made solicitor-general to Charles II. and created a baronet, and in 1661 he was elected member for the university of Oxford. He was very active in the impeachment of lord Clarendon, in 1667, and in 1670 he was made attorney-general, and three years after lord keeper, and raised to the peerage. In 1675 he was appointed lord chancellor, and in 1681 he was created earl of Nottingham, and died the year after. He was a man of great wisdom and eloquence, and though born in dangerous and troublesome times, he so conducted himself that he retained in every situation the good opinion of the king and of the people. Burnet has commended him for his attachment to the church, Dryden has recorded him in his Abolom and Achitophel, in the character of Amri, and for his powers in oratory, he acquired and deserved the name of the Roscius and Cicero of England. Some of his speeches in parliament, and on judicial causes, have been published.

FINCH, Daniel, earl of Nottingham, son of the preceding, was born in 1647. Though he was one of the privy counsellors who proclaimed the elevation of the duke of York to the throne, he never appeared at court during the reign of James, but upon his abdication he wished the appointment of a regent, and not the setting up of another king. He was secretary under William, and held the same office under Anne, till 1704. At the accession of George I. he was one of the lords for the administration of affairs, and was declared president of the council. He retired from public affairs 1716, and died 1730. He wrote a very elaborate book in reply to Whiston's letter to him on the trinity, for which he was thanked by the university of Oxford.

FINCH, Edward, brother of sir Heneage Finch, first earl of Nottingham, was vicar of Christ church, London, from which he was ejected by the parliamentary inquisitors. The crimes alledged against him were, that he preached in a surplice, worshipped the great idol set up in the church, i. e. the altar, and associated with women. He died Feb. 1, 1642, much respected.

FINCK, Thomas, a native of South Jutland, who took his medical degrees at Basil, and became physician to the duke of Sleswick. He was made in 1691 professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in 1602 professor of eloquence, and 1603, of medicine. He wrote tracts, Geometriæ Rotundi — de Constitutione Matheos — de Medicinâ, &c. He died 1656, aged 95.

FINET, sir John, a gentleman of respectability among the courtiers of James I. and Charles I. He was born at Saulton near Dover, in Kent, and died 1641, aged 70. He wrote "Fineti Philoxenus," a book on the precedency, treatment, audience, and punctilios observed towards foreign ambassadors at the English court, 1656.

FIRENZUOLA, Angelo, an Italian poet, born at Florence, and patronized by pope Clement VII. He was for some time an advocate and then became an ecclesiastic, and died at Rome 1545. His prose works were published at Florence 1548, 8vo. and his comedies and other poetical pieces the year after, and in 1763, in 3 vols.

FIRMICUS MATERNUS, Julius, a christian writer of the fourth century, of whom little is known. His book "de Errone Profanarum Religionum," has been often often printed, and is a valuable performance. The eight books of astronomy or mathematics printed at Venice 1497, which bear his name, are supposed not to be by him, or at least to have been written by him before he was converted from heathenism to christianity.

FIRMILIAN, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, was the friend of Origen, and president of the council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata. He died 269.

FIRMIN, Thomas, a most benevolent Englishman, born at Ipswich, June, 1632. He was apprenticed by his parents who were puritans, to a linen manufacturer in London, and in 1660 married a citizen's daughter, who died after bringing him two children. He married again in 1664, and had several children. He was very prosperous in his business, and he honorably employed the fruits of his industry and success to the most charitable purposes. He was in his religious opinions a Socinian, but he nevertheless was held in esteem by the clergy, by Wilkins, Whichcot, and especially Tillotson, who frequented his company even when archbishop. He was settled in Lombard street, and the ravages of the plague in 1665, and the fire of 1666, gave full activity to his extensive benevolence. In 1676 he erected a warehouse in Little Britain for the industrious employment of the poor in the linen manufacture, and in 1682 he established another manufactory of the same kind at Ipswich for the benefit of the protestants who had fled from France on account of religious persecutions. For the last 20 years of his life he was governor of Christ hospital, London, to which he was a great benefactor. There was indeed scarce a charitable institution to which he did not liberally contribute, with the most humane and benevolent of intentions. This worthy and great character, died 20th Dec. 1697, aged 66, and was buried in the cloisters of Christ hospital, where in the wall near his grave an inscription records his real merits. He published in 1678 Proposals for the Employing of the Poor, and the Prevention of Beggary, &c. 4to.

FIRMIN, Giles, a native of Suffolk, educated at Cambridge, where he studied physic, which he afterwards practised in New England. On his return to England he took orders, and became minister of Shalford, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He resumed the practice of physic, and died 1697, aged 80. The best known of his works is "the Real Christian."

FIRONZABADI, surnamed Sharazi, a learned Persian, author of al Tanbidh, or general information on the Mahometan law in the 11th century. Another of the same name wrote the Ocean, or a dictionary of the Arabic language, and died 1414.

FISH, Simon, a native of Kent, educated at Oxford, from whence he went to Gray's Inn and studied the law. He fled into Germany in consequence of his acting in a play, in which severe censures were thrown upon Wolsey, and there he met William Tyndale likewise an exile. He wrote in 1527, "the Supplication of Beggars," which is a violent satire on bishops and clergy, and the perusal of this piece by Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, restored him to favor, and after Wolsey's fall he returned, and was graciously treated by the king. He died of the plague 1571. He translated the Dutch book called the Sum of the Scriptures.

FISHER, John, an English prelate, born at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1459. He was educated at Michael house, a college afterwards incorporated with Trinity college, Cambridge, and in 1495 when fellow, he served the office of proctor, and that same year he was elected master of Michael house, and then became confessor to Margaret, duchess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. who by his advice founded St. John's and Christ colleges, at Cambridge, and among other acts of great benevolence, founded both the divinity professorships in the universities. In 1501 he took the degree of D. D. and was made vice chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1504 was nominated bishop of Rochester, and the next year accepted the headship of Queen's college, Cambridge. On Luther's appearance he stood forth as the champion of Rome, but though long favored by the king, he fell under his displeasure 1527, on account of his zealous defence of the queen, in the affair of her divorce. In 1530 he narrowly escaped poisoning by one Rouse, who threw in the cook's absence poison into the gruel, of which luckily the bishop did not taste, but which proved fatal to two of the servants, and nearly so to 15 others who partook of it. Upon the question of the king's supremacy in 1531, Fisher opposed it with great freedom, and increased the dissatisfaction of the court, by listening to the predictions of the holy maid of Kent, and more at last by refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to the king, and to his children, by Anne Boleyn. He was committed to the Tower for this contumacy, and though solicited by his friends he refused to alter his opinion, or assent to the lawfulness of the divorce, and the marriage of the king. He was attainted of high treason, but he might have languished in confinement the rest of life, had not the gratitude of the pope been unseasonably manifested towards him. Pleased with the firmness of the venerable bishop, Paul III. in 1535, created him a cardinal, an honor which displeased Henry so much, that he gave orders that none should bring the hat into his dominions. The measure was unworthy of a king, but when Fisher, more ambitiously than wisely, had declared to Cromwell, whom Henry had sent to examine him, that he would receive from the pope the cardinal's hat, the angry monarch, swore by the mother of God, that he should wear it on his shoulders then, for he would leave him never a head to set it on. He was therefore soon after arraigned, and condemned to suffer death for high treason, and on the 22d June, 1535, he was beheaded, and his head fixed on London-bridge, the next day. He was then nearly 77. Of his learning, his several works which are chiefly on Controversial subjects, &c. which appeared together at Wurtzburg, in folio, 1595, are evident proof. As he was the literary opponent of Erasmus, the opinion of that illustrious author must be considered as impartial. He describes him as a man of great and extensive powers of mind, and for integrity, sweetness of temper, and greatness of soul, far superior to all the men of his age.

FISHER, Mary, an enthusiastic quaker, in the 17th century, who travelled to Constantinople, with the chimerical intention of converting the grand Segnior. Mahomet heard her with patience, and sent her back to her country in safety. She afterwards married a preacher of her persuasion, and then went into Languedoc, to attempt the conversion of the protestants there to the tenets of the quakers.

FITZHERBERT, fir Anthony, a learned lawyer, born of an ancient family at Norbury, Derbyshire. He was educated at Oxford, and at one of the inns of court, London, and soon distinguished himself as a lawyer. In 1511, he was made serjeant at law, in 1516, knighted, and in 1523, appointed justice in the court of common pleas. After a life supported in his high station with integrity and honor, he died 27th May 1538, and was buried at Norbury, leaving a numerous family, well provided for. He wrote the office of Justice of the Peace, &c. — the office of Sheriffs, &c. and other law tracts, besides “of the Surveying of Lands” — and the book of husbandry, &c.

FITZHERBERT, Thomas, grandson to fir Anthony, was born in Staffordshire 1552, and educated at Oxford, either at Exeter, or Lincoln college. As he was a zealous catholic, he left the university without a degree, and retired to privacy, but on account of his bigoted principles, and his attachment to the jesuits Campian and Parsons, he exposed himself to difficulties, and fled as a voluntary exile to France 1582. He afterwards went to Madrid, and Milan, and at last entered into the society of Jesus, at Rome 1614. He was afterwards at Brussels, and for 22 years presided over the English college at Rome, where he died 1640, aged 88, and was buried in the college chapel. He was a man of great learning, and he wrote several books, on controversial subjects, against Barlow, Downe, Andrews and other divines. His treatise concerning policy and religion, in three parts, was much admired by papists and protestants.

FITZHERBERT, Nicholas, grandson to fir Anthony, and cousin to Thomas, was born 1550, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1572, he went abroad as a voluntary exile, on account of his religious principles, and settled at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome, in the house of William Alan, the English cardinal. He was unfortunately drowned in a journey from Rome 1612. He wrote Casæ Galatæi de Bonis Moribus, 1595 — Oxonienfis in Angliâ Academiæ Descriptio 1602 — de Antiquitate & Continuatione Catholicæ Religionis, in Angliâ, 1608 — Cardinalis Alani Vitæ Epitome, 1608.

FITZJAMES, James, duke of Berwick, natural son of the duke of York, afterwards James II. by Arabella Churchill, sister to the duke of Marlborough, was born at Moulins 1671. He was early inured to the labors of a military life, and was wounded at Buda 1686, and signalized himself at the defeat of the Turks at Mohatz, and afterwards in Ireland at the siege of Londonderry, and at the battle of the Boyne. In 1703, he headed the French troops in Spain, reduced the rebels in the Cevennes, and in 1705 took Nice, and for his services was made marshal of France by the king. He gained the famous victory at Almanza, over the English and Portuguese, under Galloway 1707; and thus secured the Spanish crown, on the head of Philip V. He was killed at the head of the French army, by a cannon ball, at the siege of Philipsburg, in Germany 1734. He was a man of a benevolent character, generally poor from the great sacrifices which he made to support the emigrants in his father's cause. Montesquieu has drawn up his character, and 2 vols. of his memoirs have been published, 12mo. by Margon.

FITZ-STEPHEN, William, a monk of Canterbury, of Norman extraction. He was present at the murder of Becket, of which he wrote an account. His description of London in that account is very curious, and is the oldest extant. He died 1191.

FIXMILLNER, Placidus, a native of Linz, in Austria, who early studied mathematics, at Strasburg, under Stuard, and afterwards embraced a monastic life, and was ecclesiastical professor for 40 years at Kremsmunster. He directed also his attention to celestial observations, and published some ingenious works on astronomical subjects, besides tracts on the canon law, and on ecclesiastical affairs. He died 1791, aged 71.

FIZES, Anthony, a famous physician of Montpellier, who died there 1765, aged 75. His works are esteemed. Opera Medica, 4to. 1742 — Leçons de Chymie, 1750. — Tractatus de Febris, 12mo. 1749. — Tractatus de Physiologia, 12mo. 1750. and dissertations.

FLACCOUR, F. de, directing general of the French East-India company, was also at the head of a colony in Madagascar, in 1648, which he was obliged to quit. On his return to France, he published an account of the island, in one vol. 4to.

FLACCUS, Gaius Valerius, a Latin poet, in the age of Vespasian, author of the Argonautica.

FLACIUS, or FRANOWITZ, Matthias, Vid. FRANOWITZ.

FLAMEEL, Bertholet, an historical painter of Liege, who died 1675, aged 61. He improved himself in Italy, and was noticed at Florence, by the grand duke. Some of his pieces, adorn the churches of Paris and of Liege.

FLAMEL, Nicolas, a notary of Paris, born at Pontoise. He suddenly rose from poverty to extensive opulence, and gave rise to a report that he had discovered the philosopher's stone. His riches, however, were nobly used in the relief of indigence, and in the erection of hospitals. It is supposed that his riches arose from successful speculations in commerce, at that time little known. He was living in 1399, and Lucas amused his readers by declaring that he had seen him in India after his decease. Some works on Alchymy have been attributed to him.

FLAMINIO, Giovani Antonio, an orator, poet, and historian of Bologna, author of the lives of Albertus Magnus, of St. Dominic, &c. He died 1536, aged 72.

FLAMINIO, Marc Antonio, son of the preceding, born at Imola. He was patronised by cardinal Farnese, who appointed him his secretary at the council of Trent, an office which his infirmities prevented him to execute. He died at Rome 1550, aged 57. His letters and epigrams appeared 1561, 8vo. — and his paraphrase of 30 psalms 1558. His latinity is very pure. He was learned, and his other writings are much esteemed.

FLAMINIUS, or FLAMININUS, Titus Quintus, a Roman consul, celebrated for his defeat of Philip of Macedon, B. C. 198, and his restoration of the liberties of Greece. He prevailed upon Prusias to deliver up Annibal.

FLAMINIUS, Nobilis, an Italian, eminent as a divine, and as a critic. He wrote a treatise on Predestination, corrected the Vulgate edition of the Septuagint, and died at Lucca, 1590.

FLAMSTEED, John, an able astronomer, born at Derby, Aug. 19th 1646. He was educated in his native town, but a severe distemper prevented the designs of his parents, in sending him to the university, and when he left school in 1662, he saw for the first time, an astronomical book, Sacrobosco's de Sphæra. This fixed deeply his attention, and directed all his thoughts to astronomical subjects. He not only constructed dials, but by the help of Street's Caroline tables, he calculated very accurately an eclipse, which was to happen 22d June 1666, and so ingenious did this appear, that the calculation was shown to Mr. Halton, a gentleman of property and mathematical knowledge in the neighbourhood, who applauded the young astronomer, and supplied him with fresh books, for his studies. In 1669, he communicated his calculations of the eclipses of the fixed stars, by the moon, to the royal society, and received the thanks of that body, by the hands of its secretary Oldenburg, and one of its members Collins. In 1670 his father, who had hitherto viewed his studies with jealous dissatisfaction, pleased with his correspondence with learned men, advised him to go to London, which he willingly did to visit his friends Collins and Oldenburg. At Cambridge he became acquainted with Barrow, Wroe, and Newton, and he now entered at Jesus college, at that university, where he continued his astronomical studies with increasing zeal. In 1673-4, he wrote his Ephemeris, to show the folly of astrology, to which he added tables of the moon's rising and setting, and at the request of his friend sir Jonas Moore, he compiled an account of the tides, and constructed a barometer, for the use of the king. On taking his master's degree at Cambridge, he wished to take orders, but his friend sir Jonas dissuaded him, and procured him the place of astronomer royal, with a salary of 100l. a year. This however did not prevent Flamsteed's purpose, he was ordained by bishop Gunning, and when in 1675, the first stone was laid for the building of Greenwich observatory, he lodged at the queen's house there, and observed the appulses of the moon and planets to the fixed stars, and in 1681, published the doctrine of the Sphere, in sir Jonas Moore's posthumous work of a new System of Mathematics in 4to. In 1684, he obtained the living of Burlow in Surrey, the only preferment he ever held, but though his genius entitled him to higher emoluments, his benevolent heart was satisfied with moderate competence, more pleased in the pursuit of his favorite studies, and in the friendship of such men as Newton, Halley, Molineux, Wallis, Ca-si, Wotton, Keil, &c. than in the possession of unbounded opulence. This great and illustrious character died of a strangury, 31st Dec. 1712, and thus though of a very feeble constitution lived more than 73 years. He was married but left no children. His Historia Cœlestis Britannica, of which the best part was printed before his death, was published by his widow 1725, in 3 vols. fol. and dedicated to the king. His papers, as he himself tells us in his preface, had been examined by the direction of George, prince of Denmark, by Roberts, Newton, Gregory, Arbuthnot, Wren and others, and, under this high recommendation, were afterwards presented to the public.

FLANDRIN, Peter, a native of Lyons, who studied the veterinary art under his uncle professor Chabert, and acquired some celebrity in the knowledge of comparative anatomy. He visited England and Spain in search of information about the management of cattle and the improvement of wools, and published an interesting treatise on the subject. He wrote besides various memoirs, and was made member of the national institute. He died 1796.

FLASSANS, Taraudet de, a Provençal poet of the 14th century, born at Flassans. He wrote a poem called Lessons to avoid the Treacheries of Love, for which he was rewarded by de Ponteves, with a piece of land. He was employed by queen Joan to make a remonstrance to the emperor Charles IV. which he ably executed.

FLATMAN, Thomas, an English poet, born in Aldersgate street, London, 1633, and educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He left the university without a degree, and became barrister of the Inner Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. He now turned author, and wrote several light poems, one of which, on the death of lord Ossory, was read by the father, the duke of Ormond, with such gratification that he sent the author a mourning ring, with a diamond in it, worth 100l. In his younger days Flatman expressed his abhorrence to the marriage state by a song, beginning with these lines:

Like a dog with a bottle tied close to his tail, and when, as Wood says, he was afterwards smitten with a fair virgin, and more with her fortune, he espoused her in 1672, and on his wedding night his jovial companions serenaded him with his favorite song. He died in Fleet-street, London, 1688. He was an indifferent poet; but, says Granger, succeeded better as a painter, as one of his heads is worth a ream of his Pindarics. His poems, third edition, were printed 1682, in one vol. 8vo.

Like a tory in a bog, or a thief in a jail, &c.

FLAVEL, John, an English divine, born in Worcester-shire, and educated at University college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. He was ejected from his living at Dartmouth, in 1662, for nonconformity, and retired to Hudscott, near South Molton. He returned to his living on the indulgence granted by Charles II. and died there 1692. He wrote Navigation and Husbandry spiritualized, &c. His works, which are respectable, were published 2 vols. fol. and 6 vols. 8vo.

FLAVIAN, a patriarch of Antioch, where he died 404.

FLAVIAN, a patriarch of Constantinople after Proclus 447. He condemned the Eutychian heresy in a synod, for which, by the opposite faction, he was deposed, scourged, and banished to Lydia, where he died in consequence of the ill treatment which he had received.

FLAVIGNI, Valerian de, doctor of the Sorbonne, canon of Rheims, and Hebrew professor of the royal college, was born at Laon, and died at Paris 1674, very old. He assisted in the polyglott of le Jay, and was a violent polemic.

FLAVITAS, patriarch of Constantinople after Acaësius. Zeno the emperor was so superstitious as to suppose that an angel would come down to inscribe the name of the new prelate on a piece of paper which he left on the altar; but Flavitas, by bribing the chamberlain, inserted his own name, and was made bishop; but died three months after, and the artifice being, in consequence, discovered, cost the guilty chamberlain his life.

FLAUST, John Baptist, an advocate of the parliament of Rouen. He was fifty years employed in the composition of his Explication of the Jurisprudence Usage of Normandy, 2 vols. folio. He died 1783, aged 72.

FLECHIER, Esprit, a celebrated French prelate, born 1632, at Perne, near Avignon. He distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and became known as an elegant scholar, by his poetical description of a carousal in pure latinity. His funeral orations were much admired, especially that on Turenne, and that on Montausier, which raised him to the same rank of reputation with the well known Bossuet. In 1679 he wrote his History of Theodosius the Great, and in 1685 he was honorably promoted to the see of Lavaur, on which occasion the king said, Be not surprised I have so long delayed to reward your merit; I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses. In 1687 he was translated to Nîmes, where, as a preacher and a bishop, he was successful in drawing many of the protestants to the catholic faith. In the famine of 1709 his charity and benevolence were unbounded. This most virtuous and exemplary man died 1710, lamented, says d'Alembert, by the catholics, regretted by the protestants, having exhibited to his brethren an excellent model of zeal and charity, simplicity and eloquence. His works are Œuvres Mêlées — Panegyric of Saints — Funeral Orations — sermons, 3 vols. 12mo. — the History of Theodosius — Gratiani de Casibus Illustr. Vir. — the Life of Ximenes, 4to. — letters, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Life of Cardinal Comendón, 4to. — posthumous works. Those who compare Bossuet with Flechier observe, that the former has less elegance but greater strength, and that the style of his rival is more flowing, finished, and uniform. Bossuet owes all to nature, Flechier much to art.

FLECKNOE, Richard, an English poet, formerly, it is said, a jesuit. At the revolution, when Dryden was dismissed, as being a catholic, from the office of laureat, Flecknoe was appointed as his successor, which so exasperated the bard, that he vented his in-digination in a severe satirical poem called, from his humble antagonist, Mac Flecknoe. He wrote some plays, one only of which was acted. His Damoiselles A-la-mode, and his Love's Kingdom were both hissed off the stage. He wrote besides enigmas and epigrams, besides the "Diarium," in burlesque verse. The time of his death is unknown.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English lawyer, recorder of London in Elizabeth's reign, was natural son of Mr. Fleetwood of Hesketh, Lancashire. He was educated at Oxford, and studied the law in the Middle Temple, and soon distinguished himself by his abilities. He was made recorder of London 1569, and showed himself very active against mass-houses, and popish priests. In 1580 he was made serjeant at law, and in 1592 serjeant to the queen. He died 1593, and was buried at Great Missenden, Bucks, where he had an estate. He was married, and had some children who survived him. He was an eloquent orator, says Wood, and his skill as a politician recommended him much to the notice of Leicester. He published an oration at Guild-hall before the lord mayor — a table to Plowden's Reports — the Office of a Justice of the Peace, 1658 — Annalium tam Regum Edwardi V. Richardi III. Henrici VII. quam Henrici VIII. — Titulorum Ordine Alphabet & Elenchus 1579 and 1597.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English prelate, descended from the Lancashire Fleetwoods, and born in the tower of London 1st Jan. 1656. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, and on taking orders, became an eloquent preacher. He was made chaplain to king William, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Eton, and the rectory of St. Austin's, London. He was installed canon of Windsor 1702, but in 1705, he quitted the tumults of the town, and, much to the concern of large audiences, who attended his eloquent and persuasive discourses, he retired to the privacy of Wexham rectory, in Bucks. In 1706, without any solicitation on his part, or that of his friends, he was nominated to succeed Beveridge in the see of St. Asaph, and in 1714 he was translated to Ely. He died at Tottenham, in Middlesex, where he had retired for change of air, 4th Aug. 1723, and he was buried in Ely cathedral, where his lady, who soon followed him to the grave, erected a monument over him. His only son, Dr. Charles Fleetwood, rector of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, did not long survive him. Bishop Fleetwood's character was respectable in every point of view. Admired as a preacher, he made an exemplary life, and a benevolent heart, the noblest ornaments of his persuasive eloquence in the pulpit. As a bishop he was beloved by his clergy, and did not arrogantly assume that superiority over them which conscious merit disdains, but illiberal pride asserts. As a writer he was highly respected, his sermons and divinity tracts were widely circulated; but the firmness of his opinions, however, drew upon him the censure of the house of Commons. His preface to his sermons, on the deaths of Mary, of the duke of Gloucester, and of William, and on the accession of Anne, gave such offence to the ministry that the book was burned publicly, 12th May 1712; but it was more universally read, and even appeared in the Spectator, No. 384. Besides these, Fleet-

Wood published Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge, 8vo. 1691 — a translation of Jurieu's Method of Devotion, 1692, the 27th edition of which appeared 1750 — an Essay on Miracles, 8vo. 1701 — the Reasonable Communicant, 1704 — Sixteen Practical Discourses on the Relative Duties of Parents, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 1705 — the Thirteenth of Romans vindicated, 1710 — the Judgment of the Church of England in Lay Baptism and Dissenters' Baptism, 1712 — the Life of St. Wenefrede, 1713 — Chronicon Preciosum, or Account of English Money, Price of Corn and other Commodities for the last 600 Years, 1707, besides smaller works.

FLEMING, Robert, a North Briton, born at Bathens, 1630. He was educated at St. Andrew's, and at the age of 33 became pastor of a congregation, from which office he was ejected after the restoration. He then settled at Rotterdam, in Holland, as minister of the Scots' congregation there, and died 25th July 1694. His "Fulfilling of the Scriptures," has been a popular work among the dissenters.

FLEMING, Robert, son of the preceding, was a native of Scotland, and educated at Leyden and Utrecht. He settled at Leyden as minister, and then removed to Amsterdam, from whence he came to London, and officiated at the Scotch church, Lothbury, and at Salters' hall. He wrote, among other things, sermons — tracts — Christology, 3 vols. 8vo. — the Rise and Fall of Popery, of which it is said that many passages are particularly applicable to the first events of the French revolution. He died 1716.

FLEMING, Caleb, a native of Nottingham, pastor of a dissenting congregation in London, and in 1752, called to be assistant to Dr. Forster at Pinners' hall. He wrote a Survey of the Search after Souls, and other tracts, and in his tenets he was a strict Arian. He died 1773, aged 75.

FLEMMING, or FLEMMYNGE, Richard, a native of Crofton, Yorkshire, educated at University college, Oxford, and made prebendary of York 1408. He was, in 1442, made bishop of Lincoln, and went as deputy to the council of Constance. The pope raised him to York; but as the king refused his consent he continued bishop of Lincoln till his death, 1431. He was founder of Lincoln college, Oxford, and was a strenuous opposer of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he afterwards as warmly embraced. To his disgrace he was instrumental, however, in digging up the bones of that bold reformer, according to the impotent resolutions of the Constance council.

FLESSELLES, N. de, a French magistrate, respectable for his loyalty, and the mildness of his manners. He attempted in vain to repress the tumults which preceded the revolution; but on the 14th of July 1789 his benevolent and patriotic interference proved fatal at the taking of the Bastille. He received a shot from a pistol, and his head, being cut off, was carried on a pike in triumph through the streets.

FLETCHER, Dr. Richard, father of the dramatic poet, was born in Kent, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was made dean of Peterborough 1583, and three years after attended the Scotch Mary's execution, where he displayed more zeal than good sense in pressing that unfortunate queen to turn protestant. In 1589 he was advanced to the see of Bristol, in 1592 translated to Worcester, and 1594 to London. After the death of his wife he took a second, lady Baker, a woman of great beauty, about 1595, and this so offended Elizabeth, who was averse to the marriage of the clergy, especially of bishops, that she caused Whitgift to suspend him. Though afterwards restored to favor, the queen's conduct sat heavily upon him, and he died suddenly in his chair 1696. As he was fond of tobacco, then little known, Camden imputes his death to an immoderate use of it.

FLETCHER, Giles, brother to the bishop, was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL. D. 1581. His abilities were employed by queen Elizabeth, as commissioner in Scotland, Germany, and the Low Countries, and in 1588, he was sent as ambassador to Russia, to reconcile the Russians to the English commerce, and to efface the disadvantageous impressions which the jealousy of the Dutch and other powers had excited. On his return he was made secretary to the city of London, and in 1597 treasurer of St. Paul's. He died 1610. He wrote a curious account "of the Russian Commonwealth," with a description of the fashions and manners of the people, 1590, 8vo. The book was suppressed, but appeared in Hakluyt's collection, 1643.

FLETCHER, John, a dramatic writer, son of the bishop of London, was born in Northamptonshire 1576. He was educated at Cambridge, probably Benet college, and distinguished himself as a writer of plays conjointly with Beaumont. He also assisted Ben Jonson in his "Widow," and after Beaumont's death he consulted Shirley in the formation of the plots of his pieces. The respective share of these joint authors is not known, though it is said that Beaumont's judgment corrected the redundancies of Fletcher's wit. Once at a tavern the brother bards debated upon the plot of a tragedy, and Fletcher being overheard by the waiter to say that he would kill the king, he and his friend were both seized for high treason, till explanations proved to the magistrate that the intended murder was the innocent sacrifice of a theatrical hero. Fletcher died of the plague in London 1625, and was buried in St. Mary Overy's church, Southwark. Fletcher was ranked with Jonson and Spakepeare, in the great triumvirate of chief dramatic authors, by Edward Philips, and Dryden says that his plays, as possessing gaiety in the comic parts, and pathos in the more serious characters, were acted more frequently than those of Jonson or Shakespear. Now, though they possess great merit, the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher are little regarded, and seldom appear on the stage. The plays of the poet amounting to above 50, were first edited together, 1679, folio, and lately by Colman, 10 vols. 8vo. 1778.

FLETCHER, Phinehas, a poet, son of Giles Fletcher. He was educated at Eton, and elected to King's college, Cambridge 1600. He was made minister of Hilgay in Norfolk, 1621, by sir Henry Willoughby, and died there about 1650. He is known as the author of "Purple Island," a poem containing an allegorical description of man, and very popular at the time of its publication. He wrote besides "Piscatory Eclogues," which were published at Edinburgh 1772, and the Purple Island, with Giles's "Christ's Victory," 1783 London.

FLETCHER, Giles, brother of Phineas, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B. D. He died at his living of Alderton, Suffolk 1623, equally beloved, says Wood, of the muses and graces. His "Christ's Victory," was first published 1610, and again 1640, and it is a poem of some merit, as the personifications are very natural, and the language dignified.

FLETCHER, Andrew, son of sir Robert Fletcher, of Saltoun, Scotland, was born 1653. He was educated under bishop Burnet, and when in parliament he so strongly opposed the measures of the court that he was obliged to leave the country and go to Holland. He landed in the West of England with Monmouth 1685, and afterwards fought against the Turks in the Hungarian army. The revolution restored him to his country, and he became a commissioner to settle the government of Scotland. He died in London 1716. His works which are all on political subjects, and in the bold style of theory, appeared together in 1 vol. 8vo. 1732.

FLETCHER, Abraham, a native of Little Broughton, Cumberland, brought up under his father as a tobacco pipe manufacturer. From this humble occupation, by severe application, he raised himself to public notice, and though self taught in reading and in writing, he so improved himself that he became at the age of 30 a teacher of mathematics; and as astrologer and universal doctor, he acquired a fortune of 3000l. His Universal Measurer, 8vo. is a work of great merit, and exhibits in the most favorable view his perfect knowledge of mathematics. He died 1793, aged 79.

FLEURY, Claude, a French advocate, born at Paris 1640. After being at the bar nine years he took orders, and in 1672 became preceptor to the prince of Conti, and in 1680 to the count de Vermandois. Under Fenelon he was subpreceptor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and for his services he was made abbot of Locdieu, which he resigned in 1706, for the rich priory of Angenteuil. In 1716 he was confessor to Lewis XV. and died 1723, aged 82, greatly respected for his learning and virtues. His works are numerous, the chief of which are, Manners of the Israelites—Manners of the Christians—Ecclesiastical History, in 13 vols. 4to. a valuable book—Institution of Ecclesiastical Law—a treatise on the Choice and Method of Studies—Duties of Masters and Servants—treatise on Public Law, 2 vols. 12mo.

FLEURY, Julian, the learned editor of the Delphin Apuleius, in 2 vols. 4to. He began Ausonius, but did not complete it.

FLEURY, André Hercule de, a famous cardinal, born at Lodeve in Languedoc 1653, and educated at Paris. Recommended by abilities, and by a pleasing address, and handsome figure, he rose from canon of Montpellier to be bishop of Frejus, and was appointed by Lewis XIV. preceptor to his grandson, after Bossuet and Fenelon. In 1726 he was made cardinal and prime minister though aged 70, and so active was his conduct, and sagacious his measures, that the kingdom of France prospered greatly under his administration, the succession war was gloriously finished, and Lorraine added to the French dominions. His economy, however, neglected and ruined the marine, and in the war of 1740, his plans were not crowned with victory, so that it is said, he died with a heart broken with grief, 1743. Without the pride of Richelieu, and the avarice of Mazarine, he possessed great abilities, and though the misfortunes of the last war were attributed to him, he rather deserved the gratitude of the nation for his prudent management of the finances, and more for the benevolence of his heart.

FLINK, Godfrey, a Dutch painter, pupil of Rembrandt. He died 1660, aged 44. He imitated his master in the execution of his pieces, but afterwards studied the Italian manner.

FLIPART, John James, a French engraver, who died at Paris 11th July, 1782, aged 67. He possessed great merit, and in private life was an amiable man.

FLOQUET, Stephen Joseph, a musician of eminence, was born at Aix in Provence, and died at Paris 1785, aged 35. His operas were received with the most flattering applause on the French stage.

FLOBOARD, or FROBOARD, a French historian of Eprenai. He was an ecclesiastic in the church of Rheims, where he wrote a Chronicle from 916 to 966—and a History of his Church from its Foundation to 949. The best edition is that of 1617. He wrote also poetry, and died 966, aged 73.

FLOGEL, Charles Frederic, author of a History of the Human Understanding—History of Comic Literature—Present State of the Belles Lettres in Germany, &c. in German, was professor of philosophy in the college of noblemen at Leignitz, where he died 1788, aged 59.

FLOOD, Henry, an Irish orator, son of the chief justice of the king's bench in Ireland. He was educated at Dublin university, and at Oxford, where he was honored with the degree of M. A. 1752. He sat in the Irish house of commons for Kilkenny, and afterwards for Callan, and he acquired great popularity by his eloquence and the measures which he proposed, but his consequence ceased when he obtained a seat among the English commons, and his addresses on subjects of reform and on public occasions were received with little interest. He died 1791. He wrote a Pindaric Ode to Fame—a Poem on the Death of Frederic Prince of Wales, found in the Oxford collection, and some of his speeches have also appeared in print. His property after the death of his wife is bequeathed to Dublin university for the foundation of a professorship, and for enriching the public library by the purchase of MSS. &c.

FLORENTINO, Stephano, an historical painter of Florence, who studied under Giotto, and died 1350, aged 49.

FLORIAN, John Peter Claris de, a native of Languedoc, educated under the care of his relation Voltaire, by whose influence he obtained the office of page to the duke of Penthièvre. Though honored by his patron, patron, and promoted in the army, he preferred literary reputation to all other objects, and published in 1782 his first work Galathée, a romance. He wrote afterwards Theatre, Voltaire et le Serf de Jura, which obtained the prize of the French academy — Estelle — Numa Pompilius, &c. During the revolution his sentiments expressed in Numa drew upon him the resentment of Robespierre, who imprisoned him, but after the tyrant's death he was liberated, and died at Seaux, 13th Sep. 1794, aged 39. He began during his confinement a poem on William Tell, which was never completed. He wrote also Ebrahim, a poem, &c.

FLORIMOND DE REMOND, a native of Guienne, counsellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux. He opposed warmly the Calvinists, and wrote on Antichrist — the Origin of the Heresies, &c. and died 1602.

FLORIO, John, the Resolute, as he styled himself, was born in London in the reign of Henry VIII. His parents who were Waldenses, and descended from the Florii of Sienna in Tuscany, had fled from the persecutions of popery in the Valteline, and settled finally in England under Elizabeth after a short absence during Mary's bigoted reign. Florio taught Italian and French in the university of Oxford, and was admitted at Magdalen college. He was tutor in those languages to prince Henry, and to Anne the queen of James I. to whom he was clerk of the closet. He died of the plague at Fulham 1625, aged 80. Of his works the principal are, "first Fruits and second Fruits," containing proverbs and witty sentences — Garden of Recreation — a translation of Montaigne's Essays — and an Italian and English Dictionary, fol. 1597, a work of merit. He married the sister of Sam. Daniel, the poet.

FLORIS, Francis, a painter of Antwerp, born 1520. He was like his father a sculptor till the age of 20, and then he studied painting under Lambert Lombard, and by imitating Angelo he acquired celebrity and opulence. He worked seven hours each day, and devoted the rest of the time to drinking. He died at the age of 50. He was called the Raphael of Flanders.

FLORUS, Lucius Annaeus, a Latin historian, related to Seneca and Lucan. He wrote an abridgment of the Roman history, 116 A. D.

FLORUS, surnamed Master, a deacon of Lyons in the 9th century, author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistle — an Answer to Erigena, on predestination, and other works.

FLOYER, sir John, a native of Hinters, Staffordshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his medical degrees. He afterwards settled as a respectable practitioner at Lichfield and was knighted. He wrote the Touchstone of Medicines, 2 vols. 8vo. — the Virtues of Cold Water, 8vo. and died 1720, aged 71.

FLUDD, Robert, an English philosopher, son of sir Thomas Fludd, knight, born at Milgate, Kent, 1574. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and after taking his degrees in arts applied to physic and travelled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, to improve himself. He took his degrees in medicine 1605, and settled in London, and became fellow of the college of physicians. He began to publish about 1616, and was a voluminous writer, chiefly on the powers and wonders of Alchymy, and the Rosicrucian doctrines. His works are in Latin, and written in an obscure and mysterious language. They amount to about 20, and are all mentioned in Wood's Athenæ. Two of his productions were against Kepler and Merfennus, and they were answered by those great philosophers.

FOES, or FOESIUS, Annius, a learned physician, born at Metz 1528. He was well skilled in Greek and Latin, and translated the works of Hippocrates into Latin, as also the commentaries of Galen. His abilities are praised by Huetius. He practised physic at Lorraine with reputation, and died 1596.

FOGLIETA, or FOLIETA, Uberto, a learned Genoese priest, banished from his country on account of the freedom of his writings. Cardinal d'Este, at Rome, became his patron, and he died there 1581, aged 63. He wrote Historia Genuensium, 12 libr. fol. 1585 — de Ratione Scribendæ Historiæ Elogia Clarorum Ligurum, 4to. — de Causis Magnitudinis Turcarum Imperii — Della Republica di Genoa, 8vo. &c.

FOHI, the first king of China, and the founder of the monarchy about 20 years after the deluge. He removed the seat of empire from Xen Si, to Chin Cheu, and he invented instruments of music, and established proper laws respecting marriage, instead of the prevalent promiscuous intercourse of the sexes. It is said that he reigned 115 years, but fable is strongly intermixed with his history. His memory is still revered by the Chinese.

FOINARD, Frederic Maurice, a native of Conches in Normandy, who was eminent as a Hebrew scholar, and became vice-principal of the college of du Pleffis. He published Breviarium Ecclesiasticarum, 2 vols. 8vo. — Genesis Explained, French and Latin, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Psalms in Historical Order, &c. and died 1743.

FOIX, Mark Anthony, a jesuit, eminent as a preacher. He died provincial of the college of Billon, Auvergne, 1687, aged 60. He published the Art of Preaching — the Art of Educating a Prince, 12mo. &c.

FOIX, Odel de, lord of Lautrec, a French general of eminence. He was wounded under Lewis XII. at the battle of Ravenna 1512, and appointed governor of Milan by Francis I. The success of Colonna, however, soon after drove him from Milan, Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia, and after the unfortunate battle of Bicoque he retired to Guienne 1522. In 1528 he re-entered Italy, took Pavia, and boldly besieged Naples, before which he died. His body was conveyed to Spain, and 20 years after buried in the tomb of the great Gonsalvo of Cordova.

FOLARD, Charles, a French officer, born at Avignon 1669. His military genius was roused by the reading of Cæsar's commentaries, and at the age of 16 he became a soldier. His father confined him in a monastery, but he escaped, and still more attached to the army, became aid-de-camp to Vendome who commanded in Italy, 1702, and entrusted him with part of his forces. He was honored for his services with the cross of St. Lewis, and had a pension of 400 livres settled on him. In 1705 he was wounded at the battle of Cassano, and in consequence lost the use of his left hand. In 1706 he defended Modena against prince Eugene, by whom he was taken prisoner some time after the battle of Blenheim. In 1711 he was made governor of Bourbourg, in 1714 he assisted in the defence of Malta against the Turks, and afterwards went into the service of Charles XII. of Sweden. He accompanied him in his invasion of Norway, and was present at his death, at the siege of Frederickshall 1718. On his return to France he served as colonel under the duke of Berwick, and afterwards applied himself to the study of the military art. He died at Avignon 1752, aged 83. He wrote some valuable commentaries on Polybius, in 6 vols. 4to. a book of new discoveries in war—a treatise Concerning the Defence of Places. Though not an accomplished writer, yet his publications show great knowledge of the military art.

FOLENGO, Theophilus, known by the assumed name of Merlin Cocayne, was of a noble family in Mantua. He fled from Bologna, and for some time was in the military profession, which he quitted for the society of the Benedictines in St. Euphemia monastery. He died 1544, aged 51, at the priory of St. Croce, Bassano. The best known of his works are “Opus Macaronicum,” 1651, a popular work—Orlandino, 1526, and Chaos del Triperuno, two licentious poems—on the three Ages of Man, 1527,—le Humanita del Figlio di Dio, 1533.

FOLENGO, John Baptist, a Benedictine monk of Mantua, who died at Treviso, 1559, aged 69. He was author of Commentaries on the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and the first of St. John, 1555, 8vo.—a Commentary on the Psalms, 1557, folio. &c.

FOLKES, Martin, an English antiquary and philosopher, born at Westminster 1690. He was of the Royal society, London, and became its president after sir Hans Sloane 1741. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and was a great connoisseur of old and modern coins. He died in London 1754. Bowyer's anecdotes contain an ample account of him. He wrote a 4to. volume of English Silver Coin, from the Conquest to his own time.

FONCEMAGNE, Stephen Laurent de, a native of Orleans, who died at Paris 26th Sept. 1779, aged 83. He was first preceptor to the duke of Chartres, and is known for some memoirs in the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member.

FONSECA, Anthony de, a Dominican of Lisbon educated at Paris, where he published remarks on Cajetan's Commentaries on the Bible, 1539. He was preacher to the king, and theological professor at the university of Coimbra.

FONSECA, Peter, a Portuguese writer, author of a system of metaphysics in 4 vols. folio. He died 1559.

FONT, Joseph de la, a French comic writer, author of five comedies and some operas. He died 1725, aged 39, hurried to his grave by his intemperance and love of pleasure.

FONT, Pierre de la, a French divine who died 1699. He wrote “Entretiens Ecclesiastiques” 5 vols. 12mo. and 4 vols. of sermons.

FONTAINE, John de la, a celebrated French poet, born at Chateau-Thierry, 8th July, 1621. After a liberal education he was admitted at 19 among the fathers of the oratory, whom he soon left, but he displayed no genius for poetry till the age of 22, when the accidental hearing of Malherbe's odes on the assassination of Henry roused his powers into a flame. He read with eagerness the best poets of Greece, and Rome, of Italy, and of his country, and in the writings of Plato and Plutarch, collected all that morality which has enriched and beautified his fables. He married to please his parents, but though he had shown such partialities to his wife as to entrust her in confidence with his compositions, he left her soon with indifference to follow his patroness the duchess of Bouillon to Paris. Here he procured a pension and became gentleman to Henrietta of England, after whose death he was received into the house of the witty Madam de la Sabliere, who jocosely observed in parting with her household, she kept only three animals, her dog, her cat, and her la Fontaine. In the company of this learned lady he continued about 20 years, not, however, without paying annually formal visits to his neglected wife, and upon the death of his patroness he refused the invitations of St. Evremont, and others, to come to settle in England. He was attacked by a severe illness in 1692, and then began to think of death and of religion, at the representation of the priest who attended him. The holy monitor reminded him that his tales had an evil tendency, and were frequently licentious, and hostile to good morals, and la Fontaine at last acknowledged the imputation, and promised amendment. Though not a libertine he was most indifferent to religious truths, and he informed the priest with great composure that he had the new Testament which he thought a tolerable good book. He died 13th April, 1695, and it is said he was found with an hair shirt on, a proof of sincere repentance according to some. In his character la Fontaine was a very absent man, who, in the indulgence of his reveries and poetical ideas, would often say the most unbecoming things, and do the most incoherent actions. Meeting one day his son, without knowing him, he observed that he was a youth of parts and spirit, and when informed it was his own son, he replied with unconcern, I am really glad of it. In the company of some wits and of some eminent ecclesiastics, he asked if St. Austin had more wit than Rabelais. One of the divines eying him from top to toe, answered only by observing, that “he had put on one of his stockings the wrong side outward,” which was the case. In consequence of his great merit, it is said the intendant forbade taxes to be levied on his family, an honorable mark of respect paid to genius. He wrote besides “Tales,”—fables—comedies—Amours de Psyche, a romance—letters, &c. all of which possess great originality. Four vols. of his miscellanies appeared at Paris 1744.

FONTAINE, Nicholas, son of a scrivener, admitted at the age of 20 among the society of port Royal, where he had afterwards the superintendence of the pupils. In 1664 he was confined for four years in the bastille with Sacy, and at last finally settled at Melun where he died 1709, aged 84. He wrote “Lives of the Saints of the Old Testament" 4 vols. 8vo. — Lives of Saints in General, 4 vols. 8vo. — the Figurative Language of the Bible, 4to. — Memoirs of the Solitaries of Port-Royal, 2 vols. 12mo. — Chrysostom's Homilies on St. Paul's epistles, translated 7 vols. 8vo. For private worth, for learning, and piety, and for indefatigable and patient industry, Fontaine not only equalled but surpassed his contemporaries.

FONTAINES, Peter Francis Guyot des, a French critic, born at Rouen 1685. He took the habit of a jesuit at 15, and quitted the society at 30. For some time a priest, he became a man of wit, and in 1724, he was entrusted by Bignon with the care of the "Journal des Savans." The severity of his censures drew upon him the accusation of an abominable crime from his enemies, but, after some confinement, his character was cleared up and re-established. In 1731, he began the "Nouvelles du Parnasse, ou Reflexions sur les Ouvrages Nouveaux," of which he wrote 2 vols., till the work was suppressed for the severity of its contents. In 1735, he began "Observations sur les Ecrits Modernes," which, after 33 vols. were completed, was also suppressed 1743. The next year another periodical paper, "Jugemens sur les Ouvrages Nouveaux," was undertaken; but after 11 vols. had appeared, death stopped the labors of the critic 1745. He published translations of Virgil and other classics, besides those of Pope, Swift, Fielding and others.

FONTANA, Dominico, a Roman architect and mechanic, born at Milan 1543. His chief work was the setting up of the obelisk, in front of St. Peter's, which had been buried for many years, and considered as an impracticable thing by all other mechanics. He was deservedly commended and rewarded for the bold and successful execution of this, and in 1592, he removed to Naples as an architect to the king, and died there greatly respected 1607.

FONTANA, Prospero, a painter, born at Bologna 1512. He was an able artist, and had among his pupils Ludovico and Annibal Caracci.

FONTANA, Lavinia, daughter of the preceding, died 1602, aged 50. She was eminent as a painter, and was patronized by pope Gregory XIII., whose picture she drew in a very superior style.

FONTANGES, Marie Angelique, duchess of, successor to de Montespan in the good graces of Louis XIV., was beautiful as an angel, but silly as a goose says abbé Choisi. She died in child-bed, June 1681, aged only 20.

FONTANINI, Juste, archbishop of Ancyra, was born in the Frioul, and died at Rome 1736. His chief works are Bibliotheca Della Eloquenza Italiana, 2 vols. 4to. 1753 — a Literary History of Aquileia, 1742 — a collection of Bulls of Canonization from John XV. to Benedict XIII.

FONTE-MODERATA, a Venetian lady, whose real name was Modesta Pozzo. She was born at Venice 1555, and though placed at first in a monastery, she married, and, after 20 years of conjugal happiness, died in child-bed 1592. Her memory was so retentive that she could repeat verbatim a discourse when only once heard. She wrote a poem called "il Floridoro," and another on the Passion and Resurrection of Christ, besides "Dei Meriti Delle Donne," a prose work in which she maintains that the female sex is not inferior in understanding to the male.

FONTENAY, Peter Claude, a learned jesuit, born at Paris. He was engaged to continue Longueval's History of the Gallican Church, and died 1742.

FONTENAY, John Baptist Blain de, a French painter, disciple of Monoyer, born at Caen 1654. His fruits and flowers are very fine, and the insects on them have the appearance of real life. He was patronized by Louis XIV., who granted him a pension, and apartments in the Louvre. He died at Paris 1715.

FONTENELLE, Bernard le Bovier de, son of an advocate in the parliament of Rouen, by a sister of the great dramatic Corneille, was born at Rouen, 11th Feb. 1657. Though so weak at his birth that his surviving was unexpected, he attained the age of 100, never troubled with attacks of disease till his 90th year, when his eyes became dim and his hearing dull. He died Jan. 1757. He displayed early proofs of genius, and before he had reached his 20th year he had written a great part of his Bellerophon, a tragic opera. He did not, however, shine as a dramatic writer equal to his uncle Corneille, but in his other pieces he exhibits great powers, delicacy of wit, and profoundness of thought, so that Voltaire has truly observed that he was the most universal genius which the age of Louis XIV. produced. His "Plurality of Worlds" is a most fascinating performance, in which he introduces a lady conveying the sublimer truths of philosophy in a dialogue, pleasing, lively, and refined. In his office of secretary to the academy of sciences, in which he continued more than 40 years, he devoted himself to the "History" of that learned body, and introduced elegance of language into the most abstruse parts of science. The "Eloges" delivered on deceased members are perused with particular attention and delight, and his apology for Descartes' virtues, though in favor of an exploded system, must be read with interest and admiration due to a great but mistaken genius. No man more than Fontenelle deserved and enjoyed the respect and confidence of his contemporaries. In his temper he was mild and affable, and with the feelings of a true christian he observed that a man should be sparing in superfluities to himself, that he may supply necessities to others. Though originally poor, he acquired, by industry and commendable economy, an independent fortune; but not despising the rest of the world for his superiority of mental talents and of riches he said that men are foolish and wicked, but such as they are we must live among them. He wrote besides the works already mentioned, Pastoral Poems 1688 — History of the French Theatre to Corneille — Reflections on Theatrical Poetry, particularly Tragedy, a judicious and valuable work — Elements of Geometry — of Infinities, 1727 — a tragedy, and six comedies — Endymion — Moral Discourses — the History of Oracles — Dialogues of the Dead, &c. His works have been published at Paris in 8 vols. large 8vo. His Eloge was pronounced by le Cat.

FONTENU, Lewis Francis de, a French writer, born at Lilledon, in Gatinois 1657. He was a great antiquarian, and contributed much to the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. A list of his works is preserved ed in Saxius' Onomasticon 1714. He died 1759, aged 92.

FONTIUS, Bartholomew, an historian of Florence, intimate with Picus Mirandula, and other learned men. He was librarian to Matthew Corvinus king of Hungary at Buda, and died 1513, aged 68. He wrote a commentary on Persius, and some orations.

FOOTE, Samuel, a dramatic writer, called the English Aristophanes, was born at Truro, Cornwall, 1722. His father was commissioner of the prize office, and member for Tiverton, and his mother inherited the paternal estates of her family by the unfortunate quarrel of her two brothers, sir John Dinely Goodere bart. and sir Samuel Goodere, captain of the Ruby man of war, in which both unhappily fell. He was at Worcester college, Oxford, and then removed to the Temple, but the law was too dry and abstruse a pursuit for his volatile temper, and he therefore went on the stage. He appeared first in Othello, but his success in performing the character of other writers did not please him, and he commenced author and actor in the Hay-market, where in 1747, he first appeared before the public in "the Diversions of the Morning." This entertaining piece at first opposed by the Westminster justices, as representing characters in real life, was altered to "Mr. Foote's giving Tea to his Friends" and thus for upwards of 40 mornings drew crowded and applauding audiences. The next year presented "an Auction of Pictures" which met with equal approbation, though it reflected on the popular characters of the day, on sir Thomas de Veil the justice, Cock the auctioneer, and Henley the orator. From 1752, to 1761, his success continued uninterrupted by the introduction of new pieces, and the versatility with which he himself represented various characters, and the little theatre Hay-market was now considered as the regular summer theatre, after the close of the other two. In 1766, he had the misfortune while at lord Mexborough's to break his leg by a fall from his horse, and to suffer an amputation, but the accident so interested the duke of York who was present, that in consequence of his influence, a patent was obtained that year for the little theatre. In 1776, his attempt to introduce on the stage the duchess of Kingston, a lady whose conduct was then much canvassed before the public, not only proved abortive, but brought upon him the malicious accusation of unnatural practices. Though acquitted of this foul charge, yet the blow he felt from the imputation weakened his constitution, and brought on a paralytic fit. He recovered, but the following year as he proceeded to France by the advice of his physicians, he was taken ill and died a few hours after at Dover, 20th Oct. 1777. In his private character Foote was respectable, and the wit and humor of his conversation were very powerful. Dr. Johnson, as Boswell relates, met him for the first time at Fitzherbert's. Having no good opinion of the fellow, says he, I was resolved not to be pleased, and it is very difficult to please a man against his will. I went on eating my dinner, pretty fully affecting not to mind him, but the dog was so very comical, that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork, throw myself back in my chair, and fairly laugh it out. Sir, he was irresistible. His dramas are 20 in number, mostly built on temporary topics, and full of personalities. He borrowed liberally from Moliere, but made all his own by his own peculiar powers of humor and originality. His works have been collected and published in 4 vols. 8vo. His life has been published with entertaining anecdotes by Mr. Cooke.

FOPPENS, John Francis, professor of divinity at Louvain, and archdeacon of Mechlin, edited Miræus' Opera Historica Diplomatica, and compiled Bibliotheca Belgica, 2 vols. 4to. from the labors of learned Belgians, and other works, and died 1761, aged 72.

FORBES, Patrick, a Scotch prelate, of a noble family, born in Aberdeenshire 1564. He was educated at Aberdeen and St. Andrew's, and being ordained presbyter at the age of 28, he was, in 1618, raised to the see of Aberdeen, much against his will, but at the pressing solicitations of king James. This great and good man died 1635, aged 71. His Commentary on the Revelations appeared London 1613. He was a great benefactor to Aberdeen university of which he was chancellor, and he revived the professorship of law, physic, and divinity.

FORBES, John, son of the preceding, was made bishop of Aberdeen, by king James. He was expelled from the divinity professorship at Aberdeen by the covenanters, and after two years' residence in Holland, he returned to his native country and ended his days at his estate at Corrie 1648. He was a very learned man, as his theological and historical institutions fully evince. His works were published at Amsterdam 2 vols. fol. 1703.

FORBES, William, bishop of Edinburgh, was born at Aberdeen 1585, and educated there. After studying at Leyden, and in the universities of Germany, he came to England, where he rejected the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, that he might re-establish his health by returning to the air of his native country. He was highly esteemed by his countrymen, and as his health would not permit his frequent preaching, he was appointed principal of the Marischal-college Aberdeen. On the foundation of the see of Edinburgh by Charles I., Dr. Forbes was honorably placed by the monarch to fill it, but he enjoyed his dignity only three months, and died 1634. He was a man of extensive learning, but was very moderate in his opinions and pacific in his temper, as his treatise to diminish controversies printed London 1658, and re-printed at Frankfort 1707, fully proves.

FORBES, Duncan, a Scotch judge, born at Culloden 1685. He studied at Edinburgh, Utrecht, and Paris, and on his return to Scotland 1710, practised as an advocate. In 1722, he was elected member for Invernesshire, and 1725 was made lord advocate. In 1742, he was raised to be lord president of the court of sessions, and, in the rebellion of 1745, he nobly opposed the pretender, but the refusal of government to refund what he had lost by his liberal support of the royal cause, proved so disagreeable to his feelings, that it produced a fever of which he died 1747, aged 62. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and wrote Thoughts on Religion, — a Letter to a bishop on Hutchinson's writings, — Reflections on Incredulity, 2 vols. 12mo 1750.

FORBIN, Claude Chevalier de, a French naval officer, born in 1656. He was early brought up to the sea service, and in 1686 became chief admiral to the king of Siam in the East-Indies. He afterwards distinguished himself in Europe, on the coast of Spain, and in the service of Lewis XIV. The king was pleased with his valor, and the disinterestedness, and generosity of his character, but though favored by the prince, he was neglected by the ministers, and therefore he retired in discontent from the service 1710. He died 1733, aged 77. His maxims to persons in the sea service, were two, never to interfere with any thing not belonging to their employment, and to pay a blind obedience to the orders they received, however repugnant to their private opinions.

FORFISHER, Vid. FROBISHER.

FORBONNAIS, Francis Veron de, inspector general of the manufactures of France, was born at Mans, 2d Oct. 1722, and died at Paris at the end of 1800. He was well acquainted with commerce, and the real resources of a kingdom, and he published various intelligent tracts on subjects of finance, politics, and mercantile concerns.

FORCE, Charlotte Rose de Caumont de la, a French poetess, who died 1724, aged 70. Her Castle in Spain, a poem — her secret History of Burgundy, a romance — her tales, and other works, possess merit.

FORCE, James duke de la, son of Francis, lord of la Force, who, with his eldest son Arnaud, was murdered in his bed, on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew. He was then nine years old, and was between his father and his brother in the bed, but being unperceived by the assassins, he escaped with his life, a circumstance which Voltaire has recorded in the 2d canto of his Henriade. He fought under Henry IV. and espoused the side of the protestants, against Lewis XIII. especially at Montauban 1621. He soon after made his peace with the king, upon which he was created marshal of France, a duke, lieutenant general of the army of Piedmont, besides a present of 200,000 crowns. He afterwards took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carignan 1630. He was afterwards engaged in the German wars, and took Spire, after raising the siege of Philippsburg. He died full of years and of glory 1652, aged 89.

FORD, John, a dramatic poet, in the reigns of James, and Charles I. He was of the middle Temple, but the time of his death is unknown. He wrote 12 plays published between 1629, and 1636.

FORDUN, John de, a Scotch historian, who flourished about 1377. He wrote a history of his country called Scoti-Chronicon, a curious but not accurate performance, published by Hearne at Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo. and by Goodall, fol. Edinburgh.

FORDYCE, David, a learned Scotsman, born at Aberdeen 1720, where he was educated, and where he became professor of moral philosophy, in the marischal college. He travelled through France and Italy, and other parts of Europe, and was drowned on his return, in a storm on the coast of Holland 1751. He wrote Dialogues concerning Education, 2 vols. 8vo. — treatise of Moral Philosophy — Theodorus, a dialogue concerning the Art of Preaching — the Temple of Virtue, a dream, &c.

FORDYCE, James, a Scotch divine, brother to the above, born at Aberdeen, and educated there. He was minister of Brechin, and afterwards of Alloa, and in 1762, he removed to Monkwell street, London, where he was assistant, and then successor to Dr. Lawrence. He afterwards settled in Hampshire, and died at Bath 1796, in his 77th year. He is author of Sermons to young Women, 2 vols. — Addresses to young Men, 2 vols. — Addresses to the Deity — a sermon on the Eloquence of the Pulpit — poems — single sermons, &c.

FORDYCE, George, nephew of the preceding, was born near Aberdeen, and educated in that university, where at the age of 14 he took his degree of M. A. After some residence with his uncle, who was an apothecary and surgeon at Uppingham, Rutlandshire, he went to Edinburgh, and to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree 1758. He settled the following year in London, where he distinguished himself as a lecturer on the Materia Medica, and the practice of physic, and in 1770 he became physician to St. Thomas's hospital, and six years after a fellow of the Royal society. He was, in 1787, made a fellow of the college of physicians speciali gratia, an unusual honor, and he died 1802, aged 66. His works are essays on Fevers — on Digestion — Elements of the Practice of Physic — Elements of Agriculture, and Vegetation, &c.

FORDYCE, sir William, a Scotch physician, of great repute, who died in London 1792.

FOREIRO, Francis, a Dominican monk, born at Lisbon, and sent, by the king of Portugal, to the council of Trent, where he was in consequence of his abilities invited to draw up a general catechism. He published, with a commentary, a translation of Isaiah's prophecy, Venice 1562, and died at Lisbon, 1581.

FOREST, Peter, or FORESTUS, a Dutch physician, born at Alcmæer 1522. He studied physic in Italy, and died medical professor at Leyden 1597. The most known of his works is "Observations on Medicine" 6 vols. fol. Frankfort 1623.

FOREST, John, a French landscape painter, born at Paris, where he died 1712, aged 76. He was painter to the French king, and in his manner imitated Titian, Giorgione, and the Bassans.

FOREST, or FORESTA, James Philip, known by the name of Philip Bergamo, the place of his birth, was an Augustine monk, and wrote a chronicle from Adam to the year 1503, a work not very valuable. He wrote a Confessional, fol. Venice 1487 — and a treatise of Illustrious Women, fol. 1497, Ferrara.

FORMEY, John Henry Samuel, a native of Berlin, minister of the French church there, and afterwards professor of philosophy in the French college, and then secretary to the royal Berlin academy of sciences, and privy counsellor. He died 1797, aged 86. He was author of Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History — History of Philosophy abridged, both translated into English — Researches on the Elements of Matter — Considerations on Cicero's Tusculanum — the Christian Philosopher — Pensées Raisonnables — Anti- ti-Emile against Rousseau, and other works, and he conducted, with Beaufobre, the Bibliotheque Germanique.

FORMOSUS, bishop of Porto, near Rome, succeeded Stephen V. as pope, 891. He was very unpopular in his government, and after death his body was dragged from his grave by the populace, and thrown into the Tiber.

FORSKAL, Peter, a Swedish naturalist, who studied at Gottingen and at Upsal, under Linnæus. He went, in 1761, with Niebuhr to Arabia, and died there at Jerim 1763, aged 27. He was author of Thoughts on Civil Liberty, 1759, and from his papers Niebuhr published Icones Rerum Naturalium quas in Itinere Orientali depingi curavit Forskal, 4to. — Descriptiones Animalium & Equarum, &c. 4to. — Flora Egyptiaco-Arabica, 4to.

FORSTER, John, a protestant Hebraist of Wittenburg, born at Augsburg 1495. He was the friend of Luther, Reuchlin, and Melancthon, and died 1556. He published a Hebrew Lexicon 1564, folio, Bale. Another person of the same name published Commentaries on Isaiah, and other works.

FORSTER, George, an ingenious naturalist, who accompanied Cook in his second voyage round the world. He was professor in the university of Cassel, and afterwards at Wilna and Mayence. He next visited Paris, to enable himself to travel to Thibet; but died in the midst of his preparations, 1792, aged 39. He was then representative of Mentz in the national assembly. He wrote a tract on the English Constitution — a Journal of Cook's second Voyage, 2 vols. 4to. which he defended against Wales — a Philosophical Journey along the Rhine, 2 vols. 8vo. — a Journey through England, 1790.

FORSTER, Dr. John Reinold, father to the above, studied at Halle, and was minister at Dantzic, and after being some time in Russia he came to England, and was tutor in German and French in Warrington academy. He accompanied Cook in his second voyage, and after his return, in 1775, he was created L.L.D. by the university of Oxford. He lost his public character in England, for publishing, contrary to agreement, an account of the plants discovered in his voyage, in consequence of which he left the country for Germany. He died at Halle, in Saxony, 1799. He is author of Observations made round the World — History of Discoveries in the North — treatises on the Byssus of the Ancients, and other valuable tracts on natural history.

FORSTER, Nathanael, a native of Plymstock, Devonshire, educated at Plymouth and Eton school, and afterwards at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became fellow. He obtained Hethe rectory, Oxfordshire, and in 1750 was chaplain to Butler, of Durham, who made him his executor. He was, in 1752, chaplain to Herring the primate, and two years after obtained a prebend in Bristol cathedral, and Rochdale vicarage, Lancashire. In 1756 he was chaplain to the king, and then preacher to the Rolls. He died 1757, aged 40. He published Platonis Dialogi quinque, &c. 1745 — Reflections on the Antiquity of Egypt — Appendix Liviana, 1746 —

Popery destructive of the Evidence of Christianity, a sermon — Dissertation on Josephus' Account of our Saviour — Biblia Hebraica, sine Punctis, 4to. — on the Marriage of Minors, 8vo. &c.

FORSTNER, Christoph, an Austrian lawyer, who died 1667, aged 69. After travelling in Italy he was engaged in the negotiations of the peace of Munster, and for his services he was made a member of the Aulic council. He wrote De Principatu Tiberii Notæ Politicæ ad Tacitum — collection of his letters on the Peace of Munster — Hypomnemata-Politica, &c.

FORT, Francis le, a native of Geneva, who, from military zeal, served in Holland at the age of 16, and afterwards entered into the army of Peter I. of Russia. He gained the favor of that prince, and was entrusted, in 1696, with the siege of Azof, and in this arduous affair he displayed such abilities that the emperor made him commander of his forces, and his prime minister. The resources of his great genius were employed in new-modelling the army, and improving the affairs of his imperial patron. He died at Moscow 1699, and the Czar, afflicted for his loss, paid the last honors to his remains, with the most magnificent obsequies.

FORTESCUE, John, an English lawyer, born of an ancient family at Wear Gifford, in Devonshire. He was, according to Tanner, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn. In 1441 he was made king's serjeant at law, and the next year chief justice of the king's bench. His integrity, wisdom, and firmness recommended him to Henry VI. by whom his salary was raised; but his attachment to the house of Lancaster proved the source of persecution. In the first parliament of Edward IV. he was attainted of high treason, and he followed his exiled master into Scotland, where he was nominated chancellor of England. He embarked for Holland in 1463, with queen Margaret, and continued several years in exile in Lorraine. In this foreign country he employed himself in the composition of his book "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," written for the instruction of young prince Edward; but not published till the reign of Henry VIII. He afterwards accompanied the queen back to England; but their affairs became more desperate, and with greater love of ease, perhaps, than attachment to his master, he reconciled himself to the reigning monarch by writing an apology for his own conduct, and passed the rest of his life in retirement and solitude. The year of his death is unknown, though he lived to nearly his 90th year, and was buried in the church of Ebrington, Gloucestershire, where, in 1677, one of his descendants repaired his monument. He wrote besides, "the Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy, &c." published by J. Fortescue Aland, 1714, besides other works remaining in MS. The best edition of his book "De Laudibus," is that of 1741. His character was very respectable for piety, learning, and benevolence, and, as attached to his country, none deserves a better name.

FORTIGUERRA, Nicolas, an Italian prelate and poet, born 1674. He was made a bishop by Clement XI.; but he was so often disappointed by Clement XII., who as the patron of poets, had promised him a cardinal's hat, hat, that he fell ill in consequence, and died 1735, aged 61. He wrote "Ricciardetto," a burlesque poem in 30 cantos, in a short time, to prove to some of his friends the ease with which he could write in the manner of Ariosto. This poem, though very faulty, exhibits fallies of pleasantry and strokes of genius. It has been translated into French by du Mourrier. Fortiguerra translated Terence into Italian 1736.

FORTIUS, or FORTIS, Joachim, a teacher of Greek and of mathematics at Antwerp, intimate with Erasmus, and other learned men. He died 1536. He wrote "De Ratione Studendi," and other works.

FOSCARI, Francis, a noble Venetian, elected doge 1423. He enlarged the Venetian dominions by the conquest of Brescia and Bergamo, and the towns of Crema and Ravenna, and other places; but these victories cost so dear that the Venetians loudly murmured, and deposed their unfortunate leader. His son shared also his disgrace, and was banished under false accusations, and the wretched father died two days after his deposition, 1457, aged 84. The son also soon after died in prison, upon the false charge of murdering a senator.

FOSCARINI, Michael, a Venetian senator and historian. He continued Nani's History of Venice, at the public request, and died 1692, aged 64. His work was printed 1692, 4to. and makes the 10th vol. of Venetian historians. He also wrote novels.

FOSSE, Charles de la, a French painter, pupil to Le Brun, born at Paris 1640. He studied in Italy, and at his return he painted the dome of the hotel of Invalids. Lewis XIV. gave him a pension of 1000 crowns, and he became professor and rector of the academy for painting. He was for some time engaged in adorning the duke of Montague's house, now the British museum in London, and received a handsome offer from king William, who admired his genius, and wished him to settle in England; but he declined. He died at Paris 1716.

FOSSE, Antony de la, nephew to the above, was born at Paris 1658. He was lord of Aubigny, by the purchase of the estate which bears that title, and he was secretary to the marquis de Crequi. When his patron was killed at the battle of Luzara, he brought back his heart to Paris, and celebrated his fall in poetry. He was afterwards in the service of the duke d'Aumont; but he distinguished himself chiefly by his tragedies. His Manlius, which is his best play, is considered by the French as equal to the tragedies of Corneille; but he is less known than he deserves. This amiable poet died in the retirement and modest solitude which he loved, 1708, aged 50.

FOSTER, Samuel, an English mathematician, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. 1623. He was elected in 1636, to the professorship of astronomy in Gresham college, which he resigned the same year, and to which he was again elected in 1641. During the civil wars he formed one of that society of learned men who united for philosophical purposes, and were afterwards incorporated under the name of the Royal Society by Charles II. He not only applied himself to astronomy, and to curious and intelligent observations on eclipses and on celestial bodies, but he constructed and improved with great ingenuity, several mathematical and astronomical instruments. He died at Gresham college, of a decline, 1652. The chief of his works are "the Art of Dialling," 4to. 1638 — four treatises of Dialling, 4to. 1654 — Miscellanies or Mathematical Lucubrations — descriptions of several Instruments invented and improved. There were two other mathematicians of the name of Foster in the same century; William, a disciple of Oughtred, and author of the Circles of Proportion, and the Horizontal Instrument, 1633, 4to. and Mark, who published a treatise of Trigonometry.

FOSTER, James, a dissenting minister, born 16th Sep. 1697, at Exeter, at the grammar school and in an academy of which place, he was educated. With great abilities, a sound judgment, and a ready elocution, he began to preach 1718, but the warm disputes which prevailed in the west of England, and especially Exeter about the trinity, rendered his situation in Devonshire unpleasant, and he removed to Melborne, Somersetshire, and soon after to Ashwick. He published in 1720 his "Essay on Fundamentals," and his sermon "on the Resurrection of Christ;" but his finances were so low, and his hopes of improving his income so uncertain, that he almost determined to learn the trade of glover from Mr. Norman, in whose house he lived at Trowbridge in Wilts, after his removal from Somersetshire. He was, however, soon after received as chaplain in the family of Rob. Houlton, esq. and in 1724 he was chosen to succeed, at Barbican, Dr. Gale, a person by whose book on adult immersion he had been persuaded to be baptized. In 1731 he published his Defence of the Usefulness, Truth, &c. of Christian Revelation against Tindal, and in 1744, after 20 years' service at Barbican, he was chosen pastor of the independents at Pinners hall, and in 1748 received the degree of D. D. from the university of Aberdeen. He attended lord Kilmarnock after his trial in 1746, and died in consequence of a paralytic stroke, 5th Nov. 1753. His character for humanity and benevolence of heart was equal to his learning, popular as a preacher, and liberal in his religious sentiments. He wrote besides the above, "Traacts on Heresy," in a controversy with Dr. Stebbing — 4 vols. of sermons, 8vo. — 2 vols. of Discourses on Natural Religion, and Social Virtue, 4to. Bolingbroke attributes to him that false aphorism, "that where mystery begins, religion ends." Pope has mentioned him with commendation in the preface to his satires.

FOSTER, John, an elegant scholar, born at Windsor 1731, and educated at Eton college, where under the able tuition of Plumtree and Burton, he distinguished himself as a superior proficient in the Greek and Hebrew languages. In 1748 he was elected to King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards became assistant to Dr. Barnard, whom he succeeded in 1765, in the mastership of Eton college. But though eminent in learning, and great in mental powers, he was deficient in manners, in temper, and in a perfect knowledge of the world, which are so necessary for such a situation, and which were possessed in a high degree by his predecessor Barnard, so that his authority became unpopular, and he at last resigned. His merits, however, were rewarded by a canonry at Windfor in 1772, but his infirmities were encreasing so rapidly, that he did not enjoy his honors long. He went to the German Spa for the recovery of his health, and died there Sep. 1773. His remains were afterwards brought over to England, and buried at Windfor near those of his father who had been mayor of the town, and over his tomb is an elegant Latin inscription written by himself. He wrote besides a prize dissertation on the doctrines of Epicurus, and the Stoics, Cambridge — an Essay on the Different Nature of Accents and Quantity, with their Use and Application in the Pronunciation of the English, Latin, and Greek Tongues, with the Defence of the Greek Accentual Marks, against J. Vossius, Sarpedonius, Dr. Galy, &c. 8vo. 1762. It is a curious and valuable performance.

FOSTER, Michael, a learned judge, born at Marlborough, Wilts. He was educated at Marlborough school, and Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1707 entered at the Middle Temple. In 1737 he was elected recorder of Bristol, and in 1745 he was made one of the justices of the king's bench, and then knighted. He died 1765, aged 74. He published an Examination of the Scheme of Church Power, laid down in bishop Gibson's Codex, 1735 — Report of some Proceedings on the Commission for the Trial of Rebels in 1746 in the county of Surrey, 1762.

FOTHERGILL, George, D. D. eldest of seven sons, was born the last day of the year 1705, at Lockholme, Westmoreland, of an ancient family. He was educated there, and at Kendal school, and then removed to Queen's college, Oxford, where he became fellow and tutor. In 1751 he was made head of St. Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hampshire. He died of an asthma, 5th Oct. 1760, and was buried in the chapel of his hall. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons.

FOTHERGILL, John, an eminent physician, born 8th March, 1712, at Carr-end, Yorkshire, of respectable quakers. He was educated at Sedburgh school, Yorkshire, and in 1718 bound apprentice to an apothecary at Bradford. In 1736 he removed to London, and studied two years under Wilmot at St. Thomas's hospital, and then went to Edinburgh, where he took his doctor's degree. He afterwards visited Leyden, and travelled through France and Germany, and in 1740 settled in London. He was a licentiate of the college of physicians London, and fellow of Edinburgh, and of the royal and antiquarian societies. He continued to rise in fame and practice, so that his business brought him little less than 7000l. per ann. and enabled him to accumulate a property of 80,000l. He died of an obstruction in the bladder, at his house Harpur street, 26th Dec. 1780, and his remains were interred in the quakers' burying ground Winchmore hill. Besides his medical engagements, he devoted much of his time to natural history, and made a collection of shells and other natural curiosities, which were sold after his death to Dr. Hunter for 1200l. He formed an excellent botanical garden at his house at Upton in Essex, and he liberally endowed a seminary of young quakers at Acworth near Leeds, for the education and clothing of above 300 children. He published some tracts, the best of which is "on the Ulcerous Sore Throat," and was a great patron of learned men. He assisted Sydney Parkinson in his account of his South sea voyage, and at the expence of 2000l. printed a translation of the bible from the Hebrew and Greek original, by Anthony Purver the quaker, 2 vols. fol. 1764, and in 1780 published Percy's Key to the New Testament, for the use of his seminary. His books were sold by auction in 1781, and his portraits and prints were bought for 200 guineas by Mr. Thane.

FOTHERGILL, Samuel, brother to the preceding, was eminent as a preacher among the quakers. He travelled over England, Scotland, Ireland, and North America to propagate his doctrines, and died 1773, much respected for his private character.

FOUCAULT, Nicolas Joseph, an antiquary born at Paris 1643. He was intendant in Normandy, and within six miles of Caen, he discovered in 1704 the ancient town of the Viducassians, of which he published an interesting account, with the history of the marbles, coins, inscriptions, &c. found there. He discovered in the abbey of Moissac in Querci a MS. of Lactantius de Mortibus Persecutorum, afterwards published by Balue. He died 1721, respected for his erudition, his mildness of manners, and his benevolence.

FOUCHER, Simon, a native of Dijon, who died at Paris 1696, aged 52. He was author of a treatise on Hygrometers — on the Wisdom of the Antients — Letters on the History and Principles of the Academic Philosophy, 6 vols. &c.

FOUCHIER, Bertram de, a Dutch painter of Bergen-op-Zoom, disciple to Vandyck. He studied the manner of Tintoretto at Rome, and adopted at his return home the stile of Brouwer. His portraits and conversations are much admired. He died 1674, aged 65.

FOUCQUET, Nicolas, marquis of Belle-Isle, was born 1615, and for his talents was early advanced in the state. He was at the age of 35 procurator-general of the parliament of Paris, and at 38 superintendant of the finances. His peculation and extravagance, however, were little calculated to repair the mismanagement of Mazarin, and when he had spent above 150,000l. of the public money in adorning his seat at Vaux, and attempted to rival his master in the affection of la Valliere, his ruin was complete. He was arrested in 1661, and condemned to perpetual banishment, exchanged afterwards for imprisonment. He died March 1680, aged 65, in the citadel of Pignerol.

FOUCQUET, Charles Lewis Augustus, grandson of the preceding, better known by the name of marshal Bellisle, was born 1684. He entered early into the army and distinguished himself at the siege of Lille, for which Lewis XIV. promised him his favor and protection. After that monarch's death, he shared the disgrace of the minister le Blanc, and was confined in the Bastille, till his modest justification recommended him to the court, and paved his way to promotion and honor. He was commander in Flanders in the war of 1733, and became the adviser and confidential friend of cardinal Fleury. In 1741 he was created marshal of France, and in 1742 he assisted at Frankfurt at the election of the emperor Charles VII. where his influence was equal to his great magnificence. Afterwards being deserted by the Prussians and Saxons, he he effected his escape with great difficulty from Prague, but with sagacious dexterity, so that he was created by the emperor member of the Golden Fleece, and a prince of the empire. He was taken prisoner in 1743 at Elbingerode near Hanover, and brought over to England. He afterwards served against the Austrians in Provence, and was made peer of France 1748. He was made prime minister 1757, and died four years after, a sacrifice to his zeal in the service of his country, and his anxiety to restore her finances and commerce to a prosperous course. He died Jan. 1761, aged 77. He was a great character, respected in private life, and much attached to the glory of his country. He was a patron of merit, and free from blame, except in his criminal partiality for the fair sex. His only son, born of a second wife, was killed in battle 1758.

FOUGEROUX, Augustus Denys, an eminent writer born at Paris 10th Oct. 1732. He was nephew of Duhamel, and with him he examined with a philosophic eye the quarries of Anjou, Britany, Naples, &c. and every where made judicious and valuable observations on the various productions of the natural kingdom. He died of an apoplexy 28th Dec. 1789. He wrote Memoir on the formation of Bone — l'Art de l'Ardoisier — l'Art du Tonnellier — l'Art de Travailler les Cuirs Dorés, &c.

FOUILLON, James, an ecclesiastic born at Rochelle, and though educated among the jesuits, a favorer of the Jansenists. He edited Arnauld's Letters, and had a share in the History of the Case of Conscience, 8 vols. 1705 — and in the Hexaples against the Bull Unigenitus, 7 vols. &c.

FOULON, William, in Latin Gnaphæus, was born at the Hague, where he kept a school. He wrote three Latin comedies, Martyrium Johannis Pistorii — Hypocrisis & Acolastus de Filio Prodigio, the most admired, edited with learned notes by Prateolus at Paris 1554. He died at Horden in Friesland, where he was burgomaster, 1558, aged 75.

FOULON, John, author of a Commentary on the Maccabees — Historia Leodienfis, 3 vols. folio, &c. was a jesuit of Liege who died 1668.

FOULON, N. a French politician who advised the government to recover its credit by a general bankruptcy. He was placed over the finances at the beginning of the revolution, but in the midst of the general confusion he became one of its first victims. He in vain attempted to conceal himself, when discovered 22d July, 1789, he was dragged with the greatest insult, and in the most execrating manner to Paris, where he was hanged amidst the acclamations of a rejoicing, and ferocious populace.

FOUNTAIN, fr Andrew, an antiquarian, born at Narford, Norfolk, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford. He studied here the Anglo-Saxon language, and published a specimen of his great proficiency in his instructor Hicckes' Thesaurus, under the title of Nunismata Anglo-Saxonica & Anglo-Danica, breviter Illustrata ab Andrea Fontaine, eq. aur. & ædis Christi Oxon. Alumno, 1705. He was knighted by king William, and afterwards travelled through Europe in making a collection of valuable pictures, medals, statues, and inscriptions. He was the intimate friend and correspondent of Swift, and he embellished his Tale of the Tub, with excellent designs. Sir Andrew, as a masterly connoisseur of medals and antiques, improved his property greatly by collecting for some of the largest cabinets in the kingdom. He was vice-chamberlain to Caroline, when princess of Wales and queen, and in 1727 was made warden of the mint, an office which he held till his death, 4th Sept. 1753. He was buried at Narford; a portrait of him by Hoare is preserved at Wilton-house. He is mentioned with great applause by Montfaucon.

FOUQUIER-TINVILLE, Anthony Quentin, a Frenchman of infamous memory, born at Herouan near St. Quentin. From a bankrupt, he became the friend of Robespierre, and so sanguinary was his conduct, and so ferocious his principles, that he was deemed by the tyrant, worthy to be the public accuser. In this office he displayed the most bloody and vindictive character. The young, the aged, the innocent, were hurried with insulting indifference to the scaffold, and in one instance, in four hours, 80 individuals were devoted to immediate death. When one of the goalers observed that a person brought up before the tribunal was not the accused, Fouquier observed with unconcern, that one was as good as the other, and the unhappy victim marched to the guillotine. On another occasion, under a similar mistake, he exclaimed, it matters little, to-day is as good as to-morrow, and the wretched prisoner suffered death. The fall of Robespierre checked not the hand of this monster, on the day of the tyrant's arrest, he observed, on signing the condemnation of 42 persons, that justice must have her course. At last punishment came though late, the vindictive Fouquier appeared before that tribunal where he had exercised such bloody tyranny, and on the 7th May 1794, he was guillotined, aged 48, and universally execrated.

FOUQUIERES, James, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, 1580. He was the disciple of Velvet Breughel, and painted for Rubens. He worked for the elector palatine at Heidelberg, and went to Paris where he died poor through imprudence 1659. His landscapes are so finely finished as to be scarce inferior to Titian's.

FOUR du. Vid. LONGUERUE.

FOURCROI, N., an eminent French engineer, who planned the junction of the rivers Scheldt, Moselle, Sambre, Oise, Rhine and Meuse, by means of canals. He published some valuable tracts, and died 12th Jan. 1791, aged 76.

FOURMONT, Stephen, professor of Arabic and Chinesse at Paris, was born at Herbelai near that city 1683. He devoted himself with unusual application to study, and had so retentive a memory that the most difficult passages became familiar to him. He was so well known as a man of erudition, that once or twice a week conferences were held at his house, on literary subjects, by learned Frenchmen and foreigners. He was liberally invited by count de Toledo to settle in Spain, which he declined. He succeeded Galland in 1715, as Arabic professor, and was admitted into the learned societies of Paris, Berlin, and London, and was afterwards secretary to the duke of Orleans his friend and patron. He died 1743. His works are "the Roots of the Latin Tongue Tongue in Metre" — Critical Reflections on Antient History, to the time of Cyrus, 2 vols. 4to. — Meditationes Sinicæ, folio — a Chinese Grammar in Latin, folio — Dissertation in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions.

FOURMONT, Michael, brother to the above, was an ecclesiastic and professor of Syriac in the Royal college, and member of the Academy of Inscriptions. He died 1746.

FOURNIER, Peter Simon, a French engraver and letter founder, born at Paris 1712. In 1737, he published a table of proportions to be observed between letters, to determine their height. He wrote also dissertations on the rise and progress of the typographical art, published since in 1 vol. 8vo. divided into three parts. His great work is "Manuel Typographique utile aux Gens de Lettres, & à ceux qui exercent les Differentes Parties de l'Art de l'Imprimerie, 8vo. 2 vols. This excellent character, who had done so much for his profession, died 1768.

FOURNY, Honoré Caille du, a learned Frenchman, who assisted pere Anselme in his second edition of Histoire Genealogique & Chronologique de la Maison de France & des Grands Officiers de la Couronne, 1712, since continued to 9 vols. fol. He was auditor of the Paris chamber of accounts, and died 1731.

FOURQUEVAUX, Raymond of Pavia, baron of, an Italian, of the family of Beccari in Pavia, who came to France in the wars of the Guelphs and Gibbelines, and signalized himself in the defence of Toulouse against the Huguenots in 1562. He was for his services made governor of Narbonne, where he died 1574, aged 66. He wrote the lives of 14 great French generals, 4to. Paris 1543, much esteemed.

FOWLER, John, an English printer, born at Bristol, and educated at Winchester and New-college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1555. He resigned in 1559; and went to Antwerp and Louvain, where he learned printing, and employed his talents for the papists against the protestants. He was according to Wood a learned man, well skilled in Greek and Latin, a poet and orator, and a judicious critic. He wrote, as well as printed, books in favor of his religion. He died at Newmark in Germany 1578.

FOWLER, Christopher, a puritan of some eminence, born at Marlborough 1611, and educated at Magdalen-college, and Edmund-hall, Oxford. He took orders, but in 1641, declared himself a presbyterian, and drew crowds after him by the oddity of his gestures and the violence of his appeals in the pulpit. He afterwards was vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, and then fellow of Eton, and an able assistant to the Berkshire commissioners in the ejection of what then were called ignorant and insufficient ministers. At the restoration he was ejected from his preferments, and died 1676, considered as little better than distracted. His writings are not worth mentioning.

FOWLER, Edward, an English prelate, born 1632, at Westerleigh, Gloucestershire, where his father was minister. He was educated at the college school Gloucester, and removed to Corpus Christi college, Oxford. As he had been brought up among the puritans, he at first objected to conformity with the church, but became afterwards one of its greatest ornaments. As he was an able preacher he was made by the primate Sheldon, rector of All-Hallows, Bread street 1673, and two years after he became prebendary at Gloucester, and in 1681 vicar of St. Giles' Cripplegate, when he took his degree of D. D. He was an able defender of protestantism, and appears as the second of the London clergy, who refused to read king James's declaration for liberty of conscience, in 1688. He was rewarded for his eminent services in the cause of religion, and in the promotion of the revolution, by being made in 1691, bishop of Gloucester. He died at Chelsea 1714, aged 82. He was twice married, and by his first wife had several children. He wrote sermons and various pieces on divinity, the most known and useful of which is his "Design of Christianity," often printed, and defended by the author against Bunyan, the writer of the Pilgrim's Progress.

FOX, Edward, an English prelate and statesman, born at Dursley, Gloucestershire, and educated at Eton, and King's college Cambridge, of which he became provost 1528. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Wolsey, by whom he was engaged as an ambassador to Rome with Gardiner, to promote the divorce of the king from Catharine of Arragon. He was afterwards sent on embassies to France and Germany, and in 1535 raised to the see of Hereford. He was an active promoter of the reformation, and if inferior to Cranmer in abilities, he was his superior in dexterity. When in Germany he zealously invited the protestant divines to unite themselves to the doctrines of the church of England. He died in London 1538. He wrote in the midst of his political engagements, a book called de Verâ Differentiâ Regiæ Potestatis et Ecclesiasticæ, et quæ sit ipsa Veritas, et Virtus utriusque 1534: translated into English by lord Strafford. His maxims were that "an honorable peace lasts long, but a dishonorable peace no longer, than till kings have power to break it; the surest way therefore to peace is a constant preparedness for war," and "two things must support a government, gold and iron,—gold to reward its friends, and iron to keep under its enemies."

FOX, John, an English divine, and ecclesiastical historian, born at Boston, Lincolnshire 1517. He was entered at Brazen nose college, Oxford, and afterwards chosen fellow of Magdalen, and in 1543, he became M. A. In his younger years he displayed poetical genius in the publication of some Latin plays on scriptural subjects, but he afterwards turned all his thoughts to divinity, and to the reformation which now engaged the attention of Europe. To acquire the judgment and information necessary on such important points, he read with great care the Greek and Latin fathers, studied Hebrew, and perused every work from which he could reap information; but his seclusion, and his frequent absence from public worship alarmed his friends and encouraged his enemies. He was therefore accused of heresy in 1545, and with difficulty escaped with his life by expulsion from college. In his distress, and abandoned by his father-in-law, he was generously received in the house of sir Thomas Lucy of Warwickshire, to whose children he became tutor. He afterwards married a person of Coventry, and after residing there some time, he came to London still exposed to the privations of a narrow income. His wants, however, says his son, were relieved by an unknown stranger, who gave him an untold sum of money and bade him hope for better times, which in three days arrived by his being admitted into the service of the duchess of Richmond, and made tutor to her nephew lord Surrey's children. He lived at Ryegate under the kind protection of this noble family, and though the persecuting Gardiner, in the bloody reign of Mary, plotted his ruin, he remained for some time unhurt by the influence and the dexterity of his worthy pupil now duke of Norfolk. At last, he escaped from the pursuit of the artful prelate to the continent with his wife, and passing through Antwerp and Frankfort he settled at Basil, and there maintained himself by correcting the press for the famous printer Oporinus. Here he formed the plan of his great work, and at the end of Mary's reign returned to England, where he was received with all the respect due to his merits. His pupil, the duke of Norfolk, settled a pension on him, and Cecil obtained for him a prebend in the church of Salisbury, but though he might have risen high in preferment by the interest of his friends Walsingham, Drake, Gresham, Grindal, Pilkington, &c. he refused to subscribe to some of the canons, and when urged by Parker the primate, he produced a Greek testament, adding, to this only will I subscribe. This worthy man, so much and so deservedly respected, was greatly afflicted at the ejection of his son from Magdalen college by the puritans; but while he exhibited the most perfect moderation in his religious sentiments, he dreaded the evils which party and dissension might bring upon the church. He died 1587, aged 70, and was buried in the church of St. Giles' Cripplegate, of which for some time he had been vicar. He left two sons, Samuel, afterwards fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, and author of his father's life, and Thomas, fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and physician in London. Fox is deservedly celebrated as the author of the history of the acts and monuments of the church, called "Book of Martyrs" published in London 1563, in one volume folio, and afterwards improved and enlarged, and published in a ninth edition 1684, in 3 vols. fol. This work was highly valued by the protestants, while the papists abused it under the name of Fox's golden legend. That Fox is occasionally intemperate and abusive cannot be denied, but though Jeremy Collier accuses him of dissingenuity and ill nature, he is still to be read with interest, as he is accurate, minute, and generally impartial.

Fox, George, the first preacher of the sect called quakers, was born at Drayton in the Clay, Leicestershire 1624. He was bound by his father, who was a weaver, to a shoemaker and grazier, and the occupation of his youth was chiefly the tending of sheep. He did not however follow the professions in which he had been engaged, as, in 1643, he began his wandering life, and after retiring to solitude, and at other times frequenting the company of religious and devout persons, he became a public preacher in 1647 or 1648. He inveighed, with fullen bitterness, against the drunkenness, the injustice, and the vices of the times, he attacked the clergy, and the established modes of worship, and asserted that the light of Christ, implanted in the human heart, was alone the means of salvation and the right qualification of the gospel ministry. Such doctrines produced persecution, he was imprisoned at Nottingham in 1649, and during the whole course of his laborious life, he suffered the same treatment eight times more, and often with great severity. He married in 1669, Margaret the widow of Thomas Fell, a Welsh judge, who was nine years older than himself, but as she had to attend to a family, by her former husband, and as his avocations were of a spiritual kind, and in distant countries, they did not long live together. In his pious zeal, Fox visited not only England, Ireland, and Scotland, but he extended his travels to Holland, and Germany, to the American colonies, and the West-India Islands, recommending in his life and conduct the merits of a meek, devout, and inoffensive character. He died in London, 1690. Though illiterate he wrote much. His journal was printed 1694, his epistles 1698, his doctrinal pieces about 150 in number, 1706. The name of quakers was first given to him and his followers at Derby, in consequence of the odd contortions of their body.

Fox, Richard, a native of Grantham, Lincolnshire. Though of obscure origin, he was well educated at Boston school, and Magdalen college, Oxford, from which he removed in consequence of the plague, to Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was by the friendship of Morton bishop of Ely, recommended at Paris, to the notice of Henry, earl of Richmond, who on his accession to the English throne, made him a privy counsellor, and raised him to the see of Exeter. His abilities were employed by the monarch in various embassies on the continent, and he was translated to the see of Durham, and then to Winchester. He was a liberal patron of learning, and founded besides several free schools, Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He died 1528.

Fox, Charles James, an eminent statesman, born 13th Jan. 1749. He was the second son of lord Holland, by the sister of the duke of Richmond, and to the accidental favors of high rank, and of titled relatives, he added the more solid advantages of extraordinary natural genius, and strong powers of mind. These promising talents were seen and cherished by his father, he was instructed to think with freedom, and to speak with readiness and with energy, and after a short initiation at Westminster school, he was removed to Eton, and during his residence in that illustrious seminary, he published the periodical paper called the Spendthrift, in 20 numbers. From Eton where he formed an encreasing friendship with some of the future leaders of the senate, he removed to Oxford, and then devoted himself so zealously to dramatic literature, that he is said to have read every play written in the English language. After making the usual tour of Europe, he was elected even before he was of age, into parliament for Midhurst, and his first speech was in favor of ministry, and against Mr. Wilkes, and the Middlesex election. After sharing the favors of the minister as a lord of the Admiralty, and afterwards as a lord of the Treasury, he was dismissed dismissed from his offices, and had the singular fortune before he reached his 24th year, of being the ablest supporter of the government during one session, and in the next of becoming one of its most eloquent and dangerous opponents. During the American war he was a regular, consistent, and active antagonist of the ministry, and on the removal of lord North he was raised to a seat in the cabinet as secretary of state. The death of lord Rockingham soon after dissolved the new ministry, and Mr. Fox after some time opposing the measures of lord Shelburne returned to power by his well known coalition with lord North. This event is regarded as an indelible stigma in the political life of Fox, who in the ardor of his zeal had often declared that he would not trust himself in the same room with lord North, but would employ all his powers to bring him to the scaffold for the flagitiousness of his pretended public crimes. So heterogeneous an union gave great offence to the people, and reflected little honor on the integrity of the two colleagues, and therefore the memorable India-bill proved fatal to their interests, and brought on their downfall. The French revolution was an event which Fox hailed as the harbinger of freedom, happiness, and prosperity, not only to France, but to neighbouring nations, but he lived to witness the fallacy of his rash conclusions. Deserted by some of his once faithful associates, who regarded his systematic opposition to the ministry as disloyal if not treacherous, he formed the design of withdrawing from his attendance in parliament, except on great and constitutional occasions, and the measure was deservedly censured, even by his warmest supporters. In his addresses at some of the public meetings at the Crown and Anchor tavern, which were now considered as substitutes for his parliamentary services, he gave offence to the ministry, and in consequence of his speeches, in which he affected to treat the sovereign with disrespect, his name was struck off from the list of the privy counsellors. In 1803, he returned to his parliamentary duty, and on the lamented death of his great rival Pitt, in the beginning of 1806, he was drawn from the ranks of opposition, and by the advice of lord Grenville, placed as secretary of state for foreign affairs, in the number of those who were most capable of guiding the destinies of the empire in times of the greatest danger and difficulty. In this new, and unexpected situation, he had the opportunity of witnessing the chicane and perfidy of the government, whose cause he had so long advocated in parliament, and in his negotiation with France he experienced how ill calculated for the happiness and independence of Europe, was the political system of that people, whose extravagances and crimes he had once regarded as the ebullitions of freemen, and as the forerunner of national forbearance, and of universal peace. Having thus lived to feel the disappointment which a generous mind must experience in a diplomatic intercourse conducted on one part with frankness and sincerity and on the other with artifice and duplicity, this illustrious statesman fell a prey to the insurmountable attacks of a dropsy. He died at Chifwick-house, 13th Sept. 1806, after undergoing three times in five weeks the painful operation of tapping, and his remains were publicly buried on the 10th Oct. following in Westminster abbey, Of this extraordinary character, it must be acknowledged that he was one of the greatest men this country ever produced. As an orator his powers were gigantic, his eloquence irresistible, vehement, and sublime. It was a torrent which in its impetuous force hurried along its hearers in spite of all opposition. His mind capacious and intelligent, at one view grasped the whole subject of debate, at one glance he saw the weak and the strong parts of his adversary's defence, and with masterly dexterity he combated the most formidable opponent, and improved every advantage which in the field of debate lay exposed to his attacks. If he was less copious, less elegant, and less intentionous than Pitt, if he was deficient in the dazzling and flowery profusion, in the lively sallies of imagination of his great master Burke, he possessed the pathos, the forcible argument, the convincing language, the imposing earnestness which captivated and enchained every hearer. With the most retentive memory, he has been known after the lapse of many hours, when the powers of the mind might grow languid, to answer the arguments of various speakers, and with the most minute arrangement. His manner, if not graceful, was peculiarly animated and impressive, and the fire of his eye was rapid and commanding. His replies always exhibited him as very great, and with all the ardor of genuine oratory he enlivened the debate, not only with new ideas, but with all the clearness of argumentation, and the extensive information with which his comprehensive mind was stored. In a profound acquaintance with the human character, and a mature knowledge of domestic and foreign politics, he was above all others supremely happy. In private life he was universally beloved. He was the convivial friend, the pleasing companion, the man of integrity and honor. He possessed in a high degree the talent which distinguishes man, and the genius which elevates him, nor was he deficient in a portion of that virtue which rises superior to both. His faults, as Burke observed, though they might tarnish the lustre, and sometimes impede the march, of his abilities, were not formed to extinguish the fire of great virtues. In his faults there was no mixture of deceit, of hypocrisy, of pride, of ferocity, or complexional despotism. That much of the popularity which he enjoyed arose from his opposition to his great rival Pitt, as well as from the vast extent of his own mighty powers, cannot be doubted. Though regarded for many years by his friends as the only man whose talents could support and confirm the tottering fabric of the state, it is remarkable that after all his determined and systematic opposition to his rival, he when in office pursued the same plan of politics, and from the champion of popular right, became the accommodating colleague, and the pliant imitator of his predecessor. As a man of letters, Mr. Fox is highly respectable. His letter to the electors of Westminster, passed through several editions, not only on account of the political situation of the times, but the abilities and the force of argument displayed in the address. Some copies of his verses are preserved and show great genius, and strong poetic fire. It was said that he was engaged in the composition of an History of England from the

Revolution

Revolution, and that he visited Paris during the short interval of peace, after the treaty of Amiens, to collect materials, but probably little, if any, progress was made in the work.

FOX DE MORZILLO, Sebastian, a native of Seville, author of tractus de Studiis Philosophici Ratione — de Naturâ Philosophorum, &c. He was invited to become the tutor of Don Carlos, son of Philip III. of Spain, but was unfortunately drowned as he passed from Louvain.

FRACASTORIO, Girolamo, an Italian poet and physician born at Verona 1483. Two singular things are related of him in his infancy. When born, his lips adhered so closely together, that the knife of a surgeon was necessary to separate them, and his mother when she took him up in her arms was killed by lightning, and he remained unhurt. He was a man of great parts and address. By his influence pope Paul III. removed the council of Trent to Bologna, on pretence of a contagious disease. He was also eminent as an astronomer and mathematician, and the intimate friend of cardinal Bembo, of Julius Scaliger who esteemed him inferior only to Virgil, and other learned men. He died of an apoplexy at Casti near Verona 1553, and six years after the town of Verona honored his memory with a statue. His chief poem is "Siphilis, or de Morbo Gallico" his medical pieces — de Sympathiâ & Antipathiâ — de Contagione & Contagiosis Morbis — de Causis Criticorum Dierum, &c. The works were printed collectively, the best edition that of Padua, 2 vols. 4to. 1735.

FRACHETTA, Girolamo, a political writer of Rovigno, engaged in several public affairs. His great services procured him enemies, and to escape from their persecution he retired to Naples, where he vindicated his conduct to the Spanish court, and was protected by Benevento viceroy of Naples, and received a liberal pension. He died at Naples the beginning of the 17th century. His great work is "Il Seminario de Governi di Stato & di Guerra," which contains about 8000 military and state maxims. The work is highly esteemed. The best edition is that of Genoa 1648, 4to.

FRAGUIER, Claude Francis, a French writer born at Paris 1666, and educated among the jesuits, Rapin, Jouvenci, La Rue, &c. He taught belles lettres at Caen for four years, but on his return to Paris he quitted the order of the jesuits 1694, and devoted himself to the greater cultivation of his mind, and to literary pursuits. As he was well skilled in the classics, and in modern languages, he assisted the abbé Bignon in the Journal des Sçavans, and undertook a translation of Plato. He exposed himself unfortunately to the cold air of the night, which brought on convulsions in his head, and though he outlived the attack 19 years, he yet was unable to labor, and died at last of an apoplexy 1728, aged 62. His works consist of Latin poems published at Paris 1729, 12mo. with dissertations concerning Socrates, and other subjects inserted in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member.

FRANCESCA, Peter, a painter of Venice, eminent in his representation of night pieces and battles. He died 1443.

FRANCESCHINI, Mark Antony, a painter of Bologna, disciple to Carlo Cignani, whose manner he successfully imitated. He died 1729, aged 81.

FRANCHI, Antonio, a painter of Lucca, engaged in the service of the dukes of Florence, for whom he painted several beautiful pieces. He died 1709, aged 71.

FRANCIA, Francesco, a painter born at Bologna 1450. He was originally a goldsmith, afterwards a graver of medals, and at last an eminent painter. His Sebastian tied to a tree, was an admirable piece, from which succeeding painters drew the improvement of their art. This story is related of his death. When requested by his friend Raphael to place in one of the churches of Bologna, his picture of St. Cecilia, he was so struck with the perfection of a piece which his best skill could not excel, that he fell into melancholy, and becoming consequently consumptive, died 1518, or according to some 1530.

FRANCIS, a Romish saint born at Assisi in Umbria, 1182. He abandoned the profession of his father as merchant, and devoted himself to austerity. He founded one of the four orders of mendicant friars, which was approved and confirmed by Innocent III. 1210. His followers increased so rapidly that in 1219, his order consisted of 5000 members. He afterwards travelled to the Holy Land, with the intention of converting the sultan Meledin, and offered to throw himself into the flames, to prove the truth of what he preached. He died at Assisi 1226, and was canonized by Gregory IX. four years after. His order rose to great consequence in time, and was distinguished not only for its services to the Roman see, but for the popes and other great men whom it nurtured.

FRANCIS, of Paulo, a Romish saint born at Paulo in Calabria, 1416, and founder of the Minims. He retired to a cave where his austerities drew around him a great number of penitents, who built there a monastery. He was very rigid in his rules, enjoining perpetual abstinence, from wine, fish, and meat, with many bodily mortifications. He was invited to France to cure Lewis XI. by his venerable presence, but instead of curing the monarch, he died at Plessis du Parc 1507, aged 91. He was canonized by Leo X. 1519.

FRANCIS XAVIER, a famous ecclesiastic, born at Xavier at the foot of the Pyrenees, 7th April, 1506. He taught philosophy at Paris, and there became acquainted with Ignatius Loyola, whom he assisted in the establishment of the order of jesuits, and with whom and five others he made a vow to labor in the conversion of infidels. Consequently he embarked at Lisbon 1541 for Goa, and as the apostle of the Indies he preached on the coast of Comorin, at Malacca, in the Moluccas, and at Japan; but as he formed the design of proceeding as far as China, he was cut off by disease 1552. He was canonized by Gregory XV. 1622. He wrote five books of Epistles, Pavia, 1631, 8vo. — a Catechism and Opuscula.

FRANCIS, de Sales, a Romish saint, born at Sales near Geneva 21st Aug. 1567. He studied at Paris and Padua, and in his zeal is said to have converted to the faith 70,000 protestants. In 1612 he was made bishop of Geneva, and founded the order of the Visitation, established by pope Paul V. 1618. Though invited to settle in France by Henry IV. he refused to quit Geneva. He died at Lyons 1622, aged 56, and was canonized by Alexander VI. 1665. His works are, Introduction to a Devout Life—a treatise on the Love of God, and letters, all displaying much piety and goodness of heart.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, emperor of Germany, was son of Leopold duke of Lorraine, and was born 1708. He married in 1736 Maria Theresa, the daughter of the emperor Charles VI. and after his father-in-law's death 1740, he was associated in the empire by his wife, and after the death of his opponent Charles VII. he was elected emperor 1745. The war which a disputed succession had occasioned was terminated by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 1747, but new disturbances arose in 1756, and hostilities again began, till the treaty of Hubertsburg in 1763 restored tranquillity to the empire. Francis was a great patron of literature, of the arts, and of commerce, among his subjects. He died suddenly at Inspruck, 18th Aug. 1765, aged 58.

FRANCIS I. king of France, son of Charles of Orleans, and Louisa of Savoy, was born at Cognac, 12th Sep. 1494. He succeeded to the French throne on the death of Lewis XII. 1515, and immediately determined to obtain possession of the Milanese, which he claimed as descended from duke Valentine his maternal grand-father. His progress was stopped by the Swiss, but he defeated them in the dreadful battle of Marignan, Sep. 1515, and entering the Milanese obliged the duke Maximilian Sforza to resign his power into his hands. After making treaties with the Genoese and the pope, Francis in 1516 met Charles V. at Noyon, and swore eternal peace between their dominions. This pledge so solemnly given was observed only two days, and Francis dissatisfied that his rival had obtained the imperial crown against him, sought revenge in war. Successful for a while in Navarre, Francis acquired greater advantages over his enemies in Flanders, and took Landrecies, Bouchain, &c. In 1522 the French under Lautrec were defeated at Bicoque, Cremona and Genoa were taken, Toulon and Marseilles were besieged, and Provence was invaded. Francis flew to the relief of his suffering provinces, and began the siege of Pavia, but was soon after defeated, 24th Feb. 1525 in battle, and made prisoner with the bravest men of his army. On this melancholy occasion he wrote to his mother, and declared that all was lost except his honor. A prisoner at Madrid, Francis was treated by Charles with great and unpardonable severity, and he was restored to liberty in 1526, only upon signing his renunciation to Naples, the Milanese, Genoa, Aost, Flanders, and Artois. The peace of Cambray 1529 put an end to the disputes between the rival sovereigns. Francis took for his second wife Eleanor the emperor's sister, and agreed to ransom for a large sum his two sons who were still detained as hostages at Madrid. Still jealous of the power of his rival, Francis in 1535 seized upon Savoy, while he saw his provinces of Provence invaded, and Marseilles again besieged, but at last a reconciliation was effected by means of the pope Paul III. 1538. The peace was of short duration, Francis attacked Italy, Rouf-illon, and Luxemburg, but though his general, the duke of Enghien, defeated the imperialists at Cerisoles in 1544, his enemy supported by the powerful assistance of Henry VIII. of England made a formidable invasion in Picardy and Champagne. Boulogne and Soissons opened their gates to the conquerors, and fresh victories appeared probable, when the protestant princes united their forces against the conqueror, and stopped his career. Peace was restored with Germany 1544, and two years after with England. Francis died at Rambouillet, 31st March, 1547, aged 53. He had in consequence of his debaucheries contracted the foul disease, which, after a continuance of nine years of increasing pains, proved at last fatal. By his first wife Claude of France, he had two sons and four daughters, and none by the second. Greater as a warrior than as a king, his whole reign was disturbed by a spirit of jealousy, which he cherished to the last against the power of his rival the emperor, but the protection which he extended to literature, and which procured for him the honorable title of father of letters, has eclipsed the weaknesses of an administration too often guided by prejudice, and disgracefully influenced by the ascendancy of mistresses and of favorites. He was the founder of the royal college of Paris. His life has been written by Gaillard, 8 vols. 12mo.

FRANCIS II. son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, was born 1544, and succeeded his father on the throne of France 1559. He had married the preceding year Mary Stuart of Scotland, and he died after a reign of 17 months, 5th Dec. 1560, aged 19. The confidence which he placed in the Guises proved the source of much misery to France, and kindled the flames of civil war.

FRANCIS, duke of Alencon, Anjou, and Berri, son of Henry II. and brother of the preceding, placed himself at the head of the malcontents when his brother, Henry III. ascended the throne. He was seized and imprisoned by order of his mother Catherine de Medicis, but his brother the king restored him to liberty, and thus enabled him to excite fresh troubles. He supported the disturbances in the Low Countries, and was at last crowned 1582, duke of Brabant, but the oppressive conduct of his government revolted his new subjects against him, and the next year he was obliged to fly to France for safety. He died there 10th Feb. 1584, aged 29. He is known in English history as the suitor of queen Elizabeth in 1581, who flattered his vanity, but with unbecoming coquetry rejected his addresses, after she had given him a ring as a pledge of her affection.

FRANCIS, of Bourbon, count of St. Pol and Chaumont, distinguished himself at the battle of Marignan 1515. He was taken prisoner at Pavia with Francis I. but escaped from captivity. He died at Cotignan near Rheims 1st Sep. 1545, aged 55.

FRANCIS DE BOURBON, count Enghien, displayed his valor in the service of Francis I. and took Nice and obtained the famous victory of Cerisoles 1544. He was killed by accident 23d Feb. 1545, aged 27.

FRANCIS DE BOURBON, duke of Montpensier, behaved with valor at the siege of Rouen, and at the battles of Jarnac and of Montcontour 1572. He was a faithful associate of Henry IV. and he ably distinguished him-himself in his service at Arques and Ivry. He died at Lisieux 1592, aged 50.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, duke of Guise, and of Aumale, was born at Bar 17th Feb. 1519. He early displayed courage and abilities in war, and his defence of Metz in 1553, against the arms of Charles V. is deservedly commended. The next year he distinguished himself at the battle of Renti, in which he defeated the Germans, and after some glorious campaigns in Italy and Flanders, he was named lieutenant-general of all the king's armies. His next exploit was against Calais, which he took after a siege of eight days from the English, who had possessed it for 210 years, and this was followed by the fall of Thionville. His services were such that he governed the kingdom under Henry II. and Francis II. and received from the parliament the glorious title of the saviour of his country. The death of Francis II. was the signal for civil war, and while the duke supported the cause of the catholics, the interests of the protestants were ably protected by the valor of Coligni. He took Rouen and Bourges, and defeated his enemies at Dreux 1562, and he was preparing to besiege Orleans, the chief and strongest town of the protestants, when he was assassinated by a pistol shot from the hands of Poltrot de Méré, one of the Huguenots, 24th Feb. 1563.

FRANCIS DE BORGIA, St. duke of Candia, and viceroy of Catalonia, was grandson of pope Alexander VI. and after filling high offices in the state, he embraced the ecclesiastical profession on the death of his wife, and entered among the Jesuits. He refused the rank of cardinal, and other ecclesiastical honors, and died at Rome, renowned for his piety, 30th Sep. 1572, aged 62. He was canonized by Clement X. 1671. He is author of some pious tracts in Spanish, which have been translated into Latin by Deza the jesuit.

FRANCIS, Lucas, a native of Mechlin, employed as a painter by the kings of Spain and France. His portraits and historical pieces possessed merit. He died 1643, aged 69. His son Lucas called the Young was born also at Mechlin, and after studying under Gerhard Segers, acquired celebrity as an artist. He died 1654, aged 48.

FRANCIS, Simon, a native of Tours, eminent as a portrait painter. He died 1671, aged 65.

FRANCIS ROMAIN, a Dominican of Ghent. He was an able architect, and finished the bridge of Maestricht, and afterwards was engaged by Lewis XIV. in the completion of the Pont-Royal at Paris, which had been left imperfect by Gabriel. He was liberally rewarded for his services and abilities by the French monarch, and died at Paris 1735, aged 89.

FRANCIS, James Charles, an eminent French engraver, born at Nancy. From Lyons he came to Paris, where he was liberally patronized, but his merits raised him enemies, which circumstance it is said hastened his death. He died 1769, aged 52. He published Recueil des Châteaux de Lorraine, — Corps-de-Garde after Venloo, &c.

FRANCIS, Philip, D. D. an eminent divine, son of an Irish dean. He is known by his excellent translations of Horace and Demosthenes. He wrote also Eugenia and Constantia two tragedies not very successful, and for his services as a political writer, it is said, he was rewarded by government with the rectory of Barrow, Suffolk, and the chaplainship of Chelsea-college. He died at Bath, March 1773, leaving a son now member of parliament, and formerly one of the supreme council of Bengal.

FRANCISCA, or FRANCES, a Roman lady founder of a convent at Rome. She followed the doctrines of St. Benedict. She was born 1384, and was canonized 1608.

FRANCIUS, Peter, a native of Amsterdam, who studied at Leyden under Gronovius. After travelling over France and England, he became 1674, professor of rhetoric and history at Amsterdam. He wrote Orationes — Specimen Eloquentiæ Exterioris, — besides poems in Greek and Latin, which possess considerable merit. He died 1704.

FRANCK, George, a native of Naumburg, who so early displayed his abilities, that at the age of 18 he received the poetic crown, for his Latin, Greek, German, and Hebrew poetry. He became professor of medicine at Heidelberg and Wittenberg, and died 1704, aged 61. He is author of Flora Francica, 12mo. — Satyra Medicæ, 4to. — Epistolæ, &c.

FRANCK, Augustus Herman, a native of Lubeck, professor of oriental languages, and of divinity at Halle. He distinguished himself by the most active benevolence, and founded at Halle an orphan-house, which, in 1727, contained 2196 children, and more than 130 preceptors. He also promoted the establishment of a mission to propagate the gospel on the coast of Malabar. He wrote Methodus Studii Theologici — Introductio ad Lectionem Prophetarum — Commentaria de Scopo Veteris & Novi Test. — Manuductio ad Lectionem S. Scripturæ — Observationes Biblicæ — Sermons — Book of Devotions, &c. He died 1727, aged 64.

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, Franciscus, a Flemish painter, called Old Franck, died 1616, aged 72. He executed his historical pieces from the scriptures, some of which possess great merit, especially in the coloring, and in the expression of the figures.

FRANCK, Franciscus, son to the above, called Young Francis, died 1642, aged 62. He studied under his father, and improved himself at Venice. His idolatry of Solomon, in the Notre Dame of Antwerp is his best piece.

FRANCKEN, Christian, a German in the 16th century, successively a jesuit, a Socinian in Poland, an unitarian, and lastly a Roman catholic. He wrote Breve Colloquium Jesuiticum, a severe satire against the jesuits — de Honore Christi, and other works.

FRANCKENSTEIN, Christian Godfrey, a native of Leipzig, distinguished as an advocate, and more as a man of letters. He wrote the life of Christina of Sweden — History of the 16th and 17th centuries — and a Continuation of Puffendorf's Introduction to History, and died 1717, aged 56. His son James wrote de Collatione Honorum — de Juribus Judæorum Singularibus in Germaniâ, &c. and died 1733.

FRANCO, Nicolo, a satirist, the friend and rival of Aretin, born at Benevento 1510. He was condemned to death at Rome 1569, for severe satires on some illustrious persons of that city; but it is unknown whether he suffered. He was an able writer.

FRANCO, Battista, a painter of Venice, who imitated the manner of Michael Angelo Buanorotti. He died 1561, aged 63.

FRANCOIS, Abbé Laurent, an able opponent of the French philosophers, who died 1782, aged 84. His works which were useful, were a Book of Geography — Proofs of the Religion of Jesus Christ, 4 vols. 12mo. — Defence of Religion, 4 vols. 12mo. — Examination of the Catechism of an honest Man — of the Facts on which Christianity is founded, 3 vols. 12mo. — Observations on the Philosophy of History, 8vo.

FRANCOIS, Simon, a portrait painter, born at Tours. He was self-taught, and acquired great reputation. He died 1671, aged 65.

FRANCOIS, Lucas, an historical painter, called the Old, was born at Mechlin, and died very rich 1643, aged 69. He was in the service of the kings of France and Spain.

FRANCOIS, Lucas, son of the above, called the Younger, was brought up under his father, and studied under Gerhard Segers. He died greatly respected as a painter 1654, aged 48.

FRANCOWITZ, Matthias, a protestant divine, the pupil of Luther and Melancthon, born at Albano in Illyria 1520, in consequence of which he assumed the name of Flaccus Illyricus. He taught the Greek and Latin languages at Wittemberg privately, and was afterwards public professor. He opposed the interim of Charles V., and was concerned in the drawing up of the centuries of Magdeburg. He died 1575. His best work is a Key to the Holy Scriptures, 2 vols. fol. He wrote besides a Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth, 4to. — de Translatione Imperii Rom. ad Germanos — de Electione Episcoporum, &c.

FRANCUS, Sebastian, a German anabaptist of the 16th century, who acquired some celebrity by writing books, which were refuted by Luther and Melancthon.

FRANK-FLORIS. Vid. FLORIS.

FRANKLIN, Thomas, D. D. son of Richard Franklin the editor of the Craftsman, an anti-ministerial paper, was born in London 1720. He was educated at Westminster-school and Trinity-college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. For some time also he was Greek professor. He was in 1758, made vicar of Ware and Thundridge, and afterwards obtained the rectory of Brasted in Kent. He was also chaplain in ordinary to the king, and died March 15th 1784. He possessed learning, genius, and application. He translated Phalaris, Sophocles, and Lucian, and he wrote the earl of Warwick, and Matilda, two tragedies which were received with great applause, and also "the Contract," a comedy in two acts performed at the Haymarket. Voltaire's works appeared translated under his name; but only two tragedies, the Orestes and Electra were by him. He published also some sermons on the relative duties.

FRANKLIN, Benjamin, an American philosopher and statesman, was born at Boston, New England, 1706. He was well educated under his father, who was a tallow-chandler and soap boiler, and after being for a little while engaged in the business, he was bound to his father's elder brother, who was a printer.

Eager after knowledge, he read attentively in the night, the works which he had printed in the day, and from the pages of Xenophon he derived that energetic ardor which at last raised him to fame and distinction. A difference with his uncle removed him from New York to Philadelphia, where he maintained himself for some time by his industry, till he was noticed by the governor, sir William Keith, and encouraged to set up business for himself. With this view he came to London; but soon discovered that the warm assurances of his patron for assistance and protection, were the unmeaning professions of polished life, and, therefore, after working for some time as a journeyman printer, he, in 1726, returned to Philadelphia, where he settled. By the means of his friends he began business, and published a periodical paper, which was read with avidity. In 1730 he married a widow, whom he had known and courted before her first marriage, and the next year he began the public library of Philadelphia, which was enriched by the valuable contributions of the Penn family, of Collinson, and others, and spread knowledge and information through the province. His Poor Richard's Almanack appeared in 1732, and so pleased the public, on account of the many aphorisms, and the valuable maxims of prudence and economy which it contained, that not less than 10,000 copies were sold in one year. He was, in 1736, made clerk to the general assembly in Pennsylvania, and the next year he obtained the office of post-master at Philadelphia. In 1738 he formed an association for preserving the houses of Philadelphia from fire, and in the war of 1744 he ably promoted some popular measures for the defence of the province, by the voluntary force of the citizens. In 1747 he addressed an account of his discoveries on electricity to his friend Collinson, and explained in a very satisfactory manner the Aurora Borealis, and the laws of thunder and lightning, and he not only recommended the propriety of guarding buildings against the effects of storms, by means of conductors, but showed that the lightning from the clouds is the same as the electric fire. Distinguished as a philosopher, he was equally so as a statesman, and the measures which he recommended in the public assemblies of the province proved his patriotism and sagacity. By his advice the militia bill was passed, and he was, in consequence, appointed colonel of the Philadelphia district. On his appearance in England, in 1757, as agent for Pennsylvania, he was received with respect and attention by the public men, and he was honored with a seat in the Royal society, and the degree of doctor of laws in the universities of St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, and Oxford. He returned home in 1762, and two years after he again visited England, as agent from his countrymen. The spirit which now began to appear in America roused the attention of the government, and Franklin, as a man of knowledge and influence, was called to the bar of the Commons, and examined with respect to the stamp act. His conduct on this occasion was firm and manly, and his answers so clear, that they, and not the questions, appeared to have been prepared with the nicest discrimination of circumstances and of facts. He returned, turned, in 1775, to America, and was elected one of the members of Congress, and during the war he displayed the most active zeal, and proposed the strongest measures for the full emancipation of the colonies from the mother country. He was next employed in completing the negotiations of America with France, and as the resources of his country were low, he embarked with a cargo of tobacco, which he sold at Nantes, to defray the expences of his mission. He was received with great distinction by the French court; the people admired the singularity of his dress and the simplicity of his republican manners; the poets of the age, and Voltaire particularly, paid respect to his merits, and the government at last, by signing a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with him, declared war with England. The independence of America was at last acknowledged by the mother country, and Franklin, who had continued at Paris, signed the treaty of peace in 1783, and advanced the interests and glory of his country by forming new connections with the kings of Prussia and Sweden. He returned to America in 1785, and was received by his countrymen as a venerable father, he was made governor of Pennsylvania, and as a representative he applied the strong powers of his mind to heal the differences which prevailed in the province, by wise laws and conciliating regulations. This respectable man died full of years and of glory, 17th April 1790, aged 84 years and three months, and his memory was respected by his countrymen, who ordered, on the occasion, a public mourning for two months. The epitaph which he composed for himself is well known. His discoveries in electricity, and his services in the emancipation of his country were depicted by the pen of Turgot in this bold line, placed under his portrait:

Eripuit coelo fulmen, sceptrumque tyrannis.

By his patient industry he rose from obscurity, and amassed a very large fortune, part of which he left for charitable and public purposes. He wrote an entertaining account of the first part of his life, which contains many valuable maxims for health, industry, and economy, which has appeared in two small vols. 12mo. with some essays. His political, miscellaneous, and philosophical pieces have been published in 4to. and in 8vo. He contributed some valuable papers also to the philosophical institutions of America.

FRANKS, Sebastian, a painter, born at Antwerp 1573. His landscapes and conversation pieces were much admired.

FRANKS, John Baptist, supposed to be the son of the preceding, was born at Antwerp 1600. He studied very successfully the manner of Vandyck and Rubens.

FRANTZIUS, Wolfgang, a German divine, born at Plawen, in Voigtland, was professor of divinity at Wittenberg, where he died 1620, aged 56. He wrote Animalium Historia Sacra — Tractatus de Interpretatione Sacrarum Scripturarum, 4to. — Schola Sacrificiorum Patriarch. Sacra — Commentar. in Leviticum, &c. and other works.

FRASSON, Claude, a French monk, born at Peronne, in Picardy. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, theological professor at Paris, and superior of the Franciscan convent there. He wrote Dissertationes Biblicæ, 2 vols 4to. — a valuable system of Philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. He died 1711, aged 91.

FRATELLINI, Giovanna, a paintress, born at Florence 1666, and patronized by the archduchess Victoria. Her historical pieces and miniatures were much admired. She died 1731.

FRATELLINI, Lorenzo Maria, son of the preceding, was born 1690. He painted under Dominico Gabbiani, and his historical pieces, his landscapes, and fruit, were highly finished. He died 1729.

FRAUWENLOB, Henry, a German writer who died 1317. He wrote in favor of the ladies, and they it is said attended his funeral, and poured such quantities of wine into his grave, as almost inundated the church.

FREDEGARIUS, the earliest French historian, after Gregory of Tours, was called the Scholastic. His chronicle, in barbarous language, extends to the year 641, and is found in the collections of Duchesne, and Bouquet.

FREDEGONDE, wife of Chilperic, king of France, was born at Avancourt in Picardy, of obscure parents. She was in the queen's retinue, and by her arts, and by the influence of her personal charms, she became the third wife of the weak Chilperic. Raised to the throne, she sacrificed the members of the royal family to her pride and ambition and by the sword, as well as by poison, she cut off all those whom, either on account of talents, influence, or birth, she regarded as enemies or rivals. She at last completed the measure of her iniquities, by the death of Chilperic, who was assassinated in hunting, that the guilty queen might indulge her criminal passions for her favorite Landri. This detested character who possessed bravery in the field of battle, died 597.

FREDERIC, I. surnamed Barbarossa, was born 1121, and succeeded his father Frederic as duke of Swabia 1147, and in 1152 he ascended the imperial throne after the death of his uncle Conrad III. He passed in 1155 into Italy, where after some difficulties on account of the superiority which the pope claimed over him, he obtained the crown, and consecration from the hands of Adrian IV. The disputes between him and the holy see were kindled anew on the death of Adrian, and Alexander III. the next successor, was soon opposed by the successive elevation of three antipopes to the chair of St. Peter. The advantages obtained at Rome were followed by the defeat of the Milanese, and by the destruction of their city, and the overthrow of Brescia and Placentia, but at last the troops of Frederic were conquered at the battle of Como, and this disaster produced a peace. The emperor met the pope at Venice, and a reconciliation was effected in 1177. New quarrels however soon arose, till Frederic was prevailed upon by Urban III. to undertake a crusade against Saladin. At the head of a numerous army he marched into the East, and after defeating the Greeks, and the Turks, he penetrated into Syria, where death stopped his victories. He died 10th June 1190, in consequence of bathing imprudently in the Cydnus, in Cilicia, where Alexander the Great, some ages before, had nearly fallen a sacrifice to the same fame recreation. During the 38 years of his reign, Frederic compensated for the odious vices of pride and ambition by courage, liberality, and benevolence, and the forbidding characters of the tyrant were forgotten in the amiable and conciliating manners of the man. By his second wife Beatrix he left five sons, one of whom Frederic, duke of Swabia, attended him in his Asiatic expedition, and behaved with great valor in the Holy Land, till he was cut off by a severe distemper, which proved also fatal to a great part of his army at the siege of Ptolemais.

FREDERIC II. grandson of the preceding, and son of Henry VI. was born 1194, and was elected king of the Romans, two years after. In 1210, he was elected emperor of Germany, on the excommunication of Otho IV. by Innocent III. but he obtained peaceful possession of his power, only after the death of his rival 1218. After settling his affairs in Germany, he went to Italy, where he was solemnly crowned by the hands of Honorius III. 1220, and promised to extend the papal power by undertaking a crusade. This distant expedition was put off for some time till the fear of excommunication from the next pope Gregory IX. obliged him to set out for Jerusalem in 1228. His invasion of the Holy Land was so formidable, that Saladin, sultan of Babylon, not only made a truce of 10 years with him, but yielded to him some of the Asiatic cities near Jerusalem. This conduct provoked the resentment of the pope, who stirred up war against Frederic, and incited his son and his father-in-law to take up arms against him. Frederic hastened back to Europe to oppose this unnatural conspiracy, and seizing Romagna, Ancona, Spoleto, and Benevento, defeated the plans of his enemies. His partizans in these troublous times bore the name of Gibelins, while those of the pope were called Guelphs, and carried on their shoulders the impressions of two keys. At last however tranquillity was restored, and Frederic made peace with the Roman pontiff 1230, to be enabled to reduce to obedience his rebellious son Henry, whom he degraded from the title of king of the Romans in favor of his second son Conrad. In 1240, Frederic passed again to Italy, and reduced the Milanese, and Sardinia, and after defeating the Genoese and Venetians, and seizing Tuscany and Urbino, he laid siege to Rome. The pope opposed his attack by the terrible denunciation of excommunication, but Frederic disregarded the impotent thunders of the Vatican, and defeated all the forces which were sent to check his progress. The death of the pope soothed for awhile the enmities between Rome and Germany, but at last Innocent IV. had the courage to depose this powerful enemy of the holy-see, at a council at Lyons 1245, and Frederic rendered unpopular by the artifice of his opponents, saw Henry of Thuringia, elected in 1246, to fill the imperial throne, and the next year, William, count of Holland. Thus insulted and harassed by the insurrections of his subjects in Naples and Parma, Frederic at last sunk under his misfortunes, and died at Fiorenzuola, in Apulia, 13th Dec. 1250, aged 57. He was succeeded by Conrad his son by his second wife Yolande, daughter of John of Brienne, king of Jerusalem.

FREDERIC III. surnamed the Fair, was son of Albert of Austria, and was elected emperor 1314, by some of the electors, though the majority placed the crown on his more successful rival Lewis of Bavaria. The battle of Mühldorf, 1322, proved decisive against the claims of Frederic, who was taken prisoner, and died 13th Jan. 1330.

FREDERIC IV. surnamed the Pacific, was son of Ernest, duke of Austria, and ascended the imperial throne 1440, in his 25th year. He was crowned at Rome 1452, by Nicholas V. and was the last of the German princes, who submitted to that ceremony in the capital of the antient world. He was a weak, indolent, and superstitious prince, and he suffered with the greatest indifference Hungary to rebel and to separate itself from his power, and afterwards he fled from Vienna, before his enemies, satisfied to beg his bread from convent to convent. This worthless monarch died 7th Sep. 1493, in consequence of the amputation of one of his legs which mortified, and he was succeeded by his son Maximilian.

FREDERIC I. the Pacific, king of Denmark 1523, after the expulsion of Christian, distinguished himself by the wisdom of his measures, and by his alliance with Gustavus I. of Sweden, and with the Hanseatic towns. After the conquest of Copenhagen, he reconciled to his government the Danish nobility, and rendered himself popular by his liberality, and the prudence and utility of his public measures, and by the introduction of Lutheranism among his subjects. He died 1533.

FREDERIC II. king of Denmark, after his father Christian III. increased his dominions, by the conquest of Diethmarsia. He was the patron of learning and of learned men, and the protection which he extended to Tycho Brahe added celebrity to his reign. He was for some time engaged in war with Sweden, but tranquillity was restored in 1570. He died 4th April 1588, aged 54.

FREDERIC III. archbishop of Bremen, succeeded his father Christian IV. in 1648, as king of Denmark. Though he lost some places in a war with Sweden, he enlarged the happiness of his people, by rendering them more independent of the nobles, and by making the crown hereditary, and no longer elective. He died 9th of Feb. 1670, aged 61.

FREDERIC IV. succeeded his father Christian V. as king of Denmark 1699. He joined the Czar Peter, and the king of Poland in hostilities against Charles XII. of Sweden, but he was obliged to make peace, by the rapidity of the victories of his enemy. During the captivity of Charles in Turkey, Frederic drove the Swedes from his dominions, and recovered some of the places which the fortune of war had wrested from his hands. He died 1730, aged 59.

FREDERIC V. grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne 1746, and died after a reign of 20 years. On his death-bed, he called his son and successor Christian VII. and addressed him in these remarkable words, "It is a great consolation to me, my son, in my last moments, to reflect that I have offended no one, and that I have shed the blood of none of my subjects."

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS I. king of Poland, was son of

of John George III. elector of Saxony, and was born at Dresden 1670. He succeeded to the electorate after the death of his brother 1694, and distinguished himself against the French on the Rhine, and defeated the Turks, in 1696, at the battle of Oltach. By embracing the catholic religion, he recommended himself to the Polish nobles, and was in 1696 elected king, but the glories which he acquired in foreign wars, were eclipsed by the successes of Charles XII. of Sweden, and Frederic beaten at Riga, Cliflow, and Frawstadt, was obliged to sign the peace of 1706, by which he was stripped of his dominions, and consented to see the crown of Poland placed on the head of Stanislaus. The battle of Pultowa, and the defeat of the Swedes, proved favorable to his views, he recovered the Polish throne, and maintained his power, and independence till his death, 1st Feb. 1733, in his 63d year. He was in his person very athletic, and possessed of prodigious bodily strength. His court was for a long time one of the most brilliant in Europe, and the patronage which he extended to literary characters, and to the arts, reflected the highest honor on his memory.

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS II. son of the preceding, was born 1696, and succeeded his father on the Polish throne 1734. The last years of his life were unhappily embittered by the miseries of war, and the king of Prussia invaded his dominions, and obliged him soon to yield to the rigorous fate of unconditional submission. Augustus was permitted indeed to return to Poland, but Saxony remained in the hands of the conqueror, till the peace of Hubersburg, 15th Feb. 1763. Augustus died the following October. Respectable in private life, this monarch was unequal to the arduous duties of reigning, and whilst he devoted himself to the pleasures of luxury and to indolence he made no preparations against the attacks of his powerful neighbours of Russia and Prussia. By his wife Mary Josephine, daughter of the emperor Joseph, he left several daughters, one of whom was the mother of the unfortunate Lewis XVI. of France.

FREDERIC, prince of Hesse Cassel, married in 1715 Ulrica Eleanora sister of Charles XII of Sweden, and he obtained possession of the Swedish throne 1720, after the abdication of his wife who had succeeded on the death of her brother. He made unsuccessful war against the Russians, and died 1751, aged 75, without issue.

FREDERIC WILLIAM, surnamed the Great, elector of Brandenburg, was born at Cologne, on the Spree 1620. He made successful war against the Poles, but the treaty of Braunsberg, in 1657, put an end to hostilities. In 1674 he joined himself against Lewis XIV. with Spain and Holland, and invaded Alsace, but his progress was checked by the intelligence that the Swedes had laid waste several of his cities, and he returned hastily to repel them, and seized the towns of Stralsund, Ferchantz, and Griffwald. Peace was soon after restored and Frederic directed all his attention to improve the commerce of his dominions, and joined the Spree to the Oder by the opening of a canal. He died 1688, aged 68, highly respected by his subjects as a liberal, generous, benevolent, and patriotic prince.

FREDERIC I, elector of Brandenburg, son of the preceding, was born at Konigsberg 1657. The ambition of this prince was flattered with the hopes of erecting his duchy into a kingdom, and Leopold the emperor, although he, in 1695, had rejected his solicitations, granted his requests in 1700, provided he assisted him in the war against France, England, Holland, Sweden, and Poland; and in consequence of this elevation his title was fully acknowledged at the peace of Utrecht. The Prussian dominions were increased under him by the acquisition of Guelders, of the county of Tecklenburg, and of the principalities of Neuchatel and Valengin. Frederic died 1713, aged 60. He founded the university of Halle, the royal academy of Berlin, and the academy of nobles. He was three times married. By his second wife daughter of the duke of Hanover, and sister of George afterwards king of England, he had a son who succeeded him.

FREDERIC WILLIAM I. king of Prussia, was born at Berlin 15th Aug. 1688, and succeeded his father just mentioned 1713. His reign was begun by a strict reform in the expenditure of the kingdom, and of the 100 chamberlains kept for ostentation by his father only 12 were retained. He unwillingly engaged in war against Charles XII. of Sweden, from whom he took Stralsund. Eager to encourage commerce and industry among his subjects, he invited foreign artisans into his dominions by the offer of liberal rewards, and while he contributed to the prosperity of the nation, he watched over its safety, and created a large standing army of sixty thousand men. The latter part of his life was clouded by an unhappy disagreement with his son the prince royal, and though he married him to the princess of Wolfenbottle in 1733, he did not derive from that union that concord and reconciliation which he fondly expected. He died 31st May 1740, aged 52. By Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George of Hanover, he had, besides his successor, three sons and six daughters.

FREDERIC II. son of the preceding, was born 24th Jan. 1712, and ascended the throne of Prussia 1740. His conduct had been viewed with jealousy by his father, and his attachment to music and to belles lettres was regarded as a mean and dishonorable propensity; but when he attempted to escape from the harsh treatment which he experienced, he was not only seized and sent as prisoner to Cultrin, but was obliged to be a spectator of the execution of Kar, the friend and the companion of his domestic sufferings. On his accession to the throne, Frederic laid claims to the province of Silesia which had been long occupied by the German emperor, and all the attempts of Maria Theresa to defend it against his invasion proved abortive. Count Neuperg the Hungarian general was defeated at Mollwitz, and, in 1741, all Lower Silesia submitted to the conqueror, and his possession was confirmed by the treaty of Breslaw 1743. The following year war was rekindled, and Frederic advanced with 100,000 men to the siege of Prague, which he took with 16,000 prisoners, and this advantage was soon followed by the decisive battle of Friedburg over prince Charles of Lorraine. Another treaty signed at Dresden 1745, again restored peace to the continent, and Austria ceded ceded to the Prussian conqueror all Silesia together with the county of Glatz. In 1755 a new war, called the seven years' war, burst forth with increased violence, and while Prussia had for its auxiliary the English nation, Austria was supported by France and by the elector of Saxony, and Frederic soon saw the number of his enemies augmented by the accession of Russia, Sweden, and Germany. Undismayed in the midst of his powerful enemies, Frederic laid the foundation for victory and success in the strict discipline of his army, and in the fortitude and resignation with which he supported the reverses of fortune, and shared the fatigues of his soldiers. Though France attacked his dominions from Guelders to Muiden, and Russia penetrated into Prussia, and the Austrians into Silesia, Frederic on all sides rose superior to misfortunes. Though defeated by the Russians he routed the Austrians, and again suffered a check in Bohemia, but on the 5th Nov. 1757, he avenged himself by the terrible defeat of the Austrians and French at Rossbach, and by an equally splendid victory the next month over the Austrian forces at Lissa near Breslaw. These important successes appalled his enemies, the Russians and Swedes retired in dismay from Prussia, and Frederic supported by a liberal supply of money from the English government, and by an army of Hanoverians under the duke of Brunswick penetrated into Moravia and laid siege to Olmutz. Though here checked by marshal Daun, he rapidly advanced against the Russians at Custrin, and defeated them in the dreadful battle of Zorndoff. The battle of Hochkirchen against Daun was adverse to his fortunes, and he also suffered a severe check at the doubtful fight of Cunnerdorf against the Russians, and in consequence of these repeated disasters, Brandenburg, and the capital fell into the hands of the victorious enemy 1761. The defeat of Daun at Torgau gave a new turn to the affairs of the undaunted monarch, his territories were evacuated by the enemy, and he in every situation displayed such activity, such vigilance, and such resources of mind that in 1762, a treaty of peace was concluded with Russia and Sweden, and the next year with France and the Empire, by which Silesia was for ever confirmed in his possession. While cultivating the arts of peace, Frederic was still intent on enlarging his dominions, and he joined with Austria and Russia, in 1772, in that unpardonable league which dismembered the defenceless territories of Poland, and added some of its most fertile provinces to his kingdom. In 1777, the death of the duke of Bavaria without children kindled the flames of discord and of war between Austria and Prussia, Frederic placed himself at the head of his troops, but the differences of the rival princes were settled by the peace of Teschen 13th May 1779. The last years of Frederic's life were earnestly devoted to the encouragement of commerce and of the arts, justice was administered with impartiality, useful establishments were created, and the miseries of the indigent and unfortunate were liberally relieved by the benevolent cares of the monarch. Frederic died 17th Aug. 1786, aged 75, and he met death with all the resignation which philosophy, unaided by religion, can show. As Frederic was brought up in the school of adversity, he early learnt lessons of stoicism and philosophical wisdom, and unyielding to the caresses of prosperity he was taught not to sink under the frowns of fortune. From necessity as well as from choice attached to literature in the years of his privacy, he cultivated the muses on the throne, and liberally patronized the lovers of sciences and of the fine arts. His evenings were generally spent in the easy society of men of letters, and after the fatigues of the day he unbent the hero and the king to the wit, the scholar, and the literary disputant. His invitations to learned foreigners were sincere and honorable, and Maupertuis and especially Voltaire were for a while objects of his particular regard and of his unfeigned esteem. Anxious to redress the grievances of his subjects he paid the minutest attention to their applications, and a word written at the bottom of each petition by his hand served for his secretaries to convey to the eager suppliants either refusal or reprehension, encouragement or promises. At five in the morning Frederic generally rose from his bed, and after the day was divided between business, recreation, and literature, he retired to his chamber at ten in the evening, and as his meals were regular and simple, and as he was through life a stranger to the licentious propensities which too often dishonor the great and the powerful, he enjoyed a strong constitution with a placid and serene evenness of temper. His conduct in war, the heroic firmness with which he withstood his numerous enemies, and the astonishing presence of mind which he displayed in every difficult situation, not less than his wisdom, the equity of the laws which he established, and the paternal care with which he watched over the happiness of his people, proved him to be a monarch of superior excellence; but though he thus deserved the appellation of Great, it is painful to observe the inconsistency of his principles, the wavering tenets of his faith, and the mighty influence of those two dangerous passions by which he was guided, ambition and avarice. Great as a monarch, Frederic was an infidel at heart, and while he wished to bind, to obedience to his government, the affection of his subjects by the imposing rites of religion, and by the expectations of another life, he was himself a sceptic in the most offensive degree, and regarded the ties which unite men to an over-ruling providence only so far as they secured his power or contributed to his aggrandizement. As Frederic did not cohabit with his wife, whom he had married only in obedience to his father, without affection or esteem, he died without issue. His works are numerous and respectable. Four volumes in octavo were published in his life-time, and fifteen since his death. The chief of these are Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg — a Poem on the Art of War, a composition of great merit — the History of his own Time — the History of the seven Years' War. All these have been collected together in 25 vols. 8vo. 1790, with an account of his life. M. de Segur has among others published an account of his reign and of his extraordinary character.

FREDERIC, surnamed the Wise, elector of Saxony, was born 1463. He enjoyed the good opinion and shared the councils of the emperor Maximilian, after whose death he might have been placed on the imperial throne, an honor which he refused, while he supported the election of Charles V. He was one of the first and most zealous friends of Luther, and contributed much to the establishment of the reformed church. He died 1526, and was succeeded by his brother John surnamed the constant, whose son John Frederic when raised to the sovereign power, became a powerful protector of the reformers, and was chief of the famous league of Smalkalde 1536. In the war which followed this league John Frederic was taken prisoner by Charles V. and condemned to lose his head, but the sentence was reversed on condition that he consented to the renunciation of the electoral dignity for himself and his posterity. He died 3d March 1554, aged 51.

FREDERIC V., elector Palatine, son of Frederic IV., married a daughter of James I. of England. He was elected in 1619, king of Bohemia by the protestants, but his elevation was opposed by his rival Ferdinand of Austria, and though supported by France and by England, he was defeated the following year and totally ruined near Prague. The great Gustavus in his invasion of Germany promised to re-establish him in his rights and dominions, but the death of that heroic chief at the battle of Lutzen 1632, not only shattered all his fond hopes, but weighed so heavily on his spirits that he died a month after.

FREDERIC, Colonel, son of Theodore the unfortunate king of Corsica, was early engaged in the military profession, and served the elector of Wirtemberg, who honored him with his friendship and presented him with the insignia of the order of merit. He came to England as the agent of the elector, but either unsuccessful in his political negotiations, or overwhelmed with debts and poverty, he in a rash moment committed suicide by shooting himself through the head in the portal of Westminster-abbey 1796. This unhappy youth who seemed to inherit the misfortunes and the imprudence of his father, was author of some publications of merit, Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire de Corse, 8vo. 1768 — a description of Corsica, with an account of its short Union to the British Crown, &c. 1798, 8vo. &c.

FREEKE, William, an English focinian, born 1663. He wrote, in questions and answers, a dialogue on the Deity, and a confutation of the doctrines of Trinity, which drew down the severity of the House of Commons upon him. He was fined 500l., his book was burnt, and he made a recantation in the four courts of Westminster-hall.

FREEMAN, John, a painter, in the age of Charles II. His life was attempted by poison in the West Indies, and his constitution ever after retained the fatal effects. In the decline of life, he painted scenes for Covent-garden theatre.

FREGOSO, Baptist, doge of Genoa 1478, from which office he was deposed for his haughtiness, and banished to Fregui. The time of his death is unknown. He wrote, like Valerius Maximus, nine books of Memorable Actions — the Life of Martin V. — a Latin Treatise on learned Ladies — an Italian Treatise against Love.

FREHER, Marquard, a German, born at Augsburg 1565. He studied civil law in France under Cujacius, and at the age of 23 was counsellor to Casimir prince Palatine. He was afterwards professor of law at Heidelberg, and engaged in important affairs by the elector Frederic IV. He died at the age of 49. His books on law, criticism, and history, are very numerous and respectable. His abilities, and the amiable character of his private life, are highly commended by Douza, Melchior Adam, Scioppius, Casaubon and others.

FREIGIUS, John Thomas, a learned German, born at Friburg, son of a husbandman. He studied the law under Zasius and Ramus, and taught first at Friburg, and afterwards at Basil, and then at the moment when he thought of retiring from the ingratitude of the world to the peace of a rural life, he was appointed rector of the new college of Altorf 1575. He died 1583 of the plague, following to the grave a son and two daughters, one of which had, at the age of 12, very promising talents and a great taste for literature. Of his works, the chief are Quæstiones Geometricæ, and Stereo-Metricæ Logica Consultorum — Ciceronis Orationes Perpetuis Notis Logicis, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. Basil 1583.

FREIND, John, an English physician of eminence, born 1675, at Croton in Northamptonshire, where his father was rector. He was educated under Busby at Westminster, and came in 1690 to Christ-church, where Aldrich presided. His abilities as a scholar were already so distinguished, that he then in conjunction with a friend published an elegant edition of Demosthenes, and Æschines de Corona, and about the same time revised, for publication, the Delphin edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses. He now directed his attention to physic, and displayed great knowledge of the subject, by addressing a letter concerning the hydrocephalus to sir Hans Sloane in 1699, and another in 1701 de Spasmi Rarioris Historia, which are inserted in the philosophical transactions, No. 256 and 270. In 1703 he drew the public attention to an useful and valuable work called "Emmenologia, in qua Fluxus Muliebris Menstrui &c.," and in 1704 was elected chemical professor at Oxford. The year after he accompanied lord Peterborough in his Spanish expedition, and after two years' attendance on the army, he visited Italy and Rome, and conversed with Baglivi and Lancisi men of eminence and medical celebrity. On his return in 1707, he published an account of the earl of Peterborough in Spain, &c. as an able vindication of the honor and character of his friend since the raising of the siege of Barcelona, and during the campaign of Valencia; and the work became very popular and passed rapidly to a third edition. At this time he was created M. D. and two years after he published his Praelectiones Chemicæ, dedicated to sir Isaac Newton. This work was censured in the Acta Eruditorum by the German philosophers, and drew forth a defence from the author inserted in the philosophical transactions. In 1711 he was elected member of the Royal society, and that year went with the duke of Ormond as physician to Flanders. In 1716 he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and at that time he had a controversy with Dr. Woodward of Gresham college, in consequence of his publication of Hippocrates de Morbis Popularibus, and afterwards on the subject of the fever in the small-pox, in which unpleasant dispute, more acrimony was shown, on both sides, than prudence or decorum could approve. In 1722 he was elected M. P. for Launceston in Cornwall, and the freedom and eloquence of his speeches in the house, together with his intimacy with Atterbury, drew upon him the suspicion that he was concerned in the plot of that unfortunate bishop, and consequently he was committed to the Tower, March, 1722-3, from which he was bailed the June following. In his confinement he wrote a letter on some kind of small-pox, addressed to his friend Mead, and he formed the plan of his great work "the History of Physic," the first part of which appeared in 1725, and the second 1726. He became physician to the prince of Wales, and on his accession to the throne, to the queen, whose confidence and esteem he fully enjoyed. He died of a fever 26th July, 1728, in his 52d year, and was buried at Hitcham, Bucks, but a monument was erected to him in Westminster abbey. He left one son, afterwards student of Christ church. His Latin works were published together, London 1733, in fol. by Wigan, who added a Latin translation of the History of Physic, with an elegant dedication to the queen. Dr. Friend's brother, Robert, was head of Westminster school, and a very learned man. He published Cicero de Oratore, and died 1754.

FREINSEMIUS, John, a learned German, born at Ulm in Swabia 1608. He was professor of eloquence at Upsal, librarian to Christina of Sweden, and afterwards professor at Heidelberg, where he died 1660. He was a most able classical scholar, and to the knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, united an intimate acquaintance with all the languages of Europe. His critique on Florus, and his notes on Phædrus and Tacitus, are valuable, but he derives his greatest celebrity from his excellent supplements to Livy and Quintus Curtius, in which he has been so successful that we almost cease to lament the loss of the originals.

FREIRE DE ANDRADA, Hyacinthe, a Portuguese, abbot of St. Mary de Chans, born at Beja 1597. He was in great favor with John IV. of Portugal, who wished to make him a bishop. He was a man of great levity of character, which probably prevented his advancement in the state, as his abilities might have promised. He died at Lisbon 1657. His "Life of don Juan de Castro," is esteemed as one of the best written books in Portuguese. He wrote also some poems.

FREMINET, Martin, a French painter, who died at Paris, his birth place, 1619, aged 52. He was chiefly painter to Henry IV. and honored with the order of St. Michael by Lewis XIII. He imitated with success the beauties of Michael Angelo, and of Joseph of Arpino.

FREMONT D'ABLANCOURT, Nicholas, nephew and pupil of Perrot d'Abblancourt, retired to Holland at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and was appointed historiographer to the prince of Orange. Besides a defence of his uncle's Tacitus against la Houssaye, he translated Lucian's dialogue between the letters and the supplement to the true history, and after his death which happened in 1693, his Memoirs of the History of Portugal, appeared in 12mo.

FRENICLE DE BESSY, Bernard, a mathematician, author of a treatise on Right-angled Triangles — on Combinations — on Resolving Problems by Exclu-sions, &c. He was very intimate with Merenne, Fermat, Descartes, and other learned men, and died 1675.

FRERES, Theodore, a painter, born at Enkhuysen 1643. The best of his pieces are preserved in the great hall of Amsterdam. His drawings and designs were in high esteem. He resided for some time at Rome.

FRERET, Nicolas, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1688. Though bred to the law he applied himself to the study of history, and at the age of 25 was admitted into the academy of inscriptions, in consequence of his Discourse on the Origin of the French. This valuable treatise was considered as offensive to the court, and the author was sent to the Bastille, where the reading of Bayle's dictionary rendered him sceptical. He wrote letters "of Thrasylulus to Leucippe," in favor of atheism — Examination of the Apologists for Christianity, &c. He died 1749, aged 61.

FRERON, Elie Catherine, a French journalist, and an able opponent of the new philosophy, was born at Quimper 1719. He was educated by the jesuits, but in 1739 he left them, and began the life and profession of author. His "Letters on Certain Writings of the Times," appeared in 1749, and were continued to 13 vols. In 1754 he began his "Année Littéraire," in 7 vols. to which he added yearly 8 vols. till his death in 1776. He was an able and acute critic, but his remarks on Voltaire drew upon him all the violence and fury of the satirist, and he became the hero of his Dunciad. To a well informed mind, Freron added an excellent private character. He died 10th March, 1776, and besides his periodical publications, wrote miscellanies, 3 vols. — les Vrais Plaisirs, from Marino, and part of a translation of Lucretius, &c.

FRESNAYE, John Vauquelin de la, an early French poet, king's advocate for Caen, and afterwards president of that city. He died 1606, aged 72. He wrote "Satires," which though inferior to those of Boileau and Regnier, yet possess merit — "the Art of Poetry," — two books of Idyllia — a poem on the Monarchy, all published at Caen 1605.

FRESNE, Charles du Cange du, a learned Frenchman, born at Amiens 1610. He studied the law at Orleans, and was advocate of the parliament of Paris. He spent some time in his native town in the pursuits of literature and philosophy, and then settling at Paris, he was in 1668 engaged by Colbert to make a collection from all authors who had written on the history of France. His labors, however, did not please the minister, and he resigned all his engagements in the undertaking, and then finished his "Glossarium Mediæ & Infimæ Latinitatis" 3 vols. fol. an excellent and useful work, often reprinted. He afterwards wrote a Greek Glossary of the middle age, in 2 vols. folio. He wrote also the History of Constantinople under the French emperors, and published besides, editions of Nicephorus, Cinnamus, Anna Comena, Zonaras, &c. with learned notes. He died 1688, aged 78, leaving four children, who were honorably pensioned by Lewis XIV. in consequence of their father's merit. Du Cange's Latin Glossary was afterwards enlarged and improved, and afterwards abridged in 6 vols. 8vo. Halle, 1772.

FRESNOY, Charles Alphonso du, a poet and painter, born born at Paris 1611. His father who was a surgeon, educated him for a physician, but the love of poetry was superior to paternal authority. Under Perrier and Vouet he learned design, and in 1634 travelled to Rome, where his wants, in consequence of the neglect of his offended parents, were very great till relieved by the liberality of his friend Mignard. Devoting himself to classical studies, he did not, however, pay less attention to anatomy, the rules of perspective and architecture, and the elements of geometry, and with a mind well stored with poetical images, he produced his elegant and labored poem "De Arte Graphica." His pictures were not numerous, scarce 50 in number, and always parted with for little, and to supply the wants of the moment. On his return from Italy, in 1656, he was solicited to publish his poem; but though encouraged by de Piles, his friend, who undertook a French translation of it, he deferred it, and died before the completion, 1665, aged 53. The poem appeared after his death, with notes by de Piles, and its excellent precepts have been made known to the English by the translations of Dryden, of Graham, and lastly of Mason, in blank verse with notes. In the coloring of his pieces Fresnoy imitated Titian, and the Caraccis in their designs.

FRESNY, Charles Riviere du, a French poet, born at Paris 1648. To a strong taste for music, painting, and sculpture, he joined a great knowledge of gardening. He was overseer of the king's gardens; but he sold the appointment to supply his extravagance, and retired to Paris to live by his pen. As a dramatic writer he acquired some celebrity. His follies were such that, as Le Sage has mentioned in the Diable Boiteux, he actually married his laundresses, thus to discharge his bills. Besides his comedies he wrote Cantatas and songs, which he himself set to music. He died 1724, aged 76. His works were collected in 6 vols. 12mo. and d'Alembert has drawn a parallel between him and Desfontaines as a comic writer.

FRETEAU DE ST. JUST, Emmanuel Marie Michael Philip, a French nobleman, who, through disappointment, embraced the popular party against the court at the revolution. After acquiring some popularity in the assembly and the convention by his speeches, he was marked for destruction by Robespierre, and was guillotined 15th June 1793, aged 49.

FREWEN, Accepted, an English prelate, born in Kent, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and president. He was chaplain to Charles I., 1631, was made dean of Gloucester, and in 1643, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. He was translated to York at the restoration, and died at Thorpe castle 1664, aged 75.

FREY, John Cecil, a German physician, who pretended to be the first in Europe who defended theses in philosophy in the Greek language. He died of the plague 1631, and his Opuscula appeared after his death by Baledrens.

FREYTAG, Frederic Gottlieb, a burgomaster of Nuremberg, who died 1776, aged 53. He was author of Rhinoceros Veterum Scriptorum Monumentis Descriptus, 1747 — Analecta Literaria de Libris Ra- rioribus, 1751 — Oratorum & Rhet. Græc. quibus Statuæ Honor. Causa positæ sunt, 1752 — an Account of scarce Books, &c. 1776, &c.

FREZIER, Amadée Francis, a native of Chambery, descended from a Scotch family. He took a survey of Chili and Peru, of which he published an account, 1716, and deserved the crosses of St. Lewis for his judicious labors in the fortifying of St. Maloes. He wrote a treatise on Les feux d'Artifice — Elements de Stereotomie, &c, and died at Brest 1772, aged 90.

FRIART, Rowland, an architect of the 17th century, who translated Palladio, and drew a parallel between ancient and modern architecture.

FRICHE, or FRISCHE, James de, a Benedictine, born in Normandy. He edited Ambrose's works, 10 vols. fol. Paris, and wrote the Life of St. Augustine, and died at Paris 1693, aged 52.

FRISCH, John Leonard, a native of Saltzbach, founder of the silk manufactures at Brandenburg, and the first encourager of the cultivation of the mulberry tree in Prussia. He belonged to the academy of Sciences at Berlin, and died there 1743, aged 77. He wrote a German and Latin Dictionary — a Description of German Insects — Dictionnaire Nouveau des Passages Francois Allemands, &c. 8vo.

FRISCHLIN, Nicodemus, a learned German, born at Baling, in Swabia, 1547. He was educated under his father, who was a minister, and at Tubingen, and so great were his powers that at the age of 13 he could write with elegance Greek and Latin poetry. He became, at 20, professor at Tubingen, and, in 1580, published an oration in praise of a country life, with a paraphrase on Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics. In this celebrated work he inveighed severely against courtiers, and the satire was felt and resented. Even his life was in danger, so that he fled to Laubach, in Carniola, where he opened a school; but the insalubrity of the air, and the ill health of his wife and children obliged him to return home. He afterwards passed to Frankfurt, and thence into Saxony, and to Brunswick, and at last, overpowered by his necessities, he wrote to the prince of Wirtemberg for relief; but his application was disregarded, and he was afterwards imprisoned in Wirtemberg castle. From this illiberal treatment he determined to escape, but unfortunately, in the attempt, the ropes which he used were so weak that he fell down a deep precipice, and was dashed to pieces on the rocks, in 1590. He left behind him the character of an unfortunate, persecuted man, whose abilities, however, were strongly exhibited in his tragedies, comedies, elegies, and elegant translations from Greek and Latin authors, and also by a well digested Latin Grammar.

FRISCHMUTH, John, a native of Franconia, who died rector of Jena university, 1687, aged 68. He was author of Illustrations and Dissertations on difficult Passages of Scripture.

FRISIUS, John, a native of Zurich. He became principal of the college there, and introduced the study of the Hebrew, and other oriental languages. Besides a Latin and German Dictionary he translated some of the the Scriptures into German from the Hebrew, and died 1565, aged 60. His son John James, was professor of theology and philosophy, and died 1610. Another son succeeded him as professor. Henry, of the same family, was professor of languages at Zurich, where he died 1718, author of a treatise De Sede Animæ Rationis — De Communionem Sanctorum, &c.

FRITH, John, Vid. FRYTH.

FRIZON, Peter, author of a History of French Cardinals — a History of the Grand Almoners of France — the Life of Spondæus, &c. and editor of the French Bible, translated by the Louvain divines, with notes, died at Paris, master of the jesuits' college of Navarre, 1651.

FROBENIUS, John, an eminent German printer, born at Hammelburg, Franconia. He was educated at Basil, and after great progress in literature began the business of printer there. The respectability of his character, and his constant care of never printing any thing offensive to morals and religion, produced him both celebrity and opulence. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and he printed his works. From his press issued a great many valuable editions of different authors, of Jerome, Augustine, &c. He had formed the design of publishing all the Greek fathers, but death prevented the completion. His death, which happened at Basil 1527, was supposed to have been occasioned by a fall five years before, which at last ended in a dead palsy. He was universally lamented; but by none more than Erasmus, who loved him sincerely, and who, in proof of his affection, wrote his epitaph in Greek and Latin. He left his business to his son Jerome Frobenius, and his son-in-law Nicolas Episcopius.

FROBISHER, sir Martin, a celebrated navigator, born near Doncaster in Yorkshire. He was early brought up to a sea life, and was the first Englishman who attempted to discover a north-west passage to China. After fruitless endeavours to complete his favorite scheme for 15 years, he at last obtained the protection of Dudley earl of Warwick, and with three barks he sailed from Deptford, 8th June 1576, in the sight of queen Elizabeth, who waving her hand bade him farewell. After visiting the coasts of Greenland, and penetrating to a Strait to which he gave his own name, he returned, and arrived at Harwich the 2d October. As he brought with him some of the produce of the lands which he visited, a black and heavy stone, which was on board, was discovered to contain gold, and in consequence a new expedition was quickly planned. With a ship of the royal navy and two barks, he sailed from Harwich 31st May 1577; and after passing by some very dreadful islands of ice on the coast of Friesland, he discovered and gave names to various bays and isles; and at last, after loading his ships with some of the golden ore of which he was in pursuit, he came back and reached England at the end of September. The queen received him with great condescension. The ore he had brought was examined before commissioners, and was proved to be valuable; and another expedition was prepared to make still further discoveries. The third expedition, consisting of 15 ships, sailed from Harwich on the 31st of May, and returned back with the usual success, at the beginning of October. Afterwards Frobisher served in sir Francis Drake's expedition to the West Indies; and three years after, in 1588, he commanded the Triumph in the defeat of the Spanish armada. He was knighted in his own ship for his great services; and afterwards was employed to command a fleet on the Spanish coast. In 1594, he supported Henry IV. against the leaguers and Spaniards; but in an attack against Croyzon near Brest, he was unfortunately wounded by a ball in the hip, 7th Nov. and died soon after, it is said, through the ignorance of his surgeon, who, by neglecting to extract the wadding, did not prevent the festering of the affected part. This brave man was buried at Plymouth.

FROELICH, Erasmus, a native of Gratz in Styria. He was a jesuit, and eminent for his knowledge of mathematics and medallic history. He wrote Quatuor Teutermia in Re Nummariâ, 4to. — Annales Regum Styriæ, fol. — de Figurâ Telluris, 4to. and died 1758, aged 58.

FROIDMONT, Libert, a native of Liege, dean of St. Peter's, and philosophical professor at Louvain. He wrote Dissertatio de Cometâ — Meteorologicorum Libri Quinque — Brevis Anatomia Hominis — in Actus Apostol. Commentar. He died 1653, aged 66.

FROILA, I. king of Spain after Alphonfus 757, is known for the famous victory which he obtained over the Saracens in Galicia 760. He established very excellent laws, but his murder of his brother Vimazan was cowardly and cruel; and in consequence of this he lost his life by the hand of his other brother Aurelius 768.

FROILA, II. succeeded his brother Ordoguo on the Spanish throne 923, and died of a leprosy two years after. He was so cruel in his government that the Castilians revolted against him.

FROISSARD or FROISSART, John, an eminent historian, born at Valenciennes 1337. Though bred to the church, he was fond of gaiety, and travelled through England, Scotland, Italy, and other places. He was for some time in great favor with Philippa, the queen of Edward III. and died canon and treasurer of Chinai about 1410. His "Chronicle" is a valuable work containing an account of the events which took place in England, France, and Spain, from 1326 to 1400. The best edition is that of Lyons, 4 vols. fol. 1599. It has been abridged by Sleidan, and continued to 1466 by Montrelet. It has been lately edited and elucidated by the labors of Mr. Johnes.

FROMAGE, Peter, a superior of the jesuits sent to Egypt and Syria. He published, in Arabic, various religious pieces, at St. John's monastery near Antura, where he had established a press. He died in Syria, after some years' residence there 1740.

FRONTEAU, John, a native of Angers, chanceller of Paris university, and afterwards prior of Benay in Angers, and St. Magdalen of Montargis, where he died 1662, aged 48. He wrote the Philosophy of Alamandus, — Antitheses Augustini & Calvini, — de Diebus Festivis, fol.

FRONTINUS,

FRONTINUS, Sextus Julius, a Roman writer under Trajan. He wrote de Re Agraria, — Libri Tres Strategematum, &c.

FRONTO, Marcus Cornelius, a Roman orator, preceptor to Verus and M. Aurelius.

FROWDE, Philip, an English poet, educated at Oxford, where his intimacy with Addison introduced him to the notice of the great. He was author of some very elegant Latin poems in the Musæ Anglicanæ, and wrote besides, two tragedies, "the Fall of Saguntum" and "Philotas." He died in Cecil-street, Strand 1738, leaving a most amiable character behind him. No man, says his biographer, could live more beloved, no private man could die more lamented.

FRUGONI, Charles Innocent, an Italian poet, born at Genoa 1692. He entered into the society of the Sommatiques, but afterwards with the pope's leave laid aside the clerical character, and became perpetual secretary to the academy of fine arts at Padua. He died 1768, aged 76. His works consisting of minor poems were published at Parma 1779 in 9 vols. 8vo.

FRUMENTIUS, a Romish saint, the apostle of the Æthiopians, among whom he was consecrated bishop 331, by Athanasius. He died 360.

FRYE, Thomas, a native of Dublin, who settled in London, where he acquired some eminence as a painter. He afterwards engaged in a china manufactory at Bow, but ill success obliged him to return to his pallet. He attempted also mezzotinto engraving. His picture of the prince of Wales painted for Sadlers-hall in 1738; was admired as a well executed piece. He died in London 1762, aged 52.

FRYTH, John, an English martyr, born at Seven Oaks in Kent. He was educated at King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he became one of the canons in Wolfey's college. The acquaintance and conversation of Tyndale converted him to the tenets of Luther, for which he was imprisoned. Upon his liberation in 1528 he left England, and two years after returned, and began with increased zeal to preach his opinions. His influence was so great that he was sent to the Tower by sir Thomas More, and refusing to recant he was condemned by the catholic commission, and was burnt in Smithfield 1533. He wrote several treatises against popery, which were reprinted in London in fol. 1573.

FUCHSIUS, or FUCHS, Leonard, a physician and botanist, born 1501, at Wemdingen in Bavaria. He practised at Munich and Ingoldstadt, and was raised to equestrian honors by Charles V. He died 1566, aged 65. The best known of his works is, "Historia Stirpium," 1543, folio, Bale.

FUESSLI, John Gaspard, a native of Zurich, eminent as an artist and as a respectable man. He wrote the History of the Artists of Switzerland, a work of merit, and died 1782, aged 76. His son of the same name was a bookseller at Zurich, and published some interesting works on entomology. He died 1786.

FUGGER, Huldric, a learned man, born at Augsburg in 1526, of an ancient and opulent family. He spent much of his property in the purchasing of books and manuscripts, which he printed at the presses of Henry Stephens, but his relations were so displeased with his extravagance, as they called it, in the protection and encouragement of literature, that they had him declared by a court of justice incapable of managing his affairs. He retired to Heidelberg, where he died 1584, bequeathing his library to the elector Palatine, with a fund for the decent maintenance of six scholars.

FULBERT, an Italian, educated under pope Sylvester II. He acquired great celebrity in France as a public preacher, and obtained the bishopric of Chartres. He wrote with strong zeal against Berengarius on the eucharist, and was the first who introduced into France the worship paid to the Virgin Mary. He died 1028. His works and letters are extant.

FULDA, Charles Frederic, a native of Wimpfen in Swabia, eminent as a Lutheran divine, and also as a mechanic. He died at Einzig 1788, aged 66. He was author of a Dictionary of the German Roots — an Enquiry into Language — on the Origin of the Goths — on the Cimbri — on the Deities of Germany — a Chart of History, &c.

FULGENTIUS, St. an ecclesiastical writer, born of a noble family at Talepta about 468. After a liberal education he took the monastic vows, and founded a monastery. He was elected bishop of Vinta in 507, and afterwards of Ruspa, but he shared the persecution of the African prelates, and was banished by Thrasimond, king of the Vandals, into Sardinia. After the death of Thrasimond he returned to Africa, and died there 533, the first day of the year, aged 55. Of the works of this learned father, the best edition is that of Paris, 4to. 1684.

FULGINAS, Sigismund, a writer of the 15th century, in the service of pope Julius II. He wrote an history of his own times.

FULKE, William, an English divine, born in London, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1564. He spent six years at Clifford's Inn, but his fondness for literature was greater than his partiality for the law, though against the wishes of his father. In consequence of his acquaintance with Cartwright, he was suspected of puritanism, and was expelled from his college, but the patronage of the earl of Leicester restored him to public favor, and presented him 1571 to the living of Warley, Essex, and two years after to Didington, Suffolk. He afterwards took his degree of D. D. at Cambridge, and accompanied as chaplain his patron when ambassador to France, and on his return he was made master of Pembroke hall, and Margaret professor. He died 1589. He wrote several works in Latin and English, chiefly against the papists, and dedicated to queen Elizabeth, and to her favorite Leicester. His Comment upon the Rheims Testament is the most known of his works. It appeared in 1580, and again in 1601, 1617, and 1633, in fol.

FULLER, Nicolas, was born at Southampton 1557, and educated at the free school there. He became secretary to Horne bishop of Winchester, and to Watson his successor, and afterwards he went as tutor to a Mr. Knight's sons at St. John's college, Oxford, and took his degrees in arts at Hart hall. He became prebendary of Salisbury, and rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, and died 1622. He was an able scholar, well skilled in Hebrew, and superior to all the critics of his time. His "Miscellanea Theologica," in four four books, a valuable book was published in Oxford 1616, and London 1617, and it is inserted with some other works in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum. Some of his MSS. are preserved in the Bodleian library.

FULLER, Thomas, an English historian and divine, born in 1608, at Akle in Northamptonshire, where his father was minister. His proficiency was so great that at the age of 12 he was sent to Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and afterwards removed to Sidney college, of which he was chosen fellow 1631. That year he obtained a prebend at Salisbury, and was afterwards presented to the living of Broad Windsor, Dorsetshire, where he married. Upon the loss of his wife about 1641, he removed to London, and became minister of the Savoy. In 1642 he preached at Westminster abbey, and gave such offence in his sermon by his zealous support of the royal cause, that his life was considered in danger. He joined the king at Oxford in 1643, but his sermon there, before his royal master, appeared as lukewarm, as that at Westminster had been interpreted as violent, a strong proof no doubt of the moderation to which he warmly exhorted all parties. In 1644 he was chaplain to lord Hopton, and was left with part of his army at Basing house when it was besieged by sir William Waller, and in this situation he behaved with such courage that the parliamentary general raised the siege with loss. Fuller afterwards retired to Exeter, where he was chaplain to the princess Henrietta, and where he continued during the siege of the city, and at the close of the war he returned to London, and became a popular preacher at St. Clement's lane, and afterwards at St. Bride's Fleet-street. In 1648 he was presented to the living of Waltham, in Essex, by lord Carlisle, and in 1654 he married a sister of viscount Baltinglass. At the restoration, he found himself a favorite at court, and took his degree of D. D. and would have risen to a bishopric, had not a fever unfortunately carried him off, 16th Aug. 1661. His funeral was attended by 200 of his brethren, and a sermon was preached over him by dean Hardy. The most celebrated of his works are "the Church History of Britain, from the birth of Christ, till 1648", with the History of Cambridge University, and the History of Waltham-abbey annexed, 1656 — History of the Worthies of England, a valuable book, published in 1662, fol. — Good Thoughts, in Bad Times, and in Worse Times — the History of the Holy War, 1640, fol. — the Holy State, fol. 1642 — Pisgah Sight of Palestine, and the Confines thereof, with the History of the Old and New Testament, 1650 — Abel Redivivus, or English divines, 1651, 4to. — the Speech of Birds, moral and mystical, 8vo. 1660 — Andronicus, or the Unfortunate Politician, 1649, 8vo. besides sermons, &c. His Church History was attacked with severity by Dr. Heylin, and ably defended, but with such moderation that the two antagonists were reconciled in lasting friendship. Dr. Fuller left a son by each of his two wives. He was, in private as well as public life, a very respected and amiable character. His memory is said to have been uncommonly retentive, so that he could repeat a sermon verbatim, after once hearing it, and once after walking from Temple-bar to the end of Cheap-side, he mentioned all the signs, on both sides of the way, either backwards or forwards. He was, in his conversation, very humorous. It is said that he once travelled with a friend of the name of Sparrowhawk, and he could not but ask him jocosely what was the difference between an Owl and a Sparrowhawk. The difference is very great, replied his companion, eyeing his corpulent person with a smile, for it is Fuller in the head, fuller in the body, and fuller all over.

FULLER, Isaac, an English painter of some celebrity. The resurrection in All Soul's college-chapel, and that of Magdalen college, and an historical piece only in two colors, in Wadham college, Oxford, are excellent proofs of his great abilities. He studied under Perrier, in France, and was very accurate in the anatomy of his figures but he often offended in decency and historical truth. He died at the end of the second Charles' reign in London.

FULLO, Peter, a heretical bishop of Antioch, during the exile of Martyrius in the fifth century. He maintained with the Eutychian tenets, that all the three persons of the trinity suffered on the cross.

FULVIA, wife of Mark Antony, known for her hatred against Cicero. When the orator's head was brought to her she pierced the tongue repeatedly with a silver bodkin.

FUNCCIUS or FUNCK, John Nicholas, a celebrated critic, born at Marburg in 1693. He was educated at the university of Rintlen, and wrote some very able and learned treatises, de Origine Latinæ Linguae, and de Pueritiâ Latinæ Linguae, &c. He died 1778.

FURETIERE, Anthony, a lawyer born at Paris 1620, and eminent as an advocate in the parliament. He afterwards took orders, and became abbot of Châlvy and prior of Chuines. He was expelled in 1685 from the French academy, on the accusation that he had composed "a Dictionary of the French Tongue" which, being borrowed from the same materials, was intended to supersede their's. This valuable work was published two years after his death, in 1690, 2 vols. folio.

FURINI, Francesco, a painter of Florence, who died 1646, aged 42. His bathing nymphs were particularly admired, but he displayed in his figures more elegance than regard to decency.

FURIUS BIBACULUS, a Latin poet of Cremona, author of some annals and satires, 100 B. C.

FURNEAUX, Philip, a non-conformist born at Totness, Devonshire. He was assitant to a dissenting congregation in Southwark, and afterwards lecturer at Salters' hall, and in 1753 he succeeded Lowman at Clapham. He was complimented with the degree of D. D. from a Scotch university, and died 1783, aged 59. He wrote an Essay on Toleration, and letters to judge Blackstone on his Exposition of the Toleration Act.

FURST, Walter, or FURSTIUS, a Swiss, revered as one of the founders of the liberty of his country. He seized in 1307, with some of his brave countrymen, the forts by which his country was enslaved under Albert of Austria, and by their demolition the independence of the Swiss was re-established.

FURSTEMBERG, Ferdinand de, a native of Westphalia, promoted in the church by pope Alexander VII.

FUS

FYO

VII. and in 1678 made bishop of Munster, and apotolical vicar of Northern Europe. He published Monumenta Paderbornensia 1672, 4to. — a Collection of Latin poems, &c. and was a liberal patron of literature, and encouraged strenuously the propagation of christianity in foreign parts. He died 1683, aged 57.

FUSI, Anthony, a doctor of the Sorbonne, minister of St. Bartholomew church at Paris. He was imprisoned by the jesuits, whose opinions and conduct he opposed, and accused of incontinency and heresy, but he was afterwards set free, and retired to Geneva where he publicly embraced the protestant tenets. He wrote against the errors and corruptions of the Romish church, besides an account of his own case, &c. He died 1630.

FUST or FAUST, John, a goldsmith of Mentz, to whom, with Guttemberg and Schæffer, is attributed the invention of printing. It is more probable that he only assisted Guttemberg with money, to enable him to make moveable metal types at Strasburg in 1444. Koster, however, at Harlaem invented, in 1430, the cutting of wooden blocks, and Schæffer, in 1452, found out the method of casting metal types. The first printed book with metallic types is Durandi Rationale Divinorum Officiorum 1459, and afterwards Catholicon Joannis Januensis, though it is said that there is a psalter, with the date of 1457 printed at Mentz. Fust died at Paris 1466 of the plague. The report of his being arrested as a magician at Paris, for having in his possession various copies of the bible in unusual exactness, is false.

FUZELIER, Lewis, a dramatic writer of Paris, who also conducted the Mercury, a periodical work, from 1744 to 1752, when he died aged 80. His tragedies, operas, &c. were written with ease and spirit.

FYOT DE LA MARCHE, Claude, count of Bosjam, a native of Dijon, highly honored by Lewis XIV. and made counsellor of state, and prior of Notre Dame. He wrote an History of the Abbey of St. Stephen, fol. and some religious tracts, and died at Dijon 1721, aged 91.

GAB

GAC

GAAAL, Barent, a Dutch landscape painter, the disciple of P. Wouwermans. He was born about 1650, and by imitating his master acquired some celebrity.

GABBIANI, Antonio Domenico, a painter of Florence, patronized by the duke Cosimo III. and sent by him to Rome to improve himself. He was killed by a fall from a scaffold 1726, aged 74.

GABINIUS, Aulus, a Roman consul, employed against Alexander king of Judæa. He placed Ptolemy Auletes on the Egyptian throne, and died B. C. 40.

GABRIEL, Severus, a Greek bishop, born at Monembasia in Peloponnesus. He was made bishop of Philadelphia, but, in 1577, came to Venice, and presided over the Greeks in that republic. His various tracts on theological subjects, Greek and Latin, were published Paris 1671, 4to.

GABRIEL, Sionite, a Maronite, once professor of oriental languages at Rome, died at Paris 1648, then professor of Syriac and Arabic. He assisted le Jay in the polyglot bible, and published a translation of the Arabic geography, called Geographia Nubienfis, in 1619, 4to.

GABRIEL, James, a French architect, the pupil of Mansard. He was born at Paris, and died 1742, aged 77. His merit, as the able builder of several noble edifices in France, placed him in the office of inspector general of buildings, gardens, arts, and manufactures, and of first architect and engineer of bridges and public ways in the kingdom. He was also knight of the order of St. Michael.

GABRIELLE, de Bourbon, daughter of count de Montpensier, married, 1485, Lewis de la Tremouille, who was killed at the battle of Pavia 1525. Her son Charles count of Talmond, was also killed at the battle of Marignan 1515, and she died 1516. Her virtues were very great, and some published treatises remain as proofs of her great piety and devotion.

GABRINO, Augustine, a fanatic of Brescia, who called himself prince of the number seven, and monarch of the holy Trinity. His followers amounting to 80 called themselves Knights of the Apocalypse. He rushed into a church on palm Sunday 1694, while the priests were singing Who is the king of glory? and with a drawn sword he proclaimed himself the king of glory. He was confined in a mad house, and his sect dispersed.

GABRINO, Vid. RIENZI.

GABURET, Nicolas, an eminent French surgeon, under Lewis XIII. He died 1662, at an advanced age.

GACON, Francis, a French poet, born at Lyons. He became father of the oratory, and died at his priory of Baillon 1727, aged 58. He is known for his severe satires against Bossuet, Rousseau, la Motte and others. Though he had personally attacked almost all the members of the academy, yet the poetical prize was adjudged to him in 1717. The best of his works is a translation of Anacreon. His other pieces are chiefly Satirical.

GADDESDEN,

GADDESSEN, John of, an Englishman, the first employed as physician at the court. He wrote "Rosa Anglica" a treatise which contains a compendium of all the practice of physic in England in his time. He was an ecclesiastic and had preferment, and as a medical man was very superstitious, though superior to others of his time.

GADDI, Gaddo, a painter of Florence, who died 1312, aged 73. His works were chiefly Mosaic, he also excelled in designs.

GADDI, Taddeo, son of the above was born at Florence, and died 1350, aged 50. A crucifixion by him is still preserved at Arezzo.

GADDI, Agnolo, the son and pupil of Taddeo, died 1387, aged 60. He successfully imitated his father.

GAELIN, Alexander Van, a Dutch painter who died 1728, aged 58. He was in London, and painted three battles between Charles I. and Cromwell, besides a picture of the battle of the Boyne.

GAERTNER, Joseph, a native of Calu in Swabia, son to the physician of the duke of Wirtemberg. He studied at Tubingen, but his fondness for natural history was so great that he abandoned divinity to devote himself more fully to his favorite pursuits, and to mathematics and medicine. He next attended the lectures of Haller at Gottingen, and after travelling over part of Europe he took the degree of M. D. and in 1759 applied himself to botany and vegetable anatomy at Leyden. His visit to England was marked by his friendly reception among men of rank and of science, he was made fellow of the royal society and enriched the philosophical transactions with a curious paper on the fructification and propagation of Conservae, &c. In 1768, he was honorably appointed professor of botany and natural history at Petersburg, and was thus enabled to examine the natural curiosities of the Ukraine with the eye and attention of a philosopher and botanist. He returned to Swabia in 1770, and, in 1778, again visited London to finish the drawings and figures for his great work called Carpology, which he dedicated to sir Joseph Banks. This indefatigable naturalist died 1791, aged 59, leaving behind him many valuable manuscripts, &c.

GÆTANO SCPIO, a Florentine painter, who died 1588, aged 38. His portraits and historical pieces are much admired.

GAFFARELL, James, a French writer, born at Mannes, in Provence, 1601, and educated at the university of Apt, in that province. He studiously devoted himself to the Hebrew language, and to Rabbinical learning, and at the age of 22 wrote a large 4to. volume in defence of the mysterious doctrine of the Cabala. He was appointed librarian to Richelieu, and enabled by his munificence to travel into Italy to make a collection of valuable books and manuscripts. On his return his abilities were employed by his patron in the difficult and unavailing task of reconciling the protestants to the papists. He died at Sigonce, where he was abbot, 1681, aged 81. By the recommendation of Richelieu, whom he survived many years, he was dean of canon law at Paris, prior of Revest de Brouffe, and commandant of St. Omeil. His works are numerous, learned, and curious. The most known are "Unheard of Curiosities concerning the Talismanic Sculpture of the Persians, — the Horoscope of the Patriarchs and the Reading of the Stars," a work which passed through three editions in six months, and in asserting some bold things concerning magic, drew upon the author the censures of the Sorbonne, — History of the Subterranean World, with an account of Grottoes, Vaults, and Catacombs, seen during his travels, with plates, left unfinished at his death — a treatise of Good and Evil Genii, &c. Though learned he was very superstitious, and more fond of magic than became his knowledge of the world, and his experience.

GAFFURIO, Franchino, a native of Lodi, who became head of the choir in Milan cathedral, and also musical professor. He wrote in Latin, Theoricum Opus Musicæ Disciplinæ — Practica Musicæ Utriusque Cantus — Angelicum & Divinum Opus Musicæ, Maternâ Linguâ Scriptum — de Harmoniâ Musicæ Instrumenti. &c. He died at Milan, 1520, aged 69.

GAGE, Thomas, an Irishman, monk among the Spanish jacobins, sent as missionary to the Philippines 1625. He acquired some property in his mission, which he came to enjoy in England, where in 1651, he published his account of the East-Indies, translated into French, by order of Colbert, 1676.

GAGNIER, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, and educated there. He was a most able orientalist, and upon abandoning the popish faith, for the tenets of the English church, he came to England, where, in honor of his merits, the two universities conferred on him the degree of M. A. He lived some time at Oxford, by teaching Hebrew, but during the absence, and after the death, of Dr. Wallis, he was appointed Arabic professor, and delivered lectures to the university, with universal approbation, till his death 1725. In 1706, he edited Jos. Ben Gorion's History of the Jews, in Hebrew, with a Latin translation, and notes 4to. and in 1723, he published Abulfeda's life of Mahomet, in Arabic, with a Latin translation in fol. His translation of Abulfeda's description of Arabia, had appeared in Hudson's Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores, 1712, 8vo.

GAGUIN, Robert, a French historian, born at Colines, near Amiens, and educated at Paris, where he took his doctor's degree in law. His abilities were employed by Charles VIII. and Lewis XII. in embassies to England, Germany, and Italy. He was royal librarian, and general of the Unitarians, and died 1501, advanced in years. His chief work is "De Gestis Francorum" from 1200 to 1500 in 11 books folio, Lyons, 1524.

GAICHES, John, priest of the oratory, and canon of Soissons, was author of Academical discourses — Maxims for Pulpit Orators, &c. and died at Paris 1731, aged 83.

GAILLARD, de Lonjumeau, bishop of Apt, from 1673, to his death 1695, is to be recorded as being the

the first projector of an universal historical dictionary. In the execution of his useful work, he patronised his almoner Moreri, and enabled him to consult the libraries of Europe, and the Vatican. According to Moreri's dedication of his first edition, Gaillard was a man of eminent virtues, exemplary in public and private life, and distinguished as the encourager of literature, and of learned men.

GAINAS, a Goth, who by his valor, became a general under Arcadius, and ruined and destroyed Rufinus, and the eunuch Eutropius, who were the favorites of their imperial master. He invaded and desolated Thrace, because refused a church for the Arians, according to the promise of Arcadius at Chalcedonia, and was at last killed near the Danube, A. D. 400, and his head carried in triumph through the streets of Constantinople.

GAINSBOROUGH, Thomas, an English painter, born at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1727. He was self taught, and after trying the powers of his genius, in delineating the scenes of the country, he came to London, where he acquired celebrity, by the superior stile of his portraits, and the elegant simplicity of his landscapes. He was of a very benevolent turn of mind, and it is said that he impoverished himself by his extensive liberality. He died 1788, aged 61. His eldest brother was also eminent as an artist, and another, minister of a dissenting congregation at Henley, Oxon, was said to be a very able and ingenious mechanic.

GALADIN, Mahomet, a popular emperor of the Moguls, who died 1605. He gave twice a day audience to his subjects, and was very careful that their complaints should be listened to and redressed, for which purpose he had a bell in his room, with a rope descending into the street, to the ringing of which he punctually attended.

GALANTINI, Hippolito, a painter of Genoa, called also Capucino, as belonging to the fraternity of Capuchins. His miniatures possess delicacy, and expression. He died 1706, aged 79.

GALANUS, Clement, an Italian of the order of the Theatin monks, for some years a missionary in Armenia. His grammar of the Armenian tongue, appeared at Rome, 1650, and also some treatises in that language, with Latin translations, 2 vols. fol.

GALAS, Matthew, a general who from being page to baron Beaufremont, so distinguished himself by his valor and intrepidity under marshal Tilly, that he succeeded him in the command of the imperial forces. After being in the service of the emperor Frederic II. and of Philip the IV. of Spain, he fell into disgrace in consequence of the loss of a battle, against Torstenfon, the Swede, near Magdebourg. He was restored afterwards to favor, but died shortly after, at Vienna, 1647, leaving behind the character of a very great general.

GALATEO FERRARI, Antonio, a scholar, and physician, born at Galatina, in the territory of Otranto. He was physician to the king of Naples, but retired from the court through ill health, and died at Lecce, in his native province, 1517, aged 73. He wrote "a Description of Iapygia" — a tract in praise of the Gout — Latin verses — a treatise on the Elements, &c.

GALATIN, Peter, author of the valuable work, de Arcanis Catholicæ Veritatis, edited best in 1672, fol. was a Franciscan monk, about 1530.

GALBA, Servius Sulpicius, emperor of Rome after Nero, was slain by the pretorian guards, who had raised Otho to the imperial throne, in his stead, A. D. 69.

GALE, John, a baptist preacher, born May 26th 1680, in London. At the age of 17 he was an able scholar, and passed to Leyden to complete his studies, and there took, in his 19th year, his degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy. From Leyden where his abilities had been acknowledged with universal applause, he went to Amsterdam, and studied under Limborch, and began a lasting intimacy with J. le Clerc. Soon after his return home in 1703, the university of Leyden offered him the degree of D. D. if he would assent to the articles of Dordt, which he refused. In 1711 he published his Reflections on Wall's Defence of Infant Baptism, and so high was the character of this work, that he acquired great influence among the dissenters. At the age of 35 he began to preach among the people of his persuasion, and became one of the ministers of St. Paul's alley near Barbican. A meeting upon the disputed subject of baptism, took place between Wall and Gale, but though each endeavoured to convince the other, both parted dissatisfied, and Wall published soon after in 1719, his Defence of the History of Infant Baptism, which was so highly respected that the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D. D. To this defence it is said that Gale prepared an answer, which death prevented him from completing. He died of a fever Dec. 1721, aged 42. Besides the book already mentioned, Gale published some sermons, 4 vols. of which appeared in a second edition, 8vo. 1726. He was in private life a respectable character, much esteemed by bishops Hoadly and Bradford, and by chancellor King.

GALE, Theophilus, a learned dissenter, born 1628, at King's Teignton, Devonshire, where his father was vicar. He entered at Magdalen college, Oxford in 1647, and in 1649 in consequence of his great proficiency in literature, he was presented with his degree of bachelor in arts. In 1650 he was chosen fellow of his college, and became an active tutor. He afterwards became a popular preacher and settled at Winchester, but at the restoration he was ejected from his fellowship for refusing to conform, and in 1662 attended as tutor the two sons of lord Wharton to Caen university in Normandy. He returned in 1665, and the following year saw the city of London in flames, but in the midst of the general calamity he had the good fortune to find his papers saved from the conflagration, and "the Court of the Gentiles," was destined to appear before the public. He assisted Rowe in the ministry of his congregation in Holborn, and succeeded him in 1677, and then took a few private pupils at Newington. He died March 1678, and as a proof of his attachment to the nonconformists, he left his property to trustees for the education of students in his own persuasion, and he also bequeathed his library for the promotion of the same principles in New England. Besides his Court of the Gentiles published in four parts, between 1669 and 1677, in which he proved that the theology and philosophy of the pagans were derived from the holy scriptures, he wrote "the True Idea of Jansenism," 4to. 1669 — the Anatomy of Infidelity, &c. 8vo. — a Summary of the two Covenants, and other tracts.

GALE, Thomas, a learned divine, born 1636 at Scruton, Yorkshire, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and M. A. 1662. His great abilities recommended him to be professor of Greek in the university, and in 1672 he was elected master of St. Paul's school, and had the honor to receive a handsome present of plate from the city, for writing the inscription on the monument which records the conflagration of London. In 1675 he took his degrees of B. D. and D. D. and the next year became prebendary of St. Paul's, and was made member of the Royal society in consequence of his presenting that learned body some curiosities, especially a Roman urn with ashes, found at Peckham in Surrey. After presiding with great popularity and national advantage over his school for 25 years he was made dean of York in 1697, and showed his liberality by not only presenting the new library of his college with five Arabic MSS. but by improving the cathedral, and displaying the hospitality of a virtuous and noble minded dignitary. He died at his deanery, 8th April, 1702, aged 67, and was buried in the middle of the cathedral. Though engaged the best part of life in active and laborious employments, he yet devoted much of his time to literature and classical learning. He published in 1671, the Greek Mythologic Authors, Ethic and Physical — Historiæ Poeticæ Scriptores, 1675 — Rhetores Selecti, Gr. and Lat. 1676 — Jamblicus, &c. 1678 — Herodoti Historia, Gr. and Lat. 1679 — Cicero's works, 2 vols. folio, 1681, and 4 — Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores quinque, 1687, fol. — Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Ang. Danicæ Scriptores quindecim, &c. 1691, fol. and other works.

GALE, Roger, esq. F. R. and A. S. S. son of the dean, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1697. He was a man of large property, and represented North Allerton in three parliaments, and was commissioner of excise. He was the first president of the Antiquarian society, and treasurer to the Royal society. He was considered as one of the most learned and polite scholars of the age. He died at Scruton 25th June 1744, aged 72. He published Antonini Iter Britanniarum Commentariis Illustratum, T. G. 1709, 4to. — the Knowledge of Medals, by F. Jobert, translated from the French, and other works. He left his MSS. to Trinity college, Cambridge, and his cabinet of Roman coins to the public library there.

GALE, Samuel, the youngest of the three sons of dean Gale, was a man of some learning. He published some essays in the Archæologia, and died 1754, aged 72.

GALEANO, Joseph, a physician of Palermo, eminent also for his knowledge of classical and polite literature. He died 1675, aged 70, much regretted. He wrote several treatises on his profession, and especially "Hippocrates Redivivus, &c." 1650, besides the smaller pieces of the Sicilian poets, 5 vols.

GALEN, Claudius, a celebrated physician of Pergamus, who practised at Rome under Aurelius with great success. He died A. D. 201. He wrote 300 volumes on his profession, &c.

GALEN, Matthew, a native of Zealand, professor of divinity, and afterwards chancellor of Douay university. He wrote Commentarium de Catholico & Christiano Sacerdote, 4to. — de Originibus Monasti. — de Missæ Sacrifici. — de Sæculi Nostri Choreis, &c. and died 1573.

GALEN, Bernard Van, a native of Westphalia, known as a bishop, and as a general. He was originally in the service of the elector of Cologne, and then took orders and became canon, and then bishop of Munster, but when the pope refused to confirm his elevation, he determined to secure his power by having a garrison of soldiers devoted to his own interest. The citizens in vain interfered, Galen was resolved to have recourse to arms, but hostilities were suspended, and his attention was drawn to the war against the Turks, in which he had an important command. In this however he did not engage, but in 1665, he attacked the United States. Though pacified by the interference of France, he again in 1672, formed a league with England and France, against the States, and afterwards directed his arms against Sweden, in conjunction with Denmark, and distinguished himself in this war, as he had done before, by great valor, but not unmixed with cruelty. He died 19th Sep. 1678, aged 74, little regretted by his people, whom his ambition and intrigues had contributed to render dissatisfied, and unhappy.

GALEOTI, Nicholas, an Italian jesuit, author of the lives of the generals of his order, in Latin, and Italian, 1748 — Notes on the Musæum Odescalcum, 2 vols. fol. &c. died 1748.

GALEOTI, Marcio, a native of Narni, in the papal territories. He instructed youth at Bologna, and afterwards in Hungary, where he became known to the king, Matthias Corvinus, who made him his secretary, and appointed him over the education of his son John, and librarian of Buda. He was invited by Lewis XI. into France, and came to Lyons to meet the king. The unexpected meeting of the king at the gates of the city proved fatal to Galeoti; he, descending too hastily from his chariot, to pay his respects to his majesty, fell down, and being very corpulent, so much injured himself that he died soon after. He published, in 1748, the Bon Mots of Matthias Corvinus, and also a treatise in 4to. "De Homine Interiore, & de Corpore ejus."

GALERIUS, C. Valerius Maximianus, from a herdsman in Dacia became emperor of Rome, and married Diocletian's daughter. He was warlike, and died 311.

GALGACUS, a Caledonian chief, famous for his noble resistance against the invasion of the Romans under Agricola.

GALIANI, Ferdinand, a noble writer, born at Chieti, in Abruzzi, and educated under his uncle the archbishop of of Tarento. In 1750 he published his work on Money and Specie, in consequence of the scarcity of cash in the two Sicilies, and in 1772 appeared his Catalogue of Stones found near Vefuvius, which he presented to Benedict XIV. with this inscription on one of the boxes which contained the collection: Beatissime pater, fac ut lapides isti fiant panes. The witty sentence procured a living from the pope, and Galiani, in 1759, was sent as secretary to the embassy at Paris, where his genius and his talents were seen and admired by the French literati. He returned, in 1779, from Paris, and died at Naples 1787. Besides his anonymous dialogues on the corn trade, written while at Paris, and which possessed merit, he published a Commentary on Horace — a treatise on the Duties of Princes towards belligerent powers, &c.

GALIGAI, Eleonora, the wife of Concini, marechal D'Ancre, was daughter of a joiner and a washerwoman in Italy. She was foster-sister to Mary of Medicis, who loved her with strong affection and to this partiality were owing her greatness and misfortunes. She came to France with her patrons, and though her features were plain and even disgusting, she married Concini. In this elevated situation, she did not shew that moderation and self-command which her great powers of mind seemed to promise. She was haughty and imperious, and by her conduct soon gave offence to Louis XIII. the son of her partial mistress, who, with the cruelty of those barbarous times, caused her husband to be assassinated, and herself to be brought to trial, though no crime but that of being a favorite and of governing the queen, could be proved against her. She was charged with sorcery; and when questioned by what magic she had so fascinated her mistress, she made this well known answer, "By that power which strong minds naturally possess over the weak." She was condemned in May, and the July following 1617, she was executed. She had a son and daughter; the daughter died young, and the son returned to Italy to enjoy the vast possessions which his mother's good fortune had heaped together.

GALILEI, Galileo, a celebrated astronomer and mathematician, was born at Florence 19th February, 1564. His father, who was a Florentine nobleman, wished him to apply to medicine, but his stronger attachment to mathematics prevailed, and so rapid was his progress, that in 1589 he was appointed mathematical professor at Pisa. His opposition there to the prevalent maxims of Aristotle, rendered his situation unpleasant, and in 1592 he removed to Padua, and obtained a professor's chair. His treatise on "Mechanics," and his "Balance," or the problem of Archimedes about the crown, now made him known as a man of genius and application. In 1609, while at Venice, he heard of the invention of the telescope by James Metius in Holland, and he immediately applied the powers of his mind to construct and improve that astonishing instrument, by which he penetrated into unknown regions, and displayed the heavens in a new light. He discovered mountains in the moon, and first observed four of the satellites which attend the planet Jupiter, to which he gave the name of Medicean stars in honor of his patron duke Cosmo II. He was in 1610 re-established at Pisa by the duke, with a handsome salary, and he continued his observations on the heavens, and observed the phases of Venus; but his discoveries were too astonishing and too opposite to the doctrines of Aristotle, to escape the censure of the philosophers of the age. No sooner did he embrace the Copernican system, and assert that the sun, disfigured by spots, remains immoveable in the centre of the universe, and that the earth turns round in annual and diurnal motions, than he was summoned before the inquisition for opinions so false in philosophy, and so heretical, and so contrary to the word of God. After a year's confinement in the inquisition prison, he was restored to liberty 1616, on the promise of renouncing his heretical opinions; but considering forced oaths as not obligatory, he continued his discoveries in the planetary system. In 1632, his dialogues on the two systems of Ptolemy and Copernicus, drew down upon him the vengeance of the monks. Though indeed he left the question undecided, yet he wished to lean to the opinions of Copernicus, and by thus overthrowing the philosophy of Aristotle, and in bold language ridiculing the blindness of his followers, he shewed himself an obstinate heretic. He was therefore cited before the inquisition at Rome, and after being made to abjure his errors, and doing penance for his offences, by repeating every week the seven penitential psalms, he was detained in prison till 1634. Indignant at the cruelty of this treatment, and the bigotry and blindness of his persecutors, he yet continued his pursuits; but in silence and fear. His excessive application, and the constant use of his telescope, together with frequent exposure to the night air, had such effect upon him, that in 1639 this venerable man lost his sight. He died three years after at Arcetri near Florence, 8th Jan. 1642, aged 78. Galileo has thus immortalized himself by his important discoveries; he first observed the inequalities on the surface of the moon, and knew her vibration; he planned the accurate calculation of the longitude by the eclipses of the Medicean stars; he invented the cycloid, and observed the increasing celerity in the descent of bodies. His works were collected in 3 vols. 4to. 1718, but it is said that his wife permitted a fanatic monk to peruse, and consequently to destroy many of his valuable manuscripts. His son Vincenzo was a man of genius and abilities, and author of some treatises and inventions in mechanics and music. Among Galileo's pupils, were Vincenzo Viviani the mathematician, Toricelli the inventor of the barometer, &c.

GALISSONNIERE, Rolland Michael Barria marquis, a French admiral, born at Rochefort, 11th Nov. 1693. After serving with distinction in the navy, he was made governor of Canada 1745, and in 1756 he had a severe engagement near Minorca with the English fleet under Byng. He died the same year at Nemours, 17th Oct. deservedly respected by the nation for bravery, humanity, and benevolence.

GALLAND, Augustus, a French counsellor of state, well acquainted with the laws, the history, and royal rights of his country. He wrote Memoirs for the History of France and Navarre, folio — a treatise on the Ensigns and Standards of France, &c. He died about 1644, but at what age is unknown.

GALLAND, Antony, a French antiquary, born of poor parents at Rollo, in Picardy, 1646. He was educated at Noyon and Paris, and in consequence of his great knowledge of the Hebrew and the oriental languages, he was sent to travel in the East by Colbert, and at his return he enriched the literature of his country by his publications. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, and professor of Arabic at Paris, where he died 1715. He published a Collection of Maxims and Bon Mots from oriental writers — a treatise on the Origin of Coffee — an Account of the Death of the Sultan Osman, &c. — Arabian Nights' Entertainments, and some curious dissertations on medals, &c.

GALLE, or GALLEUS, Servatius, pastor of the Walloon church at Haerlem, wrote Dissertationes de Sibyllis & Oraculis, 1688, 4to. — besides an edition of Lactantius, with notes, 1660, 8vo. — and of the Sibylline Oracles, with notes, &c. He died 1709.

GALLET, N. a French spice merchant, who died at Paris June 1757. He is known for some short comic pieces, which appeared on the French theatre with applause. He wrote also songs and poetical trifles, with great neatness and pleasing variety.

GALLIENUS, a Roman emperor, son of Valerian. He was assassinated 268.

GALLIGAI, Vid. GALIGAI.

GALLITZIN, Basil, a noble Russian, in great favor with the regent princess Sophia during the minority of the Czars Peter I. and Iwan, who reigned jointly. He was unfortunate in his military expeditions against the Tartars, and his influence was greatly diminished. When the princess regent was discovered in her secret intrigues to destroy the Czar Peter, and to raise her favorite to the throne by marrying him, she was confined to a monastery near Moscow, and Gallitzin banished to Kargapol, in Siberia. He afterwards recovered his liberty, and retired to a monastery, where he died in great austerity 1713, at the age of 80. Though unsuccessful in his ambitious views, he was a man of great merit, whose attention introduced improvement and civilization into the Russian empire, and prepared the way for the illustrious reign of Peter the Great.

GALLITZIN, Michael Michaelowitz, prince of, of the same family as the preceding, was born 1674, and distinguished himself under Peter the Great against Charles XII. of Sweden. He commanded 10 years in Finland, and concluded the peace of Neustadt. He died 1730, field-marshal, and president of the college of war, and highly respected as an able minister and meritorious general. At the victory of Lerna he asked only the pardon of one of the captives for the reward of his services.

GALLOCHE, Lewis, a painter of the French school, who died rector and chancellor of the Royal academy 1761, aged 91. He was the disciple of Boullongne, and master of le Moine. The Paris churches are adorned by his pieces.

GALLOIS, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1632. He was well acquainted with the ancient and modern languages, and of such universal information and splendid talents that he engaged with de Sallo in the conducting of the Journal des Scavans, a periodical paper, which, from its commencement, Jan. 5th, 1665, has, under various names, and under different revolutions and characters, claimed the public attention. Gallois was patronized by Colbert, whom he instructed in Latin chiefly in his coach, as he travelled between Versailles and Paris. He was made member of the academy of sciences 1668, and of the French academy 1673, and after his patron's death, librarian to the king, and then Greek professor of the Royal college. He died of the dropy 1707, and in 1710 a catalogue of his books was printed, consisting of upwards of 14,000 volumes.

GALLONIO, Antonio, an ecclesiastic at Rome, known for his writings on the saints, martyrs, and holy virgins, and especially his work which describes the various cruelties exercised on primitive martyrs, with plates, 1594, in 4to. He died 1605.

GALLUCCI, Tarquinio, an Italian jesuit, who pronounced an oration on cardinal Bellarmine, and wrote "Virgilianæ Indicationes," in which he asserted in bold and animated language, the superiority of Virgil over Homer, against the opinion of Madam Dacier. He died 1649, aged 75.

GALLUCCI, Giovanni Paulo, an Italian astronomer of the 16th century. He wrote "on the Instruments of Astronomy," 1597 — Theatrum Mundi & Temporis, folio, 1507 — Speculum Uranicum, folio, &c.

GALLUCCI, Angelo, an Italian jesuit, born at Macerata. He is author of "Commentarii de Bello Belgico," from 1593 to 1609, Rome, 1674, 2 vols. folio. He died 1674.

GALLUS, Cornelius, a Roman poet, made governor of Egypt by Augustus. He was the friend of Virgil, and he destroyed himself B. C. 26.

GALLUS, C. Vibius, a Roman emperor after Decius. After two years' reign he was assassinated by his soldiers, 253.

GALLUS, Flavius Claudius Constantius, brother of the emperor Julian, was made Cæsar by Constantius; but afterwards put to death on suspicion of cruelty and ill conduct, 354.

GALLY, Henry, was born at Beckenham, Kent, August 1696, and educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D. D. in 1728, when the king visited the university. In 1721 he was made lecturer of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, and rector of Wanden, Bucks, and in 1728 he was presented to a prebend of Gloucester by King, lord chancellor, to whom he was chaplain. He afterwards had a prebend at Norwich, and became rector of Ashton, Northamptonshire, and St. Giles' in the Fields, and in 1735 chaplain to the king. He died Aug. 7th, 1769. He wrote some sermons, besides the Characters of Theophrastus, translated from the Greek, with notes — a dissertation against pronouncing the Greek language according to Accents, 1754, 8vo. — a second dissertation on the same subject, 8vo. &c.

GALVANI, Lewis, an eminent physiologist, born at Bologna. He studied medicine under Galeazzi, whose daughter he married, and in 1762 he began to give lectures in anatomy in his native city. He accidentally ally discovered, while preparing broth from frogs for his sick wife, that the muscles of these animals were thrown into convulsion by the touch of a dissecting knife, and exhibited all the appearance of the electric shock. The subject was accurately examined by the patient philosopher, and upon incontrovertible grounds he proved that the nerves of all animals are thus powerfully acted upon, and he had the honor of giving his name by this important discovery to this new system of physiology. His observations were communicated to the world in his treatise de Viribus Electricitatis in Motu musculari Commentarius, 1691, and the subject afterwards engaged the attention of Valli, Fowler, Aldini, and especially Volta, who introduced very great improvements in the system. After the death of his wife, in 1790, Galvani became a prey to a severe melancholy, and died 1798, aged 61. He wrote besides tracts on medical subjects, &c.

GALVANO, Antony, a native of the East Indies, governor of the Moluccas. He was prudent and vigorous in his administration, and cleared the sea of pirates, but he reduced himself so much by his liberality that he returned poor to Europe, and not meeting with the treatment which he deserved from John III. king of Portugal, he died in an hospital at Lisbon 1557.

GAM, David, a brave Welchman at the battle of Agincourt. He observed of the enemy that there were enough to kill, enough to take prisoners, and enough to fly. He fell in the fight in nobly defending the person of Henry V. and just as he expired he was knighted by his grateful sovereign on the field of battle.

GAMA, Vasco, or Vasquez de, an illustrious Portuguese, born at Sines, on the sea coast of Portugal, immortalized as the discoverer of a passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. He set sail from the Tagus 8th July, 1497, with four ships, and though his expedition was considered as most perilous, he boldly encountered the storms of the African coast, and the more dangerous mutiny of his followers, and on the 20th Nov. doubled the cape, which hitherto had been called the Cape of Tempests, and proceeded as far as Calicut. He redoubled the cape April, 1499, and returned home after an absence of two years and nearly two months, and was loaded with honors due to his merit and services. In 1502 he again visited the East Indies, with 20 ships, as admiral of the eastern seas, and returned Sept. 1503, with 13 ships richly laden. Under John III. he was appointed viceroy of India, and for the third time returned to the country and fixed the seat of government at Cochin, but he unfortunately died soon after, 24th Dec. 1525. He was a man of the greatest intrepidity and the most persevering courage, but he also possessed in a very eminent degree the virtues of private life, and for a while forgot his ambition and his fame in deploring the death of his brother and companion, Paulus de Gama. His adventures have been immortalized by the poem of Camoens, called "the Lusiad" translated into English by Mickle.

GAMACHES, Stephen Simon, a member of the French academy of sciences, who died at Paris 1756, aged

84. He was author of Physical Astronomy, 2 vols. 4to. — Literary and Philosophical Dissertations, 8vo. — System of the Heart — the Elegancies of Language reduced to their Principles, a valuable book.

GAMACHES, Philip de, author of 2 vols. of Commentaries on the Summa of Aquinas, was divinity professor in Paris university, and ably defended the Gallican church against the encroachments of the papal power. He died at Paris 1625.

GAMALIEL, a Jewish doctor of the law, and a secret disciple of our Savior. He defended the conduct of the apostles against the machinations of the Sanhedrim, and when Stephen had been cruelly stoned to death, it is said that he caused his remains to be decently buried.

GAMBARA, Lorenzo, an Italian poet patronized by cardinal Alexander Farnese. He died 1586, aged 90. He wrote a Latin poem on Columbus, besides eclogues, &c. but his poetry is spoken of with great contempt by Muretus.

GAMBARA, Veronica, an Italian lady born at Brescia. She married the lord of Corregio, and after his death devoted herself to literature, and the education of her two sons. She died 1550, aged 65. The best edition of her poems, which possess merit, and of her letters is that of Brescia 1759.

GAMBOLD, John, a native of Haverfordwest, educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. A. 1734. He was on the presentation of Secker, vicar of Stanton Harcourt, and wrote there "the Martyrdom of Ignatius," a tragedy, 1740, and in 1742 edited at the Oxford press, the New Testament, after Milles. He joined in 1748 the united Moravian brethren, and was for many years their minister in Neville's court, Fetter-lane. He was consecrated bishop of his fraternity at the synod 1754, and in 1765 he established a congregation at Coothill in Ireland. He died in his native town, Sept. 13, 1771, and though an enthusiast he was universally respected for his learning and information, and for his inoffensive manners. He wrote several things for the use of his Moravian brethren, besides a Character of count Zinzendorf — 16 Discourses on the second Article of the Creed — and the History of Greenland, translated from the Dutch, &c.

GANDY, James, a painter who came to Ireland with the duke of Ormond, and died there 1689. He was the pupil and imitator of Vandyck.

GANGANELLI, Vid. CLEMENT XIV.

GARAMOND, Claude, a native of Paris, known as an ingenious engraver and letter founder. He first banished the use of the Gothic, or black letter, and founded his types in so complete a manner that they became universally admired in Europe, and by way of excellence the small Roman letters were denominated in every country by his name. At the desire of Francis I. he founded three different Greek types, for Robert Stephens, for the publication of the Greek Testament, and of the Greek classics. This ingenious and indefatigable man died 1561, and his types became the property of Fournier the elder, an eminent letter founder.

GARASSE,

GARASSE, Francis, a jesuit, born at Angoulême 1585. He displayed his genius by his publication of the elegies on the death of Henry IV. and in a poem in heroic verse addressed to Lewis XIII. on his inauguration. As a preacher he was very eloquent and popular, but he aspired to the public admiration by the force and consequence of his writings. In his style he was violent and scurrilous, and his "Horoscope of Anti-Coton, &c." and his "Calvinistic Elixir, &c." were proofs of the virulence and buffoonery with which he defended his order against the attacks of his enemies. In 1620 he published "Rabelais Reformed, &c." and afterwards in other publications attacked the ghost of Pasquier, an affront which was severely resented by the indignant sons of this reverend father. His "Somme Theologique des Verités Capitales de la Religion Chretienne," published 1625, first raised the torch of dissension and hatred between the jesuits and Jansenists. The book was attacked by the abbot of St. Cyran, and in 1626, the rector of the Sorbonne complained to his society of the evil tendencies of a composition which recommended heretical opinions, and abounded in false quotations from scripture. Garasse was in consequence of this, after a solemn examination censured, but the virulence and animosity which had been excited between the two orders continued to be displayed on both sides with increasing violence. Though supported by the jesuits in the dispute, Garasse was banished to one of their houses at some distance from Paris. During the pestilence which raged at Poitiers, he showed himself charitably active in the relief of the infected, and fell a victim to the contagion, 14th June, 1631. He is styled by Warburton in his commentary on the Essay of Man, an eminent casuist.

GARBIERI, Lorenzo, a painter of Bologna, pupil to Ludovico Caracci. He died 1654, aged 64.

GARBO, Raphael del, an historical painter of Florence, who died 1534, aged 58. His representation of the resurrection in his best piece.

GARCIAZ II. king of Navarre after Sancho II. died 1000.

GARCILASSO, or GARCIAZ LASSO DE LA VEGA, a Spanish poet, born of a noble family at Toledo, 1500. He was educated under the eye of Charles V. who patronized and esteemed him, and he distinguished himself as much by his valor as by his poetry. After accompanying Charles in his campaigns in Germany, Africa, and Provence, he received a wound on the head from a stone thrown from a tower, when at the head of a battalion, and died three weeks after at Nice, in his 36th year. To his genius and his labors the poetry of the Spaniards is greatly indebted. His works are written not only in elegant language, but with true poetic fire, and his odes are said by Paul Jovius to equal those of Horace in sweetness. His works were published with learned notes by Franc. Sanchez, Naples, 1664, in 8vo. There was another Spaniard of the same name, born at Cusco, who wrote the History of Florida, of Peru, and of the Incas.

GARDIE, Pontus de la, a French adventurer in the service of marshal Brisac, and afterwards of the Danes, and then of the Swedes. He was ambassador from Sweden at Vienna and at Rome, and in 1580 he was employed against the Russians, and fought with great success. He was drowned accidentally in the port of Revel 1585.

GARDIN DUMESNIL, N. professor of rhetoric at Paris, was eminent as a scholar, as appears in his Synonymes Latines, in imitation of Girard's Synonymes Francois. He died at Valogne, May, 1802, aged 82.

GARDINER, Stephen, bishop of Winchester, was the illegitimate son of Lionel Woodville, bishop of Salisbury, and brother to Elizabeth the queen of the fourth Edward. He was born at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk 1483, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where his progress in classical literature, and in civil and canon law was very rapid. His introduction into the Norfolk family, and afterwards into the service of Wolsey, soon rendered him a favorite at court. In the business of the divorce he was sent in 1527 to Rome, where he warmly espoused the cause of his sovereign, and when he found that the pope was inexorable, he turned his attention to procure the dismissal of the virtuous Catherine, without paying any respect to the opinion of the papal court. For his services he was made secretary of state, and in 1531 raised to the see of Winchester. He went afterwards as ambassador to the French court, and when Henry broke off his dependence on the papal see, the new bishop evinced his acquiescence in the bold measure by defending it in his tract de Verâ Obedientiâ. After various employments of confidence and honor, he was at last directed by Henry to draw up articles on an accusation of heresy, against his last wife Catherine Parr, but the devoted queen had the art to avert the storm from her own head upon that of Gardiner, who ever after continued in disgrace with the king. Under Edward VI. he showed himself averse to the introduction of the reformation, and though threatened and imprisoned, he still persevered in his opposition. Under Mary he was restored to his bishopric from which he had been deprived, and he was raised to the high office of lord chancellor and of prime minister. Much to the disgrace of his character he conducted himself in this elevated situation with great caprice and unpardonable cruelty. The protestants who opposed his views were with little ceremony committed to the flames, and these measures of violence and blood were sanctioned by the bigoted queen, and approved by the criminal catholics. He died 12th Nov. 1555, aged 72. In his private character he was not without some good qualities. He was learned, and promoted the cause of learning. His gratitude to Wolsey, to whom he was indebted for part of his greatness, is highly commendable, and though much injured by Henry VIII. he never mentioned his name without marks of respect and affection. That he possessed ambition, the history of his life sufficiently proves, and that he was not unskilled in art and dissimulation is strongly evident from the greatness with which he supported his measures in the midst of jarring factions, and opposite religions.

GARDINER, James, an officer in the army of George II. who on reading a religious book called Heaven taken by Storm, suddenly reformed the licentious conduct of his youth, by the most correct morals, and the most undisguised piety. This worthy man was killed at the battle of Preston-pans, in fight of his own house, 21st Sept. 1745.

GARENGEOT, René, Jacques, Croissant de, a French surgeon, born at Vitri 1688. He was royal lecturer on surgery at Paris, and fellow of the London royal society, and he acquired great celebrity by the success of his operations, and the ingenious and valuable works which he wrote on his profession. He died at Paris 1759. His works are a Treatise on Surgical Operations, 2 vols. 8vo. — on Surgical Instruments, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Anatomy of the Viscera, 12mo. &c.

GARESSOLES, Anthony, a native of Montauban, where he was divinity professor, and also moderator of the synod of Charenton. He wrote a Way to Salvation, — de Christo Mediatore, — Explicatio Catechesos Christ. Relig. — some Latin poems &c. and died 1650, aged 63.

GARET, John, a Benedictine, of the congregation of St. Maur. He was born at Havre de Grace, and died 1694, aged 69. He edited Cassiodorus 2 vols. fol. with interesting notes.

GARLANDE, Jean de, a grammarian, born at Garlande en Brie in Normandy. The best known of his works are "a Poem on the Contempt of the World." — Floretus, on the Doctrines of Faith; — Facetus, on the duties of Men towards God, — Dictionarium Artis Alchymiae 1571. Basle. He was living in 1081, and as he passed much of his time in England, with William of Normandy, some have imagined that he was an Englishman.

GARNET, Henry, known as one of the conspirators in the gunpowder plot, was born in England, and educated at Winchester school, from whence he went to Rome, and in 1575, took the habit of the jesuits. In 1586, he returned home as the provincial of his order, and began by secret intrigues to plot the overthrow of the religion of the country. By impiously asserting that the innocent might be involved in the destruction of the guilty, to establish his plans, he encouraged his associates in the forwarding of that dreadful plot which was prevented by a happy discovery. He was in consequence sent to the Tower and hanged for high treason, at the west end of St. Paul's, May 3d 1606. Though deservedly punished for his meditated crimes, yet he passed as a martyr among the catholic enthusiasts.

GARNETT, Thomas, a native of Westmoreland, educated at Sedburgh school, under Dawson, from whence he went to Edinburgh to study under Dr. Brown. He afterwards studied surgery in London, and then settled at Harrowgate; but finding success not equally rapid with his expectations, he removed to Liverpool with the intention of emigrating to America. The interference of his friends prevented his leaving the country, and he applied himself to chemistry and natural philosophy, and after reading some lectures on those sciences at Liverpool and Manchester, he was appointed Anderson's lecturer at Glasgow. The establishment of the royal institution in London, drew him to the capital, and for two seasons he read lectures to numerous and applauding audiences, after which he resigned, to lecture publicly in his own house Great Marlborough street. His prospects of future eminence, however, unfortunately vanished, he died of a fever 28th June 1802. As an author he was respectable, and as a lecturer intelligent and animated. He published Analysis of the Harrowgate Waters, — a Tour through Scotland, 2 vols. 4to. — a Lecture on Health, 12mo. — various papers, &c. on Medical and Physical Subjects, and his Lectures on Zoonomia, appeared in 4to. for the benefit of his orphan daughters.

GARNIER, Robert, a French tragic poet, born at Ferté Bernard in Maine, 1534. He studied law at Toulouse, but left it for poetry, and so successful were his attempts that he was compared to Sophocles and Euripides. His merits were rewarded by some honorable offices, and he died 1590. His works, consisting of tragedies, besides elegies, songs, &c. but all in a stile and manner which modern improvements render very obsolete, were published at Lyons, 12mo. 1597, and re-printed Paris 1607.

GARNIER, John, a Jesuit, professor of rhetoric and philosophy, was born at Paris, and died at Bologna 1681, aged 69. The best known of his works, are an edition of Mercator, folio, 1673. — Systema Bibliothecæ Collegii Parisiensis, 4to. 1678, &c.

GARNIER, Julian, a Benedictine monk, who edited St. Basil's works, 3 vols, folio. and died 1723, aged 53.

GAROSALO, Bonvenuto, an Italian painter, born at Ferrara. He succeeded chiefly in copying the pieces of Raphael, and other most celebrated masters. He died 1695, aged 80.

GARRARD, Mark, a painter, born at Bruges in Flanders 1561. He was in the service of queen Elizabeth, and of Anne the wife of James I: and some of his pieces are preserved in England. He died in London 1635.

GARRICK, David, an illustrious English actor. His grandfather was a Frenchman who left the country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and his father was a captain in the army, and chiefly resided at Lichfield. David was born at Hereford, where his father was on a recruiting party, and was baptized there in All-Saints church, 20th Feb. 1716. He was educated at Lichfield school, but was more attached to theatrical pursuits than learning, so that he acted with his fellow pupils the play of "the Recruiting Officer" and supported himself the character of serjeant Kite. He went afterwards to reside with his uncle a wine merchant at Lisbon, but soon returned to Lichfield school, and after being six months the pupil and companion of Dr. Johnson, he accompanied him to London in 1735. He was recommended by Mr. Walmley of Lichfield to Mr. Colson under whom he might improve himself in mathematical knowledge, and afterwards enter at the Temple. But though he studied for a while under Colson, and entered into partnership in the wine trade with his brother Peter, in Durham yard, not business but a theatrical life was his favorite object, and soon after the death of his uncle, the Lisbon merchant, who left him 1000l. and of his father and his his mother, he now without the controul of superiors indulged the favorite bent of his heart. The powers with which nature had endowed him were fostered and improved by the conversation and company of the most popular actors, but Garrick still dissident, flew from a London audience to Ipswich, where in 1741, he performed the part of Aboan in Oroonoko, under the assumed name of Lyddal. His efforts were received with repeated and encreasing applause, and thus flushed with provincial approbation, he came to Goodman's fields, and acted Richard III. Oct. 19th 1741. So superior were his abilities, and so powerful their display, that the other theatres were now left empty, and the house in Goodman's fields was daily crowded with all the beauty, the fashion, and the taste of the town. This success was viewed with envy, by his rival heroes Quin and Cibber. By the influence of sir John Barnard, an act of parliament was obtained to shut up the theatre of Goodman's fields, so that Garrick thus obliged to abandon a situation where he divided the profits with Giffard the manager, made an engagement with Fleetwood the patentee of Drury-lane for 500l. a year. Thus popular in England, Garrick passed to Dublin in the summer of 1742, and so prodigious were the numbers which assembled to view this theatrical phenomenon, that in consequence of the crowded houses and the intense heat of the weather, a contagious disorder fatally broke out in the town, which was called Garrick's fever. In 1747 he became joint patentee of Drury-lane with Lacy, and in July 1749, he married Mademoiselle Violetti, an Italian stage dancer. In 1763 he went with his wife to Paris and Italy, and though some attributed this journey to a jealousy at the successful efforts of Beard in the management of Covent-garden, it was more probably undertaken for the restoration of his health and that of Mrs. Garrick, who received some benefit from the baths of Padua. While on the continent, Garrick was liberally condescending in exhibiting various characters, not only in the presence of the duke of Parma, but before his friends, and so judicious was his discernment, that he foretold the future celebrity of Mademoiselle Clairon, though at that time Dumefnil was the favorite actress of the French stage. He returned to London in April 1765, but so fearful was he of the public opinion, that with a timidity unworthy of his great character, he always endeavoured to prevent censure, and on this occasion he caused, by means of a friend, to be published "the Sick Monkey," a poem in which, by drawing the censures of animals on himself and his travels, he attempted to blunt the edge of ridicule. In 1769 he projected and conducted the jubilee at Stratford, in honor of Shakespear, which though admired on one side and ridiculed on the other, should be mentioned with commendation as the homage of a great man, to an immortal genius. By the death of Lacy in 1773, the whole management devolved on him, and now the fatigues of his situation were so great, and his infirmities were increasing so rapidly, that in June 1776 he left the stage, and disposed of his moiety to Sheridan, Linley, and Ford, for 35,000l. He was seized while at lord Spencer's with a fit, and removed immediately to his house in the Adelphi, where he died three weeks after, 20th Jan. 1779.

Besides the display of his astonishing powers on the stage, Garrick merited the public approbation as a writer. The Biographia Dramatica mentions not less than 38 of his plays, some of which were original, and some translations, besides a great number of prologues, epilogues, songs, elegies, &c. A monument has been erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey, and his life has been written by Thomas Davies, 2 vols. 8vo.

GARRIEL, Peter, a priest of Montpellier in the 17th century. He wrote an account of Montpellier cathedral 1631, 12mo. — A chronological view of the Governors of Provence — Series Præfulum Megalonenfium Montispell. ab 451, ad 1652 folio.

GARSALT, Francis Alexander, a learned Frenchman, member of the academy of Sciences. He paid much attention to literature and the arts, and particularly to the history and character of the horse. He died at Paris of a paralytic stroke, Nov. 1778, aged 85. He wrote the anatomy of the Horse translated from the English of Snap, 4to. — le nouveau Parfait Marechal, a work of merit — le Guide du Cavalier — Traité des Voitures, &c.

GARTH, sir Samuel, an eminent physician and poet, born in Yorkshire, and educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. D. July 7th 1691. He settled in London, and was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1692. His assistance and influence were great in the dispute between the physicians and the apothecaries about the establishment of dispensaries, and he boldly supported the former, who with charitable zeal wished to administer to the relief of their fellow creatures gratis. Irritated at the obstinate conduct of the apothecaries, who violently opposed the benevolent plans of the college, he employed his pen to throw ridicule upon them, and in 1699, produced his "Dispensary," which in a few months went through three editions. The sixth edition of this popular piece appeared 1706, much improved with the episodes and inscriptions, but though it gained so much of the public attention, it wants something of poetical ardor, as Johnson has observed, and no longer supported by accidental and extrinsic popularity, it is now almost forgotten. In 1697, Dr. Garth spoke the annual Latin speech on St. Luke's day; and in this he showed himself an elegant and refined scholar, and an able and eloquent orator. This high reputation recommended by polite manners, and agreeable conversation, soon placed Garth at the head of his profession. His noble and spirited conduct, in raising a subscription for the interment of Dryden's corpse, which the licentious son of lord Jefferies, had insulted and abandoned, also tended to encrease his popularity, and he was one of the first who united to form the Kit-cat club, in 1703, composed of above 30 noblemen and gentlemen to support the succession of the Hanoverian family to the throne. In his politics, Garth was the friend of Marlborough, and Godolphin, and on their disgrace he, though ridiculed by Prior, employed his pen to defend their conduct, and honor their meritorious services. On the accession of George I. he was knighted with Marlborough's sword, and appointed king's physician in ordinary, and physician general general to the army. This very humane and liberal-minded physician died, after a short illness, 18th Jan. 1718-9, and his remains were interred at Harrow on the Hill. He was survived by an only daughter married to the honorable col. William Boyle. His death was universally lamented, and Pope, who loved and admired him, observed that if there ever was a good christian without knowing himself to be so, it was Dr. Garth. Besides his Dispensary he published "Claremont," on the villa of the duke of Newcastle, and other fugitive pieces, besides an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, a book to which he was very partial, &c.

GARZI, Lewis, a painter, born at Pistoia in Tuscany, and brought up under Andrea Pacchi. He is considered as the successful rival of Carlo Marat, and his finest piece is the painting of the dome of the church of Stigmatie at Rome, by order of Clement XI. undertaken when he was 80. He died 1721, aged 83.

GASCOIGNE, sir William, chief justice under Henry IV. was born of a noble Norman family at Gawthorp in Yorkshire 1350. He was made king's serjeant 1398, and the next year judge of the common pleas, and in 1401 chief justice of the king's bench. He was commissioner to treat with those deluded subjects who had joined the rebellion of the earl of Northumberland, but when archbishop Scroop was taken in arms, he refused, at the repeated solicitations of Henry IV., to condemn him for treason, observing with undaunted firmness that neither the king nor his subjects could legally adjudge a bishop to death. With persevering integrity he pursued his laudable exertions to improve the morals and the jurisprudence of England, and he made some wholesome regulations for the reduction and limitation of attorneys, who it seems were become a public grievance in each county. His presence of mind and his great dignity were most nobly exhibited, when the prince of Wales, determined to rescue one of his servants who was arraigned before the king's bench, presumed to interrupt and even to strike the chief justice. Gascoigne supported the character of his station against the bold aggression, and committed the prince to the custody of the king's bench to await his father's pleasure. The king heard of the circumstance with becoming propriety, and thanked God "that he had given him a judge who knew how to administer, and a son who could obey justice." The venerable judge died soon after, 17th Dec. 1413. He was twice married and left a numerous family. The famous Strafford in the reign of Charles I. was one of his descendants.

GASCOIGNE, George, an early English poet, born in Essex, and educated at both universities according to Wood. He studied at Gray's Inn, and was a soldier in the Low Countries. He cultivated poetry under the patronage of lord Grey de Wilton, and though his verses and language are obsolete, yet he possesses both strength, energy, and elegance. He died at Walthamstow 1578.

GASPARINI, a grammarian, surnamed Barzizio from the place of his birth near Bergamo. During the troubles of Italy, and the ignorance of the times, he labored earnestly to restore learning to its ancient splendor. He was professor of belles lettres at Padua, and was patronized by the duke of Milan. He died 1431, aged 61. He wrote in elegant Latin commentaries on several of Cicero's works, besides "Letters and Orations," reprinted 1723.

GASSENDI, Peter, a celebrated French philosopher, born 22d Jan. N. S. 1592, at Chanterfrier near Digne in Provence. In his infancy he frequently amused himself by gazing at the moon and stars, and as soon as he was able to go to school at Digne, he made such progress that he far outstripped all his fellow-students in every branch of science. After studying philosophy at Aix for two years, he returned to Digne, and at the age of 16 was made teacher of rhetoric, and three years after he removed to Aix where he succeeded his old master Feslay as professor of philosophy. His "Paradoxical Exercitations," against Aristotle's philosophy gained the attention of that humane patron of learning Nicolas Peiresc, and of Joseph Walter prior of Valette, and by means of these disinterested friends he entered into orders, and gradually rose to the dignity of D. D. and to the wardenship of Digne church, where he continued 20 years. His attention to astronomy had never been relaxed in the midst of all other pursuits, and his reputation became so extensive that in 1645 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Paris. In the discharge of this new office he unfortunately contracted a cold, which assumed such unpleasant symptoms that he left Paris in 1647 to breathe his native air. Here he was patronized by Valois earl of Alais, and while residing under his hospitable roof he planned the life of his benevolent friend Peiresc. He quitted Digne in 1653, and in company with Francis Bernier, a physician, and Anthony Poller, his amanuensis, he came to Paris, and lived in the house of his friend Monmor, master of the court of requests, at whose desire he undertook the life of Tycho Brahe, which appeared 1654 with an account of Copernicus, Purbachius, and Regio-Montanus. His studious pursuits greatly enfeebled his constitution, but he was in some degree relieved by phlebotomy. He had already undergone that operation nine times when he remonstrated, but one of his physicians prevailed upon the other two to assent to the necessity of a repetition of the bleeding, and the yielding patient submitted to it, even to a fourth time. He soon after sunk under his complaints, and placing the hand of his faithful amanuensis on his heart, after hearing that the motion of that spring of life was faint and fluttering, he exclaimed in these last words, "you see what is man's life," and immediately expired 22d Oct. 1655. His papers were left to the care of his friend Monmor, who with the assistance of an able and impartial judge, perused them and deemed them all worthy of the name of the philosopher. These therefore with the books printed before appeared uniformly in 6 vols. fol. at Leyden, 1658. This great man, who lived and died in the bosom of the catholic church, was the friend and correspondent of Kepler, Longomontanus, Snellius, Hevelius, Galileo, Bullialdi, Kereher, and other respectable scholars, and to his genius, learning, and application, are owing in some degree the rapid improvements in philosophy, which banished the foolish and unreasonable hypothesis of Aristotle and of his followers from the schools of Europe.

GASSION, John de, a native of Pau, distinguished in the army under duke de Rohan, in favor of the protestants, and under Gustavus of Sweden, whose body guards he commanded in the German wars. On the death of Gustavus he returned to France and fought under la Force. His valor was eminently displayed at the victory of Rocroy, and he was made a marshal of France in consequence of the honorable wounds he received at the siege of Toulouse 1643. He was afterwards in the wars of Flanders, and fell at the siege of Lens 1647.

GAST, John, a native of Dublin, descended from a French protestant family. He was educated at Dublin college, and from the curacy of St. John's church he became rector of Arklow, which he afterwards exchanged in 1775 for St. Nicholas without Dublin. He also obtained the archdeaconry of Glandelagh, and the living of Newcastle, and died 1788, aged 73. He published in 1753 the Rudiments of Grecian History, a work of merit, for which the university of Dublin honored him with the degree of D. D. without the usual expences — and a Letter from a Clergyman of the Irish established Church to his Popish Parishioners.

GASTALDI, John Baptiste, a native of Sisteron, who died at Avignon 1747, aged 73. He was eminent as a physician, and was employed in the household of the French king. He wrote Institutiones Medicinæ Physico-Anatomix, 12mo. — Medical Tracts on Curious Subjects, &c.

GASTAUD, Francis, an ecclesiastic of Aix in Provence, father of the oratory, preacher in Paris, and afterwards a pleader in his native city. He was very violent in his dislikes and in his attachments, and therefore while he supported the opinions of Quesnel, he acrimoniously attacked Girard and his friends. He died 1732 at Viviers, where he had been banished, and as he had insulted the bishop of Marseilles in his writings, he was denied the honors of sepulture. He wrote a set of Homilies, &c. — the Policy of the Jesuits Unmasked, &c.

GASTON of France, John Baptiste, duke of Orleans, was son of Henry IV. and brother of Lewis XIII. and he is known for his deep intrigues against the power of Richelieu. He died 1660, aged 52.

GASTON DE FOIX, duke of Nemours, son of the count d'Etampes, by Mary the sister of Lewis XII. early distinguished himself in the army in Italy. He defeated the Swiss, and obtained a glorious victory at Ravenna, and soon after fell in the field of battle 1512, aged 24.

GASTRELL, Francis, an English prelate, born at Slapton, in Northamptonshire, about 1662, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1687. He was preacher at Lincoln's inn, and Boyle's lecturer, and he distinguished himself not only by his eloquence in the pulpit, but by his writings in defence of the christian religion. In 1700, he took his degree of D. D. and became chaplain to Harley, speaker of the Commons, and in 1702, he was appointed canon of Christ's church, Oxford. In 1711, he was chaplain to the queen, and in 1714, he was raised to the see of Chester, with permission to retain his canonry. As bishop, he refused to admit Peploe vicar of Preston to the wardenship of Manchester college, because he had not taken the degree of B. D. as the statutes required. The candidate had indeed been admitted to that degree by the archbishop, but Gastrell considered a metropolitan degree as nothing, till the interference of the court of king's bench decreed, that the primate's qualification was sufficient. On this occasion the bishop received the solemn thanks of the university of Oxford, for his vindication of their rights and privileges, not only in his conduct, but in the pamphlet, which he wrote in his own defence. Though popular under the administration of queen Anne, Gastrell became obnoxious to the ministers of George the I. but though he disliked the arbitrary manners and haughty temper of Atterbury, he boldly opposed the proceedings against him, and censured the conduct of his accusers, as too violent, acrimonious, and uncharitable. He died of the gout, 24th Nov. 1725, and was buried in Oxford cathedral, without any monument. He is well known for his considerations concerning the Trinity, and "Remarks on the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, by Dr. Samuel Clarke", besides "the Christian Institutes, or the Sincere Word of God, &c." a useful performance, first published 1707, and his defence of the Christian Religion, against the deists, preached at Boyle's lectures, and afterwards digested into a continued discourse, 1699.

GATAKER, Thomas, an English divine, descended from a Shropshire family, and born 1574, in the parsonage house of St. Edmund, Lombard-street, where his father was minister. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and on the foundation of Sidney college, he was on account of his great abilities admitted one of the fellows. After being tutor, and chaplain to the families of Ayloff, and sir William Cook, he was appointed 1601, preacher of Lincoln's inn. In 1611, he married and took the living of Rotherhithe in Surrey. In 1620, he travelled into the low countries, and every where distinguished himself as an able preacher, and an active opponent of the popish tenets. As a writer he excited the public attention by his "Discourse on the Nature and Use of Lots, a treatise historical and theological 1619, 4to". and by his defence of it 1623, and so high was his reputation that, on the removal of Dr. Comber, he was offered the mastership of Trinity college, Cambridge, which his infirm health did not permit him to accept. He was one of the assembly of divines who met at Westminster, concerning justification, and other theological subjects, and though he declared strongly in favor of episcopacy, he signed the covenant, in obedience to the sense of the majority of his brethren. In 1648 he was the first of the 47 ministers who signed a remonstrance to the army, and the general, against the design of trying the king, and both in private, and in the pulpit, he spoke against the prevailing tenets of the independent faction. He was a sufferer by the violence of the times, yet when his parishioners refused to pay him the composition which they had agreed in lieu of the tithes, he bore the disappointment with patience, and turned his attention to literary pursuits. He married four wives, and died 1654, aged 80, and was buried in his own church. His funeral sermon was preached, and published with a narrative of his life, by Simon Ashe, but he gave directions that no monument or stone should mark the place where his remains were deposited. He was a man who, to extensive erudition, united great moderation, and benevolent principles. He opposed strongly in the reigns of James, and Charles I. the high notions of churchmen, and deprecated the fatal consequences which he foresaw would fall on the government, and on the church. The moderation of his conduct drew upon him the abuses and the virulence of the bigoted fanatics of the times, but he always preferred peaceful retirement, and such uniform conduct as his conscience approved, to all the reputation of guilty elevation and successful artifice. As a critic, and a writer, he was highly respected, and Salmasius, Axenius, Colomies and others, bear honorable testimony to his abilities. He was one of the divines who wrote Annotations on the Bible, especially Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Lamentations, and Calamy has observed that no commentator ancient or modern, is entitled to higher praise. He wrote besides "Marcus Antoninus's Meditations, with a discourse on the Philosophy of the Stoics, and a Commentary", 1697 — "Opera Critica" Utrecht, fol. 1668, and he was besides engaged in a controversy with Lilly, the astrologer, in which more learning, and more animosity were shown than became the subject. Some of his MSS. were published by his son Charles, rector of Haggeiston, Bucks, who was also a writer on controversial divinity, and died 1680, aged 66.

GATIMOSIN, the last of Mexican kings, was nephew to Montezuma. He was cruelly tortured in a fiery ordeal by Cortez and the Spaniards who wished to discover his treasures, and three years after, he was ignominiously hanged in his capital, with many of his caiques, in the sight of his subjects, 1526.

GAVANTS, Bartholomew, a Barnabite monk, born in the Milanese. He wrote the Thefaurus Sacrorum Rituum, on the Ceremonies, &c. of the Roman church, 5 vols. 4to. with plates — Manuale Episcoporum — a tract on conducting Synods, &c. He died at Milan, 1638, aged 70.

GAUBIL, Anthony, a French missionary in China, where he resided 30 years. He was born at Caillac, 1708, and died 1759. He was interpreter at the court of Pekin, and astonished even the Chinese themselves for his knowledge of their language. He sent some curious anecdotes to Europe, and published a good history of Gengis Khan, 1739, 4to. and a translation of Chou-king 1771. His eulogium appears in the 31st volume of Lettres Curieuses, & Edifices.

GAUBIUS, Jerome David, a native of Heidelberg, who studied medicine under his uncle a physician at Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Handerywyck, and to Leyden. In 1731 he succeeded his illustrious friend and preceptor Boerhaave, as lecturer of botany, and chemistry at Leyden, and obtained the medical professorship three years after. He died 1780, aged 75. His works are a Thesis on the Solids, 1725, when he took his doctor's degree — another on the Method of Prescribing, and Writing Recipes, a valuable work 1738 — Institutiones Pathologicæ Medicinal, 4to. 1758 — Adversaria de Variis Argumentis, &c. He also edited Albinus de Præfagienda Vitâ & Morte — Cramer's Elementa Artis Docimasticæ, &c.

GAUD, Henry, a painter and engraver of Utrecht, who died 1639. His seven engravings from Adam Elshaimer's pictures are much admired.

GAUDEN, John, a prelate born 1605, at Mayfield, Essex, where his father was vicar. He was educated at Bury St. Edmund's school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1630, he married the daughter of sir William Russell, of Chippenham, Cambridgeshire, and obtained that vicarage, and afterwards the rectory of Brightwell, Berks. From his connection with Oxford, he entered at Wadham college, and took his degree of D. D. 1641. He was chaplain to lord Warwick, and he preached before the House of Commons, in a style which procured, with their approbation, the present of a large silver tankard with an appropriate inscription, and afterwards the rich deanery of Bocking in Essex, for the regular possession of which he obtained the collation of Laud, then a prisoner in the Tower. He submitted to the regulations of the parliament, upon the abolition of the hierarchy, and he was one of the assembly of divines, who met at Westminster, though Godwin was afterwards substituted in his room. When preparations were made to try the king, he was one of those divines who boldly petitioned against it, and after the king's death he published "a Just Inveective against those who murdered king Charles I. &c." His zeal was further manifested in printing the "Icon Basilice," with a copy of the M. S. of which, written by the unfortunate Charles, he had been intrusted, and though diligent search was made by the parliament for the publisher of that popular book, Gauden had the good fortune to escape discovery. In 1659 he published "the Tears, Sighs, &c. of the Church of England, &c. in 4 books folio." and so highly approved were his services that he was made, on the death of Brownrigg, preacher to the Temple, and bishop of Exeter. In 1662 he was removed to Worcester, but, it is said, that he was so disappointed in not being translated to the rich see of Winchester, that he died of a broken heart, in September that same year. Though he had cleared upwards of 20,000l. by renewing leases at Exeter, his widow, with his five children, petitioned the king for the half year's profits of the see of Worcester, which was refused. Gauden has been censured for his ambition, and he is described by Clarendon, Burnet, Kennet and others, as so inconstant, ambiguous, and covetous of preferment, that he would follow any party or subscribe to any opinions to gain his ends. Wood says that he was esteemed by all who knew him, that he was a man of vast parts, of unwearied labor and much resorted to for his most admirable and edifying way of preaching. He wrote several tracts on the politics, and theological disputes, of the times. Some have considered the Icon Basilice, as wholly written by him, but the style is so superior to that of the bishop, that the king is now regarded as the sole author of it.

GAUDENTIO, a painter of Milan, born about 1486, He adorned the churches of his native city with fresco and oil paintings.

GAUDENTIUS, St. a bishop of Brescia, who obtained his preferment much against his wishes from the hands of St. Ambrose. He wrote sermons, — letters, — the Life of Philaster, his predecessor, &c. published, Brescia fol. 1738, and died 427. Another, in the same age, wrote two apologies for the Donatists, of whom he was bishop.

GAUDENZIO, Paganin, a native of the Valteline. He received his education at Rome where he acquired celebrity as Greek professor, and afterwards at Pisa where he filled the chair of belles lettres. He wrote Declamations — Chartæ Palantes — Obstetrix Literaria — Academ. Instar. — de Philosophiæ apud Roman. Initio & Progressu, 4to. and died 1648, aged 52.

GAVESTON, Peter, son of a Gascon gentleman, is known in English history as the favorite of Edward II. In his elevation he was proud, over bearing, and cruel, and the barons therefore rose up against him, and he was beheaded 1312.

GAULI, Giovanni Baptistà, a painter of Genoa who died at Rome 1709, aged 68. His chief merit was historical and portrait painting.

GAULMIN, Gilbert, a French writer of some celebrity, acquired by his harangues in the society of beaux and belles. He died 1665, aged 60. He wrote Commentaries on Pselus and Theod. Prodromus, besides Remarks on the false Callisthenes, — an edition of Romance of Ifmenus and Ifmenias, &c.

GAUPP, John, a native of Lindau in Swabia, educated at Jena. He was the protestant pastor of his native town, where he died 1738, aged 71. He was an able mathematician, and wrote Gnomonica Mechanica Universalis, 4to. besides some tracts on Astronomy, Chronology, sermons, &c.

GAURICO, Luca, an Italian professor of astronomy at Ferrara. His prediction that John Bentivoglio would loose the supreme power of Bologna, exposed him to persecution, and he removed to Venice, and then to Rome. He was made bishop of Civita in Naples by pope Paul, who was a great follower of astrology, but he resigned the see in 1550, and came to Rome, where he died 1558, aged 83. His works on astrology and astronomy appeared at Basil 3 vols. fol. 1375. His brother, Pomponio, wrote Latin poems, tracts on Physiognomy, architecture, &c. and died professor in Naples university.

GAUSSEM, Jane Catherine, a celebrated actress, who after enjoying for 30 years the applauses of a French audience retired from the theatre, 1664, from motives of religion. She died at Paris 1767, aged 56.

GAUTHIER, Jean Baptiste, a French abbé, chaplain to de Langle, bishop of Boulogne, and to Colbert, bishop of Montpellier, was born at Louviers in the diocese of Evreux 1685. He died of a fall 1755. He wrote against Infidels. His chief works are "a Tract against Pope's Essay on Man" which he describes as impious, — Letters against Hardouin and Berruyer, 3 vols. 12mo. — an Attack upon the Jesuits, 3 vols. and other work mentioned in "France Literaire" 1758.

GAY, John, an English poet, born 1688, near Barnstaple, Devon. The only education which he received was at the free school of his native town, under Luck who had some knowledge of poetry, but such was his taste for literature, that when his parents who were poor, though of a respectable family, bound him apprentice to a silk-mercier in London, he attended behind the counter with silent indignation, and, as soon as he could, purchased his indentures of his master. Now freed from the shackles of business, he cultivated the muses, and was introduced to the wits of the times. Flattered with the friendship of Swift and of Pope, he courted the public approbation by dedicating in 1711, his first piece, "Rural Sports, a Georgic," to the latter of these high poetical characters. But though successful as an author, his resources were scanty, and his creditors now threatened his liberty, when the patronage of the duchess of Monmouth, by appointing him her secretary, placed him above want, and called his muse to new exertions. In this sunshine of prosperity he wrote his "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets," and the next year he formed the plan of his "Pastorals." In espousing the cause of Pope, who had been insulted by Philips, he not only produced an excellent poem "the Shepherd's Week" which rivalled his antagonist's performance, but he fixed the friendship and gained the recommendation of his poetical patron. He was flattered by the ministry, and was sent as secretary to lord Clarendon, in his embassy to Hanover. The death of queen Anne seemed to ruin his hopes, but he paid his court to the new ministry, and ensured the patronage of the princess of Wales by a well-timed compliment. He was admitted into the company of the great and powerful, and the sweetness of his manners, and the sincerity of his heart, gained him friends wherever he appeared. He went to Aix in France with Mr. Pulteney, and at his return he introduced on the stage his "Three Hours after Marriage" which did not meet the same success which his "What d'ye call it" had a little time before commanded. In 1718, he was with Pope at lord Harcourt's where he celebrated in beautiful verse the sad catastrophe of the two lovers destroyed by lightning. In 1720, he recruited his finances by a handsome subscription to his poems, in 2 vols. 4to. but the whole amounting to 1000l. was ventured and lost in the unfortunate south sea scheme. This stroke had such effect upon his spirits, that he almost sunk under the loss, but by the friendship and advice of Dr. Arbuthnot he gradually recovered. In 1724, he read his "Captives" before the princess of Wales, and at her request wrote his beautiful and elegant fables for the use of the duke of Cumberland. In 1727, he produced his "Beggars Opera" which met with the most unusual success, and was acted 63 successive nights in London, 50 at Bath and Bristol, and with equal popularity in other places. So great indeed was the public admiration, that the songs of the opera appeared on the fans of the ladies, and the person who acted Polly though hitherto obscure, became an important character in the history of the town, and at last, though mother of some natural children, she rose by marriage to the rank of a duchess. This favorite play owed its celebrity to the unpopularity of the the court, and the resentment of the poet, who was offered the place of gentleman usher to the young prince Louis, which he rejected with marked indignation. To take advantage of his situation with the public, he produced a second part to the Beggar's Opera, by the title of "Polly" but the court forbade its appearance on the stage, and Gay had the satisfaction of obtaining an unusually large subscription for its publication. To make his triumph complete, the duke and duchess of Queensbury embraced his cause, resigned their places at court to patronize him, and ever after made him an inmate at their splendid table. Thus raised to independence and comfort he began to improve "the Wife of Bath" a play which had been received with indifference in 1714, but the second representation in 1720, was unsuccessful, and brought upon his spirits a severe fit of melancholy. Some lucid intervals indeed interposed during the gloomy depression, and under the hospitable roof of the duke, at Amesbury, he was enabled to finish his opera of "Achilles" He came to town to present his play to the stage, but an inflammatory fever unhappily brought on a mortification in his bowels, and he died at Burlington house 11th December 1732. His request to his friend Pope was faithfully complied with, and these his verses were accordingly engraved on his tomb;

Life is a jest, and all things show it,

I thought so once, but now I know it.

After lying in state at Exeter change, his remains were conveyed to Westminster abbey, by the duke of Queensbury, and interred in the fourth east aisle, against the tomb of Chaucer, where his monument is erected. The opera of Achilles afterwards appeared on the stage for the benefit of his two widowed sisters, Catherine Ballet, and Joanna Fortescue, who inherited equally his property of about 3000l. A few years afterwards a comedy "the Distressed Wife" was published under his name, and in 1754, a humorous piece called the Rehearsal at Gotham. His papers were left to the care of Pope who suppressed some of them as friendship and delicacy required.

GAYOT DE PITAVAL, Francis, a French author, born at Lyons. He wrote "Causes Celebres," a voluminous work, in 20 vols. 12mo. which, though interesting in some parts, is yet insipid in style and in elegant composition. Gayot was unfortunate in all his pursuits. He was successively an abbé, a soldier, and at 50 an advocate. He died 1743, aged 70.

GAZA, Theodore, an eminent scholar, born at Thessalonica, in Greece, 1398. Upon the invasion of his country by the Turks, in 1430, he came to Italy, and by his great assiduity became one of the brightest ornaments to whom Europe is indebted for the revival of learning. He soon gained a perfect knowledge of the Latin language, and was introduced to the patronage of cardinal Bessarion. In 1450 he came to Rome, and was, with several others, engaged by pope Nicolas V. in translating Greek authors into Latin, and after the death of that pontiff, in 1456, he went to the court of Alphonso, king of Naples. Two years after he returned to Rome, and by the patronage of his friend Bessarion he was presented to a small benefice in Calabria. In his old age he presented one of his performances, beautifully written in vellum, to pope Sixtus IV. and while he expected a liberal reward, he was asked by the pontiff what his expences had been, and these were carefully repaid, which treatment so excited his indignation that he exclaimed, "It was high time to return home, since the over-fed asses of Rome had no relish but for thistles and weeds." The money he had received he contemptuously threw into the Tiber, and died soon after of grief and disappointment. The works of Gaza consisted of original pieces, and of translations, — Grammaticæ Græcæ Libri quatuor, written in Greek 1495, translated by Erasmus 1522 — Liber de Atticis Mensibus — and translation of Cicero's de Senectute, & de Somnio Scipionis, into Greek — and Aristotle's History of Animals, translated into Latin, and other works. Gaza's learning and reputation were so highly respected that, Scaliger says, there were not more than three he was inclined to envy, Theodore Gaza, Angelus Politianus, and Picus of Mirandula. He is ranked among the best translators of Greek authors into Latin, though, indeed Erasmus objected to the elegance of his Latin idiom, and Huetius, in commending his fidelity and perspicuity, allows that some things might have been rendered better. He died at Rome 1478, aged 80.

GAZALI, or ABON HAMED MOHAMMED ZEIN EDDIN AL THOUSI, a musfulman doctor, who died at Khorassan, his native place, 1112, aged 56. He wrote "the Several Classes of Sciences which concern Religion." Two others of the same name were authors. One of them wrote a tract on the Mercy of God.

GAZET, William, a native of Arras, who died 1612, aged 58. He was an ecclesiastic, and wrote a Chronological History of the Archbishops of Cambray — Ecclesiastical History of the Low Countries, and other works.

GAZOLA, Joseph, a physician of Verona, who died 1715, aged 54. He is very candid in his works, and acknowledges that patients as often died by the negligence or ignorance of their physicians as by the force of disease.

GAZON-DOURXIGNE, S. M. M. a native of Quimper, was known as a critic, but as a poet little regarded. He died 19th Jan. 1784.

GAZZOLI, Benozzo, an Italian painter, who died 1478, aged 78. He painted landscapes, portraits, and sacred subjects.

GEBER, John, an Arabian physician of the ninth century. He wrote a Commentary on Ptolemy's "Syntaxis Magna," published Nuremberg 1533, and in his labor on alchemy deserved the praises of Boerhaave. His works contain much knowledge, though in such affected jargon that Dr. Johnson has derived the word gibberish from the cant of Geber, and his followers. His works are "Astronomy," in nine books, "three books on Alchymy," "Flos Naturarum," "Chymica," &c.

GED, William, an ingenious artist and goldsmith of Edinburgh, who invented a plate for printing whole pages, instead of using a type for every letter. This had had first been practised by the Chinese and Japanese in blocks of wood, as pursued by Colter, the European inventor of this simple method. In the prosecution of his plan, Ged applied to the university of Cambridge, in conjunction with some others, to print bibles and prayer-books after the new method; but much money was sunk in the attempt, and by the villainy of the pressmen and the ill conduct of his partners, the unfortunate adventurer was ruined in his hopes and fortunes. He returned to Scotland 1733, and gave a specimen of his plan by the publication of a Sallust, in 1744. He died 19th Oct. 1749. His son James, who had joined him in the Cambridge speculation, became a rebel in 1745, but was pardoned and released in 1748, and died in Jamaica, where he had gone to settle with one of his brothers as printer.

GEDALIA, a famous rabbi, who died 1448. He wrote an Account of a Chain of Traditions from Adam to the Year of Christ 761, and a treatise on the Creation of the World.

GEDDES, James, a Scotch advocate, born 1710, in the shire of Tweeddale. He displayed great powers of application while at the university of Edinburgh, and was rapidly advancing to opulence and celebrity in the profession of the law when he was cut off by a lingering consumption before he reached his 40th year. To the dry labors of the law he added a very polished and elegant taste for classical literature. He wrote "an Essay on the Composition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly Plato," published Glasgow, 1748, 8vo.

GEDDES, Michael, a learned divine, for some years chaplain to the Lisbon factory, where the inquisition suspended his ecclesiastical labors, and obliged him to return to England. He was honored with the degree of LL. D. from the university of Oxford, and made chancellor of Sarum. He died 1715, author of a History of the Church of Malabar — the Church History of Ethiopia — Miscellaneous Tracts against Popery, 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

GEDDES, Dr. a native of Ruthven, Bamffshire; educated at a village school in the Highlands, and removed 1758 to the Scottish college at Paris. He became in 1764 priest of a Roman catholic congregation in Angusshire, and the next year chaplain in lord Tranquair's family. In 1769 he was minister at Auchinhalrig, Bamffshire, and 10 years after he obtained the degree of LL. D. at Aberdeen, and then removed to London, and officiated in Duke's street chapel, Lincoln's Inn fields, and in the Imperial Ambassador's chapel. He began in 1782 his translation of the Bible, of which he published a Prospectus in 4to. 1786, with an appendix 1787 addressed to Lowth. At that time he engaged in a controversy with Priestley on the divinity of Christ, and again claimed the public notice by his general answer in 1790 to the various queries, criticisms and hints, offered to him on his meditated work. The first volume of this long promised translation appeared in 1792, under the auspices of lord Petre, as far as the end of the book of Joshua, but so severe was the opposition made to the work, that the bishops of his persuasion offended with the liberties and indelicacies of his version, actually suspended him from his ecclesiastical functions. Regardless of the public displeasure, he published his second volume 1797, but in language still more exceptionable, so that he found it necessary to defend himself against the attacks and reproaches of his opponents and of critics by his "Critical Remarks" in 1800. He died 1802, aged 65. He was in his character, irritable, petulant, and vindictive, though he possessed great learning and a capacious mind, and he is to be censured for the intemperate and licentious perversions which he wished to introduce in the holy scriptures. He wrote also an apology for the Roman Catholics of Great Britain.

GEDOYN, Nicolas, a French writer, born at Orleans. He studied at Paris, and was a jesuit for 10 years; but he returned to the world, and as the friend and favorite of Ninon de l'Enclos, he figured as a man of wit and letters. He was member of the French academy, and of that of belles lettres, and in 1732 was made abbot of Notre-dame de Beaugency. He wrote some ingenious essays and dissertations, published 1745, and is chiefly known for his elegant translations of Quintilian and of Pausanias. He died 1744, aged 77.

GEER, Charles de, a native of Sweden, descended from a noble Dutch family, and educated at Utrecht and at Upsal under Linnæus. He acquired much property by the introduction of new machines in the iron works of Dannemora, and by an apparatus for drying corn by smelting houses. He was, in 1761, made marshal of the court, and knight of the Polar star, and a baron. He died 1778, aged 58, much respected not only as a man of science, but as a benevolent man, who employed his great resources to the relief and the comfort of the poor. He was author of Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes, 7 vols. 4to. — on the Procreation of Insects — and papers on the Transactions of the Academies of Stockholm and Upsal, &c.

GEINOZ, Francis, a learned Swiss abbé, member of the academy of belles lettres at Paris, and author of some valuable dissertations on Ancient Medals — on the Plan and Character of Herodotus, &c. He died at Paris 1752, aged 56, much esteemed for his learning as well as his probity and benevolence.

GEJER, Martin, a native of Leipzig, professor of Hebrew, ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector of Saxony, and author of commentaries on several of the books of the Old Testament, &c. — and a treatise on the Mourning of the Hebrews, all in 2 vols. fol. He died 1681, aged 67.

GELASIUS, the elder, bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine, in the fourth century, was nephew of Cyril of Jerusalem. He translated into Greek two books of the ecclesiastical history, &c. He is praised by Theodoret and Jerome for the elegance of his style. A fragment of one of his homilies is preserved in Theodoret.

GELASIUS, of Cyzicus, bishop of Cæsarea about 476, is author of a History of the Nicene Council in three books, not very respectable, according to Photius, for either style or matter.

GELASIUS I. bishop of Rome after Felix II. 492, was engaged in unsuccessful attempts to settle the disputes between the eastern and western churches. He wished also to expunge from the list of saints the name of Acacius, which Euphemius, patriarch of Constantinople, opposed. Some of his works are extant, on controversial subjects. He died 496.

GELASIUS II. a Campanian by birth, raised to the pontificate 1118. He was ejected from his see by Cencio Frangipani, consul of Rome, and by the influence of the emperor Henry V. and after in vain endeavouring even by force of arms to regain the popedom he retired to the monastery of Clugny in France, and died 1119.

GELDENHAUR, Gerard Eobanus, a German, born at Nimeguen 1482. He studied at Deventer and Louvain, and such was the reputation of his learning that he was invited to the court of Charles of Austria, which offer he declined for the office of secretary to the bishop of Utrecht. He visited by order of Maximilian of Burgundy, in whose service he afterwards was, the schools and the churches of Wirtemberg, and was so struck with the zeal and innocent manners of the protestants there, that he abjured for their tenets the popish faith. He afterwards married, and was engaged in the education of youth at Worms, at Augsburg, and lastly at Marburg, where he died of the plague 1542. He was a man well skilled in poetry, history, and rhetoric, but his change of religion, and the freedom with which he inveighed against the pope, offended his friends, and particularly Erasmus, who compared him to the traitor Judas, and spoke with contempt of his conduct and pretended sincerity. He wrote Historia Batavica — Historia suæ ætatis — Germanic. Historiæ Illustratio de Viris Illustr. Inferior. Germaniæ, &c.

GELDER, Arnold de, a Dutch painter of Dort, who died 1727, aged 82. He was a disciple and imitator of Rembrandt.

GELDORP, Gualdorp, a painter of Louvain, who died 1618, aged 65. He excelled in portraits and history.

GEELE, Claude, commonly called Claude of Lorraine, Vid. CLAUDE.

GELENIUS, Sigismund, a learned man, born at Prague 1498. He travelled to improve his knowledge of modern languages, and during his residence at Basil, he became acquainted with Erasmus, who recommended him to John Frobenius as a corrector of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin works, in which his printing house was engaged. He wrote some valuable works, and especially Latin translations of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, of Appian, Philo, Josephus, Origen, and several others. He also published a dictionary in four languages, Greek, Latin, German, and Slavonian, and showed himself to be a most able and indefatigable scholar. His talents have been deservedly commended by Henry Valefius, Erasmus, and others, and though Huetius and others impeach his judgment in the great liberties which he took in altering the text of some authors, especially Arnobius, yet he gave a new turn to whatever passages he did not seem to understand. His disregard for honors was very uncommon, he rejected the splendid offers of the court of Bohemia for the enjoyment of humble life, and though deserving the most affluent fortune, he struggled, says Thuanus, all his life with poverty. He died at Basil 1555, leaving two sons and a daughter.

GELLERT, Christian Furchtegott, an eminent German poet, born at Haynichen near Freyberg in Misnia, 4th July, 1715. He studied at Meissen and Leipzig, and as the circumstances of his family were narrow, he maintained himself by being tutor in private families. At the age of 43 he was made professor of philosophy at Leipzig. He died Dec. 1769. He was of a very generous and amiable disposition, but of a hypochondriac habit, and of a constitutional fear of death, which, however, gradually disappeared, so that he expired calm and composed. He acquired universal celebrity by his poetry. His "Fables and Tales," are best known. He wrote besides, hymns, didactic poems, the Devotee, a comedy, &c.

GELLI, John Baptist, an Italian writer, born at Florence 1498. Though of the humble occupation of a taylor, which he followed till his death, yet he possessed great powers of mind highly cultivated, and wrote some very valuable books. He was universally esteemed for his modesty, and his talents were so much respected that he was acquainted with all the men of genius and learning of his time, and was member of the academy of Florence, and a burgess of the city. He died 1563, aged 65. He wrote besides translations from Latin, and Greek authors, dialogues after the manner of Lucian, which have been translated into Latin, French, and English, also dissertations, two comedies, la Sporta and l'Errore, and other things.

GELLIBRAND, Henry, professor of astronomy in Gresham college, was born in St. Botolph's parish, Aldersgate, 1597, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. He became curate of Chiddington, Kent, and afterwards devoted the whole of his attention to mathematical pursuits. He took his degree of M. A. 1623, and was entrusted by his dying friend, Briggs, the Savilian professor at Oxford, to complete his Trigonometria Britannica, which he did in 1632. He was called before the high commission court for permitting his servant William Beale, to publish an almanac for 1631, omitting the popish saints of the calendar, and substituting the names of the martyrs, for which he was acquitted, though Laud opposed it. Though of a strong enlightened mind, he had not sagacity enough to abandon the Ptolemaic for the Copernican system, and hence his treatises in explanation of plane and spherical triangles — on the improvement of navigation, &c. are confused and unsatisfactory, especially when he treats of the variation of the needle. He died of a fever in his 40th year. He possessed great application as a mathematician, but little genius.

GELON, king of Syracuse, B. C. 484, was universally respected by his subjects for his benevolence and mildness.

GEMELLI-CARRERI, Francis, an Italian writer, author of an interesting account of a voyage round the world, between 1693 and 1698. Some imagine that he never went round the world, but imposed a fictitious account on the public.

GEMIGNAGNO, Vincentio de St., a Tuscan painter, who died 1530, aged 40. He was a disciple and imitator of Raphael.

GEMIGNANO, Giacinto, a painter born at Pistoia.

He

He died 1681, aged 70. The churches of Rome are adorned with his pieces. His son was also an eminent artist.

GEMINIANI, Francisco, an eminent performer on the violin, and composer, born at Lucca in Italy 1680. He studied under Scarlatti and Corelli, and came to England 1714, where he was introduced to George I. He refused to accept the place of master and composer of music in Ireland, because he was a Roman catholic, observing that he never would sacrifice his religion to private interest; and from his particular independence of mind, unwilling to submit to the caprices of the great, he led an unsettled life, and made several excursions into foreign countries. He was so fond of painting, that he injured his income by purchasing pictures, but he found in the earl of Essex a great friend and patron, who supported his necessities. He, however, rejected, as offensive to his independent spirit, the offer of a pension of 100l. a year from the prince of Wales. He had employed much time and labor on a treatise on music, which while on a visit at Dublin, a treacherous female servant conveyed away from his house, and this had such effect upon him that he died soon after, Sept. 17th 1762. He composed Corelli's solos into concertos, and published six concertos of his own, besides harpsichord pieces, &c.

GEMISTUS, George, surnamed Pletho, retired to Florence upon the taking of his native city, Constantinople, by the Turks. He lived to above the age of 100, distinguished for his learning and virtues. He was a strong Platonician, and wrote commentaries on the Magic Oracles of Zoroaster — Historical treatises — de Gestis Græcorum post Mantineæ Pugnam — de Rebus Peloponnes. &c.

GEMMA, Reinier, a Dutch physician, of Dockum in Friesland, died 1555, aged 43. He was also an able astronomer and mathematician, on which sciences he wrote some valuable works. He practised physic at Louvain. His works are Methodus Arithmeticæ — de Usu Annuli Astronomici — Demonstrationes Geometricæ de Radii Usu, &c. — de Locorum Describend. Ratione, &c. — de Astrolabio Catholico, &c. His son Cornelius was equally eminent, and died 1579, aged 44. He wrote a treatise de Prodigiosa Specie, Naturæque Cometæ, &c.

GENDRE, Lewis le, a French historian, born of an obscure family at Rouen, and raised to notice by the kindness of Harlay archbishop of his province. He died 1733, aged 74. He wrote an History of France, from the commencement of the monarchy to the death of Louis XIII., 3 vols. folio, a valuable work — Manners and Customs of the French — the Life of Francis Harlay his patron — an Essay on the reign of Louis the Great — the Life of cardinal d'Amboise, &c.

GENDRE, Gilbert Charles le, marquis of St. Aubin, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and master of requests, died at Paris 1746, aged 59. He wrote "a treatise on Opinion," a learned and elegant performance, 6 vols. 12mo. — Antiquities of the Royal Family of France, 4to.

GENDRE, Nicolas le, a French sculptor, who died at Paris 1670, aged 52. His works are admired for chasteness and elegance of design.

GENDRE, Lewis le, a deputy in the national convention, who after being 10 years a sailor, and then a butcher at Paris, displayed himself the fit instrument of the crimes and atrocities of Marat and Robespierre. He figured in all the horrors of the 10th of August, and of September, and the night before the execution of the unhappy Lewis, he proposed in the jacobin club, that the body should be cut into 84 pieces, and sent to the 84 departments. In his missions into the provinces, at Lyons, Rouen, Dieppe, &c. he every where spread terror and dismay, but though the friend of Robespierre, he no sooner saw his fall, than he attacked him with virulence, and drove away, with a pistol in his hand, all the members of the jacobin club, and brought the key of their hall to the convention. He continued afterwards the enemy of the terrorists, and in his conduct showed deep art and dissimulation as he had the management to survive every faction. He was member of the council of ancients, and died at Paris, 13th Dec. 1797, aged 41, desiring in his will, that his body might be sent to the anatomical school for dissection, wishing as he expressed it, to be useful to mankind, even after death.

GENEBRARD, Gilbert, a benedictine monk born at Riom in Auvergne 1537. He espoused in his writings the cause of the league, and after being 13 years professor of Hebrew, at Paris, he was nominated to a bishopric, which however from his animosity in his pamphlets against Henry IV. he was not permitted to enjoy. By the interest of the duke of Mayence, he afterwards obtained the archbishopric of Aix, but he became there very unpopular by the publication of his treatise against the right of appointing bishops, which was burned by the hands of the hangman. He died 1597, in exile at his priory of Semur, in Burgundy. Besides his acrimonious polemical works, he wrote "a Sacred Chronology" much esteemed — a commentary on the Psalms — "a translation of Josephus, &c."

GENESIUS, Josephus, one of the Byzantine historians who wrote the History of Constantinople from Leo the Armenian to Basilus the Macedonian, in four books, printed Venice, 1733. He flourished 940.

GENEST, Charles Claude, a French poet, born at Paris 1636. In his attempt to go to India he was taken by the English, and supported himself by teaching French in England. He returned to France, and obtained an abbey, and became member of the academy. He died 1719, aged 84. He wrote, among other tragedies, Penelope, much admired — some epistles — and a didactic poem on the Proof of the Existence of a God, and the Immortality of the Soul.

GENET, Francis, bishop of Vaifon, born at Avignon 1640, son of an advocate, is known for the Theology of Grenoble, 6 vols. 12mo. translated into Latin by his brother the abbé.

GENGA, Jerome, an Italian painter and architect born at Urbino, founder of the family of the Ghengi. He died 1551, aged 75.

GENGA, Bartholomew, son of the preceding, was eminent as an architect. He died of a pleurisy whilst superintending the fortifications of Malta, 1558, aged 40.

GENGIS KHAN, son of a khan of the Moguls, was born 1193. At the age of 13 he began to reign, but the conspiracies of his subjects obliged him to fly for safety to Aveni-Khan, a Tartar prince, whom he supported on his throne, and whose daughter he married. But these ties of kindred were not binding, Aveni joined against Gengis, who took signal vengeance over his enemies, and then with a victorious army directed his power against the neighbouring states, and in the space of 22 years conquered Corea, Cathay, part of China, and the noblest provinces of Asia. His further projects of extended dominion over China were stopped by death 1227, and his vast kingdom divided among his four sons.

GENNADIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople after Anatolius, 458. He was an able theologian, and active diocefan. Of his works nothing but a fragment of a work against Cyril's anathemas is extant. He died 471.

GENNADIUS, an ecclesiastical writer, who was a priest of Marseilles, and not a bishop, about 493. He wrote "de Dogmatibus Ecclesiasticis" et "de Illustribus Ecclesie Scriptoribus." He favored the doctrines of Pelagius.

GENNADIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople, who was at the council of Florence 1438. He resigned his dignity after enjoying it five years, 1458, and died in a monastery 1460. He wrote among other things, an explanation of the Christian faith in Greek, Latin, and Turkish.

GENNARI, Benedetto, a painter of Bologna, who died 1715, aged 82. He was patronized by Lewis XIV. for whom he painted, and he was also encouraged in England by Charles II. and the English nobility.

GENNARI, Cesare, son of the preceding, a painter of Bologna, who died 1688, aged 47. He was eminent in historical pieces, and in landscapes.

GENNARO, Joseph Aurelius, a native of Naples, distinguished as an able civilian and as an upright magistrate. The best known of his learned works, which are chiefly on civil law, and written in an easy and pleasing style, is Respublica Jurisconsultorum, in which, in the fascinating form of a novel, he gives an account of the most intricate parts of the civil law. This respectable author died 1762, aged 61.

GENOELS, Abraham, a painter of Antwerp, born 1640. He was admired for his landscapes and portraits.

GENOVESI, Anthony, a native of Castiglione, who acquired great celebrity at Naples as lecturer in philosophy, but exposed himself to the severe censures of bigoted critics, by his metaphysics, in which he recommended the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. The popular odium was averted for a while by the protection of the king of Naples, who appointed him professor of ethics, but his application for the theological chair drew upon him from the clergy the ill founded charge of heresy. He was afterwards professor of political philosophy, and died 1769, aged 57. He wrote in Italian, a System of Logic, — Humorous Letters, — Philosophical Meditations on Religion and Morality, — Italian Morality, his best work.

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals in Spain, succeeded his father Godegisiles 428. He defeated the Suevi, conquered Africa, pillaged Rome, and became formidable to all the powers on the borders of the Mediterranean. He died 477.

GENSONNE, Armand, an advocate at Bourdeaux, born 10th Aug. 1758. At the revolution he warmly attacked the government, and first gave currency to that horrible opinion that suspicion was a sufficient reason to condemn a person to death. He however wished to refer the sentence of the unhappy Lewis to the primary assemblies, and he had boldness enough to demand in the convention the punishment of the Septembrizers. This proved so offensive to the assembly and to Robespierre, that he was marked for destruction with the Girondists, and was guillotined 31st Oct. 1793.

GENTILE, Ludovico, a painter of Brussels, who died 1670, aged 64. He lived some time in Italy, and painted for churches. His portrait of Alexander VII. is admired.

GENTILIS, de Foligno, a physician, author of commentaries on Avicenna. He wrote also "de Legationibus" — de Juris Interpretibus, — de Advocacione Hispanica &c. and died at Foligno, 1348.

GENTILIS, Scipio, a native of Ancona, who came into Germany, and studied at Tubingen, Wittemberg, and Leyden, and was professor of civil law at Altorf. He died 1616, aged 51, leaving four children by his wife, a beautiful lady of Lucca, whom about four years before he had married. He wrote "de Jure Publico Populi Romani" "de Conjuracionibus," De Bonis Maternis, &c. Tasso's Jerusalem, translated into Latin verse, 1585, 4to.

GENTILIS, John Valentine, a relation of the preceding, who left his native country Naples, not to be burnt in consequence of his attachment to Arianism. He fled to Geneva, but nearly was condemned to the flames, by the influence of Calvin. He at last was condemned to lose his head at Berne, for the violence of his religious opinions, 1567.

GENTILIS, Alberico, a native of Ancona, son of a physician. He was a lawyer, and coming to England as attached to protestantism, he was made professor of law at Oxford, and died 1608, aged 58. He wrote six dialogues on the Interpretation of the Law, — a Treatise de Jure Belli, commended by Grotius, — and other works.

GENTILESCHI, Horatio, an Italian painter, born at Pisa 1563. After being admired for his pieces in Genoa, Rome, Florence, and Savoy, he came to England, and was patronized by Charles I. He employed his pencil in adorning the ceilings of Greenwich and York house, and died in England after 12 years' residence, aged 84. His best work is the portico of cardinal Bentivoglio's palace at Rome.

GENTILESCHI, Artemisia, daughter of the preceding, was eminent as an historical painter. Her David with the head of Goliath, is her best piece. She took some of the portraits of the royal family and of the nobility in England; but chiefly lived at Naples, where her gallantry became as public as her eminence as a painter, and the splendor of her equipage.

GENTILLET, Valentine, a native of Dauphiné, syndic of the city of Geneva. He published in 1578, an Apology for the Protestants, often edited, and also Anti-Machiavel and Anti-Socinus, 1612.

GENTLEMAN, Francis, an actor, author of 11 dramatic pieces. He died 1784, aged 66.

GEOFFROI, Stephen Francis, a French physician and chemist, born at Paris 1672, son of an apothecary. He visited Italy, Holland, and England, to complete his medical studies, and became professor of chemistry and of medicine at the Royal college at Paris. He died 1731, much respected for his attention and humanity to his patients. His chief work is "Materia Medica" in Latin 3 vols. 8vo. It was translated by Bergier, and continued by Nobleville, and extended to 17 vols. 12mo.

GEOFFROY, of Monmouth, a British historian, author of Chronicon, five Historia Britonum, a curious book, but too full of legendary tales in the history of the first British kings. He was archdeacon of Monmouth, and bishop of St. Asaph, which he resigned to live at the monastery at Abingdon, where he was abbot. He flourished about 1150.

GEORGE, St. the patron of England, was supposed to have suffered martyrdom in the reign of Diocletian. Little is known of his history, though he is celebrated by many ecclesiastical writers, and even by some of the Mahometans. The miracles which he is said to have performed are properly regarded as fabulous.

GEORGE of Trebizond, a native of Candia, who came to Rome under Eugenius. He was a popular professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Vicenza, and afterwards became secretary to pope Nicolas V. After residing some time at the court of Alphonso of Naples, he returned to Rome, where he died in a good old age, 1484. He wrote de Arte Rhetoricâ — Reflections on some of Cicero's Orations and Letters, &c. and also translated into Latin Eusebius' Evangelical Preparations — some of the works of Aristotle — Plato de Legibus — Ptolemy's Almagest, &c. besides some controversial works.

GEORGE the Cappadocian, bishop of Alexandria, was elected bishop of Alexandria by the Arians after the expulsion of Athanasius 354. He was of obscure origin, and born in Epiphania, in Cilicia, and for some time he was employed in selling pork and provisions to the army. He afterwards went to Egypt, where, though without character or integrity, he was placed on the episcopal seat of Alexandria, by the turbulent opposers of Athanasius. On his elevation he betrayed the most oppressive conduct, he laid taxes severe and arbitrary on the people to enrich himself, and at last became so unpopular that the populace assassinated him in the sixth year of his episcopacy, 361.

GEORGE, surnamed Amira, a learned Maronite, who came to Rome in the pontificate of Clement VIII. and published a valuable Syriac and Chaldee grammar, 4to. 1596. He afterwards became bishop, and patriarch of the Maronites, but he suffered much during the wars between the Turks and the Emirs. He died about 1641.

GEORGE, duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. of England, was condemned to death, for conspiring against his brother. As he was permitted to chuse his own death, he was, 1478, smothered in a vessel full of Malmsey wine, a liquor to which he was particularly partial. Some suppose that he suffered this cruel treatment from his brother, because it had been foretold by some soothsayer, that the king's children would be deprived of the throne by a man whose name was to begin with a G.; that monster was the duke of Gloucester, Richard III.

GEORGE, prince of Servia, was exposed to the attacks of Mahomet II. to whom he had given his daughter Mary in marriage. After seeing some of his children treated cruelly by the victorious enemy, and his cities depopulated, he died in consequence of a wound which he had received, 1457, in a battle against the Hungarians. He was succeeded by his youngest son Lazarus.

GEORGE LEWIS I. son of Ernest Augustus, of Brunswick, elector of Hanover, and Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and grand-daughter of James I. was born 8th May 1660. He was at the head of the imperial armies in 1708 and 1709, and behaved with great intrepidity and judgment, and on the death of queen Anne, in 1714, he was called to the throne of England. By espousing the party of the whigs, who had contributed to his elevation, he highly offended the Tories, and instead of reconciling all parties to his administration, he thus sowed the seeds of animosity and rebellion. An insurrection took place in Scotland, in 1715, in favor of the Pretender, and the general tranquillity was restored only after much bloodshed. During his reign, the duration of parliament was extended from three to seven years, and the order of the bath was revived, but the partiality with which the south-sea scheme, was patronised in 1720, proved the ruin of several thousand families. George, whose reign was distinguished by firmness, and political sagacity, died suddenly at Osnaburg, 11th June 1727, in his way to Hanover. He had married Sophia Dorothea, daughter of the duke of Zell.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS II. son of the preceding was born 1683, and succeeded his father as elector of Hanover, and king of England 1727. He was engaged in war with the Spaniards, and sent against the American settlements admiral Vernon, who took Porto-bello, though he was unsuccessful in his attack on Carthage-na. In the continental wars he took an active share, and headed his troops at the battle of Dettingen, 1743, where he obtained a brilliant victory. The insurrection of the Scotch in favor of the Pretender, in 1745, was quelled by the rapidity and valor of the duke of Cumberland, who defeated the rebels at the battle of Culloden 1746. Though the peace of Aix-la-chapelle in 1748, restored tranquillity on the continent, fresh disputes soon arose, and a new war was kindled, in 1755, in North America. Braddock was defeated, and slain in his expedition in America, and Byng was shot, for not giving battle to the combined fleets, and relieving Minorca in the Mediterranean, but at last the disasters of the war were forgotten in the blaze of the glorious successes, which, under the administration of Mr. Pitt, began now to adorn the annals of the country. The destruction of the French power in the East Indies, and the fall of Louisbourg, Quebec, and Canada, were followed by the defeat of the French fleet under Conflans, and the triumphs of the English navy, all over the world. George died in the midst of the successes of his valiant subjects, by the sudden bursting of the right ventricle of of the heart, 25th Oct. 1760, in his 77th year. He had married in 1705, Caroline of Brandenburg Anspach, who died in 1737, but his domestic happiness was much embittered by his disputes with his son the prince of Wales, who died 1751. The reign of this monarch was splendid more than useful, he supported the rights of the queen of Hungary in the war of 1741, and in that of 1756, he enlarged the power of his subjects by his conquests in America, and in the East, but luxury and corruption were permitted to flourish unchecked, and the conduct of the sovereign was not always consonant with the strictest principles of morality and virtue.

GERARD, Tom or Tung, the institutor and first grand master of the knights hospitalers of Jerusalem, afterwards of Malta, was born at Amalfi. He took the religious habit at Jerusalem in 1100, and associated with others to relieve all christians in distress, and bound himself to observe also chastity, poverty, and obedience. He died 1120, and his order was confirmed by Anastasius IV., who divided it into knights companions, clerks and serving brothers.

GERARD, Balthazar, the assassin of William I. prince of Orange, was a native of Villefans, Franche Comté. He ingratiated himself into the society and the friendship of the unfortunate prince, by an affected air of devotion, and at last perpetrated the deed which he had for six years coolly meditated, by shooting him through the head with a pistol, as he was going out of his palace at Delft. He suffered the same punishment as Ravallac, and Damien, and died a martyr to the church of Rome, July 1584. The prince of Orange was the head of the protestants, and thence this fanatic was incited by his bigoted clergy to seek, as he said, by his death, the expiation of his sins, and eternal glory.

GERARD, John, a learned protestant divine, born at Quedlimburg, 1582. He wrote, among other things, the Harmony of the Evangelists, Geneva, 3 vols. folio. 1640. He died 1638, divinity professor at Jena.

GERARD, Dr. Alexander, professor of philosophy and divinity in the university of Aberdeen. He was a native of Garioch in Aberdeenshire, and died March, 1795, aged 67. He wrote an Essay on Genius, 8vo. — 2 vols. of sermons — an Essay on Taste, 8vo. — on the Genius and Evidences of Christianity, 8vo. — Discourse on Pastoral Care, &c.

GERARD, John, native of Jena, where he became theological professor and rector of the university. He was author of Harmonia Linguarum Oriental. — Disputationum Theologicarum Fasciculus — de Sepultura Mosis — de Ecclesiæ Copticæ Ortu, &c. and died 1668, aged 47. His son John Ernest, died professor of divinity at Giessen, and author of some learned works, 1707.

GERARD, John, a native of Nantwich, Cheshire, educated as a surgeon, and patronised by lord Burlington in London, of whose garden he had the care. He was very eminent as a botanist, and published an account, in Latin, of the trees, shrubs, plants, foreign and domestic, in his own garden, 4to. 1591. His chief work is, Herbal, or General History of Plants, 1597, best edited by Johnson 1633. He died 1607, aged 62.

GERARDI, Christofaro, an Italian painter of Florence, who died 1556, aged 56. He excelled in landscape and the grotesque as well as history.

GERARDI, Mark, a painter of Bruges, who came to England 1580, and was patronized by Elizabeth. He was equally eminent in history, landscape and portrait painting, and died 1635, aged 74.

GERBAIS, John, a doctor of the Sorbonne, eminent for his writings in support of the liberties of the Gallican church. These works proved highly offensive to the pope. He died 1699, aged 70.

GERBELIUS, Nicholaus, an eminent lawyer, born at Pforzeim. He died very old 1560, at Strasburg, where he was professor of law. He wrote, among other things, an excellent work containing a description of Greece, Basil, 1550, folio.

GERBERON, Gabriel, a French ecclesiastic, priest of the oratory, and then a Benedictine of St. Maur, was born at Saint Calais, Maine, 1628. Long distinguished at St. Maur as a theological professor, he was ordered to be arrested by Lewis XIV. for the freedom of his opinions on the Jansenist controversy, but he escaped to Holland, and in 1703 was seized by the bishop of Mechlin, and imprisoned at Amiens, and afterwards at Vincennes. He died at the prison of the abbey of St. Denis 1711, aged 82. His chief work is the General History of Jansenism, 3 vols. 12mo. Amsterdam. Though impetuous in his character, he was firm in his conduct, and exemplary in his piety.

GERBIER, sir Balthazar, a painter of Antwerp, recommended by Buckingham to Charles I. who knighted him, and sent him to Brussels as resident for the king of Great Britain. He died 1661, aged 69.

GERBILLON, John Francis, a jesuit missionary in China. He was born in 1654, became a jesuit 1670, and was sent to China 1685, and died at Pekin 1707, superior of all the missions in China. He wrote an account of his travels inserted in du Halde's History. He was in great favor with the emperor of China, for whom he wrote Elements of Geometry, from Euclid and Archimedes, splendidly published at Pekin in the Chinese and Tartarian languages.

GERDES, Daniel, a native of Bremen, who took his doctor's degree at Utrecht, and became professor of divinity at Duisburg, and in 1735 at Groningen, where he died 1765, aged 67. He wrote Vesperæ Vadenfes or Diatribæ Theologico-Philologicæ de Hyperbolis, &c. 4to. — Observationes ad quædam Loca S. S. &c — Miscellanea Duisburgensia ad Incrementum Rei Literariæ, &c. 4to. — Florilegium Historico-Criticum, &c. — Compendium Theologicæ Dogmaticæ, &c.

GERHARD, Ephraim, a native of Silesia, professor of law at Altdorf, where he died 1718, aged 36. He wrote Delineatio Philosophiæ Rationalis, &c.

GERLACH, Stephen, a native of Swabia, educated at Tubingen, where, after being five years chaplain to the imperial embassy at Constantinople, he became professor of divinity and dean of the church. He wrote Epitome of Ecclesiastical History — Journal of the Embassies to the Porte — dissertations, &c. He died at Tubingen 1612, aged 66.

GERMAIN, Thomas, a native of Paris, son of the king's goldsmith. He resided for some years at Rome, distindistinguished as an ingenious goldsmith and as an architect, and eminent also in drawing. His metal sculptures were so neatly wrought that they obtained high celebrity at Paris, and sold very dear. He died 1748, aged 74.

GERMANICUS, Cæsar, son of Nero and Antonia, was adopted by Tiberius, and became a popular character at Rome in consequence of his valor in the field of battle, and particularly for the goodness of his disposition and his many private virtues. He died near Antioch, A. D. 19, it is supposed by poison, and was universally lamented.

GERMANIO, Anastasio, a native of Piedmont. Originally self taught he acquired celebrity for his learning at Padua, and also at Turin, where he was elected professor of canon law. His abilities recommended him to the popes, and he was made bishop of Tarantasia. He died at Madrid, where he was an ambassador from the duke of Savoy, 1627, aged 76. He wrote De Sacrorum Immunitatibus, and other tracts.

GERMANUS, bishop of Cyzicum, was made patriarch of Constantinople 715, and died 740. He was degraded by a council for supporting image worship. He wrote a treatise de Sex Synodis Œcumanicis, &c. Another of the same name was patriarch of Constantinople 1222, and deposed 1240, but restored 1254, soon after which he died. He was author of some homilies, orations, &c.

GERMYN, Simon, a Dutch painter of Dort, who died 1719, aged 69. His fruits and landscapes are much admired.

GERSON, John, an illustrious Frenchman, canon and chancellor of the church of Paris. When Petit justified the murder of the duke of Orleans, by the duke of Burgundy, he boldly inveighed against it, and had the doctrine condemned by the doctors and bishops of the university. He was at the council of Constance as ambassador from France, and in his eloquent speeches he asserted the superiority of the synod over the pope. He retired to Germany from the persecution of the duke of Burgundy, and died 1429, aged 66. His writings have been published by Du Pin, 5 vols. fol. 1706 in Holland. Thuanus, Hoffman, Cave, and others speak highly of his erudition and universal knowledge.

GERSTEN, Christian Lewis, a native of Gießen, where he was mathematical professor. He was deposed from his office afterwards for refusing to submit to the sentence of a court of law, in a law suit with his brother-in-law, and was also imprisoned for 12 years for writing an improper letter to his sovereign in vindication of his contumacy. He died two years after his liberation from confinement 1762, aged 61. He wrote Methodus Nova ad Eclipses Terræ, et Appulses Lunæ ad Stellas supputandas — Tentamina Systematis Novi ad Barometri Mutationes, &c. — Exercitationes circa Roris Meteora — Methodus Calculi Eclipsium Terræ, in the 43 vol. of philosophical transactions — Mercurius sub Sole Visus — Quadrantes Astronom. Muralis Idea Nova, &c.

GERVAIS, Armand Francis, a Carmelite ecclesiastic, superior of his order, and in 1695 abbot of la Trappe, which he soon after resigned. His attack on the Ber-nardines procured his confinement in an abbey at Troyes, where he died 1741. He wrote an History of the Cistercian Order — the Lives of Eloisa and Abelard, and other works in theology and biography.

GERVAISE, Nicholas, a French missionary in Siam, afterwards provost of Suevre in the church of St. Martin of Tours. He was at Rome in 1724, and was made bishop of Horren, and soon after went as missionary to Guiana, where he and his attendants were cruelly murdered by the natives 1729. He wrote History of Boethius — Life of St. Martin of Tours — and the History of his Church — the Natural and Political History of Siam, 4to. 1688.

GESNER, Conrad, an able scholar, physician, and philosopher, born at Zurich 1516. The poverty of his father would have checked the display of his great abilities, had not Ammien, professor of Latin and eloquence at Zurich, with noble generosity, taken him to his own house and provided for his education. The death of his father left him his own master, and he began to travel to seek his fortune. He visited Strasburg, where he made some progress in the Hebrew language, and as he was allowed a small pension from Zurich university, he made the tour of France, and in company with John Frisius came to Paris. He afterwards returned to Strasburg, and was called back to Zurich to preside over a school, and there he married. His appointment, however, was not adequate to his expenses, and determining to apply himself to physic he left Zurich in disgust, and studied the Greek physicians in their own language at Basil, till he was honorably nominated Greek professor at Lausanne. In some degree thus independent he applied himself with redoubled assiduity to the medical profession, and passed to Montpellier where he devoted himself to anatomy and botany, and on his return to Zurich he began to practise as physician, and received the honor of a doctor's degree. He was appointed there professor of philosophy, a place which he enjoyed 24 years till his death. He died of the plague 1565. For the variety of his attainments, and the extent of his erudition, he was deservedly called the German Pliny; and among his various avocations he found time to write not less than 66 various pieces on subjects of grammar, botany, medicine, and natural history. He was the first who distinguished the genera of plants by the comparison of their flowers, seeds, and fruits.

GESNER, Solomon, bookseller of Zurich, was author of some elegant poems in the German language. He was member of the senate of Zurich, and also obtained celebrity by his landscape paintings, many of which were sold in England. The most admired of his compositions is the Death of Abel, in poetic prose, which has been translated into English. He died 2d March 1788, aged 58. He wrote besides, "Night" — Daphnis, a pastoral — Idylls — a Letter on landscape painting — poems, &c. He also published 10 landscapes engraved by himself 1765.

GESNER, John Matthew, an able scholar and acute critic, of the family of Conrad Gesner, born near Newburg in Germany 1691. After studying eight years at Ansbach, he was appointed by the recommendation of Budus to superintend the public school at Weinheim.

heim. Eleven years after he was removed to the same but more lucrative situation at Anspach, and lastly to Gottingen, where he became professor of humanity, public librarian, and inspector of public schools in the province of Luneburg. He died at Gottingen universally respected in 1761. He is much known as the author of some valuable editions of the classics, of which the Horace and Claudian are the more popular. He also published a most excellent Thesaurus of the Latin tongue.

GESNER, John James, a native of Zurich. He was professor in the university, and died there 1787, aged 80. He wrote Thesaurus Universalis Omnium Numismatum Veterum Græcor. & Roman. 4 vols. fol. — Specimen Rei Nummarie Numismata Regum Macedon. ex Laboribus Crophii, Lazii, Golzii, &c.

GESNER, Solomon, a native of Silesia, who studied at Breslau and Straßburg, and became divinity professor at Wittenberg 1593, and afterwards dean and rector of the university. He wrote the Prophecy of Hosea from Jerome's version — Dissertation on Genesis, &c. — Disquisition on the Psalter — sermons, essays, &c. He died 1605, aged 46.

GETA, Septimius, son of the emperor Severus, and brother of Caracalla, was slain in the arms of his mother, by his brother who was jealous of his merits and virtues, A. D. 212.

GETHIN, lady Grace, an English lady, daughter of sir George Norton, of Abbots-Leith, Somersetshire, born 1676. She married sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin-Grott, Ireland; but she did not live long enough to display to the world the superior talents she possessed, as she died at the premature age of 21. She was buried in Westminster abbey, where a beautiful monument records her merits, and where, to perpetuate her memory, she also founded a sermon to be preached every Ash-Wednesday for ever. After her death were published "Reliquiæ Gethinianæ," or Remains of the ingenious and excellent lady Grace Gethin, being a collection of choice discourses, pleasant apophthegms, and witty sentences, &c. 1700, 4to. This work, containing much good sense and many judicious observations, deserves the compliments which the fair author received from the pen of Congreve.

GETHING, Richard, a curious penman of Herefordshire. He settled in London about 1616, at the Hand and Pen, Fetter lane, London, and published copy books of various hands with plates. One of them was dedicated to sir Francis Bacon. The time of his death is not mentioned.

GEVARTIUS, John Gaspar, an eminent critic, born at Antwerp 1593. He studied under the jesuits at Antwerp, and then removed to Louvain and to Douay. He was at Paris in 1617, and took the degree of LL. D. in the university of Douay, and became town clerk of Antwerp, an employment which he held till his death 1666. He was married 1625. He published Lectio-num Papinianarum Libri quinque in Statii Sylvas, 1621, 8vo. Leyden — Electorum Libri tres, &c. 1619, 4to. Paris — a Latin poem on the death of Thuanus, 1618, &c.

GEVSS, John Michael, a native of Holstein, professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and author of the Theory of the Art of constructing Mines, 1776 — a Voyage to Iceland, from the German, 2 vols. 4to. — an edition of Logarithmi Numerorum ab Unitate ad 10,000, &c. He died at Holstein 1786, aged 41.

GHELEN, Sigismund, or GELENIUS, Vid. GELENIUS.

GHEZZI, Peter Leone, a painter, born at Rome, and knighted by Francis I. duke of Parma. His abilities were employed by the pope in adorning the castle of Gondolfo, and other public edifices. He died 1755, aged 81.

GHILINI, Jerome, an Italian writer, born at Monza, in Milan, 1589. He was educated by the jesuits at Milan, in philosophy and polite literature, and studied the civil and canon law at Parma. He married; but upon the death of his wife he became an ecclesiastic. He lived to the age of 80. He is chiefly known for his "Theatro d'Huomini Letterati," reprinted 2 vols. 4to. Venice, 1647. The work, though praised by Baillet, is considered in general as insipid, partial, and often incorrect. He wrote besides, Cases of Conscience — poems — Annals of Alexandria.

GHIRLANDAIO, Domenico, a Florentine painter, born 1449. He was intended for the profession of a goldsmith; but he studied with success painting, and though his pieces possess not superior merit, he is yet respected as the master of the great Michael Angelo. His three sons, David, Benedict, and Randolph, were distinguished as painters. He died at the age of 44.

GHISOLFI, Giovanni, a painter of Milan, who died 1683, aged 60. His perspective views and his sea ports are much admired.

GIAPAR, or SADEK the Just, a Mussulman doctor, by the mother side, descended from Abubekir the caliph. He wrote a book of Prophecies — one on lots and traditions, and died at Medina 764.

GHIAHEDH, or Large-eyed, a Mussulman, the head of the Motazales, a sect who united religion and philosophy. He wrote treatises on Metaphysics, &c. and died 840.

GIANNONI, Peter, a Neapolitan, author of an history of his country, which so offended the court of Rome that he fled from persecution to the king of Sardinia's dominions, and died in Piedmont 1748, aged 68. His history was translated into French by Desmanceaux.

GIBALYN, le Comte de, author of "le Monde Primitif," died 1784, aged 59. For this valuable work he twice received the prize of 1200 livres from the French academy.

GIBBON, Edward, the celebrated author of the history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, was born at Putney, 8th May 1737, of a very respectable and ancient family. From Kingston-school he removed to Westminster, and afterwards entered as gentleman commoner at Magdalen college, Oxford. At the university he paid much attention to books of divinity, especially the works of Bossuet, and as he had never imbibed in his youth proper notions of religion, and decided tenets of faith, he at last, either from conviction, or the love of singularity, embraced the Roman Catholic principles, and in 1753 renounced the the hierarchy of the protestants in the presence of a popish priest in London, and was received into the bosom of the church. This conduct alarmed and displeased his father, who immediately sent him to Lausanne, where, under the friendly care, and by the sensible conversation of Pavilliard, a protestant divine, he was made to understand the true nature of religion, and the pure doctrines of the gospel, and in 1754 he renounced his errors, and received as a pledge of his reconciliation, the sacrament, according to the rites of the reformed church. During his residence at Lausanne, he paid much attention to classical literature, and acquired such a perfect knowledge of the French language, that he both spoke and wrote it with the same facility as his own native tongue. He here became intimate with the daughter of a protestant minister, an accomplished woman, who afterwards became the wife of the celebrated Necker; but his wish to form a matrimonial connection with the lady was checked by his father, and while he sighed as a lover, he obeyed as a son, and abandoned the object of his passion to lead the rest of life in peevish celibacy. In 1758 he returned to England, but though engaged in a military life, as the captain of the grenadiers of the Hampshire militia, he continued his studies in the midst of the dissipation of a camp, and found more pleasure in the company of his favorite authors, than in the society of gay and profligate associates. His Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature, appeared in 1761, dedicated to his father, and was admired as an elegant and correct performance. At the peace of 1763 he quitted the militia, and travelled through Paris and Switzerland to Italy, and in the midst of the ruins of the capitol, formed the plan of that great work which has immortalized his name. He contributed much to the completion of the "Mémoires Littéraires" of Great Britain by Deyverdun 1767, and in 1770 he attacked Warburton's hypothesis on the descent of Æneas to the infernal regions, in his critical observations on the sixth book of Virgil's Æneid. The death of his father in 1770, left him master of a comfortable, independent, though encumbered family estate, and therefore as an owner of landed property, he determined to add to the consequence of his rank, by obtaining a seat in parliament for Liskeard in 1774. The first volume of his immortal work, the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, appeared in 1776, and was continued and completed in five other quarto volumes. The book was received with universal applause, and his bookseller, Mr. Cadell, sensible of the merits of the performance, and of its rapid sale, liberally paid him on the completion of the history 8000*l*. Much and deservedly as the historian is commended, yet it is to be lamented that he has inveighed with sarcastic rudeness, and with an insulting air of affected impartiality, against the great truths of christianity. The unsettled state of his own religious opinions, and the frequent visits which he paid to the infidel hero of Ferney, left it indeed doubtful whether he was much more than a masked atheist; but it required the deep arts of hypocrisy to pretend to develop the awful causes which produced the redemption of mankind, and to unveil the mysteries which cover the revelations of heaven to fallen sinners. It is therefore not to be wondered, that the two offensive chapters on the growth and progress of christianity were violently attacked by various writers, but these were disregarded by the phlegmatic historian, who deigned to give a reply only to Mr. Davis because he had accused him with want of fidelity. Though the abilities of the historian were thus acknowledged of superior rank, and his powers of understanding extensive, yet he never ventured to speak in parliament, but during the eight years in which he held a seat, he gave a silent vote for the minister. His Memoir on the War with France, in consequence of her espousing the cause of the Colonies, written in French, was much admired; and procured for him, from lord North, a seat at the board of Trade, till its abolition by Burke's bill. In 1783 Gibbon returned to Switzerland, to complete the three last volumes of his history, and he returned to England 1788, where the work was published complete on his birth-day. He afterwards returned to Lausanne, but the horrors of the French revolution, the origin of which, he with many other virtuous and sensible characters had falsely hailed as the regeneration of mankind, disturbed the tranquillity of his retirement, and he hastened back to England. He died of a dropsy 16th Jan. 1794, at the house of his friend lord Sheffield. His posthumous works, with his memoirs written by himself, and finished by the pen of his friend lord Sheffield, appeared in 2 vols. 4to. soon after his death. His character as a writer has been well drawn up by the nervous pen of Mr. Porson in his letters to archdeacon Travis. His history he allows to be one of the ablest performances that has ever appeared. His industry is indefatigable, his accuracy scrupulous, his reading, which is sometimes ostentatiously displayed, immense, his attention always awake, his memory extensive, his periods harmonious. In endeavouring however to avoid vulgar terms he too frequently dignifies trifles, and clothes common thoughts in a splendid dress, that would be rich enough for the noblest ideas. In his anxiety to vary his phrase, he becomes obscure, and instead of calling his personages by their names, he describes them by their birth, alliance, office, or other circumstances of their history. An unpardonable fault too, is his rage for indecency, which pervades the whole work, especially the last volumes, though it is remarkable he is so affectedly prudish that he dares not call Belshazzar a cuckold, because it is too bad a word to be used by a decent historian.

GIBBONS, Grinling, a famous sculptor, son of a Dutchman, settled in England. He was a member of the board of works, and was employed by Charles II. The best specimens of his art are the foliage in Windsor chapel, the choir of St. Paul's cathedral, the font of St. James's church, Westminster, and particularly the ornaments of Petworth house. He died 1721.

GIBBONS, Orlando, a native of Cambridge, made organist of the royal chapel; and admitted Mus. D. at Oxford 1622. He died three years after, of the small pox, at Canterbury, aged 42. His compositions in music were far superior to all those of his age. He published Madrigals, 1612, &c. His son, and also two brothers, were eminent as musicians.

GIBBS, James, an architect, born at Aberdeen 1685. Besides the design of St. Martin's church, London, which cost 32,000*l.* in the erection, the new church at Derby, the senate house, and the new buildings of King's college, Cambridge, and St. Mary's church in the Strand, are part of his works. He sold his designs in 1728 for 1500*l.* and the plates for 400*l.* He died 5th Aug. 1754.

GIBERT, Balthasar, a native of Aix, who, after being four years professor of philosophy at Beauvais, was elected to the chair of rhetoric at the college of Mazarin, where he presided 50 years. Though highly respected at Paris he was banished to Auxerre by the court in 1740, because he opposed the revocation of an appeal which the university had made against the bull Unigenitus. He died at Regennes 28th Oct. 1741, aged 77. His works are Rhetorique, or les Regles de l'Eloquence — Jugement des Savans sur les Auteurs qui ont traité de la Rhetorique, 3 vols. — Observations sur le Traité des Etudes de Rollin, &c. His nephew Joseph was also a man of literary fame, and wrote Memoire pour l'Histoire des Gaules, &c. He died at Paris 1771, aged 60.

GIBERT, John Peter, a native of Aix, professor of theology at Toulon and at Aix, from which he, in 1709, removed to Paris. He lived here in a very retired and abstemious manner, and though offered several benefices he refused them all with the most indifferent composure. As a canonist, learned and well informed, he was highly respected. He died poor at Paris 2d Dec. 1736, aged 76. He wrote Practical Cases concerning the Sacraments — Memoirs concerning the holy Scriptures — Institutions ecclesiastical and beneficial, &c. — Usage of the Gallican Church in Censures, &c. — Traditions, or History of the Church, on Marriage — Corpus Juris Canonici, &c. 3 vols. fol. — Notes on the Treatise of Abus, &c.

GIBERTI, John Matthew, a native of Palermo, who obtained favor and consequence at the court of Leo X. and Clement VII. and became governor of Tivoli and bishop of Verona. He was, in 1527, one of the hostages whom Clement delivered to the Imperialists, and, according to the barbarous prejudices of those times, he was treated with great rudeness, and even cruelty. When set at liberty he retired to his diocese; but returned to Rome at the invitation of Paul II. and with a liberal mind he established in his own house a Greek press, and thus enabled the learned men whom he patronized to publish some editions of the writings of the fathers. His letters and directions to the clergy are valuable. He died 1543.

GIBIEUF, William, a priest of the congregation of the oratory, who wrote a book on the Liberty of God, and of the Creature, in Latin, a performance of great merit. He died 1650.

GIBSON, Edmund, an English prelate, born at Knipe, near Bampton, Westmoreland, 1669. From a school in the county he entered as servitor at Queen's college, Oxford, and soon evinced his proficiency by publishing 1691, William Drummond's "Polemio Midiana" and James V. of Scotland's Cantilena Rustica, 4to. with curious and interesting notes. In 1692, he published a Latin translation of the Chronicon Saxon- cum, 4to. and soon after Librorum M.S.S. in duabus Insignibus Bibliothecis, Altera Tenison, Londini, Altera Dugdali, Oxonii, Catalogus, dedicated to Tenison bishop of Lincoln, who appointed him his chaplain. He took his master's degree in 1694, and the next year showed his abilities as an antiquarian by publishing Camden's Britannia, with great additions, also dedicated to Tenison, under whose patronage he rose to the rectory of Stisted, Essex in 1700, the rectory of Lambeth, and the mastership of St. Mary's hospital 1703, and in 1710, the archdeaconry of Surrey. His Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani in fol. appeared in 1713, and while it commanded the applause of the friends of the church, excited the censures and the envy of its enemies. When Wake on Tenison's death succeeded to the primacy 1715, Gibson was raised to the see of Lincoln in his room, and in 1723, he was translated to London. He died at Bath 6th Sep. 1748, leaving several children. As a prelate Gibson ranks high. Vigilant over the rights of the church, he warmly supported the test act, and was zealous that those who were admitted into holy orders should be persons of character, discretion, and learning. The establishment of preachers from Oxford and Cambridge, at Whitehall, alternately, took place at his suggestion. This worthy prelate wrote, besides, some tracts and pastoral letters, wisely calculated to recommend religion and to counteract infidelity and immorality.

GIBSON, William, a self taught mathematician, born at Boulton near Appleby, Westmoreland, and died 1791, aged 71. Though he published nothing, his knowledge of mathematics, of navigation, of mechanics, optics, and experimental philosophy, was very great and very accurate.

GIBSON, Thomas, an eminent painter, known at Oxford and in London. He died April 28th 1751, aged about 71.

GIBSON, Thomas, a physician, born at Morpeth in Northumberland. He was very eminent for his knowledge of botany, history, physic, and divinity, and he performed very popular cures. He favored the reformation, and fled during the persecution of Mary, but returned under Elizabeth, and died in London 1562. The titles of his writings are preserved in Tanner, and in Aikin's Memoirs of Medicine.

GIBSON, Richard, commonly called the dwarf, was an eminent painter in the time of sir Peter Lely. He was originally servant to a lady at Mortlake, who observed and encouraged his fondness for painting, and placed him under de Cleyn, master of the tapestry works at Mortlake, and the designer of the cuts for Ogilvy's works, and Sandys' Ovid. Gibson's pieces in water colors, but especially his copies of Lely's portraits, gained him great reputation. He was page of the back stairs to Charles I. he was also a favorite with Oliver Cromwell, and drew him several times, and he also instructed in drawing the princesses Mary and Anne afterwards queens. He married Mrs. Anne Shepherd who was likewise a dwarf, and the ceremony was honored by the presence of Charles I. who gave away the bride. Though only three feet ten inches, they had nine children, five of which reached maturity, and were well proportioned, and of the common size. Gibson died.

in Covent Garden in his 75th year, and his wife 20 years after, 1709, aged 89.

GIBSON, William, nephew of Richard, was instructed by him and Lely in the art of painting, in which he became eminent. He was successful as a limner, and a copier of sir Peter Lely; whose collection he purchased at his death, and enriched with several valuable foreign pieces. He died of a lethargy 1702, aged 58.

GIBSON, Edward, kinsman to William, was instructed by him in drawing. He first painted in oil, but afterwards acquired great celebrity in crayons. His promising abilities were cut short by death when very young.

GIDEON, one of the judges of Israel. He was of the tribe of Manasseh and was called by God, while he was threshing, to extricate the people of Israel from the oppression of the Midianites. He was judge over the nation 40 years, and died B. C. 1236.

GIFANJUS, Hubertus or Obertus, a critic and civilian, born at Buren in Guelderland 1534. He pursued his studies at Louvain and Paris, and first erected a library for the Germans at Orleans, where he took the degree of doctor of civil law 1567. He was in Italy in the suite of the French ambassador, and afterwards was professor of philosophy at Strasburg, and then at Altdorf and Ingoldstadt. He abandoned the protestants for popery, and was made counsellor to the emperor Rodolph. He died at Prague 16th Aug. 1604, according to Thuanus. He wrote notes and commentaries on Homer, Aristotle's Ethics and Politics, Lucretius, and other authors, and some law tracts, but he is accused with dishonorably suppressing the publication of the MSS. of Fruterius, an extraordinary youth who died at the age of 25 at Paris, and which had been entrusted to his care. He was unfortunately engaged in quarrels with Lambin, Scioppius, and others, which, in exhibiting the passions of human nature, too often show that the intellectual powers do not always exercise that authority over the heart which religion dictates.

GIFFORD, Dr. Andrew, a baptist minister, for some time, assistant librarian in the British museum. He died 1784, aged 84, leaving his library to the baptist meeting, Bristol.

GIFFORD, Richard, an English divine, educated at Baliol college, Oxford, which he left after taking his first degree in arts. He was for some time curate of Richard's castle, Herefordshire, and then morning preacher of St. Anne's Soho, and in 1758, he became chaplain to the marquis of Tweedale, and the next year obtained from bishop Cornwallis, Duffield vicarage in Derbyshire. He was presented, in 1772, to North Okendon rectory in Essex, where he was unable long to reside on account of the pestilential vapors of the fens. He was author of Remarks on Kennicott's Dissertation on the Tree of Life in Paradise, — Contemplation, a poem, 1753, quoted by Johnson in his dictionary, — Outlines of an Answer to Dr. Priestley's Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit, &c. He died at Duffield much respected, 1st March 1807, aged 82.

GIGGEO, Anthony, an Italian divine, who settled at Milan, and translated into Latin the commentaries of

R. R. G. Solomon, Aben Ezra, and Levi Gerfon on the Proverbs. His chief work is Thesaurus Lingue Arabicæ, or Lexicon Arabico-Latinum, 4 vols. fol. He died about 1632.

GILBERT, William, a learned physician, who first discovered some of the properties of the load-stone, was born 1540, at Colchester, where his father was recorder. He was educated at Cambridge, but he took his degree of M. D. abroad, and on his return to London, was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1573. He began to practise in London with such reputation, that Elizabeth appointed him her physician, with a liberal pension. In 1600, he published his book "de Magnete, &c. Physiologia Nova," which contained the observations of former writers, and might be said to be the foundation of all future improvements. He died 30th Nov. 1603, and was buried in Trinity church, Colchester. His reputation, in consequence of his discoveries on the magnet, was very extensive, so that not only Carpenter, Barrow, sir Kenelm Digby, and others have compared him to Harvey, to Galileo, to Gassendus, and other great luminaries of philosophy, but foreigners have regarded him as a man of uncommon merit and of superior abilities. His MS. de Mundi Nostri Philosophia Nova, was published at Amsterdam, 1651, 4to. by sir William Boswell. He left his books, &c. to the college of physicians.

GILBERT, Thomas B. D. an English divine, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford. He was ejected from the parish of Egmond, Salop, for nonconformity, 1662, and died 14th July, 1694, aged 83. He wrote some theological tracts, and it is said that he made a convert of Dr. South to his opinion concerning predestination.

GILBERT, sir Humphrey, an able navigator, born at Dartmouth. His mother, when a widow, married Mr. Raleigh, by whom she had the famous sir Walter Raleigh. He was educated at Eton, and Oxford, and afterwards followed the military profession, and was knighted in 1570, for his services in Ireland. He, in 1583, took possession of Newfoundland, in the name of his mistress Elizabeth, where his attempts to settle a colony on the American continent were unsuccessful. He wrote a book to prove a N. W. passage to Cathaia, and the Indies. On his return from Newfoundland, the ship, in which he was, foundered, and every soul on board perished, 1584.

GILBERT, Jeffery, chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland, and afterwards in England, abridged Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, published by Dodd 1750, and translated the 12th ode of Horace's second book, in a very elegant style, which was inserted in the Wit's Horace, p. 67.

GILDAS, the most ancient of British historians, is known for his epistle written 560, 12 years after the evacuation of Britain by the Romans. He lived near the wall built by Severus, and Nicholson calls him a monk of Bangor. His epistle was translated into English in the reign of Charles II. There was also a poet of that name concerned in the writing of the prophecies of Merlin, in Latin verse.

GILDON, Charles, an English critic, born at Gillingham, Dorsetshire, 1666. As his friends were of the the Roman catholic persuasion, he was sent to Douay, to become a priest, but his inclinations were not for the church, and he returned to England, 1685. He spent in youthful follies, in London, the greatest part of his property, and married a woman of no fortune, and at last to retrieve his affairs, at the age of 23, he went on the stage, but proved unsuccessful as an actor, as well as the author of three plays. He afterwards published various pamphlets and essays, and affected the name and office of a critic, and wrote his "Complete Art of Poetry", and the "Laws of Poetry", &c. He offended Pope, for which he was placed in a conspicuous place in the Dunciad. He died 1723.

GILES, of Viterbo, an Italian cardinal, the favorite of the popes Julius II. and Leo X. He was legate in Germany, from the pope, and made a cardinal. He died 1532. He was author of Commentaries on the Palms—dialogues—letters—poems—Remarks on the three first Chapters of Genesis, &c.

GILES, John, or ÆGIDIUS, was born at St. Alban's in the 13th century. He studied at Paris, and was physician to Philip, king of France, and professor of medicine, at Montpellier, and Paris. He was also made D. D. and was the first Englishman on record entered among the Dominicans. He was an eloquent preacher, and as eminent for his physical recipes.

GILIMER, or GELIMER, descended from Genferic, was the last of the Vandal kings of Africa. He deposed his relation Hilderic, 530, but fled into Numidia, when invaded by the superior force of the great Belisarius. He was at last taken prisoner after various defeats, and when led through the streets of Constantinople, he exclaimed, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity! He was honored by Justinian, but refused to be raised to the rank of senator, as it was offered on condition of his renouncing Arianism.

GILL, Alexander, an English scholar, educated at Christ-church, Oxford, and made master of St. Paul's school 1608, in which he continued till his death 1635, at the age of 71. He wrote some theological tracts, and was buried in Mercers' chapel.

GILL, Alexander, son of the above, was born in London, and admitted at Trinity college, Oxford. He was usher to his father in St. Paul's school, and succeeded him in 1635. He removed five years after and kept a school in Aldersgate, till his death 1642. He is called by Wood, a good Latin poet.

GILL, John D. D. a dissenting minister born at Kettering, Northamptonshire, 19th Nov. 1697. In 1716, he was admitted pastor of the anabaptists at Kettering, and two years after went in the same capacity to Higham Ferrers. In 1721, he was invited to Horsley-down meeting, in Southwark, and soon after removed to Tooley street, where he died Oct. 13th 1771. He ranked high as a good orientalist, and as an extensive scholar. His publications were numerous, and in his principles he was a rigid Calvinist. His works are, an Exposition of the Bible, 9 vols. fol. a valuable performance—the Cause of God and Truth, 3 vols. 8vo.—a Body of Divinity, 3 vols. 4to.—a dissertation on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language—tracts and sermons.

GILLES, Peter, a learned adventurer, born at Albi 1490. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of classical literature, and in 1533 he dedicated a book to Francis I. and invited him to send learned men into foreign countries to examine their manners and customs. He was accordingly sent by the monarch to the Levant, but as he was not supplied with money for his expences as he expected, he was obliged in his distress to enrol himself in the army of Soliman II. for subsistence. He was afterwards engaged in another voyage, and carried by the pirates to Algiers, from which he extricated himself by the liberal assistance of cardinal d'Armagnac. He died at Rome 1555. He was author of Tracts de Vi et Naturâ Animalium—de Bosphoro Thracio—de Topographiâ Constantinopolitana.

GILLESPIE, George, a Scotch divine, one of the four sent as commissioners from the church of Scotland to Westminster 1643. He wrote Aaron's Rod Blossoming—Miscellaneous Questions, &c. and died 17th Dec. 1648.

GILLOT, Claude, a French painter and engraver of Langres, disciple to Vateau, and the master of J. Baptiste Corneille. He died at Paris 1722, aged 49. He was happy in representing grotesque figures, &c.

GILPIN, Bernard, an eminent divine, born at Kentmire, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He afterwards went to Christ church, and became a zealous supporter of the reformation in consequence of reading attentively the works of Erasmus, and of other German divines. He obtained in 1552 the living of Norton in Durham diocese, but with remarkable humility he resigned it, considering himself as yet unfit to preside over the spiritual concerns of a parish. He next visited the continent, where he printed a treatise on the sacraments, written by his uncle Tonstal, and returned to England in 1556. By the patronage of his uncle he now obtained the archdeaconry of Durham, and the rectory of Easington, and afterwards the rectory of Houghton le Spring. Zealous and active he conducted himself as the friend of piety and religion, he enforced residence among the clergy, and every where supported the honor and the interests of virtue. His influence as a pastor was considered as so great that Bonner, jealous of the increasing power of the reformers, marked him for destruction, and Gilpin, summoned to London before a bloody tribunal, already prepared himself to march to the stake with all the composure of those who had gone before him, when the death of Mary stopped the hand of his persecutors, and restored him to the wishes of his parishioners, and the duties of a benevolent pastor. This exemplary and hospitable man was offered the bishopric of Carlisle by Elizabeth, and also the headship of Queen's college, but he modestly refused these honors, satisfied to live and to die among his parishioners who regarded him as a friend and a father. He died 1583, aged 66. His life has been written by bishop Carleton, and by his descendant William Gilpin.

GILPIN, Richard, a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. D. He afterwards took orders, and became minister nister of Greystock in his own county, and a popular preacher about London, but was expelled for nonconformity 1662. He then practised physic in the north, especially at Newcastle, and died 1657. Of his works his discourse on "Satan's Temptations," is best known.

GILPIN, William, an able divine, descended from the famous Bernard Gilpin of whose life he wrote an account. He was born in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards distinguished himself at the head of a respectable school at Cheam, Surrey. He died 5th April 1804, aged 80, vicar of Boldre in Hampshire, and prebendary of Sarum. He published the Lives of Latimer, Wickliffe, Hufs, and Cranmer — Lectures on Church Catechism, 12mo. — Exposition of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo. — Observations on Picturesque Beauty, 8vo. — a Tour to the Lakes, 2 vols. 8vo. — Remarks on Forest Scenery, 2 vols. — Essays on Picturesque Beauty — on Prints — on the River Wye, &c. — on the Western Parts of England, 8vo. — Moral Contrasts, 8vo. — Sermons to Country Congregations, 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

GINNANI, Francis, a native of Ravenna, page to duke Anthony Farnese. He afterwards retired to solitude, and devoted himself to the improvement of his estate, and the cultivation of natural history. He died 1766, aged 50. He wrote an historical treatise of the Diseases of Growing Corn, 4to. 1759 — a Description of Indigenous Plants — Dissertation on the Scirpus of Ravenna — and an Account of the Curiosities of his Musæum.

GIOCONDO, Fra Giovanni a native of Verona, where he was schoolmaster, and had Julius Cæsar Scaliger among his pupils. He was well skilled in architecture, mathematics, theology, and antiquities, and he constructed some of the bridges of France and Italy. He died 1521. He published an edition of Cæsar's commentaries, and of Vitruvius.

GIOIA, Flavio, a Neapolitan, born at Amalfi, celebrated as being the inventor of the mariner's compass. As the sovereigns of Naples were at that time the younger branches of the royal family of France, he placed at the north of the compass a fleur de lis, a distinction adopted by every succeeding navigator. The principality of Principato, where he was born, also assumed a compass for its arms, no doubt as a monument of the celebrity of its citizen. Some have attributed the invention of the compass to the Chinese, and Dr. Wallis to the English. Gioia was born about 1300, but the time of his death is not mentioned.

GIOLITO, Del Ferrari, a printer of the 16th century at Venice, ennobled by Charles V. His types were more elegant than his printing was correct. He left two sons printers, and died 1547.

GIORDANI, Vital, a Neapolitan mathematician. He was at first a soldier in the pope's galleys, then purser of a ship, afterwards keeper of St. Angelo's castle at Rome, and lastly professor of mathematics. He died 1711. He wrote Euclide Restituito, fol. — de Componentis Gravium Momentis, fol. — Fundamentum Doctrinæ Motus Gravium, et ad Hyac. Christophorum Epistol.

GIORDANO, Luca, a painter of Naples, who died 1705, aged 76. He improved himself by studying the works of Titian, Corregio, and Paul Veronese, and for his merits he was knighted by the king of Spain. Several of his pieces are preserved at Milan, but his most finished picture is the battle of the angels, and the fall of Lucifer, preserved at Naples.

GIORGIANI, or ALSEID ALSCHERIE ABON HASAN, or HOUSSAIN ALI, a native of Georgia, and a Mussulman doctor, author of an Explanation of Terms used in Theology and Philosophy — a Commentary on Euclid, &c. He died 1413, at Shiraz. Another of that name was eminent as a grammarian and mathematician.

GIORGIONE, an illustrious painter, so called from his noble and comely aspect, was born at Castel Franco in Trevisano, Venice, 1478. He devoted himself to music in which he excelled, and afterwards directed his attention to painting, and was the first of the Lombards who found out the admirable effects of strong lights and shadows. He first studied under Giovanni Bellino, and improved himself by the imitation of the works of Leonardo da Vinci. Titian was his friend and fellow pupil, but his frequent visits alarmed him, and viewing him in the light of a rival and enemy, he excluded him from his house. Thus become hostile each to the other, Titian assiduously labored to copy nature, but while he surpassed Giorgione in the delicacies of natural objects, he was himself surpassed in greatness of conception, and sublimity of invention. The house where the German merchants assemble at Venice, had its front adorned by the pencil of these rival masters, and while Titian embellished one side, Giorgione labored on the other, but time unfortunately has defaced these once splendid monuments of human excellence. A Christ carrying the Cross, in St. Rovo's church, Venice, is considered as the best piece from Giorgione's pencil. The ingenious artist employed his talents to show that sculpture is not superior to painting, and he represented all the sides of the body in the same picture, by the aid of reflection from a fountain at his feet, from a looking glass at his side, and a shining armour. He died in his 33d year 1511, of the plague, with which he unfortunately was seized by paying a visit to a favorite mistress, whose infection was not suspected.

GIOSEPPINO, a painter so called from Gioseppe d'Arpino, a town of Naples where he was born 1560. He learned at Rome the elements of his art, and so distinguished himself that he became the favorite of cardinals and popes, and was made knight of St. Michael by Lewis XII. His battles in the capitol are his best pieces. He died at Rome 1640.

GIOTTINO, Tomaso, a painter of Florence whose name was Stefano. He was called Giotto from the resemblance of his style to that of Giotto. He died 1356, aged 32.

GIOTTO, an eminent painter, sculptor and architect, born near Florence 1276. He was found by Cimabue while he was employing himself in the fields in drawing upon the sand the figures of the sheep which he was tending, and under the guidance of this excellent friend and master, he soon rose to consequence and fame. When Benedict IX. wished to see designs from the Tuscan artists, Giotto, with the greatest greatest quickness, drew with one stroke of his pencil, a circle so round and so perfectly equal, that round as Giotto's O afterwards became proverbial. The pope understood from this the genius of the painter, and employed him at Rome. His most admired piece was a ship of Mosaic work over the three gates of the portico at the entrance of St. Peter's church. Giotto still favored by Clement V., Benedict's successor, returned in 1316 to Florence loaded with riches, and was afterwards honorably engaged in the service of the lord of Lucca, and of the king of Naples, and every where left specimens of his genius and of his art. His death of the Virgin, with the apostles about her, was greatly admired by Michael Angelo. He died 1336, and the city of Florence erected a marble statue over his tomb. Giotto was respected not only by princes, but by the learned and the witty, and among his particular friends were Dante and Petrarch.

GIRALDI, Lilio Gregorio, an ingenious critic born at Ferrara 1479 and educated in Latin under Guarini, and in Greek under Demetrius Chalcondyles. He resided at Modena, and afterwards went to Rome, and saw the pillage of that ancient capital by the soldiers of Charles V. After losing there the whole of his little property, and attending his patron cardinal Rangoni to the grave, and losing his other patron Mirandula, he returned to Ferrara poor and enfeebled by disease. Though, however, terribly afflicted with the gout, he yet read, and composed several of his books, till he sunk under the heaviness of his complaint 1552, and was buried in the cathedral of Ferrara. He wrote 17 different things, afterwards collected into 2 vols. folio, Basil 1580, and Leyden 1696. The most valuable of his compositions are his Historia de Deis Gentium — Historia Poetarum tum Græcorum quam Latinorum Dialogi decem, — and the Dialogi de Poetis Nostrorum. His erudition was very great, and the high encomiums of Scaliger, of Casaubon, and Thuanus upon his meritorious services to the republic of letters, are very just and honorable.

GIRALDI, John Baptist Cinto, an Italian of the family of the preceding born at Ferrara 1504. After studying philosophy and the languages he applied to physic and took the degree of M. D. Though only 21 years old he was appointed to read lectures on physic and polite literature at Ferrara, and in 1542 he became secretary to the duke of Ferrara. After teaching belles lettres at Mondovi three years he went to Turin, and thence to Pavia, where he was honorably made professor of rhetoric. He took the name of Cinto at Pavia, which he prefixed to his books. He was greatly afflicted with the gout, and retired to Ferrara where he died soon after 1573. He wrote nine Italian tragedies, besides some orations in Latin, and Hecatonmithi, or 100 novels. His tragedies, which some critics esteem as excellent compositions, were edited by his son Celso, Venice, 1583, 8vo.

GIRALDUS, Sylvester, a learned Welchman born at Mainarpir castle near Pembroke, South Wales, 1145. He was educated under his uncle, the bishop of St. David's, and studied theology at Paris for some time. He returned to England 1172, and four years after was named by Henry II. who knew his merit and his learning, to fill the vacant see of St. David's, which he disinterestedly refused. Afterwards he went to Paris and Bologna to study the civil law, and in 1185 he was sent by the king as secretary to his son John, in Ireland. In this office he applied himself to making collections of materials for the History of Ireland, and in 1186 returned to England. In 1198 he was a second time elected to the see of St. David's, but as he had a rich competitor, and as every thing was venal at Rome, he did not succeed. He died at the age of about 70. He wrote several works in which he displayed great erudition and commanding eloquence, which was wonderful, as Tanner observes, in so dark and ignorant an age. He was a great enemy to the monks, and very superstitious, and with respect to dreams and visions contemptibly ridiculous. Besides his History of Ireland, he wrote "Itinerarium Cambriae" — "de Rebus a se Gestis," and other things some of which are still in MS.

GIRARD, John Baptist, a jesuit born at Dol. He was tried by the parliament of Aix, on the accusation of a girl of 18, Mary Catherine Cadiere, for using forcery, according to her expressions, in the violation of her person, and in the attempt to destroy the fruit of her womb. This trial excited much of the public attention. Girard was acquitted.

GIRARD, Gabriel, a French ecclesiastic, almoner to the dukes of Berry, and interpreter to the king in the Russian and Slavonian languages. He wrote Synonymes François — Principes de la Langue Française, &c. and died much respected 1748, aged 70.

GIRANDON, Francis, a native of Troyes. He studied sculpture and architecture under Anguier, and was sent to Rome by Lewis XIV. to complete his knowledge of the arts. He succeeded Le Brun as inspector general of sculpture to the king, and died 1715, aged 87. His chief works are the Mausoleum of Richelieu in the church of the Sorbonne — the Equestrian Statue of Lewis XIV. and the Rape of Proserpine in the garden of Versailles.

GIRON, D. Pierre, duke of Ossuna, a noble but proud and imperious Spaniard, who, when viceroy of Naples, encouraged the famous conspiracy against Venice, which was discovered by Jaffier one of the accomplices, and which forms the subject of one of the finest pieces of English tragedy. Giron was disgraced and died in prison 1624, aged 49.

GIRONST, James, a native of Beaufort in Anjou, educated among the jesuits, and known as a popular preacher. His sermons appeared in 5 vols. 12mo. 1704. He died 1689, aged 65.

GIRTIN, John, an English painter of great excellence. His landscapes in water-colors, and in oil, were much admired. The views of London and Paris, exhibited in the Panorama in London, were by him, and are pleasing proofs of his genius and taste. Though laboring under the attacks of a dreadful asthma, he followed his profession till within a few days of his death, which happened Nov. 1802, in his 30th year.

GIRY, Lewis, one of the first members of the French academy, translated Tertullian's Apology, — the Sacred History of Sulpicius Severus — Augustine de Civitate Dei, &c. This learned and excellent character died 1665, aged 70.

GISBERT, John, a native of Cahors, for some years divinity professor at Toulouse, and then provincial of the jesuits at Languedoc. He died 1710, aged 71. He wrote Anti-Probafimus, 4to. and other works of merit.

GISBERT, Blaise, a jesuit, born at Cahors. He wrote a work on the Education of a Prince — another on Christian Eloquence, &c., and died at Montpellier 1731.

GISELINUS, a physician, native of Bruges, who published a correct edition of Prudentius at Antwerp. He died 1551, aged 78.

GIULANO, Di Majano, a Florentine, sculptor and architect, who died at Naples 1447, aged 70. The Poggio Reale palace, and other edifices at Naples, are the monuments of his genius, as well as several buildings at Rome, in the pontificate of Paul II.

GIUSTI, Antonio, a painter of Florence, who died 1705, aged 81. His animals, as well as landscapes and historical characters, are highly esteemed.

GLAIN, N. Saint, a native of Limoges 1620, who retired to Holland to profess the protestant faith. After serving with reputation in the armies of the republic, he wrote in the Holland gazette, and from a zealous protestant, he became, by reading Spinoza's book, a rank atheist. So devoted was he to his new opinions, that he translated Spinoza into French, and published it in three different editions, under three different titles, to attract the public attention.

GLANDORP, Matthias, a physician, born at Cologne 1595, where his father was a surgeon. After studying at Bremen, and improving himself at Padua and other Italian universities, he became physician to the archbishop of Bremen 1628. He died soon after 1652. His works, which exhibit the powers of an attentive and able man, were printed together at London 1729, 4to. with his life prefixed.

GLANVIL, Joseph, an English divine, born at Plymouth, Devonshire, 1636. He was of Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1656 removed to Lincoln college, and soon after taking his degree of M.A. 1658, entered into orders, and became chaplain to Rouse, provost of Eton college. The death of his patron soon after left him at liberty; and he returned to his college, where he continued during the turbulence of the times, till the restoration brought back peace, confidence, and security. Glanvil, who had showed strong partiality for Cromwell's usurpation, now became an active royalist, and he drew the attention of the learned by his popular treatise, called the Vanity of Dogmatizing, &c. against the Aristotelians, so that when the Royal society was established, he was chosen one of that learned body, whose opinions and philosophy he had so ably defended. In 1663 he engaged in a controversy about the possibility of witches and witchcraft, and though his friends, and particularly Mr. Boyle, advised him to be careful in his management of so delicate a subject, where religion might be treated with levity, he collected, with more superstition than prudence, not less than 26 modern relations of apparitions, &c. besides that of the invisible drummer which, nightly disturbed Mumpesson's house at Tedworth, Wilts, and which was the origin of the controversy. In 1666 by the interest of his friends, he obtained the rectory of the Abbey church, Bath, where he fixed his residence. In 1677 he engaged in a controversy with Crosse, vicar of Chew, Somersetshire, in defence of the Royal society, and against the Aristotelian philosophy; and the rallery used on both sides, brought a fresh antagonist Dr. Stubbe, physician at Warwick, who treated our author with more vehemence and scurrility than propriety could countenance. Glanvil forgot his resentment in the attentive performance of his ministerial duty; and when Stubbe was unfortunately drowned near Bath, and his remains were brought to be interred into the Abbey church, he preached a very pathetic and eloquent sermon on the occasion, and paid very handsome and deserved compliments to the memory of his departed antagonist. He was presented, in 1678, to a prebendal stall of Worcester, by the patronage of the marquis of Worcester, to whom his wife was related, and with the approbation of the king, to whom he had been chaplain since 1672. He was attacked by a fever which proved fatal, and he died at Bath 4th Nov. 1680, aged 44, and was buried in his own church, where his widow erected a decent monument to his memory. He was twice married, but had no issue. He was a man of great parts; but though he possessed in a high degree the power of writing with elegance and fluency, his publications were all on temporary and controversial subjects. Besides the works mentioned already, he wrote an "Essay concerning Preaching, — and a seasonable Defence of Preaching," — a blow at modern Sadducism — "Reflections on Drollery and Atheism" — Essays on important subjects in Philosophy and Religion — sermons, &c.

GLANVILLE, Ranulph, an English lawyer in the 12th century. He is mentioned with great respect, by law writers, for his diligence in collecting all the laws of the kingdom into one body.

GLAPHYRA, a priestess of Bellona's temple in Capadocia, is known for her amours with M. Antony, from whom she obtained the kingdom for her two sons, Sifinna and Archelaus.

GLAPTHORNE, Henry, a dramatic writer in the age of Charles I. Winstanley speaks of him with commendation, but Langbaine allows him little merit. Besides plays, he wrote poems to his mistress Lucinda.

GLASER, Christopher, apothecary to Louis XIV., was author of an elegant and valuable treatise on chemistry, translated into English and German. He died about 1679.

GLASS, John, M.A. a Scotch divine, born at Dundee 1698, and educated at New college, Aberdeen. Upon his publication of a pamphlet on the inconsistency of a civil establishment with christianity, he was deposed from his church, near Dundee, and then became the founder of a new sect called the Glassites, in Scotland, Scotland, and Sandemonians in England. As the discipline of his sect was very rigorous, few embraced his tenets, and the name is scarce known now. He wrote various controversial tracts, published at Edinburgh, 4 vols. 8vo. He died at Dundee 1773, aged 75.

GLASS, John, son of the preceding, was born at Dundee 1725, and went as surgeon to the West Indies. He afterwards quitted the medical profession; and as captain of a ship traded to the Brazils. After an absence of two years, he returned from the Brazils to London in 1765, with all his property; but, when in fight of Ireland, four of the seamen conspired against him; and after murdering him, his wife and daughter, the mate, one seaman and two boys, they loaded the boat with dollars, and sinking the ship, landed at Ross, and came to Dublin, where punishment overtook them. They were executed for the bloody deed, Oct. 1766. Glass possessed abilities, and published a description of Teneriff, with the manners, &c. of the Portuguese, 4to.

GLASSIUS, Solomon, a German divine, professor of divinity and D. D. in Jena university. He was afterwards superintendant of the schools and churches in Saxe-Gotha, and died 1656, aged 63. He wrote Philologia Sacra, 4to. — Onomatologia Messiae Prophetica — Disputationes in Augustanam Confessionem — Exegetis Evangeliorum et Epistol. — Chistologia Mosaica, et Davidica, &c.

GLAUBER, Rodolphus, a German chemist, author of a volume "Glauberus Concentratus," translated into English, fol. 1689, London. He has acquired celebrity as the discoverer of the neutral purgative salt, which still bears his name.

GLAUBER, John, a painter of Utrecht, who died 1726, aged 80. His landscapes are much admired. His pieces are enriched by the expressive figures of his friend Laireffe.

GLAUBER, John Gottlieb, brother and disciple of the preceding, died 1703, aged 47. His landscapes, sea ports, &c. are in a very finished style.

GLAUBER, Diana, sister of the above painters, born 1650, shone likewise by the execution of her pencil. She became blind in her old age. Her portraits and historical subjects were admired.

GLEDITSCH, John Gottlieb, a native of Leipzig, who took his degree of M. D. at Frankfort on the Oder, 1740, and there became lecturer in botany, physiology, and the Materia Medica. He was afterwards member of the Berlin academy of sciences, anatomical professor, and director of the botanical garden. He was author of treatises on the Management of Trees — on the Means of destroying Locusts — on Funguses — Miscellaneous Essays on Medicine, Botany, Economy — on Bees — on the System of Plants, &c. He died 1786, aged 72.

GLEICHEN, Frederic William Von, a nobleman, born at Bayreuth, who, after serving his country with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, retired from public life in 1756, and, satisfied with the empty title of privy counsellor, devoted himself to the study of natural history. He was very ingenious in the delineation of plants, and well acquainted with chemistry, and he constructed a curious microscope, with which he made observations on feminal animalcules, and on the putrefaction of vegetables, of which he published an account. These, and other works on subjects of natural history, are written in German, and possess merit. He died 1783, aged 69.

GLEN, John, a painter and engraver on wood of Liege. He published, in the 16th century, a curious work of ancient and modern dresses, with figures, &c.

GLENDOWER, Owen, a famous Welchman, who boldly opposed in the field, during 14 years, the elevation of Henry IV. to the English throne. His name is still revered among the Welch. He died 1415, aged 61.

GLICAS, a Byzantine historian, whose works, the Annals from the Creation, and the History of the Byzantine Emperors, were published by Labbe, 1660, in Greek and Latin.

GLISSON, Francis, an English physician, born at Rampisham, Dorsetshire, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He took his degrees in physic, and became, in the room of Winterton, regius professor of physic to the university, an office which he held 40 years. He was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1634, and in his practice and studies he followed the plans of the great Harvey, and depended more upon anatomical dissection and minute observations than wild theories and vague conjectures. During the civil wars he removed to Colchester, where he practised physic, and he was present at the siege and surrender of that important fortress. He distinguished himself by the great attention he paid to the progress of the rickets, a disorder which then first began to appear in the counties of Dorset and Somerset, and he communicated his observations and discoveries to the world in his "Anatomia Hepatis," 1654. He was for several years president of the college of physicians, and died 1677, in the parish of St. Bride, London. He was a man of great erudition, and universally esteemed. He contributed much to the advancement of true medical knowledge, and he discovered the capsula communis, or vagina portae, and more clearly defined the vena cava porta, and vasa fellea of the liver. Of his many compositions on anatomical and medical subjects his treatise on the Liver is his best work.

GLOUCESTER, Robert of, the most ancient of English poets, flourished in the reign of Henry II. and died in a good old age in the beginning of John's reign. Camden speaks very highly of him, and quotes many of his English rhymes; but he is more esteemed for his history than for his poetry.

GLOVER, Richard, an English poet, born in London, and educated at Cheam school, where his verses on the memory of Newton were deservedly applauded. He afterwards engaged with his father in the Ham-burgh trade, and in 1737 he married a woman of fortune, and produced his admired poem Leonidas. The powers of mind which he possessed were now displayed in political dissensions; he was a popular leader at elections, and when appointed one of the committee in an application to the house of Commons from the London merchants, he spoke with such boldness and energy at the bar that his address was printed, and excited universal attention. He sat in parliament for Weymouth at the election of 1761, and died 1785, aged 74, much and deservedly lamented. Besides his Leonidas he published London, or the Progress of Commerce, a poem, 1739 — Hofier's Ghost, a popular ballad to rouse the spirit of the nation against the insults of the Spanish court — Boadicea, a tragedy, acted at Drury-lane, not with success, 1753 — Medea, another tragedy, better received 1761 — Athenaid, an epic poem of inferior merit, which appeared 1788, in 3 vols. 12mo. His great and immortal work Leonidas has been translated into French, and has passed through various editions.

GLUCK, Christopher, an able musician, born in the Upper Palatinate. He studied in Italy, and visited England and Germany, and afterwards acquired great celebrity at Vienna. He went to Paris, where his performances were honorably rewarded with a pension. He wrote besides operas, letters on music, &c. and died at Vienna 1787, aged 73.

GLYNN, Robert, a native of Cambridge, educated at Eton and King's college, of which he became fellow. He studied medicine, and took his doctor's degree in 1752; but he preferred the easy and indolent life of a college to the labors of an extensive practice, which his knowledge and information might have commanded. After being for 63 years, for his wit, his learning, and his interesting fund of anecdotes, the favorite of his society, he died 1800, aged 82. He is known as the author of the Day of Judgment, a poem of singular merit, which obtained the Setonian prize at Cambridge 1757, and which is much read and deservedly admired.

GMELIN, Samuel Gottlieb, son of a physician at Tübingen, was born in 1745, and distinguished himself by his abilities and his perseverance in several voyages to France, Holland, and on the shores of the Caspian sea. He was seized by the Tartars when in their country, and died in confinement 1774. He published, in German, "Travels in Russia," and "Historia Fucorum," but though a man of genius, and well versed in natural history, he was of a licentious turn of mind. Pallas has written his life.

GMELIN, John George, uncle to the preceding, was born at Tübingen, and became member of the academy at Petersburg. He is known by his Flora Siberica, 4 vols. 4to. — and his Travels in Siberia, published in French, 2 vols. He died 1755, aged 46.

GOADBY, Robert, a printer of Sherborne, Dorsetshire, author of an Illustration of the Scriptures, 3 vols. fol. and the Universe Displayed, and other books. He wrote also the life of Bamfylde Moore Carew, the famous king of the beggars; and he acquired some property by the establishment of a provincial paper at Sherborne. He died much respected 1778.

GOAR, James, a Dominican friar of Paris, sent to the Levant in 1618. He published "Græcorum Eucologium," in Greek and Latin, Paris, 1647, and also translated some of the Byzantine historians. He resided for some time at Rome, and was universally respected for his learning. He died 1653, aged 52.

GOBBO, Pietro Paolo Cortonese, a painter of Cortona, who died 1640, aged 60. His fruits and landscapes, by their charming coloring and native elegance, are much admired.

GOBBO, Andrea, an Italian historical painter, who died about 1527, aged about 57.

GOBEL, John Baptist, a native of Hanne, bishop of Lydda. At the revolution he embraced the opinions of the popular party, and was appointed 1791, first constitutional archbishop of Paris. Soon after, however, he resigned his episcopal habit in the convention, declaring at the age of 70 that he abjured a religion in which he placed no faith, and which dishonored humanity. This hoary delinquent against truth and virtue did not pass unpunished, he was accused of atheism by Robespierre, and condemned as the accomplice of Chaumette. He was guillotined 14th April, 1793, regretted by none.

GOBELIN, Giles, a famous dyer in the reign of Francis I. known for the invention of the fine scarlet which still bears his name. The house where he lived in the Fauxbourg of St. Marcel, Paris, still preserves his name.

GOBIER, Charles, a jesuit of St. Maloes, born 1644. He wrote the "History of the Mariannes," and "Lettres Edifiantes," which contain the history, geography, and politics of those countries, subjected to the observations and discoveries of the jesuits. He wrote some other tracts, and warmly embraced the disputes about the worship of Confucius in China. He died at Paris 1708.

GOBRYAS, one of the seven Persian nobles who conspired to dethrone the usurper Smerdis. He was father-in-law of Darius.

GOCLENIUS, Conrad, a German, born in Westphalia 1486, and esteemed for his learning and virtues by Erasmus. He wrote valuable notes on Cicero's Offices, and published an edition of Lucan, and a translation of Lucian's Hermotimus. He died 1539.

GOCLENIUS, Rodolphus, author of a tract on the Cure of Wounds by the application of the Magnet, may be considered as the founder of modern magnetism. He was born at Wittemberg, and was professor of physics and mathematics at Marburg, and died 1621, aged 49.

GOCLENIUS, Rodolphus, a voluminous writer, born at Wardeck 1547. He was for nearly 50 years professor of logic at Marburg, where he died 1628. His works are on philosophical subjects.

GODDARD, Jonathan, an English physician and chemist, born at Greenwich 1617, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. After four years' residence in the university he travelled to improve himself in the knowledge of physics, and on his return he took his degree of M. D. as member of Christ college, Cambridge, and that of doctor at Catherine hall. In 1646 he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and the next year was appointed their reader in anatomy. As he favored strongly the measures of parliament, he was taken under the protection of Cromwell, and accompanied him as physician to the army to Ireland, and and afterwards to Scotland, and for his services he was nominated by the usurper, warden of Merton college, Oxford, 1651. During Cromwell's absence in Scotland, he was one of the five delegates, whom he appointed to settle all grants and dispensations, and in the short parliament of 1653, he sat as the sole representative of the university. At the restoration he was driven with disgrace from his wardenship, and he retired to Gresham college, where he had been in 1655 chosen professor of physic, and afterwards his services and talents were considered as so respectable, that in the establishment of the Royal society to which he had so much contributed, he was named one of the first council 1663. In his extensive practice as physician, he was so conscientious that he mixed up his own medicines, and regardless of the clamors of the apothecaries against him, he even published a pamphlet strongly recommending it to his fellow physicians. After being driven from the Exchange by the fire of London, he was enabled to return to the new lodgings in 1671, where he continued till his death, eagerly devoted to the advancement of medicine and of philosophy. He died of an apoplectic fit in Cheapside, as he returned home from the society of a number of his learned friends, 24th March, 1674. He was not only an able writer, but he was the liberal patron of learned men, and in consequence of his celebrity, had several books dedicated to him. He procured some fame by the invention of some drops, long since forgotten, but he deserves to be mentioned with particular honor, if as Dr. Seth Ward says, he was the first Englishman who made a telescope. His writings, which are chiefly on medical and philosophical subjects, are preserved in the philosophical transactions, in Birch's history of the Royal society, and in separate pamphlets.

GODEAU, Anthony, a French prelate, born at Dreux 1605. At the age of 24 he was one of those learned men who met at the house of Mr. Courart, on subjects of science and philosophy, and to their zeal in the cause of literature, the French academy of belles lettres owed its origin, and he became one of its first and brightest ornaments. In 1636 he was raised by Richelieu to the bishopric of Grasse, which he relinquished for that of Venice. He was an active prelate, attentive to the duties of his station, and exemplary in every part of his conduct. He died of a fit of apoplexy 21st April 1671. His writings, both in prose and verse, are numerous. His Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. folio, 1653, is very valuable, the first of which only appeared in 1653. He translated also the psalms into French verse, which work though abused by Vavassor and others, is preferred by some to Marot's version.

GODEFROI, Denys, a native of Paris, counsellor in the parliament there. As he was a protestant he left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes and retired to Geneva, and afterwards to Straßburg where he died 1622, aged 73. He wrote Corpus Juris Civilis, 4to. — Notæ in Quatuor Libr. Institut. — Opuscula Varia Juris, &c.

GODEFROI, Theodore, eldest son of the preceding, was a catholic, and became counsellor of state in France. He wrote on the Genealogical History of France, and died at Straßburg 1642. His brother James, remained a protestant, and was member of the council and law professor at Geneva, where he died 1659. He was a learned man and edited Cicero and other classical authors.

GODEFROI, Denys, son of Theodore, was author of Memoirs and Instructions concerning the Affairs of the French King, in fol. He died 1681. His son John edited Philip de Comines' Memoirs, 5 vols. 8vo. and published also queen Margaret's Memoirs, &c. and died 1732.

GODESCHALC, surnamed Fulgentius, a monk of Orbais in Saxony, in the ninth century, known for his controversy about predestination and grace. He was attacked by Rab. Maurus archbishop of Mentz, and thrown into prison, where, after being degraded from his ecclesiastical offices, he died; but his doctrines as well as his sufferings gained him followers. Maguin published in 2 vols. 4to. an edition of all the treatises written on both sides of the agitated question. He died about 869.

GODEWYCK, Margarita, a paintress of Dort, who died 1677, aged 50. Her landscapes, and also her works in embroidery, were much admired.

GODFREY, for Edmundbury, an able and upright magistrate, who exerted himself in the discovery of the popish plot. He was soon after found dead, pierced with his own sword, and with many marks of violence. His death was imputed to the resentment of the papists, and therefore his funeral was performed with great pomp, and no less than 72 clergymen preceded his corpse, and 1000 persons of rank attended the procession. The dean of Bangor, Dr. William Lloyd, afterwards bishop of Worcester, preached his funeral sermon. He died 17th Oct. 1678.

GODFREY, of Bouillon, an illustrious and active chieftain during the crusades, son of Eustace count of Boulogne. He was, after the fall of Jerusalem, elected by the christians king of that city, and of the adjacent country, but, from motives of piety and humility, he declined the lofty title, and was satisfied with the appellation of duke of the holy sepulchre. He defeated the armies of the Egyptian sultan with great slaughter, and made himself master of all the holy land. He made an excellent code of laws for his subjects, and died after enjoying his dignity little more than a year, 1100. He is one of the heroes of Tasso's immortal poem.

GODINOT, John, a native of Rheims, where he was canon of the cathedral. He was also a wine merchant, and in his conduct very charitable. He was zealously attached to the tenets of the Jansenists, and died 1749, aged 88.

GODIVA, a lady of great beauty and greater celebrity. She was sister to Therald de Burgenhall, sheriff of Lincolnshire, and wife of Leofric earl of Leicester, the son of the earl of Mercia. She solicited her husband to exonerate the people of Coventry from a heavy tax, and he consented to grant her petition provided she rode naked through the streets, which from her generous affection towards the city she condescended to do. The adventure was painted in one of the windows of Trinity church, Coventry, with these words,

I Luric, for the love of thee,
Do make Coventry toll-free.

GODOLPHIN,

GODOLPHIN, John, a learned civilian, born at Godolphin, in the island of Scilly 1617. He was of Gloucester-hall Oxford, and devoted himself attentively to civil law, and took his doctor's degree 1642-3. He favored the puritans, and under Cromwell he was appointed one of the three judges of the admiralty. So great was his reputation for integrity and knowledge, that at the restoration he was made king's advocate, and he asserted in his publications the king's supremacy. He died 1678. He published "a View of the Admiral's Jurisdiction," 8vo. 1661—"the Orphan's Legacy, &c. 1674,"—"Repertorium Canonicum, 4to."—the Holy Limbec,—the Holy Arbour, fol. &c.

GODWIN, earl, a powerful Saxon baron, who, in 1017, went with Canute against Sweden, and for his valor in that expedition received that monarch's daughter in marriage. On the king's death he supported Hardicanute against his brother Harold, but soon after changed sides. After Hardicanute's death he declared himself in favor of Edward, who had married his daughter, but, with a fickleness peculiar to his character, he afterwards conspired against him, and escaped to Flanders to avoid punishment. Bent, however, on revenge he invaded the kingdom from the continent, and spread such terror by sailing up the Thames to London, that the king yielded to his wishes and received him again into his protection. He died at Winchester suddenly, while dining with the king 1053. It is said that he murdered Alfred, one of the sons of the second Ethelred, and that when accused of it he purified himself by the solemnity of an oath.

GODWIN, Thomas, an English prelate, born at Ockingham, Berks, 1517. Under the patronage of Dr. Layton he was sent to Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1544. He early embraced the tenets of the protestants, and as his fellow collegians were very zealous for the popish principles, he quitted Oxford, and took the grammar school at Brackley, Northamptonshire, where he married, and lived in comfortable independence in the reign of Edward VI. At the accession of Mary he was exposed to persecution, and leaving his school, he began to practise physic, and took his bachelor's degree at Oxford 1555. On Elizabeth's accession he took orders, and by the friendship of Bullingham bishop of Lincoln, he was introduced to the queen, who admired his eloquence in the pulpit, and rewarded him with the deanery of Christ church 1565, and that of Canterbury the next year. In 1584 he was made bishop of Bath and Wells, but he soon after fell under the queen's displeasure for taking a second wife, and this weighed much on his spirits, and increased his infirmities. He died of a quartan ague 1590.

GODWIN, Francis, son of the preceding, was born at Havington, Northamptonshire 1561, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, of which he became student 1578. He was rector of Samford Orcais, Somersetshire, prebendary of Wilts, subdean of Exeter, and in 1595 he took his degree of D. D. He devoted his time to literary pursuits, and accompanied Camden in his travels into Wales in search of antiquities, but while he left his friend to record the features of the country, he turned his thoughts to the history of some of the inhabitants, and produced in 1601, in 4to. "a Catalogue of the Bishops of England, since the first planting of Christianity in the Island, with an History of their Lives and memorable Actions." This valuable work gained him the friendship of lord Buckhurst, and the patronage of Elizabeth, who made him bishop of Llandaff. He now devoted himself to the improvement of his book, and, in 1615, published another edition, which however was so erroneously printed, from his distance from the press, that he gave another edition in an elegant Latin dress, dedicated to James I. who was so pleased with it that he translated the bishop to the see of Hereford 1617. He died of a languishing disorder April 1633, leaving several children by his wife, daughter of Wollton, bishop of Exeter. After his death, in 1638, was published "the Man in the Moon, by Domingo Gonsales, 8vo." an entertaining piece on a philosophical subject, which he had written in 1583, but never published. He wrote also Annals of the reigns of Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Mary, in Latin, the third edition of which was 1630, with an English translation by his son Morgan, also a computation of the value of the Attic Talent, and Roman Sesterce, &c.

GODWIN, Thomas, a learned Englishman, born in Somersetshire 1587. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1609, and that year he was elected master of Royse's free school, in Abingdon, where his genius and abilities were soon distinguished by a respectable number of pupils. He wrote for the use of his school "Romanæ Historiæ Anthologia" 1613, 4to. and in 1616, published at Oxford his "Synopsis Antiquitatum Hebraicarum, &c." dedicated to his patron Montague, bishop of Bath and Wells. Some time after he obtained from his patron the rectory of Brightwell, Berks, and resigned his school. He printed 1637 "Moses and Aaron", and took his degree of D. D. 1637. He died at Brightwell 1642-3, leaving a wife, whom he had married while at Abingdon. This worthy and learned man was, on account of his book called Three Arguments to prove Election upon Foresight, by Faith, engaged in a controversy with Dr. Twile of Newbury.

GODWIN, Mary Wollstonecraft, a woman of eccentric character and superior abilities, born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, 1768. Reduced in her circumstances by the extravagance of her father, she sought for subsistence in the resources of her own mind, and as a teacher of a day school at Islington, and then at Newington, and afterwards as governess in lord Kingsborough's family, she maintained herself with reputation. Too fond of independence however to submit to the caprices and humors of self-willed children, she had recourse to her pen, and, in 1787, she settled in London, and published Original Stories for the use of children, and various translations from French, and German authors. She was also engaged in the Analytical Review, and, in 1790, was one of Burke's opponents in an attack against his famous pamphlet on the French Revolution, and the next year she published her vindication of the Rights of Women, a book which in bold language attempts to overthrow the established regulations of society, and which, instead of conciliating concord, cord, harmony and mutual affection, in domestic life, would render the marriage-state a scene of distrust, and jealousy, of strife, and contentious rivalry. She was in 1792, at Paris, where she unfortunately formed an improper connection with an American merchant, by whom she had a daughter, and while accompanying him in Norway, she wrote her Letters on Scandinavia. The little respect she had paid to her character, proved now the source of great unhappiness, and deserted by her ungrateful favorite, she, on her return to England, attempted to destroy herself by throwing herself into the Thames, from Putney bridge. She in some degree atoned 1796, for the insults she had offered to the good sense of her sex, and the precepts of a holy religion, and, after defending a promiscuous intercourse among the sexes, as passion or inclination dictated, she married Mr. Godwin, but died the August of the following year in childhood. Her letters, fragments, and posthumous works, appeared after her death.

GOERCE, William, an eminent scholar of Middleburg, who died at Amsterdam, 1715, aged 80. He is author of Jewish Antiquities, 2 vols. fol. Utrecht 1700 — History of the Jewish Church — essay on the Practice of Painting — on Architecture.

GOERTZ, John baron of, a memorable Swede, born in Holstein. He gained, by his intrepidity and valor, the good opinion of Charles XII. He endeavoured to excite an insurrection in England, in favor of the pretender, and was at last sacrificed to the popular fury. He had been placed, by Charles, at the head of his finances, and the discontents which he caused by requiring money for the schemes of his eccentric master, were such, that after the king's death he was beheaded 1719.

GOES, Hugo Vander, a painter of Bruges, disciple of Van Eyck. His Abigail in the presence of David, is his most admired piece. He flourished about 1480.

GOESIUS, William, a critic, born at Leyden. His notes on Petronius, adopted in Burman's edition, are much admired. He was son-in-law of Dan. Heinsius, and died 1686.

GOETZE, George Henry, a native of Leipzig, who died at Lubec, 1702, aged 34. He was superintendent of the churches of Lubec, and wrote in Latin, dissertations historical, critical and theological. A collection from his works appeared 3 vols. 12mo. 1706.

GOEZ, John Augustus Ephraim, a native of Ascherleben, educated at Halle, and minister of Quedlinburg, where he died 1786, aged 55. He was an eminent naturalist, and his various discoveries with the microscope entitle him to great praise. He published Entomological Collections, in four parts, 1771-1781 — History of Intestinal Worms, in German, 1782, &c.

GOEZ, Damian de, a Portuguese writer, born at Alanquar, near Lisbon, of a noble family. He travelled much, and became acquainted with the learned of Europe, especially John, and Olaus Magnus, Erasmus, cardinal Bembo, and others. He married at Louvain, and hoped there to enjoy peace and security, after 14 years spent in travelling, but a war between Charles V. and Henry II. of France, drove him from his retirement. He was recalled home by John III. of Portugal, but the favors of the monarch were embittered by the jealousy and the persecution of the courtiers. By their influence he was confined within the walls of Lisbon on his parole, and he was soon after found dead in his house, with the appearance of having been strangled, or fallen a sacrifice to a violent apoplexy. He wrote "Fides, Religio, Moresque Æthiopum" — "de Imperio & Rebus Lusitanorum," and other works much esteemed.

GOFF, Thomas, an English writer, born in Essex, 1592, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. In 1623 he obtained the living of East Chandon, Surrey, where he took for his wife a Xantippe, whose violence of temper destroyed his comforts, and probably shortened his days. He died 1627. Among his writings are five tragedies, published after his death, some sermons, and two funeral orations on Sir Henry Saville and Dr. Godwin. Philips and Winstanley ascribe to him improperly "Cupid's Whirligig."

GOGAVA, Antonius Hennanius, a German physician, who published Aristoxeni Harmonicorum Elementorum Libri quinque, Venice 1592.

GOGUET, Antony-Tues, a French writer, born 1716 at Paris, son of an advocate. Though dull in his younger years, his mind expanded, and produced that excellent work called "L'Origine des Loix, des Arts, des Sciences, et de leur Progres chez les Anciens Peuples 1758," 3 vols. 4to. The reputation of this celebrated performance he did not long enjoy, as he died of the small-pox the same year; and his friend, Conrad Fugere, to whom he left his MSS. and library, followed him through affliction to the grave in three days.

GOLDAST, Melchior Haiminsfeld, a learned civilian, born at Bischoffsels in Switzerland 1576. He was always poor, though his distress was relieved by his publications, and the liberality of his friends. He was of a very unsettled temper, and he passed from St. Gall to Geneva, from Geneva to Lausanne, and afterwards he was at Frankfort, Forsteg, and other places. He was some time secretary to the duke of Bouillon, and he married a wife at Frankfort, with whom he lived nearly 30 years. He survived her five years, and died 1635. He was a most indefatigable man, and though his writings were not properly his own, but drawn from scarce books and old manuscripts, yet he displayed astonishing judgment and great erudition; and though abused by Scioppius, he probably deserved all the flattering things which Conringius has said in his praise. As to the knowledge of the public law of the empire, and a thorough acquaintance with the affairs of Germany, no man was better intitled to respect, and therefore it might be said, that had he lived in the age of Athens, he would have found an honorable asylum in her prytaneum. His works are Monarchia S. Romani Imperii, 3 vols. fol. — Alamaniz Scriptores, 3 vols. fol. — Commentarius de Bohemiz Regno, 4to. — Scriptores Rerum Suevicarum, 4to. — Collectio Consuetudinum Leg. Imperial. fol. — Politica Imperial. 2 vols. fol. &c.

GOLDHAGEN, John Eustachius, of Magdeburg, translated Herodotus, Pausanias, Xenophon, and other Greek classics into Latin. He died 1772, aged 71.

GOLDMAN, Nicholas, a native of Bresslaw, author of a Latin treatise on military architecture, on the proportion of the circle, &c. He died 1665 at Leyden.

GOLDONI, Charles, a native of Venice, who early showed a decided partiality for theatrical representation, so that his father, to humor his taste, fitted up a play-house on his own premises. The genius, so kindly patronised, was most happily exerted, and the Italian itage was completely reformed by the labors and the judgment of Goldoni, whose plays were numerous and popular. After acquiring deserved celebrity at home by the humor and genuine wit of his comedies, he went in 1761 to Paris, where he became composer to the Italian theatre, and obtained apartments at court, and a pension. He died 1792, aged 85. His works were collected together at Leghorn, in 31 vols. 8vo.

GOLDSMITH, Oliver, a celebrated writer, born at Elphin 1729, or, according to some accounts, at Pal-las in the county of Longford 1731. He was the third of four sons, and his father, who was a clergyman, intending him for the church, sent him in 1744 to Trinity college, Dublin, where he took his first degree in arts 1749. He preferred, however, medicine to divinity, and in 1751 passed to Edinburgh to qualify himself for his medical degrees, but here the benevolence of his disposition drew him into difficulties; and his imprudent offer to answer for the payment of the debts of an ungrateful fellow collegian, obliged him to fly precipitately from Scotland. He was pursued, and arrested at Sunderland, but the friendship of two of his college friends, who knew his merits and pitied his imprudence, relieved him from his difficulties; and he immediately embarked for the continent. From Rotterdam, where he had landed, he proceeded to Brussels, and then passing through Flanders he came to Strasburg, and visited Louvain, where he took his degree of M. B. From Flanders he travelled to Geneva, where he became tutor to a young man whom the sudden possession of a large fortune had induced to make the tour of Europe, but the dispositions of the preceptor and the pupil were so different, that, after visiting the south of France, they separated in mutual disgust. After a long excursion, chiefly on foot, Goldsmith at last reached Dover in 1758, but persecuted by poverty. For a while he sought employment in London; but the rustic appearance of his dress, and his broad Irish accent, proved unfavorable to his application, till at last a chemist in Fish-street, pitying his misfortunes, received him into his laboratory, more as an act of charity than from the prospect of private advantage. From the hospitable roof of this accidental patron, he soon, however, rose to greater consequence under the patronage of his old friend Dr. Sleigh, and after being usher in a school at Peckham, he commenced writer in the Monthly Review, and then in the Public Ledger, where his Citizen of the World first appeared under the title of Chinese Letters. He was now courted as a man of genius, and respected as a public character; and emerging from his obscure lodgings near the Old Bailey, he took chambers in the Temple, and began to live like a man of fashion and of fortune. His Traveller, or Prospect of Society, his Vicar of Wakefield, and his Letters on the History of England added to his reputation and to his income, and in 1768, his Good-natured Man, acted at Covent-garden, though censured by some critics, placed him in the rank of the most popular writers of the age. His excellent poem of the Deserted Village appeared in 1770, and two years after he produced his comedy of She stoops to Conquer, or the Mistakes of a Night, which was received with great and deserved applause, and will long engage the public approbation. He published besides, an History of England in 4 vols. 8vo. — another in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son long attributed to lord Lyttelton, in 2 vols. 12mo. — a Roman History, 2 vols. 8vo. — a Grecian History, 2 vols. 8vo. — an History of the Earth and Animated Nature, 8 vols. 8vo. &c. but though his income was respectable he was far from feeling the comforts of independence and prosperity. His temper was unfortunately peevish and fullen, and though humane, benevolent, and generous, though the friend of indigence and pining merit, he was often a prey to childish moroseness and fullen melancholy, and frequently retired from the company of the gay and the convivial to brood over his self created miseries and his imaginary woes. The last part of life was embittered by the lingering attack of a strangury, and bodily disease at last produced a settled melancholy. A nervous fever succeeded to wear out his constitution, shattered by delirium and the horrors of despondency, and by inadvertently taking an improper dose of Dr. James's powders he hastened his own dissolution. He died 4th April 1774, aged 45, and was buried in the Temple church yard. A monument worthy of his fame and merit has been erected to his memory in Westminster abbey, where a Latin inscription, in nervous and beautiful language by the pen of Dr. Johnson records his virtues. As a writer, Goldsmith acquired great and deserved celebrity. His poems possess singular beauty, the Traveller abounds with elegant and animated description, and as Dr. Johnson observed, no poem of greater excellence has appeared since the days of Pope. The Deserted Village exhibits beauties peculiarly its own, and while the simple tale of indigent nature, and of suffering humanity can interest and captivate the heart, so long will the lines of this correct poem continue to be read and admired. Besides the works already mentioned, many are enumerated as the composition of Goldsmith, though it is probable that, like Guthrie, Smollet, and others, he only lent his name to them to give them a temporary celebrity.

GOLDSMITH or GOULDSMITH, Francis, an able translator of Grotius' play of Sophomarpas, or History of Joseph, into English verse. He lived in the reign of Charles I. and was highly respected.

GOLIUS, James, a learned orientalist, born at the Hague 1596. He studied with unusual application at Leyden, and travelled afterwards to France with the dukes de la Tremouille, and was honorably invited to teach Greek at Rochelle, where he staid till that city was reduced by the French arms. He afterwards returned to Holland, and directed by the genius of his friend and preceptor the learned Arabic professor Erpenius, he accompanied the Dutch ambassador in 1622, to the court of Morocco, thus to enrich his mind with a more intimate knowledge of the Arabian tongue, and to advance the interests of literature. He carried with him a letter of recommendation from his master Erpenius, for the Moorish prince, with a present of a grand atlas, and of a New Testament in Arabic, which was received received with great satisfaction by Muley Zidan the king of Morocco. During his residence here, Golius devoted himself assiduously to the Arabic, and in an audience which he had from the king, he was admired for the facility with which he understood the language, though on account of its guttural sounds he could not pronounce it fluently, and on his return to Holland he brought with him a most valuable collection of books and manuscripts, hitherto unknown to Europe, and among them the Annals of the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. On the death of his valued friend Erpenius, he was chosen as his successor in the Arabic chair, but so great was his thirst after knowledge, that he asked and obtained permission to travel into the east. He was 15 months at Aleppo, and made various excursions into Arabia and Mesopotamia, and then came by land to Constantinople, and at last in 1629, he returned to Leyden: He not only had thus become a perfect master of the Persian, Turkish, and Arabic languages, but he had made observations on their manners, and he brought with him such curious and valuable manuscripts, as have ever since been the pride and glory of the university of Leyden. With indefatigable zeal he now converted the treasures he possessed to the good of mankind, and nobly patronized by the states, he began and finished a New Testament in the Arabic language, with a translation into the vulgar Greek, besides the Confession of the Reformed Protestants, and a Catechism and Liturgy, assisted by an Armenian and an Archmandrite, to be dispersed among the Greeks and Mahometans in every part of the world. During his absence, his countrymen, in honor of his great services, had appointed him mathematical professor, and soon after he was nominated interpreter in ordinary to the States for eastern languages, for which he was so well qualified. To these honors from his country he added all the virtues of private life; his temperance and regularity ensured him a vigorous constitution, and at the age of 70 he travelled on foot from the Meuse to the Waal, a journey of 14 hours. He died 28th Sept. 1667, much and deservedly respected for his learning, his virtue, meekness, and piety. He had by his wife, with whom he lived 24 years, and who survived him, two sons, who rose to distinction in Holland. Besides a valuable "Arabic Lexicon," and a new edition of Erpenius' Grammar, and a Persian Dictionary, printed in London, the Life of Tamerlane, &c., he engaged in a Geographical and Historical Dictionary of the East, which, however, he did not complete.

GOLIUS, Peter, brother of the preceding, was born at Leyden, and established a monastery of the barefooted Carmelites on the summit of mount Libanus. He was an excellent orientalist, and published some books in Arabic and Latin, and assisted in the editions of the great Arabic Bible, printed at Rome 1671. He died at Surat, in the East Indies, 1673.

GOLTZIUS, Henry, an eminent painter and engraver, born 1658. at Mulbrec, in the duchy of Juliers. He travelled through Germany to Italy disguised in the habit of a servant, whilst his servant appeared in the character of a master, and pretended to keep him for his knowledge and skill in painting. After visiting Rome and Naples, and studying the works of the best masters he returned to Haerlem, where he died 1617. As an engraver he has been highly commended by Evelyn, and his imitations of Leyden, in the Passion, the dead Christ, and other pieces, have been long and deservedly admired.

GOLTZIUS, Hubert, a German writer, born at Venloo, in the duchy of Gueldres, 1526. Though brought up a painter under his father, who was of the same profession, he devoted himself to the pursuits of antiquities, and particularly of medals, and travelled through France, Germany, and Italy, in the cultivation of his favorite study. His fame as an antiquary was so respectable that he was honored with the freedom of Rome, and the books he wrote were so curious and so valuable that they were deemed the ornaments of the first libraries in Europe. He was so devoted to the science of antiquity that he gave to his children the names of ancient Romans, such as Julius, Marcellus, &c.; but though very nice and judicious in his examination of antiques, he has admitted some medals as true which are evidently not such. He married a second wife, widow of Smetius, more for the antiques which her husband had possessed than for love, and, consequently, the union proved so disagreeable that the violent temper of his bride shortened his days. He died at Bruges 1583, aged, 57. His chief publications were "Imperatorum fere omnium vivæ Imagines à J. Cæsare ad Carolum V. ex Veter. Numismatibus" — "Fasti Magistratum, &c." — "de Origine Populi R." — "Fasti Consulares" — "Thesaurus Antiquit."

GOLYDDAN, a bard in the court of Cadwallader in the beginning of the eighth century.

GOMAR, Francis, a native of Bruges, known for his strong and able defence of Calvin's principles against Arminius, his colleague as divinity professor at Leyden, and his adherents. He died at Groningen, where he was divinity and Hebrew professor, 1641. He had before held a literary situation at Middleburgh and Saumur. His works were collected into one volume, Amsterdam, 1645.

GOMBAULD, John Ogier de, a French poet, born at St. Just de Lussac, in Saintonge, 1567. He was educated at Bourdeaux, and then came to Paris, where he determined by his abilities to advance his fortune, which he, as the son of a fourth marriage, found very circumscribed. His sonnets and epigrams gained him applause, and the verses which he wrote on the king's assassination by Ravallac 1610, so pleased the queen regent, Mary de Medicis, that she made him her favorite, and granted him a pension of 1200 livres. Thus cherished by the great, and the respected friend and associate of those who frequented the house of that virtuous and amiable woman Mad. Rambouillet, he charmed every company with his wit and his elegant manners. He was one of those whose meetings gave rise to the academy of belles lettres, 1626, under the patronage of Richelieu, and he became one of its first members. Though a friend of the reformed religion he conducted himself with such propriety that he offended no party, but, on the contrary, he gained universal esteem, and lived respected. His income was increased by an additional pension from Seguier, chancellor of France, and, by prudent economy, his equipage and finances were always on the most respectable footing. By an accidental fall in his room he was confined for some of the last years of his life to his bed. He died 1666, aged 99. At the age of 90 he published a collection of epigrams, and some years after, the tragedy called Danaides. Among his chief productions are "Endymion," a romance, in prose — Amarintha, a pastoral — letters — poems, &c. His posthumous works appeared in Holland 1678, and were chiefly religious, and in favor of protestant principles.

GOMBERVILLE, Marin le Roi, a native of Chevreuse, member of the French academy, and author of Polexandre — la Cytherée — la Jeune Alcidiene, romances — Discours sur les Vertus & les Vices de l'Histoire, &c. — la Doctrine des Mœurs selon les Stoïques — de la Rivière des Amazones — Poësies Diverses, &c. He died 1674, aged 75.

GOMERSAL, Robert, a poet in the time of Charles I. student of Christ-church, Oxford, and B. D. 1627. He left poems and sermons. His "Levite's Revenge" containing poetical meditations on the 19th and 20th chapters of Judges is his best piece. He died 1646.

GOMEZ, de Ciudad, Alvarez, a Latin poet of Guadalaxara near Toledo. He wrote Solomon's Proverbs into Latin verse — the Golden Fleece, and other works, esteemed in Spain. He died 1558, aged 70.

GOMEZ, de Castro, Alvarez, a learned Spaniard, born near Toledo, and author of the History of cardinal Ximenes. He died 1580, aged 65.

GOMEZ, Magdelene Angelica Poisson de, a French lady who wrote some romances and theatrical pieces, very numerous, but not much esteemed. She died 1770, aged 86.

GONDEBAUD, third king of Burgundy after his brother Chilperic 491. He attacked Italy, and endeavoured in vain to reunite the catholics and Arians at a synod at Lyons 499, but he was afterwards defeated and made tributary to Clovis king of the Franks. He put to death his brother Godefil who had revolted against him, and afterwards devoted himself to the improvement of his subjects, whose morals and property he protected by the establishment of a system of laws still called la Loi Goubelle. He died 516.

GONDRIN, Lewis Antony, a favourite of Lewis XIV. When visited at his country house by the monarch, he removed in one night the grove of old trees which had appeared to the king as offensive to the sight. Lewis the next day, complained of a large wood which obstructed his view, and in a moment 1200 men, who were ready, levelled the disagreeable wood to the ground. What if the king, said the dukes of Burgundy, who was present, if the king wished our heads thus to disappear, the duke, I fear, would not hesitate to gratify his sovereign.

GONDY, John Francis Paul, cardinal de Retz was born at Montmirel in Brié, in 1613, and died 1679. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, and coadjutor to his uncle the archbishop of Paris, and after many intrigues he obtained a cardinal's hat. Though a debauchee in his youth, he yet assumed the sanctity of the preacher, and with such eloquence and effect that he was adored by the people. He caballed against Richelieu, and at last, after six years of exile, and after being imprisoned at Vincennes and Nantes, he was permitted to return, and by his good conduct and exemplary manners he made atonement for the vices of his youth. He was, says Voltaire, a Catiline in his youth, and an Atticus in his old age. He wrote, besides the Conspiracy of count Fiesco — Memoirs of his Life, which are very authentic and interesting. The best edition of this valuable performance is that of Amsterdam 1719, 4 vols. 12mo.

GONET, John Baptist, a Dominican friar, doctor and professor of theology in the university of Bourdeaux, and author of a Sytem of Theology in 5 vols. folio. He died 1681, aged 65, at Beziers his native place.

GONGORA, Lewis de, a Spanish poet, born at Cordova 1562. He studied at Salamanca, and taking orders, became chaplain to the king, and prebendary of Cordova where he died 1627. His works were all published after his death, and consist of sonnets, elegies, a comedy, a tragedy, &c. Though he is abused by some critics for affectation, and a false sublime, yet the Spaniards regard him as the prince of their poets.

GONNELLI, John, the blind man of Combaffi, lost his sight at the age of 20. He afterwards became a sculptor, and by the touch acquired great excellence, and even attempted portraits, and with some success. He gave a good likeness of pope Urban VIII. and of Cosmo the great duke of Florence. His works are much admired in France.

GONSALVA, Fernandez, the great captain of Cordova, was an illustrious Spaniard, distinguished against the Portuguese, and in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella in the conquest of Grenada, and in the wars of Italy, where he conquered Calabria, Apulia and Naples. This great character, so respectable for his valor and his private virtues became at last suspected to his sovereign, by the artifice of his enemies, and he died in retirement in Grenada 1515. Florian has made him the hero of his romance.

GONTHIER, a Latin poet, author of the History of Constantinople, 1203.

GONTHIER, John and Leonard, two brothers, eminent as painters on glass. Their works were much admired, and are still held in high estimation.

GONZAGA, Lucretia, a learned and illustrious woman of the 16th century. At the age of 14 she married Paul Monfrone, who conspired against the life of the duke of Ferrara, and was discovered and imprisoned. Lucretia, though he was not put to death, applied to every European power for his deliverance, and even solicited the grand Signior to seize the castle where he was confined, but her endeavours were fruitless, and her guilty husband died in prison. Though afterwards solicited in marriage, she lived in widowhood, and of her four children only two daughters survived, whom she placed in monasteries. She was so elegant a writer that her epistles were collected and published at Venice 1552. Though she did not profess to be learned, yet she infused spirit, and all the graces graces and flowers of erudition into her pieces, and she fully deserved all the praises and flattering compliments of Hortensio Lando, and of the wits of her time. She died at Milan 1576.

GONZAGA, Scipio, a noble Italian, educated at Padua, and eminent for his knowledge of philosophy and divinity. He was created a cardinal by Sixtus VI. and died 1593, aged 51. He wrote some poems and left manuscript memoirs of himself, &c. He was concerned in the establishment of the academy of Degli Etereî at Padua.

GONZAGA, Vespasian, duke of Sabbioneta, a city which he founded, and which he adorned with churches and schools, died 1591, aged 60, universally respected as a liberal patron of literature, and as an excellent Italian poet.

GONZALEZ, Thyrfus, a Spaniard, general of the jefuits, who died at Rome 1705. He is author of the Doctrine of Probability, folio, 1694, and of several other tracts.

GOODALL, Walter, a writer, born in the shire of Angus, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He is known as a philologist, and as the author of a Vindication of Mary, in 2 vols. 1751, in which he shows himself very strongly attached to the house of Stuart. He died at Edinburgh 1758, aged 71. He has been censured for his excessive fondness of drinking.

GOODWIN, John, an able disputant, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, and appointed 1633, minister of St. Stephen, Coleman street, London, from which he was ejected 1645 for refusing to administer the sacrament to his people promiscuously. Under the republic his principles were so violent that he wrote a vindication of the beheading of Charles I. At the restoration he was excepted from the act of indemnity, and his works were burnt by the hangman, and he soon after died lamented by few. His writings which were in favor of Arminianism, were a treatise of Justification, 4to. — Exposition of the ninth of the Romans, 4to. — Redemption Redeemed, fol. &c.

GOODWIN, Thomas, a puritanical divine, born 5th Oct. 1600, at Rolfeby, Norfolk, and educated at Christ church, Cambridge. He was fellow of Catherine hall, but in 1630 to avoid persecution he went to Holland, and settled at Arnheim, as pastor of the English church there. During the civil wars he returned to London, and was one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and in 1649 was made by Cromwell president of Magdalen college, Oxford. He attended the protector in his last illness, and was ejected from Oxford at the restoration. He afterwards preached to an assembly of independents in London till his death, 23d Feb. 1679. His works have been collected 5 vols. folio. He is supposed by Granger to be alluded to in No. 494 of the Spectator.

GOOL, John Van, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague 1685. He also wrote an account of the lives and works of the Flemish painters.

GORDIAN I. emperor of Rome, was invested with the purple in Africa much against his wish, 237, in the reign of Maximinus. His son of the same name assumed the imperial power with him, but soon after their elevation they were attacked by a general of Maximinus, and the son was killed in battle, and the father destroyed himself with his girdle, 237. A youth of the same family afterwards was raised to the throne, but a few years after he was murdered near the Euphrates by his minister Philip, 244.

GORDON, Thomas, a political writer, born at Kircudbright, Galloway. He came to London early, and distinguished himself in the Bangorian controversy, and other political subjects as the defender of lord Oxford. He was patronized by Mr. Trenchard, who with him began to publish under the name of "Cato" a number of letters on public affairs. He about this time published "the Independent Whig," in which he showed his violence against the hierarchy, but sir Robert Walpole, knowing his abilities, gained him over to his party, and made him commissioner of wine licences. Thus devoted to the minister, he began ably to defend his measures in several pamphlets, and continued attached to him till his death, which happened 28th July, 1750, at the age of 66. His second wife was Trenchard's widow, by whom he had some children. Besides political tracts, he published English translations of Sallust and Tacitus, with additional discourses.

GORDON, Alexander, M. A. a Scotchman, admired as a draughtsman and as a Grecian. He travelled over France, Germany, and other places, and was secretary to the society for the encouragement of learning, afterwards to the Egyptian club, whose members had visited Egypt, and to the antiquarian society, which he resigned 1741. He went with governor Glen to Carolina, where he died a justice of peace, leaving a handsome inheritance to his family. He wrote "Itinerarium Septentrionale," or a Journey through Scotland, with plates — Lives of Alexander VI. and his son Cæsar Borgia, &c. folio — History of Ancient Amphitheatres — and 25 Plates of Egyptian Mummies, &c. folio, 1739 — Hieroglyphical Figures, &c.

GORDON, James, a jesuit, descended from a Scotch family. He taught philosophy and languages at Bourdeaux and Paris, and suffered much for the catholic religion. He died at Paris 1620, aged 77. He wrote Controversiarum Christianæ Fidei Epitome, 2 vols. folio. There was another jesuit of that name, author of a Commentary on the Bible, 3 vols. fol. 1632, and other works.

GORDON, Robert, of Stralagh, was author of "Theatrum Scotiæ," an excellent book with maps of the country, dedicated to Oliver Cromwell. He died about the middle of the 17th century.

GORDON, Andrew, a native of Aberdeen, who became professor of philosophy in the Scotch monastery of Benedictines at Erfurt, where he died 1751, aged 39. He wrote Phænomena Electricitatis Expedita, 8vo. — Philosophia Jucunda et Utilis, 3 vols. 8vo. — Origin of the Present War of Great Britain, 4to. — Physicæ Experimentalis Elementa, 8vo. He first substituted a cylinder instead of a globe in his electrical machine.

GORDON, lord George, son of Cosmo duke of Gordon, was originally in the navy, which a dispute with the first lord of the admiralty obliged him to quit. He afterwards obtained a seat in parliament for Ludgershall, and and anxious to gain popularity he violently opposed the ministry, and attacked the bill which granted certain immunities to the Roman catholics. Not satisfied with the opposition which he gave to the measures in the house, he had the imprudence to head the mob when they presented a petition to the commons, and thus by his artful and intemperate conduct, he occasioned those dreadful riots, which in 1780 nearly converted the capital into a heap of ruins. So gross a violation of duty did not pass unnoticed, he was sent to Newgate and tried, but acquitted. In 1786 he was excommunicated for refusing to appear as a witness in a cause, and two years after he was found guilty of publishing a gross libel against the queen of France. To avoid the punishment due to this offence he fled to Holland, but soon after returned in the habit of a Jew. His disguise, however, could not screen him from the pursuits of the officers of the law, he was sent to Newgate, and died there 1793, aged 43.

GOSSELINI, Julian, a writer born at Rome, 1525. At the age of 17, he was appointed secretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily, in whose service he continued 40 years. He published several things in Italian, in verse and prose, besides Latin poems, and died at Milan, 1587.

GOTH, Stephen, archbishop of Upsal, who by attempting in vain to restore the Roman catholic religion in Sweden, in conjunction with John the king, nearly kindled a civil war, in the 16th century.

GOTHOFRED, Dennis, an able lawyer, born at Paris. He taught law in some of the German universities, but was not permitted to reside in France, on account of his attachment to the principles of Calvin. He died 1622, aged 73. He edited "Corpus Juris Civilis" and wrote some law treatises, published in Holland, in folio.

GOTHOFRED, Theodosius, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1580, and professed the catholic religion, which his father had abjured. He became counsellor of state, and assisted in the embassy for a general peace at Munster, where he died 1649. He wrote several works on the history, rights, and titles of the French monarchy.

GOTHOFRED, James, son of Dennis, was born 1587. He was a Calvinist, and enjoyed five times the office of Syndic, and other high appointments at Geneva, where he died 1652. He wrote several works, which display his great and extensive erudition.

GOTHOFRED, Dennis, son of Theodosius, was born at Paris 1615, and died at Lisse, 1681, director of the chamber of accounts. He wrote the histories of Charles VI. VII. and VIII.

GOTHOFRED, John, son of Dennis, just mentioned, succeeded his father as director at Lisse. He was equally well skilled in the history and antiquities of France, and wrote Journal de Henry III. — Memoires of Marguerite, and an edition of Philip Comines. He died 1732, very old.

GOTTESCHALC, Vid. GODESCHALC.

GOTTI, Vincent Lewis, an Italian of Bologna, made a cardinal by Benedict XIII. He wrote several works on theology, &c. and died 1742, aged 78.

GOTTIGNIES, Giles Francis, a native of Brussels, professor of mathematics at Rome, where he died 1689, aged 59. He was also a jesuit, and wrote Elementa Geometriæ Planæ — Arithmetica Introductio ad Logisticam Mathefi Universæ Servientem — Epistolarum Mathematicarum. — Figura Cometarum, qui apparuerunt Annis 1664, 5, and 8.

GOTTLEBER, John Christopher, an excellent German critic, who died 1785, aged 52. Of his learned works, the best known is Animadversions on Plato's works.

GOTTSCHED, John Christopher, a German poet of Königsberg, professor of logic, philosophy, and metaphysics, who died at Leipzig 1766, aged 66. He was assisted in the composition of his dramatic pieces by his wife, and so great was his influence and celebrity, that he banished buffoonery from the stage, and spread a love of literature over Germany. His wife died 1762. The best of his works are, Essay towards a Critical History of Poetry for the Germans — Collections for a Critical History of the Language, Poetry, and Eloquence of Germany — Principles of General Philosophy — Principles of the German Language — the German Theatre — Poems — the Death of Cato, a tragedy, &c.

GOUDIMEL, Claudius, an excellent musician, put to death at Lyons, for setting the psalms of Marot and Beza to music.

GOVEA, Martial, a Latin poet of the 16th century, author of a Latin grammar.

GOVEA, Andrew, brother to the preceding, taught grammar and philosophy, and established under John III. of Portugal, the college of Coimbra. He died 1548.

GOVEA, Antony, youngest brother of the preceding, eminent for his erudition, and professor of law at Toulouse, and then at Turin. Besides an excellent edition of Virgil and of Terence, he wrote Latin epigrams, and a commentary on Cicero's Topica. He died, as Blount says, after an immoderate meal of cucumbers, at Milan 1565, aged 60.

GOUGE, William, minister of Blackfriars, was born at Stratford le Bow. He was of King's college, Cambridge, and is remarkable for not being absent from morning and evening prayers for nine years, and for reading 15 chapters of the bible every day. He was one of the ministers of the assembly of Westminster, and was appointed one of the annotators of the bible. He died 16th Dec. 1653, and was buried at his own church leaving an exemplary character for perseverance as a preacher, for humility, faith, and patience. He wrote "the whole Armour of God" — Exposition of the Lord's Prayer — Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, and other works in support of Calvinism.

GOUGE, Thomas, son of the preceding, was educated at Eton and King's colleges, Cambridge, and became minister of St. Sepulchre, London, for 24 years, but was ejected at the restoration. He died in his sleep 1681, aged 77. He wrote several books of practical divinity, and distributed many thousand copies of the bible, catechism, &c. among the 300 schools which he is said to have established in Wales. Dr. Tillotson preached his funeral sermon, though he was a non-conformist.

GOUGES, Mary Olympe de, a native of Montauban. During the revolution, she espoused the violent measures of the times, and made Mirabeau the hero of her writings. Reflection, however, and the enormities of the times, cooled her prejudices, and when Louis XVI. was dragged before the bloody tribunal, she had the courage to demand of the convention, the privilege of defending an innocent monarch. This heroic conduct, and her attacks upon Marat and Robespierre, marked her out for death. She was guillotined 3d Nov. 1792, aged 38. She wrote some dramatic pieces, which were collected in 3 vols. 8vo.

GOUJET, Claude Peter, a French writer, who died at Paris 1767, aged 70. He published a supplement to Dupin's Bibliothèque, 18 vols. 12mo. — Richelet's Dictionary, &c. His library consisted of above 10,000 volumes.

GOUJON, John, a sculptor of Paris, from the correctness and grace of his works, called the Coreggio of sculpture. He flourished in the reigns of Francis I. and Henry II., and was killed at the massacre of St. Bartholomew 1572.

GOULART, Simon, an able writer, born near Paris 1543. He studied at Geneva, where he succeeded Calvin as minister; and died there 1628. He wrote an History of the League — Notes on Plutarch's works, translated by Amiot — and on Cyprian's works; and published besides some treatises on divinity — and on moral subjects — and a Translation of Seneca, and other authors. His works are enumerated in Niceron's Memoirs.

GOUPY, Joseph, a French artist, admired for his execution in water colors, and for his skill as a copier. He taught the princess of Wales; and his cartoons were were so highly valued, that the duke of Chandos gave 300*l.* for the copy, when, they produced at his death not more than 17 guineas. He died 1747.

GOURDON, Simon, a native of Paris, who, at the age of 15, embraced the ecclesiastical profession among the canons of St. Victor, and lived a very austere life till his death 1729, aged 83. He was author of Lettres on Cases of Conscience, hymns, &c.

GOURNAY, Mary de Jars, lady of, a Frenchwoman, born in Gascony 1565, and allied to several illustrious families. She had a great partiality for literature, and she showed such respect for Montaigne upon reading his first essays, which were then published, that she solicited his friendship; and on the death of her father, adopted him as her own parent. Thus devoted to the muses and the purest regards of this celebrated philosopher, she passed the best part of her life, rejecting every connection which might destroy her friendship and her mental enjoyments. On Montaigne's death, she crossed the kingdom to mingle her tears with those of his widow and her much loved daughter; and as a proof of her great gratitude and immortal affection, she re-printed his Essays in 1634, with an elegant preface sacred to his memory. Her works, in prose and verse, were published in 1636, in one volume. She died 1645 at Paris, and her memory was honored with various epitaphs from the pens of Menage, Valois, Patin, la Mothe, Vayer, and others.

GRABE, John Ernest, a native of Königsberg, in Prussia, who studied divinity with great attention, and then determined to go to Rome, to embrace popery, because he considered the Roman church as the true church of Christ. He published his opinions before his departure, but before he reached Rome, he met with three pamphlets which had been written by order of the elector of Brandenburg, in answer to his book, and these had such an effect upon him, that after conversing with Spener, the author of one of them, he resolved to come to England, as the only place which retained the regular succession of the Apostolic ministry, without the superstitions of Rome. He was liberally received in England, and presented to the degree of D. D. by the university of Oxford, and in proof of his sincerity, and his adherence to the principles of the Anglican church, he took orders, and wrote some valuable works in divinity. He also published lished an edition of the Septuagint, from the Alexandrian MS. preserved in the king's library. He died 1712, aged 46, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

GRACCHUS, Tiberius, and Caius, sons of Sempronius Gracchus by Cornelia, are celebrated for their intrigues and death. By attempting to revive the Agrarian law at Rome, they drew down upon themselves the vengeance of the senate. They were both killed, Tiberius 133 B. C. and Caius, some years after.

GRACCHUS, Sempronius, a Roman banished for his licentious amour with Julia, to a solitary island on the coast of Africa, where 14 years after he was assassinated.

GRÆME, John, a Scotch poet, born at Carnwarth, Lanarkshire, 1748. As the youngest of four sons and of a weakly constitution, he was intended for the ministry by his father, a farmer of the middling class, whose income arose chiefly from his industry. From the school of Lanark, he was removed to Edinburgh university, where his talents soon displayed themselves in the composition of elegant Latin, and in the acquisition of the more abstruse sciences of natural philosophy and metaphysics. He declined accepting an exhibition at the university of St. Andrew's, and satisfied with the friendship of Wilkie, the author of the Epigoniad, he devoted himself fully to the cultivation of the muses, in the ease and retirement of a college life, but his rising fame was cut short by the appearance of a rapid consumption, of which he died 26th July, 1772, aged 22. His poems consisting of elegies and miscellaneous pieces were printed at Edinburgh 1773, 8vo. and exhibited him in the character of a spirited author, and a benevolent man.

GRÆVIUS, John George, a celebrated critic, Vid. GRÆVIUS.

GRAFFIO, a jesuit of Capua in the 16th century, author of two 4to. volumes on moral subjects. He was grand pensionary of Naples.

After her husband's death, who was chamberlain to the duke of Lorraine, and from whom, for his brutality, she was separated, she removed to Paris, to live with the wife of marshal Richelieu, where she died 1758, aged 65. She wrote also Genie — la Fille d'Ariftide, two dramatic pieces.

GRAFTON, Richard, author of an abridgment of the Chronicles of England, and of a Chronicle and large meere History of the Affayers of England, and Kings of the same from the Creation of the World, was born in London under Henry VIII. and died there in the reign of Elizabeth.

GRAHAM, George, an eminent watch and clock-maker born at Gratick, Cumberland, 1675. In 1688 he came to London, and some time after lived in the family of Tompion, a clockmaker, who knew his merit, loved his person, and respected his abilities. To the most perfect knowledge of mechanics he added practical astronomy, and by his perseverance and accuracy, he not only improved but invented several astronomical and mathematical instruments, with a degree of perfection and dexterity hitherto unknown. The great mural arch in Greenwich observatory, was made for Dr. Halley under his inspection, and divided by his own hand; and with his sector Dr. Bradley first discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. But not only England was benefited by his genius, but the rest of Europe. The instruments with which the French academicians made observations to ascertain the figure of the earth, and those which enriched the collections and cabinets of the king of Spain, and other princes, were all constructed by this most ingenious and eminent artist. As a member of the Royal society, he contributed some valuable discoveries, especially on the horary alteration of the magnetic needle, and a quick silver pendulum, and other particulars respecting the simple pendulum. With all the powers of his genius, he was candid and modest, friendly and communicative, and more anxious to advance the happiness of mankind by the improvement of science, than to accumulate a private fortune. The remains of this most respectable man were carried Nov. 24, 1751, with great solemnity to Westminster, and deposited in the same grave with his friend and master Tompion.

GRAHAM, Catherine Macaulay, Vid. MACAULAY.

GRAIN, John Baptiste le, a French historian born 1565. He was counsellor and master of the requests to queen Mary de Medicis, and became a great favorite with Henry IV. He wrote the Decades, containing the History of Henry IV. and the History of Lewis XIII. to the death of marshal d'Ancre 1617. He was so censured, and so illiberally abused by the jesuits, who interpolated his works to make him appear ridiculous, that he ordered in his will that none of his descendants should be educated by the jesuits. He died at Paris 1643.

GRAINDORGE, Andrew, a physician and philosopher of the Epicurean sect, born at Caen. He wrote some treatises on fire, light, colors, &c. and died 1676, aged 60.

GRAND, Lewis, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Luzigni in Autun. His works, on theological subjects, are much admired. He died 1780.

GRAND, Peter le, captain of a Dieppe privateer, was famous for his courage. He attacked in 1640, with his ship of four guns and 28 men, a Spanish vessel of 54 guns, which he took and carried in triumph to France.

GRANDET, Joseph, a French priest of Angers, whose amiable manners and benevolence of heart are highly commended. He wrote several volumes on subjects of biography, in 12mo. He died at Angers 1724, aged 78.

GRANDI, Francis Lewis, a native of Cremona, professor of philosophy at Florence, afterwards at Pisa, and then abbot of St. Michael at Pisa, where he died 1742, aged 71. He wrote various mathematical works of merit.

GRANDIER, Urban, a Jesuit, native of Bouvere, near Sablé, curate and canon of St. Peter's Loudun, in France. He was an eloquent preacher, and as he recommended confession to the curate at easter, he drew upon himself the envy and resentment of the monks of Loudun. He was accused of criminal conversation with maids and married women in his own church, and when honorably acquitted, his enemies inweighed against him, for causing the Ursuline nuns of Loudun to be possessed with the devil. The folly of this accusation would have appeared before impartial judges, but the monks persuaded cardinal Richelieu, that Grandier was the author of "la Cordonniere de Loudun" a severe satire upon himself, and consequently his fate was determined upon. He was ordered to be tried, and soon found guilty of magic, witchcraft, and possession, and condemned to be burnt alive, and to have his ashes dispersed in the air. The dreadful sentence was executed, and this innocent man perished in the flames, because his enemies were acrimonious against him, and their virulence was supported by the approbation of a gloomy tyrant in power.

GRANDIN, Martin, a doctor of the Sorbonne, author of a Popular Course of Theology, in 6 vols. 4to. He died at Paris 1691, aged 87.

GRANDIUS, Guido, a mathematician of Cremona, who among other things translated Euclid into Italian, and died 1742, aged 71.

GRANDUET, Charles, a French actor for 35 years, the successful representative of all the Paris petitemaitres. His operas, and other poetical pieces, met with some success on the stage.

GRANET, Francis, a learned French writer, intimate with the abbé de Fontaine, who speaks with great respect of his talents and amiable character. He translated Newton's Chronology, and wrote Remarks on Racine and Corneille, and was for some time engaged as a journalist at Paris, where he died 1741.

GRANGE, Joseph de Chancel, a French writer, who brought upon himself several difficulties, with imprisonment and exile, in consequence of a satirical work on Philip duke of Orleans. He died 1758, aged 82, leaving several works. His tragedies are much admired, as well as his miscellaneous pieces, and they display genius, judgment, and sublimity.

GRANGE, Nicolas, an able writer and critic. He translated Lucretius with notes, and edited the Greek antiquities of le Bos. His translation of Seneca appeared after his death, with an account of his life by his friend Diderot. He died at Paris 1775, aged 37.

GRANGER OR GRAINGER, James M. D. a physician, known as the author of a poem on the Sugar Cane, of a translation of Tibullus, and of some medical tracts, was born at Dunfermline in the south of Scotland 1723. He was educated at Edinburgh, and was under lord Stair, as surgeon in the army, during the German campaign of 1748, and afterwards he practised in London, where his genius and learning procured him the friendship of Shenstone and other men of letters. Probably his success as a physician was not equal to his expectations, as he left London and embarked to settle at the the Island of St. Christopher. In his passage he administered to the cure of Mrs. Burt, who sailed in another ship of the fleet, and who had been seized with the small pox, and by his friendly attentions to her, he gained the affection of her daughter, whom he married as soon as he reached St. Christopher. In the midst of a respectable practice, Granger did not forget the muses. He wrote his Sugar Cane, which he came to England to publish, and after a few years' residence, again returned to his favorite island, where he died of a contagious fever, 1767. His wife and one daughter survived his loss. In his character he was a man of pleasing manners, and of great benevolence of heart. His merits as a poet are well known. Besides the Sugar Cane, he wrote an Ode to Solitude, — a West Indian Ballad, — Historia Febris Anomalæ Batavæ, 1746, — a Treatise on the more common West India Diseases, 8vo. — a Translation of Tibullus' Elegies into English Verse.

GRANGER, James, author of the Biographical History of England, 4 vols. 4to. a valuable work, was vicar of Shiplake, Oxon, and died 15th April 1776, in consequence of an apoplectic fit, with which he had been attacked on the preceding day, whilst administering the sacrament in his own church.

GRANT, Francis, lord Cullen, an eminent lawyer and judge of Scotland, born of the ancient family of the Grants, about 1660. He was educated at Aberdeen, and finished his studies under Voet at Leyden, and displayed even in his younger years, such assiduity as promised the highest exertions. On his return to Scotland, he became the friend of sir George Mackenzie, and distinguished himself by the able and constitutional character which he supported at the revolution. While in the Scotch convention of estates, some of the aged lawyers argued in favor of the house of Stuart, he boldly and manfully adopted the principles of the English nation, and asserted the right of the people to fill up the vacant throne. This decided conduct tended not a little to recommend the succession of William III. and Grant thus became a popular advocate, and a politician whose opinions were respected and universally approved. Without his solicitation he was created a baronet by queen Anne in 1705, and a year after he was nominated one of the judges of Scotland, when he assumed the title of lord Cullen. After 20 years of indefatigable and honorable labor devoted to the good of his country, and the impartial administration of her laws, this upright magistrate fell a sacrifice to an illness of three days 16th March 1726, in his 66th year. Respected as a judge in public, and as a man in private life, he was equally great as a writer. His essays on law, religion, education, and on several literary subjects, proved him to have been a man of solid sense, extensive erudition, and strongly fixed principles. He left three sons and five daughters.

GRANT, Patrick, a Scotch judge, by the title of lord Preston-Grange, was born at Edinburgh 1698, and studied at Glasgow, Paris, and Leyden. He was member of the house of Commons, and in 1746 was made lord advocate, and in 1754 advanced to the bench. He wrote some ingenious pieces against the rebellion of 1745, and greatly distinguished himself as a lawyer. He died at Edinburgh 1762, aged 64.

GRANVILLE, George, viscount Landsdowne, an English poet, second son of Barnard Granville esq. brother of the first earl of Bath of this name, who had a principal share in bringing back Charles II. The father of Barnard was sir Bevil, killed in the royal cause at Landsdowne 1643. Under the tuition of sir William Ellys, a pupil of Busby, young Granville travelled abroad, and at the age of 11 he entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, and two years after, in consequence of his extraordinary abilities, he was created M. A. He had a strong passion for a military life; but his father checked his ambition when he expressed a wish, on the insurrection of the duke of Monmouth, to arm in defence of the king, and his ardor was renewed at the invasion of the prince of Orange, but he was equally rebuked, and he, with his family, remained quiet spectators of the revolution, and acquiesced in the measures of parliament. Unable to shine in the field he devoted himself to the cultivation of the muses, and soon told the world, in all the sweetness of amorous poetry, how much he was charmed with the beauty of Myra, a name under which he immortalized the charming, but inexorable countess of Newburgh. In vain his friends expostulated with him for the prostitution of his poetry and of his fame, at the shrine of unyielding charms; he indulged his favorite passion, and, in enjoying the company of the fair, he celebrated, after the example of his predecessor Waller, the reigning beauties of the age. He wrote also some dramatic pieces, and his play of the "British Enchanters," introduced on the stage under the care of Betterton, called and obtained the public applause for 40 successive nights. Thus distinguished as a writer, and flattered by the muse of Addison and of Dryden, Granville, at the age of 35, was introduced to queen Anne after her accession, and found that polite reception which his character and his great veneration for his royal mistress deserved. In seconding the views of ministry in their war against Spain, he translated the second Olythiac of Demosthenes to animate his countrymen, and presented to Harley the Journal of Wimbledon's Expedition against Cadiz in 1625, that his errors might be avoided in the projected plan under the duke of Ormond; but in vain, for the attempt was unsuccessful, though Vigo fell into the hands of the disappointed English. After the death of his father, Granville was in parliament for Fowey, and by the death of his elder brother, who died governor of Barbadoes, he was now at the head of his family, and in possession of a very ample fortune. A change of administration, however, cut off his prospects of aggrandizement, till, at the trial of Sacheverell, in 1710, his friends were again replaced into the favor of the queen, and he became secretary at war in the room of Walpole. In 1711 he married Mary, lord Jersey's daughter, widow of Thomas Thynne, and the same year he was created baron of Bideford, viscount Landsdowne, in Devonshire. Though he was one of the 12 persons created peers at the same time, for the purposes of party, his elevation caused not so much noise as that of the others, as already two peerages had been extinct in his family, which, for antiquity, respectability, and fortune, was equal to any in the kingdom. In 1712 he was made privy counsellor, comptroller, and afterwards treasurer of the household. The death of the queen removed him from his offices; but he did not forget his friends, and therefore strongly protested against the attainting of Ormond and Bolingbroke. As he was suspected of violent attachment to the pretender's party, and was even suspected of planning an insurrection in the West, at the rebellion of 1715, he was arrested on the 26th Sept. and committed a close prisoner to the Tower, where he remained till 1717. As he continued to oppose the ministry his conduct was always suspected by the court, and therefore, on the breaking out of Atterbury's accusation, he retired to France to avoid the imputation of treason and the persecution of his enemies. After 10 years' residence at Paris he returned to England, and published, in 1732, his poems, corrected of their juvenile inelegances, together with a vindication of his uncle sir Richard Granville, against the misrepresentations of Burnet, of Echard, and Clarendon, in 2 vols. 4to. The rest of his life was passed in the ease of privacy and literary retirement. He died 30th Jan. 1735, aged 68, a few days after his wife, and as he had no male issue, but only four daughters, the title was extinct. The last verses which he wrote were to inscribe two copies of his poems to queen Caroline, who had honored him with her protection, and to the princess royal, Anne of Orange.

GRAPALDUS, Francis Marius, a native of Parma, who distinguished himself so much in an embassy to the pope, that Julius II. crowned him with his own hand. He wrote a book in which he described all the parts of a house with great judgment and taste. The work has often been reprinted.

GRAS, Anthony le, an ecclesiastic of Paris, who translated Cornelius Nepos into French, and wrote an account of the fathers in the age of the apostles. He died 1761, aged 70.

GRAS, James le, an advocate of Rouen, who translated Hesiod's Opera et Dies into French verse in the 17th century.

GRASWINCKEL, Theodore, a native of Delft, who died at Mechlin 1666, aged 66. He was eminent not only as a lawyer, but as a man of letters, and he was made knight of St. Mark by the Venetians for vindicating them against the duke of Savoy in his work called Libertas Veneta. He was buried at the Hague, where a monument is erected to his memory. He wrote besides de Jure Majestatis against Buchanan, and other learned and valuable treatises.

GRATAROLUS, William, a learned physician, born at Bergamo. As a protestant he wished to live in Germany, but after visiting Marburg he settled at Basil, where he practised, and died 1562, aged 52. He wrote a great many books.

GRATIAN, a Roman, emperor in conjunction with his father Valentinian. He was cruel in his government, but warlike in the field, and successful against the Goths, and the other barbarians who had invaded the Roman empire. He was killed in a revolt A. D. 383, aged 24.

GRATIAN, a private soldier, raised to the imperial throne in Britain, 407, and put to death four months after.

GRATIAN, a Benedictine monk of Chiusi in Tuscany, in the 12th century, employed for 24 years in writing a book to reconcile the contradictory canons one to the other. This book called "Decretals," was in high repute for some centuries, and greatly contributed to advance the authority and supremacy of the papal see.

GRATIANI, Jerome, an Italian writer of the 17th century, author of the Conquest of Grenada — and of Cromwell, a tragedy — and other miscellanies in prose.

GRATIUS FALISCUS, a Latin poet in Ovid's age. He wrote Cynegeticon, or Art of Hunting, &c.

GRATIUS, Ortuinus, a learned German, born at Helwick in the diocese of Munster. His real name was Graes. He wrote several works, especially Lamentationes Obscurorum Virorum, &c. and died 1542.

GRAVELOT, Henry Francis Bourguignon, an engraver of Paris, who spent some time at St. Domingo, and afterwards came to London, where he resided 13 years. He employed his art in adorning the best editions of the French poets, and died 1773, aged 74.

GRAVEROL, Francis, a French advocate, born at Nismes, who wrote among other works Sorberiana. He was an excellent scholar, and died 1694, aged 59. His brother John wrote Archæologia Philosophica, against bishop Burnet.

GRAVES, Richard, a popular English writer. He was born at Micleton, Gloucestershire 1715, and after receiving his education at Abingdon school, he removed to Pembroke college, Oxford, and afterwards in 1736 was elected fellow of All-Souls. He studied physic for some time, but abandoned it for divinity, and entered into orders in 1740. He was presented in 1750 to the rectory of Claverton near Bath, and to this was added in 1763 the living of Kilmersdon, by the friendship of Mr. Allen of Prior park, and the empty honor of being chaplain to lady Chatham. He distinguished himself much as a popular and pleasing writer, and every where displayed that ease, that freedom, and that good humor which were so eminently visible in his character. The best known of his publications are, the Festoon, or Collection of Epigrams, 12mo. — Lucubrations, in prose and rhyme, published under the name of Peter Pomfret — the Spiritual Quixote, 3 vols. 8vo. a work of merit, in which he successfully exposed to ridicule the conduct and tenets of the methodists — Eugenius, or Anecdotes of the Golden Bull — Columella, or the Distressed Anchorite — Plexippus, or the Aspiring Plebeian — political pieces, under the name of Euphrosyne — Recollections of some Particulars in the Life of his friend Shenstone — Life of Commodus, translated from the Greek of Herodian — Hiero, or Royalty, from Xenophon — Sermons on Various Subjects — Meditations of Antoninus, from the Greek — the Reveries of Solitude — the Coalition, or Rehearsal of the Pastoral Opera of Echo and Narcissus — the Farmer's son, as a Companion to Anstey's Farmer's Daughter — the Invalid, with the Means of enjoying Long Life — Senilities, &c. This truly amiable man, long respected for his benevolence, and the urbanity of his manners, died at his rectory of Claverton, 1804, in his 90th year.

GRAVE-

GRAVESANDE, William James, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Delft in Holland, 1688. He was educated at Leyden, and intended for the law, and before the age of 19 he wrote an able treatise on perspective. He settled at the Hague 1707, and practised at the bar, but his acquaintance with learned men led him to the cultivation of literature, and he was one of those who united in the periodical review called "le Journal Litteraire," from 1713 to 1722. In 1715 he was one of the delegates sent to congratulate George I. on his accession to the English throne, and during his stay in England, he became the friend of the great Newton, whose sublime philosophy he afterwards taught when elected to the mathematical and philosophical chair of Leyden. This learned man died 1742, after long enjoying the respect of his countrymen by his patriotism, talents, and assiduity. He wrote among other things "an Introduction to Newton's Philosophy" — "a small treatise on the Elements of Algebra," — "a Course of Logic and Metaphysics."

GRAVINA, Peter, an Italian poet, who published a 4to. volume of poems, admired for harmony, sweetness, and delicacy. He was the friend and favorite of Sanzaui, and Paul Jovius, who speak of him in terms of rapture and admiration.

GRAVINA, John Vincent, an illustrious lawyer, born at Roggiano, 18th Feb. 1664, and educated under his relation Gregory Caloprese, the well known philosopher. He afterwards studied at Naples, and so ardent was his attachment to literature and science, that each day he dedicated 10 often 12 hours to his improvement. He went to Rome 1696, and some time after was made professor of canon law in the Sapienzi college, by Innocent XI. He was invited by liberal promises and high patronage to settle in the universities of Germany, and also at Turin, but he preferred his residence, where he died of a mortification in his bowels, 6th Jan. 1718. Though learned, he was unhappily of a disagreeable temper, and spoke with such freedom and contempt of mankind, that he raised himself many enemies. He wrote various works, but that which entitles him to the praises of the learned, is his three books, "de Ortu et Progressu Juris Civilis," the best edition of which is that of Naples, 2 vols. 4to. with the addition of his treatise de Romano Imperio. In this famous work he called upon the Roman youth to study the law in the original records, in the pandects, institutes and the code, and not in modern inelegant abridgments. He wrote also five tragedies, besides philological treatises, orations, &c.

GRAUNT, Edward, a learned man, head master of Westminster school, and author of Græcæ Linguae Specilegium et Institutio Græcæ Grammaticæ. He died 1601.

GRAUNT, John, the celebrated author of "Observations on the Bills of Mortality," was born in Birch Lane, London, 24th April 1620. He was brought up in the rigid principles of the puritans, and as he was intended for trade, he received no advantages from grammar education, but was barely qualified in writing and arithmetic, for the business of a haberdasher. In this employment he gained by his good sense, and strict probity the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens; so that he rose to all the offices of his ward; was a common council-man, and a captain, and then a major of the train bands. His "Observations" first appeared in 1661, and with such success, that Louis XIV. of France adopted his plans for the regular register of births and burials, and Charles II. in proof of his general approbation, recommended him to the Royal society to be elected one of their members in 1661-2. In 1665 the third edition of his popular book was printed by the society's printer, and the author, flattered by the honors paid to his literary services, abandoned the business of shopkeeper, and in 1666 became a trustee for the management of the New river, for the countess of Clarendon. In this new office, it has been reported by Burnet, that he was guilty of a most diabolical crime, by stopping all the cocks which conveyed water from Islington to London, the night before the great fire began, which consumed the city. The accusation, however, is false, as he was admitted among the trustees 23 days after the conflagration happened; and the malevolent report arose only after his death, and probably owed its origin to his change of religious principles, as about 1667 he reconciled himself to the tenets of the church of Rome. He died 18th April 1674, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Fleet-street, attended by many respectable friends; and among them by Sir William Petty, to whom he left his papers. A fifth edition of his book appeared in 1676, under the care of his friend; and it may be fairly inferred, that to this work, and the persevering powers and inquisitive mind of the author, we are indebted for the science of political arithmetic, so ably treated afterwards by Sir William Petty, Daniel King, Dr. Davenant, and other learned men.

GRAY, Thomas, an English poet, son of a reputable citizen, was born in Cornhill 26th Dec. 1716. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Peter-house, Cambridge, and four years after, in 1738, he came to town to apply himself to the study of the law. His pursuits were for a while suspended, while he accompanied his friend Horace Walpole on the continent. Two months after his return, in 1741, his father died, and he then discovered that his income was inadequate to support him in the study of the law, therefore he returned to Cambridge, where he took his degree of LL. B.; and where he afterwards chiefly fixed his residence. Between the years 1759 and 1762, he had lodgings in Southampton-row, to be enabled to consult the Harleian and other MSS. in the British museum, from which he made some curious extracts. In 1768, he was appointed professor of modern history at Cambridge, but his health was such, that he never executed the duties of the office. He died of the gout in his stomach July 30th 1771, and was buried with his family at Stoke Pogges, Buckinghamshire. As a scholar, Gray was profound, elegant, and well informed; he had read all the historians of England, France, and Italy, and was well versed in antiquities, in criticism, in morals and politics; and he possessed the most refined taste in painting, architecture, and gardening. His letters are correct, pleasing, and instructive. His poems, which are very few, but most elegant, nervous, and sublime, were published in 1775, in 4to. by his friend Mason, who had lived with him in intimacy since 1747, and who, therefore, was well qualified to prefix to the edition "Memoirs of his Life and Writings."

GRAZZINI, Antony Francis, surnamed Lasca, one of the principal founders of the academy of la Crusca, was born in Florence, and considered as nearly equal in merit as a writer to Boccaccio. He published six comedies, and other things, besides a collection of novels printed at Paris 1756. He died 1583.

GREATRAKES, Valentine, an Irishman, who acquired some celebrity by attempting to cure diseases by the mere touch. He came to England; but the high expectations formed of his powers were soon dissipated, when the populace found themselves disappointed. He is described as an extraordinary person, by Boyle, who with several others has attested his cures. But, though Glanville imputed his healing powers to some fanative qualities about his person, it is plain that his enthusiasm was strongly assisted by the imagination of his patients. He was otherwise an humane and virtuous character, and died about 1680.

GREAVES, John, an eminent mathematician and antiquary, born 1662 at Colmore near Alresford, Hants, where his father was rector. At 15 he entered at Balliol college, and in 1624 he was elected first of five candidates to a fellowship in Merton college. He devoted his time to mathematics and oriental learning, and in 1630 he was chosen geometry lecturer in Gresham college. Intimately acquainted with the works of the most celebrated astronomers of the age, he wished to extend his knowledge by travelling, and accordingly, in 1635, he went to Holland to attend the lectures of Golius at Leyden, and afterwards passed to Paris, and then visited Rome and other parts of Italy. Lord Arundel saw and admired his spirit in Italy, and endeavoured to prevail upon him to accompany him to Greece, with the liberal allowance of 200l. per annum, and the promise of more extensive patronage, but Greaves had formed the design of penetrating to Egypt, and therefore on his return to England, he communicated his plan to his patron Laud. With praise-worthy zeal, Laud applauded and liberally encouraged his intentions, but when the city of London was solicited to add its influence, and to subscribe to the design, it was peremptorily rejected, and Greaves remembered ever after with sullen disdain the illiberality of the Londoners. In June 1637 he embarked for Leghorn, and from thence he proceeded to Constantinople, where by the kindness of sir Peter Wyche, the English ambassador, he was introduced to Cyril Lucaris the Greek patriarch, who enabled him to procure valuable MSS. but whose violent death, however, soon frustrated his design, and rendered his longer residence at the Porte dangerous. He then embarked for Alexandria, and after visiting Rhodes he reached Egypt, Sep. 1638. After twice penetrating into the desert, measuring the pyramids, and making various observations on the climate, monuments, and manners of the country, he left Alexandria April, 1639. He came back through Italy, and after visiting Florence and Rome with the eye of a philosopher and an antiquarian, he embarked at Leghorn, and reached London before midsummer 1640, richly loaded with the classical spoils of the East, Arabic, Persian, Greek MSS. besides gems, coins, and other valuable antiquities. The political state of the kingdom, however, promised little encouragement to his studious pursuits, and for his attachment to his patron and to his royal master, he suffered much from the virulence and persecution of the parliament. He was removed from his professorship at Gresham college, and though appointed to the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, and permitted by the king to retain his Merton fellowship, he found himself disturbed in his views of arranging his papers for the press. In this undertaking he was assisted by his friend archbishop Usher, and though the Commons were acrimonious against the partizans of royalty, yet he found an active patron in Seldon, who was burgess in the house for Oxford, and to whom he dedicated his "Roman Foot." Such at last was the persecution of the parliament that he was ejected from the Savilian professorship, in which he was succeeded by Seth Ward, and he afterwards went to reside in London, where he married. Devoting himself to studious pursuits, he shunned the politics of the times, and chose rather to enrich English literature by the translation of Arabic and Persian manuscripts with explanatory notes. He died 8th Oct. 1652, and was buried in the church of St. Benet Sherehog, London. He had no children by his wife. His coins were left to his friend sir John Marsham, and his astronomical instruments were presented to the Savilian professorship of Oxford, with several of his papers. The best known of his works are, his "Pyramidographia," and his "Description of the Roman Foot and Denarius." He had formed a plan for adopting the Gregorian calendar by omitting the bissextile days for 40 years, which though approved by the king and council, was not adopted through the turbulence of the times.

GRECOURT, John Baptiste Joseph Villart de, a French poet, born at Tours. Though an ecclesiastic he lived a disorderly life, but afterwards quitted the church, and became the favorite of men of rank and fashion, on account of his great wit. He died 1743, aged 60. He wrote tales, epigrams, songs, fables, sonnets, and other light works.

GREEN, Robert, a poet in the reign of Elizabeth. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards of Clare hall, where he took his degree of M. A. 1583. The wit and humor which he possessed in great plenty, were unfortunately prostituted to encourage the cause of vice and obscenity, and he showed himself a most abandoned libertine in theory and practice. He is said to be the first English poet who wrote for bread, and happy had it been if virtue had been the idol of his muse. It is said that he felt remorse with penury and disease, as Cibber has preserved one of his letters to his much injured wife. He died according to Wood 1592, of a surfeit, after eating too many pickled herrings, and swallowing too much Rhenish wine. His pieces which are numerous, are now little known.

GREEN, John, an English prelate, born at or near Hull in Yorkshire, 1706. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards usher of Lichfield school, and then chaplain to the duke of Somerset, who became his friend and active patron, and gave him the rectory rectory of Borough Green near Newmarket. In 1748 he was made regius professor of divinity, in 1750 master of Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and in 1756 he became dean of Lincoln, and vice chancellor of the university. On the translation of Dr. Thomas to Salisbury, he was raised to the see of Lincoln, and in 1764, he resigned the headship of his college. In 1771 his income was increased by the addition of the residentiaryship of St. Paul's. It is remarkable that on the debate concerning the dissenters in 1772, he favored the bill for their relief, and was the only bishop who voted with that side of the house. He died suddenly at Bath, 25th April 1779. He wrote the "Academic, or a Disputation on the State of the University of Cambridge," and some sermons.

GREEN, Edward Burnaby, author of some poetical works, was educated at Benet college, Cambridge. He translated Anacreon, Apollonius Rhodius, and some parts of Pindar, and paraphrased Persius. He died 1788.

GREEN, Matthew, an English poet. His parents were dissenters, but he afterwards abandoned their tenets for the church of England. He held an office at the custom house, where he attended to his duty with diligence and ability. His best poem is the "Spleen," containing wit, elegance, and originality. He was a very amiable man, and died at the age of 41, 1737. His works have been elegantly edited by Dr. Aikin.

GREENE, Dr. Maurice, a musician, son of a London clergyman. He was organist, before the age of 20, to St. Dunstan in the West, and afterwards in the year 1718, to St. Paul's, and in 1727, to the royal chapel. In 1730, he took his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and was also appointed professor of music, to the university. He projected the plan of reforming our church music, which had been corrupted by mutilated copies, and the inattention of transcribers, and the design, stopped by his ill-health, was happily completed by his friend Dr. Boyce. He died 1st Sep. 1755. His performances are mentioned by sir John Hawkins.

GREENHILL, John, an English painter, born at Salisbury. He studied under sir Peter Lely, who was so jealous of his powers that he never would use his pencil before him, till he inadvertently betrayed himself by taking a likeness of his wife. His licentious and imprudent mode of life, it is said, hastened his end. A portrait of bishop Ward, by him, is preserved in Salisbury town hall. He died 19th May, 1676.

GREENVILLE, sir Richard, grandfather to the well known sir Bevil Greenville, was son of sir Roger, and was born in Cornwall 1540. He served in the imperial army against the Turks, and was knighted 1571. He was, in 1585, sent on an expedition to America, and in 1591, he was commissioned to intercept a rich Spanish fleet, in conjunction with lord Howard. He with only a few ships attacked the enemy's squadron of 52 sail, on the American coast; but when about to sink his own ship he was carried on board the Spanish fleet, and died three days after of the wounds which he had received.

GREENVILLE, sir Bevil, grandson of sir Richard, was born at Stow, in Cornwall, and educated at Exeter college, under Dr. Prideaux. During the civil wars he behaved with singular courage, and after defending the rights of his sovereign, in various encounters, he at last fell at the battle of Lansdowne, near Bath, 5th July 1643, aged 47.

GREGORY, St. surnamed the Great, was descended from an illustrious Roman family. He was made prefect at Rome 573, by Justin the younger; but he soon after quitted all secular employments, to retire to a monastery. He was sent, by Pelagius, to Constantinople as nuncio, and on the death of that pontiff, he was elected in his room 590. He labored earnestly in his new dignity to heal differences, and to make profelytes; and in Sardinia, and also in England, by the preaching of Augustine, the monk, the blessings of the gospel were rapidly spread. This mild and benevolent pontiff, died 12th March 604, aged 60.

GREGORY II. a native of Rome, elected pope after Constantine, 715. He was an enlightened and virtuous pontiff, and died 12th Feb. 731.

GREGORY III. a native of Syria, who succeeded the preceding, 731. He excommunicated the Iconoclastes, and solicited the assistance of Charles Martel, against the Lombards, who ravaged Italy, by means of a pompous embassy which is regarded by some authors as the origin of the apostolic nuncios in France. He was a charitable but magnificent pontiff, and the first who added temporal consequence and imposing splendor to the ecclesiastical power of the holy see. He died 28th Nov. 741.

GREGORY IV. a native of Rome, elected pope 827, or 828. He rebuilt Ostia, and visited France, to reconcile the jarring interests of the royal family, but returned without accomplishing his designs, and died at Rome, 25th Jan. 844.

GREGORY V. Brunon, a German, elected pope after John XVI. 996. He was opposed by Crescencius, the consul of Rome, who raised to the holy seat the anti-pope, John XVII. but the usurper was expelled by the influence of the emperor Otho, who was the relation of Gregory, and excommunicated in the council of Pavia. He died 18th Feb. 999, aged 27.

GREGORY VI. John Gratian, a Roman, elected pope 1044, after Benedict IX. He labored zealously to restore the revenues of the church to their former flourishing situation, and punished peculators and plunderers, but his anathemas offended those who reaped advantage from the public calamities, and a formidable party was raised against him. Gregory defeated them, and rendered travelling easy and safe, but the severity of his measures displeased again the Romans, who preferred public robbery, to private industry; and Gregory, in disgust, abdicated the tiara, in the council of Sutri, near Rome, 1046, and was succeeded by Clement II.

GREGORY VII. Hildebrand, son of a carpenter of Soano, in Tuscany. He entered among the monks of Cluni, and obtained preferment at Rome, and in 1073 was elected successor to Alexander II. In his new dignity, the pope soon assumed extraordinary powers, and claiming superiority, not only in all spiritual but temporal affairs, he regarded the sovereigns of of Europe as vassals whom he could depose and appoint at his pleasure. His presumption soon embroiled him with his ancient friend Henry IV. emperor of Germany, who had the weakness to submit to his power by the most mortifying penance. A reconciliation was followed by fresh disputes, and at last Henry elected another pontiff, in opposition to Gregory, while the offended Italian prevailed upon the German princes to appoint another emperor. At last Gregory, tired with the dissensions, which his inordinate ambition had raised around him, and disgusted with the murmurs of the Romans, retired to Salerno, where he died 24th May 1085.

GREGORY VIII. Albert de Mora, of Benevento, succeeded Urban III. as pope 1187, and died two months after, 17th Dec. exhorting the Christian princes to undertake a crusade against the infidels. The anti-pope Bourdin assumed also the name of Gregory VIII.

GREGORY IX. Ugolin, of the family of the count of Segni, and nephew to Innocent III. was elected^s pope 1227. He excited the christian princes to undertake a crusade, and Frederic, emperor of Germany, though twice excommunicated for his disputes with the see of Rome, joined the expedition. He died 12th Aug. 1241.

GREGORY X. Theobald, of the noble family of the Visconti, at Placentia, was elected pope 1271, while he was in the Holy-land, with Edward king of England. He summoned a general council at Lyons, and labored earnestly to heal all schisms, in religion, and to reconcile the Eastern and Western churches. He died 10th Jan. 1276, at Arezzo.

GREGORY XI. Peter Roger, nephew to Clement VI. and son of the count of Beaufort, of Limousin, was elected pope 1370. He was a zealous promoter of concord and reconciliation among the christian princes, and distinguished himself by his benevolence, his charity, and his liberal patronage of letters. He quitted Avignon, where the popes had fixed their residence for several years, and transferred the see to Rome, where he died 28th March, 1378, aged 47.

GREGORY XII. Angelo Corario, a native of Venice, made a cardinal by Innocent VII., and elected pope 1406, during the schism in the West. He was opposed by Benedict XIII. the other pope, and at last a general council, held at Pisa, deposed both the competitors, and elected Alexander V. in their room. Gregory who wished to oppose the proceeding of the council, at last fled before the storm to Gaeta and Rimini, and sent his abdication to the council of Constance. He died at Recanati, 13th Oct. 1417, aged 92.

GREGORY XIII. Hugh Buoncompagno, a Bolognese, elected pope after Pius V. 1572. He was an able civilian, and warmly opposed the protestants. He embellished Rome with churches, palaces, and porticoes, and chiefly immortalized himself by the reformation of the calendar, and the adoption of the style which bears his name. He was assisted in this honorable and necessary alteration by the labors of Lilio, an able astronomer of Rome, but though the plan was acknowledged universally useful, it was pertinaciously rejected by the protestant princes of Europe. Gregory also published the Decretals of Gratian, which were enriched with valuable learned notes. He died 10th April, 1585, aged 83.

GREGORY XIV. Nicolas Sfondrate, son of a senator of Milan, was elected pope after Urban VII. 1590. He declared himself, at the suggestion of Philip II. of Spain, against Henry IV. of France, and levied an army to enforce his threats, but his troops were defeated, and his military plans disconcerted. He died of the stone, 15th Oct. 1591, aged 57.

GREGORY XV. Alexander Ludovisio, of an ancient family of Bologna, was archbishop of his native town, and made a cardinal by Paul V. He was elected pope 1621, and died 8th July, 1623, aged 69. He erected the see of Paris into an archbishopric, and assisted the emperor and the king of Poland, in their wars. He wrote Epistola ad Regem Perfarum Schah Abbas, cum Notis Hegalsoni, 8vo. — Decisions de la Rote.

GREGORY, James, a Scotch mathematician, born and educated at Aberdeen. His strong genius began early to display itself, and in 1663 at the age of 24 he invented the reflecting telescope, which still bears his name, but which the inexperience of the London artists could not then construct according to his approbation. He afterwards went to Italy, which at that time was considered as the cradle of mathematical knowledge, and applied the powers of his mind with such success that he discovered a new analytical method of summing up an infinite converging series to calculate with exactness the area of the hyperbola, and of the circle. On his return to London in 1669 he was chosen a member of the Royal society, and soon after engaged in an unfortunate controversy with Huygens about the quadrature of the circle, in which his arguments were false. His reputation as a mathematician, and as the inventor of the reflecting telescope, and of the burning concave mirror, was now so well established, that the royal academy at Paris proposed him to the French king as deserving an honorable pension from him, a step which was not, however, adopted. In 1672 he had a dispute, but in amicable terms with sir Isaac Newton after his wonderful discoveries on the nature of light, about the various utility of his dioptric telescope against that of the catoptric instrument of his antagonist. This able philosopher, whose genius daily contributed to the improvement of mathematical science, was unhappily attacked by a fever which proved fatal Dec. 1675, in his 36th year. A short history of his mathematical discoveries was compiled and published by his friend Mr. Collins, with his letters to him in the "Commercium Epistolicum." His works are Optica Promota seu Abditata Radium Reflexorum & Refractorum Mysteria, &c. 1663, translated by Dr. Desaguliers into English — Vera Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura, &c. besides some papers in the philosophical transactions.

GREGORY, David, nephew to the preceding, was born at Aberdeen 24th June 1661. He there received the elements of his education, and then went to Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M. A. The fame of his uncle and the perusal of his papers excited his attention attention in mathematical pursuits, and at the age of 23 he was deemed capable to fill the mathematical chair of Edinburgh. He published, in 1684, an ingenious treatise called "Exercitatio Geometrica de Dimensione Figurarum," 4to. and soon after, on the appearance of Newton's Principia, he applied himself to study the great truths of that immortal philosopher, and was the first to introduce them into the university schools. In 1691 he came to London with the intention of soliciting the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford upon Dr. Bernard's resignation, and by the friendship of sir Isaac Newton, and of Flamsteed, he succeeded, after being admitted at Baliol college, and incorporated M. A. and created M. D. He now devoted himself to his laborious studies, and displayed great powers in the elements of optics and physical and geometrical astronomy, improving the discoveries of others by new and elegant demonstrations. He proposed to publish the works of all the ancient mathematicians, and in the prosecution of this plan produced an edition of Euclid in Greek and Latin, and prepared with his friend Halley, an edition of the Conics of Apollonius. His labors however were stopped by death. He died at his villa near Maidenhead, 16th Oct. 1710, and a handsome monument was erected to his memory, in St. Mary's, Oxford, by his widow. His eldest son David, was educated at Christ church, and successively became regius professor of modern history, canon and dean of his college. Many of his papers were inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, and the various things which he wrote, and the improvement which he made in geometry and philosophy are fully mentioned in the Biographia Britannica. His brother James was for 33 years mathematical professor at Edinburgh, where he was succeeded by Maclaurin. — Another brother, Charles, was 32 years mathematical professor at St. Andrew's, where he was succeeded by his son David, author of a System of Arithmetic and Algebra in Latin.

GREGORY, John, an English divine, born at Agmondesham, Bucks, 10th Nov. 1607. His abilities displayed themselves so early that as his parents were poor, though well respected, his opulent neighbours united to give him a liberal education by common subscription. With this benevolent intention, he was sent with sir William Drake to Christ church, Oxford, as fervitor, under the tuition of Morley, afterwards bishop of Winchester. Young Gregory rose in the esteem of his fellow students, he took his degree of M. A. 1631, and was made by dean Duppa, chaplain of the cathedral. When Duppa was promoted to the see of Chichester, and afterwards to Salisbury, he accompanied him as his domestic chaplain, and obtained from him a stall in the church of Sarum. The violence of the times, however, did not long permit him to enjoy his ecclesiastical honors, he was ejected by the parliament, and, in his distress, he went to reside in the house of one Sutton, who kept an ale-house at Kiddington green, near Oxford, to whose son he had been tutor, where he died of the gout in his stomach, March 13th 1646. His remains were buried in Oxford cathedral. His works were Notes and Observations on some Passages of Scripture, — an edition of Ridley's View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law — "Gregorii Posthuma," &c.

GREGORY, Edmund, author of the "Historical Anatomy of Christian Melancholy," — of "a Meditation on Job," 8vo. was of Trinity college, Oxford, and died 1650.

GREGORY, Dr. John, a physician of respectability, born at Aberdeen. He studied at Edinburgh and Leyden, and became professor of philosophy and medicine at Aberdeen. He wrote several valuable medical tracts, but he is chiefly known for his "Comparative View of the State of Man, and other Animals," — a Father's Legacy to his Daughter, and other moral pieces. He settled in London in 1751, but removed to Edinburgh as professor of physic, in 1766, and died there 1773, aged 49. His works have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo.

GREGORY, Peter, a native of Toulouse, author of some learned but injudicious works. He died 1527.

GREGORIUS, Georgius Florentius, or Gregory of Tours, a learned bishop of Tours, in the 6th century. He was an able writer, as his History of France, Lives of the Saints, and other works fully prove, though Gibbon censures his style as devoid of elegance and simplicity. He died about 595.

GRENADA, Lewis de, a Dominican, born at Grenada. Devoted to the duties and austerities of a monastic life, he had the firmness to refuse the bishopric of Braganza, and died 1588, aged 84. He wrote several works which evince his labors, his piety, and his benevolence.

GRENAN, Benignus, a Latin poet, professor of rhetoric at Harcourt. He was born at Noyers, and died at Paris 1723, aged 42. He was the friend and the poetical rival of professor Coffin. His verses contain great elegance, with many noble and delicate sentiments.

GREUCE, a French painter of great merit. His pieces are much admired, especially the sacrifice of Jephtha, Diana and Endymion, Susannah, &c.

GRENVILLE, George, a celebrated statesman, known in parliamentary history, for his two bills for the more regular payment of the navy, passed in 1757, and for the trial of contested elections, passed in 1770. He was distinguished for his eloquence in the senate, and possessed that extensive and enlightened knowledge which fitted him for the highest offices of the state. He was, in 1754, made treasurer of the navy, and became first lord of the treasury in 1763, but resigned two years after to lord Rockingham. He died 13th Nov. 1770, aged 58. By Elizabeth, daughter of sir William Wyndham, he had four sons and five daughters, and of these, the present marquis of Buckingham, who inherited the family estates in Buckinghamshire; lord Grenville, and Mr. Thomas Grenville, have raised themselves high in the public estimation for their services to their country, in the important offices which they have filled with so much ability, firmness, and wisdom.

GRESHAM, sir Thomas, descended from an ancient family in Norfolk, was born in London 1519, and was bound apprentice to a mercer. That his mind might however be somewhat cultivated, he became a member of Caius college, Cambridge, where his proficiency was such that he was called by Caius the founder, "Doctissimus Mercator." He was admitted into the mercers' company in 1543, and about that time married, ried, and, in 1551, he went to Antwerp to settle as agent to king Edward, for taking up money from the Flemish merchants. In this office he displayed great dexterity and wisdom, and made the balance of trade preponderate much in favor of England. On Mary's accession he was removed from his office, in consequence of which he presented a petition to the queen, and represented in modest terms the many services which he had rendered to her brother Edward, and to the kingdom, in consequence of which he was restored to favor, and continued in the same employment under Elizabeth. In 1559, he was knighted by the queen, and in the midst of his great reputation, and commercial prosperity, he built himself a mansion-house on the west side of Bishopsgate street, but his hopes were ruined, and his happiness embittered by the death of his only son, a youth of 16, in 1564. Full of liberality, sir Thomas wished that the merchants of London might meet in a more convenient place than the open air in Lombard street, and therefore, agreeable to his suggestions, the city of London bought for more than 3532l. about 80 houses, which were pulled down, and on the site of them was begun, 7th June 1566, the erection of a noble building. It was fully completed in 1569, at sir Thomas's expence, after the model of the exchange at Antwerp, and Jan. 29th 1570, Elizabeth, attended by her nobility, visited it, and by the voice of a herald, caused it to be proclaimed "the Royal Exchange." Sir Thomas afterwards built the mansion-house at Osterley park, for his residence, and he determined to appropriate his house in Bishopsgate street to literary purposes, though earnestly solicited to apply his liberality to the foundation of a college at Oxford, or more particularly at Cambridge, where he had received some part of his education. In 1575 he therefore founded Gresham college, leaving the half of his property in the Royal exchange to the corporation of London, and the other to the mercers' company, for the endowment of seven lectures in divinity, law, physic, astronomy, rhetoric, geometry, and music, at 50l. each, with his house where the lectures were to be delivered. Besides these munificent donations, he was a very liberal benefactor to various charities and institutions, and, in every respect, shewed that riches in his hand could best be employed in acts of benevolence and humanity. This truly illustrious character did not long enjoy the satisfaction of conscious and dignified virtue; he fell down senseless on his return from the exchange to his house, Bishopsgate street, and expired soon after, 21st Nov. 1579. He was buried with great pomp in his parish church of St. Helen's. His corpse was attended by 100 poor men and as many women, clothed in black, and the expences of the funeral, in those cheap days, amounted to no less than 800l. His lady survived him some years, she died 23d Nov. 1596, and was buried in the same vault with him. The character of this generous and public spirited man has been drawn accurately by Mr. Ward, who observes that, to the knowledge of ancient and modern languages, and an eagerness to patronize literature and learned men, he united a very comprehensive knowledge of commercial affairs, foreign and domestic. He therefore deservedly acquired an immense fortune, which rendered him not only the highest commoer in the kingdom, with the appellation of the Royal merchant, but the most capable and the most willing to employ his opulence in such acts as dignify human nature.

GRESSET, John Baptist Lewis, a celebrated French poet, known chiefly for his elegant, lively, and interesting poem called Vert-vert. His Ceuvres Diverses were published 1748, 12mo. He was director of the French academy, and obtained the order of St. Michael, and letters of nobility. He died at his native town, Amiens, 16th June 1777, aged 68. His comedy of the Mechant was a very popular play.

GRETZER, James, a learned jesuit, born at Marcdorf 1561. He was 24 years professor of morality and school divinity at Ingoldstadt, and published a great number of books on theological subjects, and against the protestants. To great learning he united unusual modesty. He died at Ingoldstadt 1635. His works were published at Ratibon, in 17 vols. folio, by Nicéron, 1739.

GREVENBROECK, a Flemish painter of the 17th century, admired for his sea pieces, and particularly for the correctness with which he delineated the most minute objects.

GREVILLE, Fulk, or Foulk, lord Brooke, was born 1554, at Beauchamp court, Warwickshire, the seat of his father sir Fulk Greville. He was educated, as is supposed, at Shrewsbury school and at Trinity college, Cambridge, and afterwards entered at Oxford. After travelling abroad he was introduced to the court of queen Elizabeth, where he became a great favorite, and where he obtained an annual income of above 2000l. as clerk of the signet to the council of Wales. Though prevented by the commands of the queen from indulging his attachment to military affairs, he distinguished himself, with his affectionate friend sir Philip Sydney, in the tilts and tournaments which engaged the public attention on the expected marriage of Elizabeth to the duke of Anjou. In 1597 he was knighted, and continued to represent his county in parliament till the end of the queen's reign. Though under James he obtained the grant of Warwick castle, on the reparation of which he spent 20,000l. yet he found Cecil jealous of his power, and therefore retired to privacy, and to studious pursuits. He wished to engage in the history of his country from the union of the two roses in Henry VII.; but Cecil the secretary refused him the perusal of those papers which might have thrown a great light on the annals of that interesting period. After Cecil's death he became, in 1615, a favorite at court, and was made under-treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer, and in 1620 he was raised to the dignity of the peerage. He continued in the favor of Charles I. and in the beginning of his reign founded a history lecture in the university of Cambridge, with an annual salary of 100l. The succeeding history of his life is most melancholy; Ralph Heywood, one of his domestics, considering his services too long unrewarded, upbraided him in his chamber with unusual freedom, and upon finding his application disregarded, stabbed him mortally in the back with a knife or sword, and then retiring to an adjoining chamber, destroyed himself with the same weapon. This bloody catastrophe happened at Brook-house, Holborn, 30th Sept. 1628. The dead body was conveyed to Warwick, and buried in St. Mary's church there. Lord Brooke deserves deserves to be recorded not merely as a courtier, but as the friend and patron of learned men, and among his respectable associates may be numbered besides Sidney, Spenser, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Egerton, Overal, Camden, Speed, Davenant, &c. As he was never married, his estates descended to his relation Robert Greville.

GREVIN, James, a French poet and physician, born at Clermont 1538. He was in the service of Margaret of France, duchess of Savoy, and died at Turin, 5th Nov. 1573. He wrote three plays; and had he not died thus prematurely, he would have been distinguished still more by his genius as a poet, and by extensive practice as a physician. His poems, &c. were printed at Paris 1561, in 8vo. As he was a strong Calvinist, he joined Roche Chandieu and Christian to write the well-known poem "the Temple," against Ronsard, who in his "Miserics of the Time," had abused the protestants.

GREVIUS, or GRÆVIUS, John George, a learned Latin critic, born at Naumbourg in Saxony, 29th Jan. 1632. He finished his studies at Leipzig, but though intended for the law by his father, he paid much attention to classical literature, and by the friendship and assistance of J. F. Gronovius at Deventer, and of D. Heinsius at Leyden, he laid the foundation of that universal learning, which soon after so eminently distinguished him. By the persuasion of D. Blondel, at Amsterdam, he quitted the tenets of Luther for those of Calvin. His reputation was so well established that his assistance as public professor was solicited by the elector of Brandenburg, but he finally settled at Deventer, where he succeeded his friend Gronovius. After adorning, by his eloquence and the great powers of his mind, successively, the chairs of eloquence, politics, and history; and after being honored with the particular attentions of the states of Utrecht, who, as well as many students from Germany and England, paid homage to his superior abilities; this excellent scholar was suddenly carried off by an apoplexy, 11th Jan. 1703, aged 71. By his wife, whom he married 1656, he had 18 children, but only four daughters survived him. As an editor and annotator, Grævius has acquired great celebrity. Hesiod, Suetonius, Cicero, Florus, Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, Cæsar, Lucian, &c. were edited by him, besides Callimachus, which his son, who died in his 23d year, had nearly completed. His chief work is his "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum," 12 vols. fol. to which he added Thesaurus Antiq. et Hist. Italix, printed after his death, 3 vols. fol. The best part of his letters to the learned men of the age were preserved in Dr. Mead's collection.

GREUZE, a very eminent French painter. His Pere de Famille giving his daughter to an honest peasant, to whom she was betrothed, his Filial Piety, and his young Woman deploring the loss of her canary-bird, are very fine performances.

GREW, Obadiab, an English divine, born at Atherston, Warwickshire, 1607. He entered at Baliol college, and after taking his degrees in arts, he entered into orders at the age of 28, and favoring the views of parliament, settled at Coventry as minister of St. Michael's there. Active and exemplary in his conduct, he was an indefatigable parish priest, and as he sided with the presbyterians against the hierarchy, so he opposed them in their views of cutting off the king; and even drew a promise from Cromwell, as he passed through Coventry, in 1647, that no violence should be offered to his royal master. In 1651, he took both his degrees in divinity, but at the restoration he refused to conform, for which he was ejected from his parish. He died 22d Oct. 1698. He published Meditations on the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and other theological tracts.

GREW, Nehemiah, son of the preceding, was eminent as a writer and a physician. He was educated abroad, and was admitted into the college of physicians 1680. His great merits and extensive practice, in London, recommended him to the Royal society, of which he became fellow; and in 1677, secretary. Besides the publication of the philosophical transactions in which he was engaged, he sent to press the Anatomy of Plants, fol. — Comparative Anatomy of the Stomach, &c. fol. — Catalogue of the Rarities of the Royal society — Cosmologia Sacra, &c. He died suddenly, Lady-day 1711, in London.

GREY, lady Jane, celebrated for her virtues and her misfortunes, was daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by Frances Brandon, daughter of Mary, dowager of France, and sister to Henry VIII. She was born in 1537, at Bradgate-hall, Leicestershire, and from her very infancy shewed great quickness and comprehension of mind. Under Harding and Aylmer, her father's chaplains, she improved herself in the various branches of learning; and became such a proficient in languages, that she spoke and wrote, with astonishing facility, the French, Italian, Latin, and it is said the Greek; and was also well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee. To these high acquirements in literature, were united great beauty, the mildest manners, and the most captivating virtues of humility, benevolence, and modesty. Regardless of the pleasures and frivolous occupations of the great, she sought for gratification in reading and in meditation, and she observed to her tutor Ascham, who found her reading Plato while the rest of the family were hunting in the park, that the sport which they were enjoying, was but a shadow compared to the pleasure which she received from the sublime author. The alliances of her family, however, and their ambition, were too powerful to suffer her to live in her beloved seclusion. No sooner was the declining health of the sixth Edward perceived by his courtiers, than Dudley, duke of Northumberland, prevailed upon the unsuspecting monarch, to settle the crown on his relation, lady Jane, whose attachment to the principles of the reformation was indubitable; and to pass over his sisters Mary and Elizabeth. When this was effected, the artful favorite married his son Guildford Dudley to the future queen, and thus paved the way to the elevation of his own family to the throne. But while others rejoiced in these plans of approaching greatness, Jane alone seemed unconcerned, and when, at last, on Edward's death, she was hailed as queen by her ambitious father-in-law, Northumberland, she refused the proffered dignity, till the authority of her father the duke of Suffolk, and the entreaties of a husband whom the tenderly loved, prevailed upon her reluctantly to consent. She was as usual, conveyed to the tower, preparatory to her coronation, and she was proclaimed queen in the city, and honored with all the marks of royalty. This sumshine of prosperity, was, however, but transitory; her rival Mary proved more powerful, and the kingdom seemed to espouse her cause with such loyalty, that Northumberland and Suffolk yielded to the popular voice, and lady Jane, after being treated as queen for a few days, descended again, and with exultation, to privacy. But misfortunes accompanied her fall. She saw her father-in-law and his family, her own father and his numerous adherents brought to the Tower, and at last expire under the hand of the executioner, and she herself together with her husband were to complete the bloody tragedy. She and lord Guilford and Cranmer were carried to Guildhall from the Tower and attainted of high treason, and condemned, but it is imagined that had not Wyatt's rebellion at that time alarmed the suspicions of the bigoted Mary, the innocent Jane might have been pardoned. Three months after her condemnation she was ordered to prepare for death, and as her husband was dissuaded from increasing their mutual bitterness by taking leave of each other, she gave him her last farewell through the window as he passed to the place of execution, and soon after the saw his headless body wrapped in a linen cloth borne to the chapel. From the horrid sight she was soon summoned herself to the scaffold, where she suffered with the most christian resignation, exclaiming with fervency, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." This bloody catastrophe took place 12th Feb. 1554. Jane carried with her to the grave, the regrets and the affections of the protestants, and Mary in shedding the blood of those who were so nearly related to her, seemed to proclaim that she little regarded the sacrificing of the lives of her subjects to her own bigoted principles.

GREY, Dr. Zachary, an English scholar, descended from a Yorkshire family. He was of Jesus college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Trinity hall, where he took the degree of LL. D. He was rector of Houghton-Conquest, Bedfordshire, and vicar of St. Giles' and St. Peter's in Cambridge, and died 25th Nov. 1766, aged 79. He was author of near 30 publications, the best known of which is his edition of Hudibras, with curious and interesting notes, 2 vols. which has been censured and ridiculed by Warburton and H. Fielding, but ably defended by Warton on Shakespeare. He also answered Neale's History of the Puritans, 3 vols. 8vo. Dr. Grey was twice married and left two daughters.

GREY, Dr. Richard, an English divine, born 1693. He was of Lincoln college, Oxford, and obtained the livings of Kilncote, Leicestershire, and afterwards Hinton in Northamptonshire, and a prebend in St. Paul's. He was made D. D. 1731, by the university for his "System of English Ecclesiastical Law." He published besides in 1736 an anonymous pamphlet called "The Miserable and Distracted State of Religion in England, upon the Downfall of the Church Established," 8vo. — and also "A New Method of learning Hebrew without Points," — Liber Jobi — the Last Words of David — some sermons, &c. He left some daughters, and died 28th Feb. 1771, aged 78.

GRIBALDUS, Matthew, a learned civilian of Padua, who left Italy to embrace the protestant faith, and became professor of civil law at Tübingen. He followed the errors of the anti-trinitarians, for which he was obliged to fly from Tübingen, and he was at last seized at Bern, where the plague carried him off in Sep. 1564, and thus prevented the ignominious death which his persecutors would have inflicted upon him. He wrote some valuable books on civil law, the best known of which is his "Commentarii in Legem de Rerum Mixturâ, et de Jure Fisci."

GRIEBNER, Michael Henry, professor of the law at Wittenberg, died 1734. He wrote several works in Latin on jurisprudence, &c. and his abilities are mentioned with respect by Saxius in his Onomasticon.

GRIERSON, Constance, a woman of great respectability as a scholar in Greek and Roman literature. She was born in Kilkenny, Ireland, of poor and illiterate parents, but she proved her title to celebrity by her edition of Tacitus, dedicated to lord Carteret, and by that of Terence, inscribed to his son, and also by her poems, and a Greek epigram of great merit. In acknowledgment of her literary abilities, lord Carteret inserted her name in the patent which granted the office of king's printer to her husband for life. She died in 1733, aged only 27. She received, as she informed Mrs. Pilkington, some instruction from the clergyman of her parish, but for the best part of her learning, she was indebted to her own industry. To her learning and philosophical knowledge, she united great modesty, genuine piety, and every female virtue.

GRIFFET, Henry, a jesuit of Moulins, who died at Brussels 1775, aged 77. He published Daniel's History of France, in which he continued the reign of Lewis XIII. 7 vols. 4to. besides sermons, and a popular work called "Delices des Pays Bas," 5 vols. 12mo.

GRIFFIER, John, an eminent painter, called old Griffier, and abroad the gentleman of Utrecht. He was born at Amsterdam, and died in London 1718, aged 60. His views on the Thames were much admired, as also his etched prints of birds, beasts, &c. from the designs of F. Barlow. His son Robert, called the young Griffier, was born in England, and was living in 1713. He was an excellent landscape painter.

GRIFFIN, the last prince of Wales before its total subjugation by the English, was inhumanly put to death in London by his conqueror.

GRIFFITH, Michael, a native of London, who studied at Seville and in the Low Countries, and became a jesuit, and was sent as missionary of his order to England. He died at St. Omer's 1652, aged 65. He wrote Annales Ecclesiæ Britannicæ, 4 vols. fol. — Britannia Illustrata, 4to.

GRIFFITHS, Ralph, a native of Shropshire, known in the republic of letters as the first editor and proprietor of the Monthly Review a periodical work, begun in 1749, and by his assiduity and the co-operation of men of talents and information raised to great celebrity. This useful work was so ably and so successfully conducted, that it procured him a comfortable independence, on which he retired to his residence at Turnham Green, some years before his death. He was honored for his services to literature with the degree of LL. D. from one of the American universities, and he died 1803, aged 83.

GRIGNAN, Frances Margaret de Seigné, countess of, daughter of the celebrated madam de Seigné, was born in 1646. She married in 1669, count Grignan, an officer of high rank at the court of Lewis XIV. Her residence residence in Provence with her husband, and at a distance from her mother, was the cause of the writing of those excellent letters, which passed between the mother and daughter. She had two daughters and one son. She died 1705, one year after the death of her son, and her husband survived her till 1714, aged 85.

GRIGNON, Jaques, a French engraver at the end of the 17th century. His best works are his portraits. He engraved some pieces from Chauveau's designs for "les Tableaux de la Penitence."

GRIMALDI, John Francis, a painter, born at Bologna 1606. He studied under his relations the Caraccis, and was honorably employed by Innocent X. in adorning the Vatican, and the other edifices of Rome. He also was engaged by Mazarin at Paris for three years in embellishing his palace and the Louvre, but the troubles of the times, and the warmth with which he espoused the cause of his patron, obliged him to fly to the jesuits for protection. On his return to Rome he gained the patronage of Innocent's two successors, Alexander VII. and Clement IX. and devoted the labors of his pencil in their service. He was also skilled in architecture, and 42 of his engravings in aqua fortis, are mentioned with great commendation. In him the celebrity of the painter was united with great benevolence and the most charitable disposition. He died of a dropy at Rome 1660, leaving a considerable fortune among his six children, the youngest of whom Alexander, distinguished himself as a painter.

GRIMANI, Domenico, son of the doge of Venice, was born there 1460. He was a learned man and the correspondent of Erasmus, and translated some of Chrysostom's homilies into Latin. He was made a cardinal and died 1523.

GRIMANI, Hubert, an excellent portrait painter of Delft, who died 1629, aged 30.

GRIMAREST, Leonard, a French writer who died 1720. He wrote the Life of Charles XII. and that of Moliere, severely censured by Voltaire.

GRIMAUD, N. de, professor of medicine at Montpellier, is author of a treatise on Fevers — Memoirs on Nutrition, &c. He died 1791.

GRIMMER, James, a much admired landscape painter of Antwerp, who died 1546, aged 30.

GRIMOUX, a French painter, who affected to make no distinction between night and day. His portraits are highly valued as cabinet pieces. He died 1740.

GRIMSTON, sir Harbottle, a learned lawyer, master of the rolls to Charles I. He died 1683, aged 99.

GRINDAL, Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, was born 1519 at Haltingham in Cumberland. He entered at Magdalen college, Cambridge, and then removed to Christ's, and afterwards to Pembroke hall, where he became fellow 1538, and M. A. 1541. He was afterwards chosen lady Margaret's public preacher, and distinguished himself so much that Ridley bishop of London made him his chaplain 1550. The next year he was appointed chaplain to the king, and in 1553 he obtained a stall at Westminster, and was marked as one of those who were to enjoy in two portions the rich bishopric of Durham, but the succession of Mary clouded all his prospects. He fled to Strasburg, and there remained till the death of the queen, when his services were employed in drawing up the new liturgy and in opposing in a public dispute with seven other protestants the popish prelates. In 1559 he was made master of Pembroke hall, in the room of Young, who refused the oaths of supremacy, and the same year he was nominated to succeed after Bonner's deposition as bishop of London. In 1564 he took his degree of D. D. and in 1570 he was translated to York, and succeeded Parker five years after in the see of Canterbury. His elevation was of short duration. Elizabeth saw with displeasure that the frequent meetings of the clergy for purposes of mutual improvement, and for the better understanding of the scripture, were often converted into faction instead of christian edification, and she therefore directed Grindal to exercise his authority to abolish these prophesyings, as they were called. The primate who acknowledged that the interference of the laity in these public meetings was often subversive of good order and decorum, yet saw consequences in the friendly meeting of the clergy so favorable to the cause of religion that he ventured to dispute with the queen about the propriety of her measures. Elizabeth was peremptory, her commands were issued to the bishops to silence all prophesyings and exercises, all preachers not lawfully called; and Grindal after being allowed a decent time to consider of his conduct, was, by order of the Star-chamber, confined to his house, and his see sequestered from him. Though in some degree afterwards restored to his metropolitan power, yet he chose to resign his see, and to receive a pension from the queen. With this he retired to Croydon, but died two months after 6th July, 1583, and was interred in Croydon church. This learned prelate, whose firmness was doubted whilst he held the see of London, and seemed to waver in his treatment of the papists, wrote little. The patrons of his early life, were besides Ridley, secretary Cecil and archbishop Parker. He was engaged in drawing up the statutes for the government of Christ-church, Oxford, and by his humanity he provided a new settlement at Embden for the British merchants of Antwerp, whom Spanish tyranny oppressed and insulted.

GRINGONNEUR, Jacquemin, a Parisian painter in the 14th century, said to have invented playing cards about 1392, to amuse the melancholy hours of Charles VI. king of France. Some, however, imagine that cards were in fashion long before the derangement of the sixth Charles.

GRINGORE, Peter, herald at arms to the duke of Lorraine, died 1544. His "Moralities" in verse, though not very interesting, are curious, to mark the progress of theatrical improvement.

GRISAUNT, William, an English physician, astronomer, and mathematician, who studied at Merton college, Oxford, and to avoid the suspicion of magic which in those barbarous ages attended the possession of learning, fled over to France. He settled at Montpellier and afterwards at Marseilles, where he acquired eminence and fame by an inquisitive examination of the diseases and constitution of his patients. His son rose to the pontificate under the name of Urban V. His works are mentioned in Aikin's Biog. Memoirs. The time of his death is unknown, though he was an old man in 1350.

GRIVE, John de la, a French geographer born at Sedan. He died 1757, aged 68. His "Topography of Paris" is extremely accurate, and his plans of Versailles, Marly, &c. are much admired. He wrote also a Manual of Spherical Trigonometry, and other works.

GROCYN, William, a learned Englishman, born at Bristol 1442, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. In 1479 he obtained from his college the rectory of Newton Longville, Bucks, and afterwards in consequence of holding in the ablest manner a disputation before Richard III. when he visited Oxford, he was made prebendary of Lincoln. He travelled to Italy, and improved himself in the Greek, then little understood, under Demetrius Chalcondylas, and Politian, and at his return 1491, settled at Exeter college, Oxford, where he became public professor of his favorite language. He was the correspondent and friend of Erasmus. When that illustrious scholar visited Oxford, Grocyn received him with affection, and introduced him to Warham the primate, and other great and learned men. In 1490, Grocyn exchanged his living for the mastership of All-hallows college, Maidstone, Kent, where he died 1522, of a stroke of the palsy, which the year before had greatly impaired his faculties. He had little respect for Plato, but paid great homage to the philosophy of Aristotle, whose works, he undertook with Latimer, Linacre, and More, to translate, but did not pursue. He left part of his property to Linacre his executor, and to Thomas Lilly the grammarian, who was his godson. A Latin epistle from him to Aldus Manutius, is preserved in Linacre's translation of Proclus de Sphæra. Though Erasmus says this is all he wrote, yet some other writings of his are mentioned by Bale and Leland.

GROCHOWSKI, a Pole, who, after serving in the Prussian armies, took up arms in defence of his country against the Russians. He was with Kosciuszko, at the battle of Syezekociny, 6th June, 1791, and was mortally wounded by a cannon ball.

GRODITUS, Stanislaus, a jesuit of Poland, author of eight volumes of Latin sermons, and other polemical writings. He died at Cracow, 1613.

GRONOVIVS, John Frederic, a respectable civilian, critic, and historian, born at Hamburgh, 1613. After making great progress in literature at home, he travelled through Germany, Italy, and France, further to increase the resources of his mind, and on his return through Deventer, he was stopped, and honorably appointed professor of polite learning. In 1658 he removed to Leyden as successor in the professorial chair, to Dan. Heinius, and there he died greatly regretted, 1672. He married at Deventer, and had two sons both eminent in literature. He published a dissertation on Statius Sylva — a treatise on the Sestertie — a work of Ecclesiastical Writers, besides valuable editions of Plautus, Seneca, Sallust, Livy, Quintilian, Pliny, &c.

GRONOVIVS, James, son of the preceding, was born at Deventer, 20th Oct. 1645, and educated under his father at Leyden. In 1670, he visited England, and not only examined the valuable libraries of the universities, but he gained the friendship of the learned, of Pocock, Pearson, and M. Casaubon, and after his return to Leyden, he extended his travels to France, where he was introduced to Chaplain, d'Herbelot, Thevenot, and other scholars. Though his father's death disconcerted his plans, he proceeded to Italy, where the grand duke of Tuscany, in respect to his merits, granted him a pension, and a professor's chair at Pisa, where he had for his colleague Henry Norris, afterwards a cardinal. After some time he left Tuscany, and returning by the way of Venice and Padua, he came to Leyden, where, in 1679, a professorship awaited him. In this peaceful retreat, endeared to him by the residence of his father, and the partialities of youthful life, he determined to pass the remainder of his days, and therefore rejected the honorable offers of a chair at Padua, and also at Keil, in Holstein, under the duke of Sleswick. In the midst of his literary occupations the death of his favorite daughter rent his bosom with affliction, so that in the fullness of his grief, he fell sick, and five weeks after followed her to the grave, 21st Oct. 1716. He left two sons, the eldest a physician and the youngest Abraham, history professor at Utrecht. Gronovius was inferior to his father in modesty and moderation, though superior in learning; but his virulence against his literary antagonists was such, that he was called a second Scioppius. Besides editions of Macrobius, Polybius, &c. he published that valuable book, "Theaurus Antiquitatum Græcarum" 13 vols. fol.

GROPPER, John, an able polemic of Westphalia, who refused a cardinal's hat. He died at Rome 1559. He had a great abhorrence of women. He wrote a valuable work "Enchiridion Christianæ Religionis."

GROS, Peter, an able sculptor, born at Paris. He embellished the capital of France with many fine specimens of his art, and died at Rome 1710, aged 44.

GROS, Nicholas, a theologian of Rheims, whose opposition to the bull unigenitus, obliged him to fly from France. He was for some time in England, and wrote several things on temporary subjects. He was theological professor at Amersfort, and in his writings ably supported the jansenists in Holland. He died 1751, aged 76.

GROSE, Francis, an English antiquary, and able writer. He illustrated "the Antiquity of England and Wales" in 4 vols. 4to. "and of Scotland," in two. His design, with respect to Ireland, was checked by death, which carried him off in Dublin, in 1791, aged 52. He published besides "a Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue," — "Military Antiquities, &c. — a treatise on Ancient Armour, &c. His talents were much admired as a draughtsman, and he was equally respectable as a pleasing and agreeable companion in private life.

GROSLEY, Peter John, member of the academy of belles lettres, and of Inscriptions, was born at Troyes, and died there 1785, aged 67. He wrote "Recherches pour l'Histoire du Droit François" — the Lives of the two Pithou's, &c. besides large contributions to the Encyclopedia, and the Dictionnaire Historique.

GROSSETESTE, Robert, an English prelate, born about 1175, at Stradbrook, Suffolk. Though obscurely born, he received a decent education, most ably assisted by indefatigable application, at Oxford and Paris, where he became a respectable proficient in Greek literature, little regarded at that time. On returning from Paris, he read lectures on philosophy and divinity at Oxford, and from the celebrity which he acquired was made archdeacon of Chester, afterwards of Wilts, and in 1234-5, elected bishop of Lincoln. He died at Buckden, 1253, highly respected for learning, integrity, and piety, even in the opinion of Matthew Paris, who often speaks of him with marked indifference. He wrote commentaries commentaries on Aristotle, and other voluminous works, mentioned in Tanner's Bibliothèque. He possessed besides great learning, a clear and vigorous intellect. Dr. Pegge has written his life.

GROSTESTE, Claude, a French refugee, who came to London, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was minister of the Savoy, and wrote several sermons, and a treatise on the Inspiration of the Sacred Books, displaying learning, benevolence, and humility. He died 1713, aged 28.

GROSVENOR, Benjamin, a native of London, made minister of a dissenting congregation, in Crosby square, 1704, and in 1716 removed to Salters' hall meeting-house. Besides essay on Health, and the Mourner, often edited, and universally approved, he wrote several sermons, and died 1758, aged 83.

GROTIUS or GROOT, Hugo, a celebrated writer, son of John de Groot, a respectable burgo-master of Delft. He was born at Delft, 10th April 1583, and from his earliest years displayed strong powers of mind, great genius, sound judgment, and a most retentive memory. He studied at the Hague, and afterwards removed to Leyden under the care of Francis Junius, and here Joseph Scaliger saw and admired his promising abilities, and affectionately interested himself in his improvement. In 1598 he accompanied count Justin of Nassau, and the grand pensioner Barnevelt, in their embassy to France, and he was received with every mark of kindness by the court, and presented by Henry IV. with his picture and a gold chain. The university of Paris also paid its respect to this learned youth, and granted him a doctor of law's degree before his return to Holland. Devoting himself to the law, he pleaded his first cause at Delft, and though scarce 17, he commanded the general applause by his eloquence and extensive information. But polite literature also engaged much of his attention, and in 1599 he published an edition of Martianus Capella, dedicated to the celebrated de Thou, and translated into Latin, Stevin's treatise for the instruction of pilots in finding a ship's place at sea. In 1600, he published his Phænomena of Aratus, and acquired such celebrity as a poet that his Prosopopœia was translated into French by du Vaer, Rapin, Pasquier, and Malherbe, and into Greek by Casaubon. He also wrote tragedies, and his Adamus Exul, his Christus Patiens, and his Joseph, were received with great applause. In 1603, he was appointed historiographer to the states of Holland, who thus selected him as the ablest historian worthy to transmit to posterity the heroic deeds of their countrymen, and their emancipation from Spanish slavery. He was next appointed advocate general for the fife of Holland and Zealand, with an increased salary, and he ably defended in 1609, in his "Mare Liberum" the freedom of the ocean, and the right of the Dutch to trade to the east, though the work was severely and acutely censured by Selden. His treatise de Antiquitate Reipublicæ Batavæ, to assert the ancient independence of his country from the Roman yoke, and the modern usurpations of Spain appeared in 1610, and was rewarded with the unanimous thanks of the states. In 1613, he was honorably elected pensionary of Rotterdam, and obtained a seat in the assembly of the states of Holland, and afterwards of the states general, and soon after his abilities were employed in settling the disputes between the English and the Dutch, on the subject of the fishery in the Northern seas. In the religious differences which now began to agitate Holland, Grotius who had hitherto marched unopposed in the road of honor and glory, took a share, and, in embracing the tenets of Arminius, he declared himself a zealous advocate for toleration. His conduct, and that of those with whom he acted, proved offensive to prince Maurice, and the conference, begun for reconciliation, soon ended in mistrust and warfare. At the national synod of Dort, 15th Nov. 1618, the five articles of the Arminians were condemned, their ministers were banished, and their three able defenders Barnevelt, Grotius, and Hoogarbets, were tried, and the first was executed, and the others doomed to perpetual imprisonment. In his prison of Louvestein, Grotius found consolation in literary occupations, and though his confinement was rigorous, he derived every comfort from the attentions of his wife, who after some difficulty was permitted to visit him. The fond care of this worthy woman at last procured his deliverance, after a captivity of nearly two years, and on pretence of removing books which she declared proved injurious to her husband's health, she was permitted to send away a small chest of drawers of the length of three feet and a half in which he was confined. Thus carried by two soldiers from the fortress of Louvestein, the chest was removed to Gorcum on horseback, and at the house of a friend the illustrious prisoner was set at liberty, and immediately escaped disguised in the dress of a mason with a rule and a trowel, to Valvic in Brabant, and then to Antwerp. From Antwerp he wrote to the states general exculpating himself, and asserting that his conduct was guided by the purest love for his country, and the sincerest regard for the interests of the states, and he afterwards went to Paris, where he received a pension from the French court. His apology appeared in 1622, but it was received with such indignation by the states general, that all persons were forbidden to read it on pain of death, and a decree was issued to seize the offending author wherever he could be found. In 1623 he retired from the tumults of Paris to the seat of one of his friends near Boulogne, and there began his great work on the Rights of Peace and War. The death of Maurice in Holland made no change in the politics of the Dutch, and the next stadtholder, Frederic Henry, professed the same enmity against the exiled sufferer, but, at last, through the solicitations of his friends, and the earnest applications of his wife, the confiscation was removed from his property, and in Oct. 1631, he ventured to revisit Holland. Though honorably received at Rotterdam, at Amsterdam, and at Delft, he found still the spirit of rancor in the magistrates, and when threatened again with persecution, he determined to remove from an ungrateful country on which his services and his writings have conferred immortal fame. In March 1632, he retired to Hamburgh, and there was flattered with the most pressing and liberal invitations from Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Holstein, and other princes, but he preferred the friendship of Oxenstiern, and a residence in Sweden, to all other situations. By the kindness of his new patron, and the celebrity of his own meritorious works, he was at last declared counsellor to the queen of Sweden, and appointed her ambassador to France, and for eight eight years, till 1644, he supported the character of his station, and the interests of his new adopted country, with firmness and with dignity. When, at his own solicitation, he retired from the French embassy, he removed through Holland to Sweden, and was honorably received by queen Christina; but seeing the cabals of his enemies, who, without merit, were jealous of his fame and consequence, he sighed again for retirement, and requested permission to go to Lubec. On the 12th of August, 1645, he embarked, but the vessel was driven by a dreadful storm on the coast of Pomerania, and Grotius, intent to reach Lubec, arrived at Rostock, after a tedious journey of sixty miles, exposed to the rain and to the inclemency of the air. The difficulties of his journey were increased by the attacks of a fever, and the illustrious stranger, whom the ingratitude of his countrymen had banished from his home, and the envy of courtiers had driven from his long wished for asylum, sinking under fatigue and disease, expired at midnight, 28th Aug. 1645. His remains were conveyed to Delft, and deposited in the grave of his family, where this modest epitaph written by himself marks the spot;

Grotius hic Hugo est, Batavum captivus et exul,

Legatus regni, Suceia magna, tui.

Besides his valuable treatise on the Christian religion, which is known to every student of christianity, and his treatise de Jure Belli & Pacis, and the other pieces already mentioned, he published, among other works, Via ad Pacem Ecclesiasticam — Anthologia — Historia Gothorum — Commentary on the Old and New Testaments — Dissertation Historic. de Dogmat. Ritib. &c. Ecclesiæ, &c. — de Origine Gentium Americæ. — Notes on Tacitus, Lucian, &c. — Epistles, &c. His wife, Mary Reigelberg, whom he married 1608, survived him. She was a woman of a most respectable family in Zealand, and in her character most amiable, benevolent, and exemplary. The religious opinions of Grotius were very favorable to the church of England, and it is no despicable testimony to the purity and authenticity of the doctrines of our national establishment, that its tenets and discipline were commended and applauded by a man whose judgment was so discriminating, and whose opinion is so respectable and so satisfactory, especially on the subject of religion, to which he devoted, for a long time, all the powers of a strong, vigorous, and unprejudiced mind. Two of the sons of this illustrious character, Cornelius and Diederic, embraced the military profession, and another, Peter, became eminent in the law and as a philologist, and was known as a pensionary of Amsterdam. He died 1678.

GROTIUS, William, brother of Hugo, was born at Delft, and distinguished himself as a lawyer. He wrote Enchiridion de Principiis Juris Naturæ — & Vitæ Jurisconsultorum in Pandectis Nomin. &c. and died 1662.

GROVE, Henry, a learned teacher among the presbyterians, born at Taunton, Somersetshire, 4th Jan. 1683. He was descended from very respectable families in Devonshire and Wiltshire, by his father and mother, and therefore his education was particularly attended to. After being under the care of Mr. Warren, who kept an academy at Taunton, he went to London, and studied under his relation Mr. Rowe, and, by his learning and abilities, recommended himself to the notice of some respectable divines, among whom, was Dr. Watts. At the age of 22 he began to be a preacher, and soon after married; and undertook with Mr. James, the care of Taunton academy, in the room of his friend Warren, where he continued very successfully employed for 18 years. During that time he engaged in the theological disputes which agitated the dissenters and the clergy, and he published his, "Essay on the Terms of Christian Communion," and other things. In 1736 he lost his wife, and the following year, he fell a victim to a violent fever, which carried him off 27th Feb. 1736-7. An inscription was placed over his grave, by Dr. Ward of Gresham college. He wrote Miscellanies in prose and verse, besides a Discourse on Saving Faith — an Essay on the Soul's Immortality — and the numbers 588, 601, 626, 635, in the Spectator. His posthumous works appeared in 1740, 4 vols. 8vo.

GROVE, Joseph, an Englishman, who wrote the life of cardinal Wolley. He died 1764.

GRUCHIUS, Nicolas, of a noble family in Rouen, was the first who explained Aristotle in Greek. He translated Castanedo's history of the Indies, and wrote a treatise de Comitibus Romanorum, besides tracts against Sigonius, and other works. He died 1572, at Rochelle.

GRUDIUS, Nicolas Everard, treasurer of Brabant, wrote sacred and prophane poetry in Latin, and died 1571.

GRUE, Thomas, a Frenchman at the end of the 17th century, who translated several English works into French, and among them, Ross's history of all Religions, and Rogers' Gate opened to the Knowledge of Paganism.

GRUET, N. a young poet of very promising abilities, who was unfortunately killed by the discharge of a fowling-piece, on which he was resting his head, and of which the trigger was pulled by the motion of his dog. His farewell to Hector and Andromache, and his Annibal to the Carthaginian senate, are poetical pieces of great merit. He died 1778, aged 25.

GRUGET, Claude, a Parisian of the 16th century, who translated Spanish and Italian works into French, and among them the queen of Navarre's Heptameron.

GRUNER, John Frederic, an able theologian and scholar born at Cabourg. He wrote an introduction to Roman Antiquities — Miscellanea Sacra — Critical Remarks on the Classics, besides editions of Cælius Sedulius, Eutropius, Paterculus, and other valuable works. He died 1778, aged 55.

GRUTERUS, Janus, an eminent philologist, born 3d Dec. 1560, at Antwerp. His father was burgo-master there, and he was obliged to fly in consequence of signing that petition to the dukes of Parma, which gave rise to the word Gueux. He came to Norwich with his wife, who was an Englishwoman, and with his infant son. Under the eye of his mother who was an excellent scholar, and could read Galen in the original, young Gruter made a rapid progress, and at the proper age he was sent to Cambridge. On the return of his parents to the continent he followed them and completed his education at Leyden, where he took a doctor's degree in civil law. During the political agitation of Flanders, he travelled into foreign countries, and was some time professor of history at Wittenberg, but refused to continue there, as a confession of faith, contrary to his sentiments, was tendered to him. He was afterwards offered a professor's chair at Padua, but he preferred the invitation which he had received to settle at Heidelberg. In this situation he published his large collection of inscriptions, dedicated to the emperor Rodolphus II. who in approbation of his merit granted him the licence of publishing his own works and those of others, and intended him the honors of nobility, the completing of which his death prevented. On the taking of Heidelberg he had the misfortune to lose his valuable library which had cost him 1200 golden crowns, and all applications for its recovery were fruitless. He afterwards had honorable invitations to settle in Denmark, and in the university of Franeker, but he rejected them, and at last fixed his residence at a country house near Heidelberg, from whence going to visit his son-in-law he was 10th Sep. 1527, suddenly taken ill, and expired 10 days after. He was buried in St. Peter's church, Heidelberg. He was an able critic, a man of extensive erudition, and a very voluminous and respectable writer.

GRUTERUS, Peter, a practitioner of physic in Flanders, who published in 1709 at Leyden "a Century of Latin Letters," with obsolete phrases, and a "New Century," also in 1629 at Amsterdam, where he died 1634.

GRYLLUS, son of Xenophon, slew Epaminondas, and fell himself at the celebrated battle of Mantinea, B. C. 363.

GRYNEUS, Simon, a learned German, son of a peasant of Swabia, born at Veringen, in the county of Hohenzollern, 1493. He studied with great assiduity, and became Greek professor at Vienna, but his attachment to the protestants exposed him to many dangers and frequent persecution. He was imprisoned by the monks at Baden, and after his liberation had a conference with Luther and Melancthon at Wittemberg. He was afterwards for six years Greek professor at Heidelberg, from whence he went to Basil, and, in 1531, visited England with strong recommendations from Erasmus to sir Thomas More, Montjoy, and others. In 1534 he was employed in reforming the church and school of Tübingen, and two years after returned to Basil, and in 1540 assisted at the conferences of Worms. He died of the plague the next year at Basil. He was an excellent scholar, whose great erudition is usefully displayed in his editions of the Almagest of Ptolemy, of Euclid, Plato, Proclus, &c.

GRYNEUS, John James, a native of Berne, of the family of the preceding. He was minister and divinity professor at Basil, and died there 1617, aged 77. He was blind for the last five years of his life. He wrote notes on several of the fathers, besides an ecclesiastical history, &c.

GRYNEUS, Thomas, nephew of the preceding, was born at Syringen in Swabia, and educated under the care of his uncle. He was Latin and Greek professor at Berne and Basil, and was highly respected as a scholar and a man. He left four sons, all eminent in literature.

GRYPHIARDER, John, professor of history and poetry at Jena, was author of some works, and died 1612.

GRYPHIUS, Sebastian, a celebrated printer at Lyons, born at Reuthlingen in Swabia 1493. He was equally known as a scholar, and Conrad Gesner, in testimony of his merit, dedicated one of his books to him, and Julius Scaliger also spoke respectfully of his abilities. The books printed by Gryphius are much admired, especially his Hebrew, Greek, and Latin editions, and particularly his "Latin Bible," in 2 vols. fol. in the largest types, then seen, 1550. He died 1556, and left his trade and reputation to his son and able successor Anthony Gryphius.

GRYPHIUS, Andrew, the Cornelle of Germany, was born at Glogaw 1616. He is highly extolled by the Germans as a tragic writer, and he also published in a fine vein of satire and irony, a critique on the ancient comedies of the Greeks. He died 1664.

GRYPHIUS, Christian, son of Andrew, was professor of eloquence at Breslaw, and principal librarian of the college of Magdalen. He was a man of extensive erudition, and was the author of German poems — a treatise on the German language — of a dissertation on the historical writers of the 17th century, &c. He died 1706, aged 57.

GUA DE MALVES, John Paul de, a French ecclesiastic, born in Languedoc. He first conceived the idea of an encyclopedia, which was so successfully executed by d'Alembert, Diderot, and others. He wrote Usage de l'Analyse de Descartes, &c. and died at Paris 1786, aged 74.

GUADAGNOLO, Philip, a learned orientalist, born at Magliano. He chiefly devoted himself to the study of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldean, Syriac, Persian, and particularly Arabic, which he taught many years in the Sapienza college at Rome. He was so well versed in Arabic, that he spoke an oration in that language before queen Christina at Rome 1656. He also at the request of pope Urban VIII. undertook in 1622, and finished after 27 years' labor, a translation of the Bible into Arabic for the use of the Eastern churches, published at Rome 1671, 3 vols. fol. He wrote besides an Apology for the Christian Religion in Latin 1631, and in Arabic 1637, against a mahometan, and with such effect that his antagonist embraced christianity — "a Methodical Arabic Grammar" — an Arabic Dictionary, not completed, the manuscript of which is preserved in the convent of San Lorenzo in Lucina. This accomplished scholar died 1656, aged 60.

GUAGUIN, Alexander, an author, who was born at Verona 1538, and died at Cracow, aged 76. He wrote some valuable typographical works, especially "Sarmatiae Europae Descriptio, Spices," 1581 — et Rerum Polonicarum Scriptores, 3 vols. 8vo.

GUALBERT, St. John, a Florentine who founded a monastery at Vallombrosa among the Apennines, where he died 1073. The spot is immortalized by the pen of Milton in his Paradise Lost.

GUALDUS, Prioratus, or Galeazzo, an Italian historian, born at Vicenza, where he died 1678. He was historiographer to the emperor, and wrote the History of Ferdinand II. and III. and also of Leopold, 3 vols. folio — the Troubles of France from 1648 to 1654.

GUALTERUS, Rodolphus, author of Commentaries on the Bible, and of a translation of Julius Pollux, was born at Zurich 1529, and died 1586.

GUARIN, Peter, a Benedictine of Rouen, who died at Paris 1729, aged 51. He was an excellent Hebrew scholar, and published a Hebrew Grammar, 2 vols. 4to. and also a Hebrew Lexicon.

GUARINI, an eminent scholar, of a noble Veronese family, who went to Constantinople to learn Greek, and was the first who taught it in Italy. He was professor of learned languages at Ferrara, and translated some of the ancient authors, especially Strabo and Plutarch's Lives, and died 1460, at Ferrara. His son Baptista was professor at Ferrara, and translated into Italian some of Plautus' comedies, and wrote besides some poems and other works, &c.

GUARINI, John Baptist, a famous Italian poet, great grandson of the preceding, born at Ferrara 1537. He was educated at Pisa and Padua, and afterwards introduced to the court of Alphonso II. His abilities were employed in frequent embassies to Venice and to Turin, where his "Pastor Fido," was first exhibited to the applauses of an admiring populace, at the nuptials of the duke of Savoy with the sister of Philip III. of Spain. In 1571 he went as ambassador to Rome, and four years after negotiated in Poland, to obtain for his master the crown, which Henry of Valois had resigned. Disgust with the intrigues and ingratitude of the court drove him, in 1582, into retirement; but he was prevailed upon again to become secretary of state, and ambassador, and again he abandoned, with dissatisfaction, the offices of elevated life for privacy. As the duke of Ferrara had favored his son in a law-suit against him, he offered his services to the duke of Savoy; but the loss of his wife, in 1589, produced a revolution in his sentiments, and for a while determined him to become an ecclesiastic. After, however, being in the service of the duke of Mantua, he was reconciled to Alphonso of Ferrara; but fresh quarrels arose, and Guarini quitted his country for the protection of the grand duke of Tuscany. He died at Venice, October 1612, aged 70, after exhibiting the peevishness and dissatisfaction of an ambitious, but inconsistent, character. He was member of several learned societies; but so regardless of the poetical fame which his Pastor Fido had acquired, that he considered it below the rank of a gentleman to be a poet. He wrote several things besides, mentioned by Nicéron.

GUARINI, Guarino, a well known architect, born at Modena. He died 1683, aged 59. He embellished Turin, and other cities of Italy, and even Paris, with palaces; but though admired, his buildings are irregular.

GUASCO, Octavian, a native of Turin, who died at Verona 1783. He was member of the French academies, and distinguished himself by his writings, especially "a treatise on Asylums," — on the Statues of the Ancients, &c.

GUAZZI, Stephen, an Italian, secretary to the dukes of Mentz, and author of some poems, dialogues, &c. much esteemed. He died at Pavia, 1565.

GUAZZI, Mark, a native of Padua, eminent in arms and in literature. He wrote an History of Charles VIII. — an History of his own Time, and other things, much admired. He died 1556.

GUAY TROUIN, René du, a famous admiral. Vid. Du-GUAY.

GUDIUS, Marquard, an able critic of Holstein, educated at Rensburg and Jena. He early displayed a strong inclination for literature, and was recommended by Gronovius to D. Heinsius, as a person of great and promising talents; but his parents were anxious to advance him at court, and, therefore, earnestly desired to see him lay aside all studious pursuits. By the interest, however, of his friends Grævius and Gronovius, he obtained the office of tutor to a young man of family and fortune, named Samuel Schas, and with him he began to travel, in 1659, into France. His abilities, and the recommendation of his friends in Holland introduced him to the learned of Paris and of Toulouse, and after visiting the libraries and most curious collections of France and Italy, the tutor and the pupil returned, in 1664, to Germany. He was afterwards in England, and in the company and friendship of his pupil, who possessed great erudition, and employed much of his great property in the collection of rare and valuable manuscripts, he spent the whole of his time, and declined accepting a professorship which was offered him at the Hague. So great and sincere was the friendship between Gudius and Schas, that the pupil left his property to his preceptor in 1675; but such was the ungrateful conduct of Gudius, that on the acquisition of his riches he forgot and disregarded the friends in Holland, to whose interference he owed his elevation and his opulence. He was afterwards counsellor to the duke of Holstein, and to the king of Denmark, and died immaturely, as Burman observes, in 1689. Though very learned, he never published any thing of great importance; the notes and MSS. however, which he communicated to his friends were valuable, and his assistance and abilities have been honorably recorded by Grævius, Burman, and others.

GUDIUS, Gottlob Frederic, a Lutheran minister, author of some valuable works, especially on the Difficulty of learning Hebrew — Remarks on the Emperor Julian — a Life of Hoffman.

GUEDRIER DE ST. AUBIN, Henry Michael, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Gournai-en-bray, near Rouen. He died abbot of St. Vulmer monastery, in Bayonne, 1742, aged 47. He distinguished himself as a casuist, and wrote the Sacred History of the two Covenants, 7 vols. 12mo. &c.

GUERARD, Robert, a Benedictine monk, born at Rouen, where he died 1715, aged 74. He wrote an Abridgment of the Bible in questions and answers, 2 vols. 12mo. and assisted Delfau in the editing of St. Austin's work, and was sent to exile, when his associate was disgraced for his book called l'Abbé Comendataire.

GUERCHEVILLE, Antoinette de Pons, marchioness of, a French lady, remarkable for her dignified answer to Henry IV. who meditated an attack on her virtue. If, said she, I am not noble enough to be your wife, I am too noble to be your mistress. When married to Mary de Medicis, he made her lady of honor to his queen, saying, Since you are a lady of honor, be one to my wife.

GUERCHI, Claude Lewis de Regnier, count de, a French general, who distinguished himself in the wars of Italy and Flanders, and afterwards came to England, as ambassador from his court. He died 1768.

GUERCINO, Francisco Barbieri da Cento, so called from a cast in one of his eyes, was a painter of eminence, born near Bologna, 1590. He began to practise his profession at the early age of eight, and by attending the lessons of Michael Angelo, and the Caracci, he acquired great reputation for correctness, invention, and a becoming boldness in his figures. For two years he practised at Rome, by the desire of Gregory XV. but afterwards the liberal offers of the kings of England and France could not draw him away from his favorite retreat at Bologna. Christina queen of Sweden, paid her respects to him, and shook him by the hand, by that hand, said he, which had painted 106 altar pieces, 144 pictures, for people of distinction, and besides composed 10 books of designs. He died 1666, a bachelor, leaving much of his property to build chapels, and for other charitable purposes. His private character for piety and morality, was as eminent as his abilities as a painter.

GUERET, Gabriel, eminent as an advocate at the bar, and as an author, was born at Paris 1641, and died there 1688. He wrote "Parnassus reformed" — the War of Authors, and other facetious and satirical works.

GUERICK, Otto, a German philosopher, and physician, celebrated as the inventor of the Air-pump, and of the Weather glass. He was counsellor to the elector of Brandenburg, burgo-master of Magdeburg, and author of some treatises, on experimental philosophy. He was twice married, and by his first wife had Otto, who was counsellor to the king of Prussia, and a man of learning. This able man died at Hamburgh, 1686, aged 84.

GUERIN, Francis, professor of the college of Beauvais, translated Tacitus and Livy into French. His Livy was esteemed, printed at Barbou's press, 10 vols. 12mo.

GUERINIERE, Francis Robichon, author of "l'Ecole de Cavalerie", and "Elemens de Cavalerie", was equester to the French king, and died 1751.

GUERRE, Martin, a Frenchman, whose history excited some interest in his country. After living about 10 years with Bertrande de Rols, his wife, he went from her and engaged in the Spanish service. Eight years after one of his friends, Arnaud du Thil, presented himself to the deserted Bertrande, and by imposing upon her credulity, was received by her as her husband. The imposture was suspected by the uncle of Guerre, but du Thil, though prosecuted, and condemned to be hanged, asserted his innocence, and declaring himself the real Martin, appealed to the parliament of Toulouse. The cause seemed intricate, but before the decisive sentence was pronounced, Martin returned, and the impostor, was for his treacherous and immoral conduct, hanged and burned, 1560.

GUESCLIN, Bertrand du, a celebrated warrior, constable of France. He was a native of Britany, but his education had been so neglected, that he could neither read nor write, and in his person he was as mean, as his mind was noble. He was principally distinguished in his wars against the English. His life has been written by several of his countrymen. He died in the midst of his triumphs, before Chateau Neuf de Rendon, 1380, aged 69.

GUETTARD, John Stephen, a French physician and botanist, whose extreme application in literary pursuits, brought on a premature death 1786. He wrote Observations on Plants, 2 vols. 12mo. and Memoirs of different parts of the Sciences and Arts, 3 vols. 4to.

GUEVARA, Antony de, a Spanish writer, born in the province of Alaba. He was brought up at court, and became known as a preacher, and historiographer to Charles V. He was made bishop of Guadix in Granada, and of Mandonedo in Galicia, and died 1544. The best known of his works is "Dial of Princes, or the life M. A. Antoninus", which has been translated into all the languages of Europe. He is deservedly censured as an historian, not only for the ill taste, but the improbabilities, and distorted accounts, which he introduces as historical facts, more becoming the meretriciousness of romance than of sober truth. He wrote besides Golden Epistles, &c. His nephew, Anthony, was also an ecclesiastic, and author of Commentaries on the Scriptures.

GUEVARA, Lewis Velez de, a Spanish comic poet, admired in the court of Philip IV. for his pleasantries. His humorous piece "el Diabolo Cojuelo" is the foundation of le Sage's Diabolo Boiteux. He was a native of Içija, in Andalusia, and died 1646.

GUEULETTE, Thomas Simon, a French advocate, author of some novels and comedies, was born at Paris, and died 1766, aged 83. His works display genius, elegance, and ease. Besides "the Sultans of Guzerat, &c." he wrote Italian pieces, &c.

GUGLIELMINI, Dominic, a mathematician, born at Bologna. He was of the academy of Paris, and was patronized by Lewis XIV. Of the valuable works which he wrote the treatise on the Nature of Rivers is the most esteemed. His works are printed at Geneva, 2 vols. 4to. 1719. He died 1710, aged 55.

GUIBERT, author of Gesta Dei per Francos, or an History of the first Crusade, died abbot of Roget-sous-Couci, 1124, aged 71.

GUIBERT, James Anthony Hippolite, a native of Montauban who early served in the German wars, and became a colonel in Corsica. He published in 1770; Essai general du Tactique, and afterwards quitted the military profession to devote himself to dramatic writings. He became member of the French academy, in the room of Thomas, and died 1790; aged 47. Besides tragedies, he wrote also the Eulogy of the king of Prussia — of Catinat, and of l'Hopital.

GUICCIARDINI, Francesco, a celebrated historian, born at Florence, 1482, of a noble family. After receiving a most liberal education, he practised the law, and held some offices of dignity and importance, and then devoted himself to the public affairs of his native city. From Florence, he went to Rome, and was highly honored by Leo X. and his two successors, who employed him in a high, civil, and military capacity, and trusted much to his integrity and talents. He died universally respected 1540. His history of Italy, in Italian, 4 vols. 4to. is a performance about which his countrymen deservedly pride themselves.

GUICCIARDINI, Lewis, nephew of the historian, was himself a writer of great fidelity. He was born at Florence, and died at Antwerp 1589, aged 66. Of his valuable works the most esteemed is his description of the Pays Bas, in Italian, translated into French by Belleforet.

GUICHARD, Claude de, historiographer to the duke of Savoy, was author of a curious work called "the Funerals of the Ancients" in 4to. He died 1607.

GUICHERON, Samuel, a French advocate of Bourges, in Bresse, known as an historian. Among other things, his "Genealogical History of the House of Savoy," is much admired by Bayle and others. He died 1664, aged 57.

GUIDI, Alexander, a Italian poet, born at Pavia in Milan, 1650. He was patronized by the duke of Parma, and afterwards under the protection of Christina of Sweden, who resided at Rome, he not only became acquainted with the literary characters of that city, but read to great advantage the works of his favorite masters, Dante, Petrarch, and Chiabrara. After thus enjoying the friendship of the learned, and the good opinion of the popes, of Eugene of Savoy, and others, he was seized with an apoplexy which proved fatal at Fiescati, in June, 1712. His body was carried back to Rome, and buried in the church of St. Onuphrius, near that of Tasso. His works which consist of pastorals, operas, and other poems written in an easy, agreeable, but correct style, were published at Verona 1726, 12mo. with an account of his life. Though respectable as a poet, he was in his person very deformed, his head was disagreeably large, and he was blind of one eye.

GUIDO, Reni, a celebrated Italian painter, born at Bologna 1575. His father who was a musician designed him for his profession, but nature had given him a strong genius for painting, and by improving himself under the direction of Denis Calvert, a Flemish painter, and afterwards of the Caraccis, he acquired such excellence as rendered him superior to the artists of his age. His merits happily were not buried in oblivion, he was honored with the notice and esteem of pope Paul V. of the cardinals and princes of Italy, of Lewis XIII. of Philip IV. of Spain, and of Udislaus king of Sweden and Poland. He lived in great splendor at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome, but a most invincible attachment to gaming ruined his fortune and rendered him indigent and discontented. From the most elevated affluence he sunk to poverty, and the reflection of his deplorable and ruined situation had such an effect upon him that it brought on a distemper, of which he died 1642. In his youth his features were so pleasing that his master Ludovico Caracci painted his angels from him. In every part of his character Guido was highly respectable, gaming was his only vice. His pictures are much valued, and they adorn the collections of the great. His best piece is what he painted with Domenicheno in the church of St. Gregory. Some of his designs were etched by himself.

GUIDO, Cagnacci, an historical painter of Bologna, disciple to Reni Guido. He possessed great merit. He died 1680.

GUIDOTTI, Paul, a painter, engraver, and architect, of Lucca. He had also some knowledge of anatomy, and pretended he could fly with wings. In the attempt he fell and broke his limbs. He died 1629, aged 60.

GUIGNARD, John, a jesuit born at Chartres, and professor of divinity at Clermont college. He was executed at Paris 7th Jan. 1595, for high treason. During the affair of John Chastel, which so nearly concerned the life of Henry IV. some papers were seized at Clermont, in the hand-writing of Guignard and as in these he maintained that the murder of Henry

III. and of Henry IV. was lawful, and refused to retract his assertions, he was put to death.

GUIGNES, Joseph de, a native of Pontoise, who studied the oriental languages under Stephen Fourmont, and became interpreter to the French king, 1741, and member of the belles lettres' academy 1753. The revolution though it hurried him not to the guillotine, yet proved the source of his misery and reduced him to poverty. He died at Paris 1800, aged 79. He was well acquainted with the Chinese characters, and for 35 years was principal conductor of the Journal des Savans. He wrote General History of the Huns, Turks, Moguls, and Tartars, 5 vols. 4to. — the Life of Fourmont — the Military Art of the Chinese — Memoir to prove the Chinese an Egyptian Colony — Essay on the Oriental and Greek Topography — Principles of Typographical Composition — Memoirs in the Academy of Inscriptions, &c.

GUILD, William, D. D. a Scotch divine born near Dundee, and educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he was successfully professor of philosophy, divinity, and church history. Though he opposed the covenant in 1638, he afterwards complied, and at the restoration went as one of the commissioners to Breda to congratulate Charles II. He wrote in 1657 an answer to a Roman catholic book on Innovations, and died 1662, much esteemed, aged 60.

GUILLAIN, Simon, a sculptor, rector of the painting and sculpture academy at Paris. He died 1658, aged 77.

GUILLANDIUS, Melchior, an eminent physician and botanist of Konigsberg in Prussia. He was taken by the Algerines when going on botanical pursuits to Africa. His commentary on the Papyrus is full of erudition. He wrote several works, and died at Padua 1589, where he was botanical professor.

GUILLELMA, a woman of Bohemia, who in the 13th century, founded in Italy a sect which united enthusiasm with lewdness. After being respected during life as a saint, she was, when dead, dug up from her grave and burnt with ignominy.

GUILLEMEAU, James, a French surgeon, author of some valuable books on his profession. He died at Paris 1612.

GUILET DE ST. GEORGE, George, first historiographer to the academy of painting and sculpture in Paris, was born at Thiers in Auvergne, and died at Paris 1705, aged 80. He wrote, among other things, the History of Mahomet II. — Ancient and Modern Sparta — Ancient and Modern Athens, &c.

GUILLIAUD, Claude, doctor of the Sorbonne, was author of Commentaries on the Gospels of St. Matthew, and St. John, and of Collationes in omnes S. Pauli Epistolas, &c.

GUILLIM, John, author of the celebrated work "Display of Heraldry" in folio, was born in Herefordshire 1565, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was of the society of the college of arms, and in 1617, was made rouge-croix pursuivant of arms. He died 1621. The sixth edition of his valuable work appeared 1724, with many editions. Some have attributed the work to Dr. Barkham.

GUILLOTIN, a physician, born at Saintes, 29th March 1738. He studied at Paris, and at the revolution tion he was sent as a deputy to the national assembly from Paris. In making a report on the penal code, he recommended an instrument of death which might be more expeditious, and create to the unhappy sufferers less pain than either the halter or the wheel, and this new machine, so fatally used during the civil dissensions of the state, has immortalized the name of its author. Though it is reported that he perished under his guillotine, it is however certain that he died a natural death, and it is said of grief for the infamous abuse of what he intended for the more humane punishment of the guilty.

GUISCARD, Robert, a famous Norman knight, son of Tancred Hauteville, of Coutances, assisted in the conquest of Naples and Sicily, from the Saracens. He obtained the dukedom of Apulia and Calabria, and took prisoner pope Gregory VII. who died a captive under his care. His daughter married Constantine, son of the emperor Michael Ducas, for which elevation he is censured by the invidious Anna Comena. He died 1085, in the island of Corfu.

GUISCARD, Charles, a Prussian officer of distinction, author of "Military Memoirs of the Greeks and Romans" a valuable work. He wrote besides Memoires Critiques & Historiques sur Plusieurs Points d'Antiquités Militaires, 4 vols. 8vo. &c. As a soldier, he served with reputation under the Dutch, and under Frederic II. of Prussia, who called him Quintus Icilius, and gave him a regiment. He died 1775, aged 33.

GUISE, Claude de Lorraine, duke of, fifth son of duke René II. of Lorraine, settled in France and became the founder of the family of Guise there. At the battle of Marignan he displayed such valor, that he received more than 20 wounds. He married Antoinette de Bourbon of the blood royal, in 1513, and died 1550.

GUISE, Francis duke of, son of the preceding, was a man of great talents, and extensive influence in France. In him began the factions of Condé and Guise. He was at the head of the Catholic party, and was a most furious bigot. He died by a pistol shot from the hand of Poltrot de Meré, a protestant gentleman 1563, aged 44.

GUISE, Henry, duke of, eldest son of Francis, was born in 1550. Brave and gallant as a soldier, he was turbulent, imperious, factious, and violent, as a subject, and at the head of that party which were called the league, and formed by the intrigues of his brother the cardinal, under pretence of supporting the catholic religion and the state, he long overawed the king, Henry III. and prevented his appearance at Paris. After massacring the Huguenots, and filling the streets of Paris with blood, on the famous day called the day of Barricades, Guise considered his success secure, but Henry escaped his guards and fled to Blois where he called an assembly of the states. Guise appeared there, but a forced reconciliation with the king was followed by the assassination of the demagogue, 23d Dec. 1588, and on the morrow the cardinal shared the fate of his brother.

GUISE, Charles duke of, eldest son of Henry, was arrested on his father's murder and confined in the castle of Tours, from which he escaped 1592. His partizans received him with open arms, but he afterwards had the good sense to be reconciled to the king, and might have lived in security, had not Richelieu's jealousy of him driven him from the kingdom. He fled to Italy, and died at Cuna 1640, aged 69.

GUISE, Lewis de Lorraine, cardinal of, son of Henry, was illustrious as well in arms as in the arts of peace. He was with Lewis XIII. in Poitou, where he greatly signalized himself. He died at Saintes 1621.

GUISE, Henry of Lorraine, duke of, grandson of Henry, was remarkable for his intrigues with the duke of Bouillon, and the court of Soissons, which obliged him to fly from France to Rome. During his exile, the revolt of the Neapolitans from the Spanish power, called him into the field, but while flushed with victory he regarded the crown of Naples already within his reach, he was taken prisoner at Abruzzo and carried to Spain. After four years' imprisonment he was liberated. He died 1664, aged 50, author of Memoirs of his Neapolitan Enterprize, which appeared in one vol. 4to. after his death.

GUISE, William, an English divine, born at Ab-lond's court, near Gloucester 1653. He entered at Oriel college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and he applied himself with indefatigable zeal to the study of oriental literature, and published a translation with a valuable commentary of "Misa Pars Ordinis Primi Zeraim Tituli Septem." His learning was highly esteemed both at home and abroad. He died of the small pox 1638, and was buried at St. Michael's Oxford, where he had long resided, and where his wife erected a monument to his memory. His son was general Guise of military memory.

GUITTON, d'Arezzo, an early Italian poet, some of whose productions are to be found in the Florence collection of ancient Italian poets 1527, in 8vo. He flourished in the middle of the 13th century.

GUITTON, John, a native of Rochelle, mayor of the town when it was besieged by Richelieu. He always had a dagger on the table, to stab the first man who talked of surrendering, and when told that many perished by famine, he said, it matters little if one only is left to shut the gates.

GULDENSTAEDT, John Antony, a famous traveller, born at Riga. He visited during an absence of three years, Astracan, Caucasus, Georgia, Tartary, and the neighbouring places, with the eyes of a politician and philosopher. His performances are enumerated by Coxe. He was honorably invited to Petersburg, where he became professor of languages, and where he died of a fever, 1781.

GUNDLING, Nicolas Jerome, a native of Nuremberg, professor of eloquence, civil law, and philosophy at Halle, on which subjects he wrote some valuable works. His reputation for sagacity and knowledge was such that he was often consulted at Berlin by the court. His "Course of Philosophy," "of Literary History," and his History of moral Philosophy, are much esteemed. He died rector of Halle 1720.

GUNNERUS, John Ernest, a native of Christiana, made bishop of Drontheim 1758. He died at Christianfund 1773, aged 55. He was well skilled in botany, and published Flora Norwegiae, &c. He founded, for the encouragement of natural history, the royal Norwegian society at Drontheim. Linnæus, in compliment ment to his merit, gave the name of Gunnera to a plant.

GUNNING, Peter, an English prelate, born at Hoo in Kent, 1613, and educated at Canterbury school, and Clare hall, Cambridge. He became fellow and tutor of his college, and distinguished himself as a preacher, but he exposed himself to the persecution of the parliament, on account of his zeal for the king's service; and when ejected, he returned to Oxford. Here he was made chaplain of New college, and afterwards became tutor to lord Hatton, and sir Francis Compton, and chaplain to sir Robert Shirley, at whose death he obtained the chapel of Exeter-house, Strand. At the restoration, his services and sufferings were rewarded; he was created D. D. by the king's mandate, and then advanced to a prebend of Canterbury, and successively to the headships of Corpus Christi and St. John's college, Cambridge. He was one of the committee for the review of the liturgy, and he had a conference with the dissenters at the Savoy, in 1661. In 1669, he was made bishop of Chichester, and in 1674, he was translated to Ely, where he died, 6th July 1684, a bachelor. He was buried in his cathedral. Opinions have varied with respect to his character, but it must be confessed, that, though some question, whether his head was as good as his heart, he was distinguished by erudition, piety, and exemplary manners. His charities to public uses were great and numerous.

GUNTER, Edmund, a mathematician, of Welch extraction, born at Gunter's town, Brecknockshire, 1581. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and entered at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and was ordained. His genius led him to mathematical pursuits, and by the new projection of a sector, he acquired celebrity, and was in 1619, honorably appointed astronomy professor at Gresham college 1619. In this appointment he directed all the powers of his mind in the improvement of science. He invented a portable quadrant, observed a new variation in the magnetic needle, and contrived that valuable rule of proportion, the line of numbers, called from him, Gunter's scale. His merits gained him not only the friendship of the learned, of Oughtred, Henry Briggs, and others, but the patronage of the earl of Bridgewater, and the notice of his sovereign Charles I. This excellent philosopher was carried off in the prime of life, 10th Dec. 1626. He was buried in St. Peter's the poor, Broad-street, where no monument records the name of a mathematician, whose services to science and to mankind are so great. The fifth edition of his works was published by Leybourn, 1674, in 4to.

GUNTHER, a German poet in the beginning of the 18th century, whose superior genius proved his destruction. As he was going to be presented to Augustus II. king of Poland, a rival poet mixed some poisonous drugs in his drink, in consequence of which the unhappy man, as he was addressing the monarch, fell down, and he expired soon after, in his 28th year. He wrote some elegant poetry, an Ode on Eugene's victory over the Turks, &c.

GURTLE, Nicolas, a native of Basil, who died 1527, aged 53. He wrote a Greek, German, and French Lexicon — Historia Templariorum — Origines Mundi Institutiones Theologicae.

GUSMAN, Lewis, a Spanish jesuit, author of the history of his fraternity in the Indies, and the success of their missions in Japan, 14 books. He died at Madrid 1605, provincial of Seville and Toledo.

GUSSANVILLAN, Peter, a native of Chartres. He edited the works of Gregory the Great, the best, before the Benedictine edition.

GUSTAVUS, king of Sweden, was son of Eric, duke of Gripsholm, is known by the name of Gustavus Vasa. He was born 1490. After the reduction of Sweden by Christian II. king of Denmark, Gustavus was kept a prisoner in the capital of the conqueror; but after many years of captivity, he escaped, and appeared among the Dalecarlians, whom he engaged to revolt. A great boldness of character, and an ardent love of military glory, together with capacious resources of mind, had calculated him for a leader in times of danger and difficulty. The conduct of the Danes, who had murdered his father and other Swedish nobles, roused him to revenge. He re-took Upsal; and though occasionally defeated, he acquired fresh vigor from disasters; and animated to desperation by the cruelties of Christian, who put his mother and his sister to death, by shocking tortures, he over-ran Gothland, and besieged Stockholm. The states of the kingdom were convened, and Gustavus was offered that kingdom, which his valor had recovered, and by his influence the crown was declared hereditary in his male issue. Invasion from abroad ceased, by the expulsion of the Danish monarch from the throne, and the succession of Frederic, duke of Holstein; and Gustavus, secure in the love of his subjects, cultivated all the arts of peace and commerce, and made the Lutheran tenets the established religion of his country. This great and heroic monarch, died at Stockholm 1560, in his 70th year, and was succeeded by his son Eric.

GUSTAVUS, Adolphus, deservedly surnamed the Great, was born at Stockholm 1594. In 1611 he ascended the throne of Sweden, and though so young he evinced the sagacity of a great character in the choice of able ministers. He was fond of military glory, and soon acquired renown in his battles against the Danes, Muscovites, and Poles. By his heroic valor and judicious conduct, he made an honorable peace with the two first, and obliged the last to evacuate Livonia, and then forming an alliance with the protestants of Germany, he over-ran in two years and a half all the countries between the Vistula, the Rhine, and the Danube. The imperial general Tilly was twice defeated; and the pride of Austria was humbled, but the battle in the plains of Lutzen proved fatal to the life of the brave monarch, 1632. He fell it is said by the treacherous intrigues of Richelieu, or by the hand of Lawemburgh, one of his generals who had been dishonorably bribed by the emperor Ferdinand to take away his life. This warlike monarch possessed those virtues which in a reign of peace might have equally distinguished him. He patronized literature, he enriched the university of Upsal by his munificent donations, he founded the royal academy of Abo, and the university of Dorp, in Livonia. Before his time the Swedes were indifferent soldiers, but such was the enthusiasm which he inspired among his subjects, that he had always an army of 80,000 men well disciplined. He has been with some justice compared to the great Scipio, and the parallel in some particulars ticulars is striking. He was succeeded by his only child, the celebrated Christina, who succeeded though only five years old.

GUSTAVUS III. king of Sweden, son of Frederic Adolphus, by Louisa Ulrica, the sister of Frederic II. king of Prussia, was born 24th Jan 1746, and succeeded to his father 1771. Disgusted with the influence of Russia at Stockholm, and with the usurpation of his senators who wished to abridge his liberty, and not only to appoint him a confessor, but to settle even how much wine he might be permitted to have on his table; he secretly formed the plan of a revolution, which was effected without bloodshed in 1772. The senate surrounded by the guards surrendered its authority, and the friends of Gustavus were afterwards distinguished by wearing a white handkerchief on the left arm, which was the signal of mutual attachment during the revolution. The wisest regulations followed this change of government, a new translation of the bible was made, torture was abolished, commerce, the arts and the sciences were liberally encouraged, agriculture and industry patronized, and the laws were administered with greater dispatch and more impartiality. To put an end to the disputes which prevailed with Russia, he in 1777 paid a visit to Catherine at Petersburg, and was received with magnificent hospitality, and in 1783 he spent 10 months in travelling over Italy and France, not only to improve his health, but to observe the manners, the political regulations, and the industrious exertions of foreign countries. The peace with Russia was disturbed in 1788, by the emissaries of Catherine, who wished to excite disturbances in Finland, and Gustavus declared war, and equipped a formidable fleet at Carlscrona. Though he had to contend with Denmark and Russia, he, encouraged by assurances of support from Turkey and Prussia, boldly attacked Frederickshamn, where he destroyed several vessels, but he was repulsed in his attempt against Revel, and obliged to retreat. The attempt on Wyburg was equally unsuccessful, but a splendid victory was obtained July 9th 1790, by the monarch over the Russian fleet, who took and destroyed 45 ships, and peace soon after was restored between the two countries. The abilities which Gustavus had displayed made him ambitious of acquiring greater glory in war, and therefore on the breaking out of the French revolution he zealously engaged in the coalition which Spain formed with the Northern powers for the invasion of France. But during the preparations for this distant war, the life of the monarch was cruelly sacrificed by the hand of an assassin. The Swedish nobles dissatisfied with the events of the revolution of 1772, and with the changes which had been introduced into the government at the diet of Gesse in 1792, conspired against his life, and three of them drew lots who should give the fatal blow. Ankarstroom a disbanded officer who had received favors from the monarch was the assassin, and during a mask ball in which the unfortunate king had been warned of his danger, the fatal blow was given by the discharge of a pistol. This was in the night of the 15th April, 1792, and the king languished till the 29th of the same month, and expired in great agony, maintaining to the last the firmness and serenity of a heroic mind. He took an affectionate farewell of his son and of his friends, and appointed his brother the duke of Sudermania the regent of the minority. Gustavus possessed an enlightened mind, and as his education had been under the care of count Tessin, he imbibed a strong partiality for literature and for noble achievements. He wrote some dramatic pieces, academical discourses, and an eulogy on Torstenfon, which was secretly conveyed to the academy of Stockholm, and obtained the prize.

GUTHRIES, James, a French advocate, known as an able antiquarian and correct writer. He died 1638.

GUTHRIE, William, was born at Breichen, Angus-shire, 1701, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen. A love affair drove him to London, where he wrote for the bookfellers, and died 1769. He was a justice of Middlesex, but did not act. His works were, History of England, 3 vols. folio. — a Geographical Grammar, in 8vo. and 4to. He lent his name to "History of Scotland," 10 vols. — to "Universal History," 12 vols. — and a "Peerage," 4to.

GUTTENBERG, John, a German, born at Mentz 1408, of a noble family. He disputes with Faust, Schœffer, and others, the honor of inventing printing. Bowyer says, Laurentius of Haerlem is the real inventor, and that his types were stolen by a brother of Guttenberg. Guttenberg, however, claims the merit of regularly printing a book, and of inventing cut metal types, with which the earliest editions of the bible were printed. He died at Mentz, 1468.

GUY, Thomas, son of a lighterman and coal dealer of the same name, in Horsley-down, Southwark, was apprenticed in 1660 to a bookfeller, and began trade with about 200l. stock, in the house which forms the angle between Cornhill and Lombard-street. He engaged with others in a scheme to print bibles in Holland to import into England; but when that was prohibited, he contracted with the university of Oxford for their privilege, and by this lucrative connection, he began to amass a large fortune. His property, however, was immensely increased by purchasing seamen's tickets and south-sea stock in the year 1720. It was his intention to marry his maid-servant, and to adorn the avenues of his house, on this occasion, he had the pavement before his door mended. A broken piece was observed in his absence by the maid-servant, and she desired the workmen to repair it, and when they said they were not to go so far, she, presuming on the partiality of the old man, required them to mend it, and to tell her master not to be angry, as she had directed it. The pavement was mended, but Guy was offended at the presumption of his intended bride, he determined never to marry her, but to apply his riches to charitable purposes. After being a great benefactor to St. Thomas' hospital, he at the age of 76 formed the noble design of erecting that stately pile which bears the name of Guy's hospital. The erection cost him 18,793l. and 219,499l. were left by him for its endowment, and he had the satisfaction to see the building roofed in before his death, which happened 17th Dec. 1724, in his 81st year. He also founded an alms house at Tamworth, which he represented in parliament, and which was his mother's native place, and he also gave 400l. a year to Christ's hospital, and left 80,000l. to his relations. This most extraordinary, and very benevolent man, who left more to charitable uses, uses than any private man on record, was in his habits very parsimonious. He dined on his shop counter with an old newspaper for his table cloth, without dainties, and his dress and appearance were so mean that in some instances the alms of the humane were pressed upon him as upon an indigent and half starved beggar.

GUY, a monk of Arezzo, known as a musician, and as the first who produced a delightful harmony from several different voices singing together. He also invented the six syllables of the gamut, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. His inventions were received with applause by the world. He lived about the year 1026.

GUYARD, de Berville, a French author of some merit. He was born at Bans 1697, and after suffering, like Otway and Chatterton, all the evils of pinching poverty and accumulated distress, he died in the prison of Bicetre at the age of 73. He wrote the lives of Bertrand, of du Guesclin, of the chevalier Bayard, &c.

GUYARD, Anthony, a benedictine monk, author of Political Observations on the Administration of Benefices, &c. He died at Dijon 1770.

GUYET, Francis, an eminent critic, born at Angers 1575. He lost his parents in his infancy, but, though his property was squandered by the negligence of his guardian, he devoted himself assiduously to letters, and went to Paris, where he had the happiness to be introduced to the society of the two du Puys, Thuanus, and other learned men. In 1608 he visited Rome, and acquired a perfect knowledge of Italian. After his return through Germany to Paris, he became tutor in the house of the duke d'Epemon to the abbot de Granselve, afterwards cardinal de la Valette. In this office he conducted himself with such judgment and prudence, that he gained the confidence of his patrons, and might have risen to eminence in the church, had he not preferred the retirement of Burgundy college to the splendor of a palace. He employed himself here in a work to prove that the Latin is derived from the Greek, and that all the primitive words of the Greek are but of one syllable. Though learned, he published nothing, but his criticisms afterwards appeared very valuable in the hands of his friends, especially those on Hesiod, published by Grævius, and those on Terence by Bocclerus. As a critic, however, he was severe, and he scrupled not to erase many verses in Virgil, and to reject the first ode in Horace, and the secret history of Procopius. Thus respected for his erudition, and for the virtues of private life, this good man died of a catarrh after three days' illness in the arms of his friends J. du Puy, and Menage, 12th April 1655, aged 80. His life, in Latin, was published by Portner.

GUYON, Johanna Mary Bouviers de la Mothe, a French lady of a noble family, born at Montargis, 1648, famous for her writings. She wished to take the veil, but her friends made her marry, and she became, at the age of 28, a widow. Abandoning the care of her family, she devoted herself to the mysteries of quietism, which Michael de Molinos, a Spanish jesuit at Rome, had imposed upon the credulity of the world. Wavering in her opinions, and inconstant in her temper, she, however, endured persecution for her tenets, and when she declared herself the pregnant woman mentioned in the apocalypse, and threatened the peace of the kingdom by the number of her followers, she was imprisoned in the bastille by order of the king. Fenelon undertook her defence, but his enemy Bossuet had the art to procure the condemnation of his works on the subject. Her verses, after her death, which happened at Blois 1717, were published in 5 vols. and also some of her Mystical Reveries.

GUYON, Claude, a French historian, born at Franche Comté. He died at Paris 1771. Besides his "Ecclesiastical History," a very valuable book, he wrote "History of the Indies — of the Amazons — and a continuation of Echard's Roman History.

GUYS, Peter Augustin, a native of Marseilles, eminent as a merchant, and as a man of letters. He travelled over various parts of the east, with the eye of a philosopher and an antiquarian, and published the result of his researches, in which he compared the different characters of the ancient and of the modern inhabitants of those classical countries. He died at Zante in the Ionian sea, in 1799, aged 79. His works are Essay on the Antiquities of Marseilles, 8vo. — Voyage Literaire de la Grece, 4 vols. 8vo. 1783, — a Voyage in Italy and in the North, 8vo. &c.

GUYSE, John, a native of Hereford, who became a dissenting minister there, and in 1727 removed to New Broad-street independent congregation, London. He was made D. D. by the university of Aberdeen 1732, and though blind for some years before his death, he nevertheless continued his pastoral functions. He died 1761, aged 81. He wrote a Paraphrase of the New Testament, 3 vols. 4to. — the Standard Use of Scripture in the Purposes of Divine Revelation, 8vo. — Jesus Christ God-Man, &c. in several sermons — the Holy Spirit in sermons — Youth's Monitor in 10 sermons to young persons, 12mo.

GWYNN, Eleanor, better known by the name of Nell, was famous in the history of courtezans, as she rose, from an orange girl of the meanest description in the play-house, to be the mistress of Charles II. In the first career of life she gained her bread by singing from tavern to tavern for the amusement of the guests, and gradually advanced to the rank of a popular actress, at the theatre royal. She is represented as handsome but low of stature. She was mistress successively to Hart, Lacy, and Buckhurst, before she was admitted to the arms of the licentious Charles. It is said that in her elevation she showed her gratitude to Dryden, who had patronized her poverty, and she was, unlike the other concubines, faithful to her royal lover. From her are sprung the dukes of St. Alban's. She died 1687.

GWYNNE, Matthew, an English physician, born in London, of an ancient Welch family. He was educated at Oxford, where in 1593, he took his degree of M. D. He went in 1595, as physician to sir Henry Unton, queen Elizabeth's ambassador to France. He obtained great reputation by his practice, as well as by his writings, which modern discoveries have rendered now of little value. He died after 1639, though what year is uncertain.

GYLIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian general, sent to assist Syracuse against the Athenians, B. C. 414. He was banished for embezzling the booty which he had obtained.

GYZEN, Peter, a landscape painter, disciple to John Breughel, born at Antwerp, about 1636. His views on the Rhine are much admired.

HAANSBERGEN, John Van, a painter of Utrecht, who died 1705 aged 63. The figures which he introduced into his landscapes were much admired. He was pupil to Cornelius Poelemborg.

HAAS, William, a printer and type-founder, born at Basil, and eminent for his ingenious inventions. He was in the first part of life engaged in the military affairs of his country, and he established a school in which a new system of artillery was practised and recommended with great success. He afterwards devoted his time to printing, and was the first who engraved a French type in the style of Baskerville. He invented a new printing press, and introduced a new method of printing geographical charts with moveable characters. He died at St. Urban monastery in Lucerne, June 1800 aged 59. Many of his papers are preserved in the economical society of Basil.

HABAKKUK, the eighth of the minor prophets, supposed to be of the tribe of Simeon. He prophesied in the reign of Jehoiakim, and chose to remain among the ruins of his desolated country, rather than follow his people into captivity. His style is highly poetical, beautiful and sublime.

HABERT, Francis, a native of Berry, one of the most ancient poets of France. He wrote some fables, besides Les Trois Nouvelles Deesses, &c., and died about 1569.

HABERT DE CERISI, Germain, an ecclesiastic of Bayeux, who wrote some poems. He defended the Cid of Corneille against the censures of Richelieu and of the academy, and died at Paris 1655.

HABERT, Henry Lewis, a member of the French academy, the friend of Gassendi, and the publisher of his works with an elegant Latin preface. He wrote some epigrams and other poetical pieces, and died 1679.

HABICOT, Nicolas, a surgeon, born at Bonay in Gatinois. He was eminent in his profession, and wrote a treatise on the plague. He died 1624.

HABINGTON, William, an English writer, born at Hendlip, Worcesterhire 1605. As a catholic, he was educated at St. Omer's and Paris, but he refused to embrace the order of the Jesuits, and returned to England. He died 30th Nov. 1654. He wrote the Queen of Arragon,—Observations on the History of Edward IV.—and some poems.

HACHETTE, Jane, a heroine of Beauvais in Picardy, who successfully headed a body of women in an assault against the Bourguignons who besieged her native place 1472. In commemoration of her intrepid conduct, an annual procession takes place at Beauvais on the 10th July, in which the women march at the head of the men.

HACKAERT, John, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam 1635. The mountainous scenery in his landscapes is much admired.

HACKET, William, a fanatic in the reign of Elizabeth. After being a gentleman's servant, he married a rich widow, and when reduced to indigence by debauchery and extravagance, he became a highwayman, and then all at once aspired to the name of prophet. He was joined in his imposture by Coppinger and Arthington, men of some learning, and after imposing upon the credulity of the people of York and Lincoln, he came to London, as inspired by the holy ghost. He proclaimed that Jesus was come to judge the world, and his associates announced him by the words of "behold the king of the earth." The cabals which he raised called for the interference of government. He was tried and executed 28th July 1592. His blasphemies on the scaffold were most horrid, and evinced not only a mad enthusiast, but a most diabolical heart. Of his associates Coppinger died in prison, and Arthington upon his recantation was pardoned.

HACKET, John, an English prelate, born in London 1st Sept. 1592. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. His great merit recommended him to bishop Andrews, and to Williams bishop of Lincoln, to whom he became chaplain, and afterwards to James I. He took his degree of D. D. 1628, and was promoted to a prebend in Lincoln, and the rectory of Cheam in Surrey, and St. Andrew's, Holborn. The troubles of the times not only prevented his further advancement, but subjected him to persecution, though he concealed himself in retirement at Cheam. At the restoration he refused the bishopric of Gloucester, but soon after accepted that of Lichfield and Coventry. With great munificence he began the repairs of his cathedral, which had been nearly demolished by the civil wars, and after eight years' labor, and the expence of 20,000l. nearly all his own, he completed the building in a splendid and most elegant manner. He was equally liberal in his benefactions to Trinity college Cambridge, and other foundations. He died at Lichfield, Oct. 21, 1670, and was buried in his cathedral. He was twice married, and had children by both his wives. His son Sir Andrew, master in chancery, erected a monument over him. He wrote "Loyola" a comedy, twice acted before James I.: besides sermons, and a life of his great patron bishop Williams, &c. He was highly respected for learning, for piety, and every exemplary virtue.

HACKSPAN, Theodore, a Lutheran minister, first professor at Altorf, well skilled in oriental literature. His books on theological subjects were much esteemed in Germany. He died 1659.

HADDICK, N. count of, an Austrian general during the seven years' war. He also distinguished himself against the Turks in 1789, and died the next year aged 80.

HADDOCK, Sir Richard, a valiant admiral who distinguished tinguished himself on various occasions under Charles II. and his successors, and died, very old, 1714.

HADDON, Walter, an eminent English scholar, born in Buckinghamshire 1516, and educated at Eton school and King's college, Cambridge. He took his doctor's degree in civil law, of which he became professor. In Edward's reign he was a zealous promoter of the reformation, and for his services he was made master of Trinity hall, Cambridge, in the room of Gardiner, and afterwards, though not qualified, made president of Magdalen college, Oxford; but in Mary's reign he resigned his honors to avoid the disgrace of expulsion, and lived in concealment. The accession of Elizabeth restored him to public notice; he was made master of the court of requests, judge of the prerogative court, and one of the commissioners who visited Cambridge. In 1566 he was employed at Bruges to settle the commercial intercourse between England and the Netherlands. He died Jan. 1571-2, and was buried in Christ church, London. The chief writings of this pious, learned, and polite character, were "Lucubrationes," containing latin orations, letters, &c.—a defence of queen Elizabeth against Osorio, &c.—poems. He assisted also sir John Cheke in the compilation of the ecclesiastical law, called Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum. 4to.

HADRIAN, vid. ADRIAN.

HAEN, Antony de, privy councillor and physician to the empress Maria Theresa, was author of "ratio mendendi," 17 vols. 8vo.—and a treatise on magic. He died 1776.

HAERLEM, Theodore Van, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem. His Christ and his Apostles in the church of Utrecht are much admired. He died 1470 aged 60.

HAGEDORN, a German poet of the 18th century. His works, which are chiefly in imitation of Fontaine, display genius, vivacity, and great delicacy.

HAGEN, John Van, a landscape painter, born in Cleves. His pieces were much admired. He died at the end of the 17th century.

HAGGAI, the tenth of the minor prophets, lived in the reign of Darius Hytaspes. He was of the sacerdotal race; and according to Epiphanius was buried among the priests of Jerusalem.

HAGUENIER, John, a French poet born in Burgundy. He died 1738. His pieces are on light subjects, but possess great wit and elegance.

HAGUENOT, Henry, author of a treatise de morbis externis capitis, 12mo.—otia physiologica—memoirs addressed to the academy of sciences, &c.—was a physician of Montpellier, who died 1776.

HAHN, Simon Frederic, author of the "history of the empire," and of "collectio monumentorum veter. & recent." 2 vols. 8vo.—was a very extraordinary character. At the age of 10 he knew several languages, and at 24 he was professor of history at Helmstadt. He was historiographer to the elector of Hanover, and died 1729 aged 37.

HAILLAN, Bernard de Girard, lord of, a French historian, born at Bourdeaux about 1535. He first appeared before the public as a poet, in his piece called "the union of the princes," and afterwards as the translator of Eutropius, of Tully's offices, and Æmylius Probus. In 1574 he was named historiographer of France, in consequence of his valuable book on the state and success of the affairs of France. In 1576 appeared his history from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. the first history of France written in French. He did not continue this popular work beyond that time, though he promised it to Henry IV., as he considered himself too near the periods of which he was to treat, afraid that the sober truths of history might give offence. A continuation was added by the booksellers, as far as 1627. He died at Paris, Nov. 23, 1610. He was originally a calvinist, but it is said he changed his religious opinions to please the court where he was flattered and admired. Though accurate and impartial as an historian, he seems fond of displaying his title to the approbation of his country, by the style of his dedications and of his prefaces. He was at one time secretary to the embassy in England in 1556 and 1557.

HAINES, Joseph, better known by the name of count Haines, was a comedian of wit and great facetiousness. He was obscurely born, but the liberal subscription of a few friends, enabled him to enter at Queen's college Oxford, where his talents and manners gained him the friendship of sir Joseph Williamson, afterwards secretary of state, and minister at Ryfwick congress. He attended his friend as Latin secretary, but he betrayed the state secrets with which he was confidentially entrusted, and thus incapable of this office, he was recommended to Cambridge, which all at once he quitted to join a company of strolling players at Stirbridge fair. He gradually rose to some consequence, and was engaged at Drury lane, where his education, his wit, and his agreeable conversation made him the friend and the associate of the great and the opulent. He went afterwards as companion to the English ambassador to France, and on his return again appeared on the stage. He died of a fever, after a few days' illness, in Hart street, Long-acre, and was buried in St. Paul's church yard, Covent-garden.

HAKEM, the third of the Fatamite caliphs, was a violent persecutor of the Christians and Jews. He pretended to be the visible image of God. He was assassinated by the intrigues of his sister 1021.

HAKEWILL, George, an able divine, born 1579 at Exeter, son of a merchant. He entered at St. Alban's hall, and was elected fellow of Exeter college, Oxford. He was in 1616 made archdeacon of Surrey, and as chaplain to Charles prince of Wales, he might have risen to higher honors in the church, had he not written to oppose the union of his master with the infant of Spain. The king resented the remarks of the chaplain, and he was for some time imprisoned, and dismissed from about the prince's person. He was afterwards chosen rector of Exeter college, but the rage of civil war drove him to his rectory of Heanton near Barnstaple, where he died 1649. Of his works the best known is his "apology or declaration of the power and providence of God in the government of the world, proving that it doth not decay," &c. in four books, 1627, with two additional books in an edition, folio 1635.

HAKEWILL, John, brother to the preceding, was mayor of Exeter 1632. Another brother, William, was of Exeter college, and afterwards of Lincoln's inn, and as he espoused warmly the party of the puritans, he published published among other things, "the liberty of the subject against the power of impositions," &c. 4to.

HAKLUYT, Richard, a native of Eyton, Herefordshire, educated at Westminster school and Christ church Oxford. He took orders, and obtained the living of Wetheringset in Suffolk, and a prebend in Bristol cathedral, and afterwards at Westminster. He died 23d Nov. 1616 aged 61. He was not only an able divine but a learned cosmographer; and his collection of voyages in 3 vols. folio, is deservedly admired as a valuable performance. In honor of his services to geography, a promontory on the coast of Greenland was called by his name, by captain Hudson in 1608. His son was a student of Trinity college, Cambridge.

HALDE, John Baptiste du, a learned Jesuit, born at Paris 1674. He is the author of a valuable work, "grande description de la Chine & de la Tartarie," 4 vols. folio; compiled from the curious and interesting observations of the missionaries of his fraternity. He collected also after father Gobien, "lettres edifiantes," in 18 vols.: besides Latin poems and orations. He died 1743.

HALE, sir Matthew, a learned lawyer, born at Aldersly in Gloucestershire, 1st Nov. 1600. He was educated at Wootton-under-Edge, under the puritanical vicar of the parish, and in 1626 entered at Magdalen hall Oxford, and three years after began to study the law at Lincoln's inn. Parting after distinction he now bid adieu to the follies and levities of youth, and of idle company, and devoting daily 16 hours to study, he enriched the resources of his mind with all the treasures of law, of philosophy, of science, and of divinity. When called to the bar, the integrity of his conduct recommended him to the public notice, not less than his superior abilities; and in those times of civil discord, he became the friend of royalists and of republicans by not mixing with faction. His extensive knowledge of the law was called into action in the defence of Stafford, of Laud, and even of Charles himself; but though the advocate of royalty, he refused not to take the covenant, and to appear as one of the commissioners who treated with the king's officers about the reduction of Oxford. Though the death of Charles shocked his feelings, he however yielded to the strong invitations of Cromwell, who knew his merits, and he accepted under him the office of one of the judges of the Common-bench. Scruples however soon arose, and after going two or three circuits, he refused to act as judge on the crown side; and when on the death of the protector, higher powers were offered him under his son Richard, he boldly rejected the new dignity, and refused to wear mourning. At the restoration he was marked out for the highest distinction as chief baron of the exchequer; and Clarendon in investing him with his office, declared that he knew no one more honest or more fit to preside in that court. For eleven years he endeared himself to the nation as an impartial judge, generous, diligent, and humane; and in 1671 he was promoted to the office of chief justice of England, where he displayed the same integrity, the same zeal, and the same unbiassed patient attention. Four years after, a sudden inflammation in the midriff produced an asthma and a rapid dropy, which proved fatal 25th Dec. 1676. He was twice married, and by his first wife had ten children. He left his valuable MSS. to Lincoln's inn society. This great man eminent not less for his learning, piety, and private virtues, than for his uprightness as a judge, wrote several valuable works on subjects of law, philosophy, and divinity; the best known of which are, the primitive origination of mankind considered and explained according to the light of nature, &c. folio—the history of the pleas of the crown, folio—the original institution, power, and jurisdiction of parliaments—contemplations moral and divine, 3 vols. 8vo.—judgment of the nature of true religion, its corruption, &c.—difficiles nugæ, &c.—essay on the gravitation, &c. of fluid bodies, &c.

HALES, John, called the ever-memorable, was born at Bath, 1584, and educated at Corpus Christi college Oxford. In 1605 he was chosen fellow of Merton; in 1612 made Greek professor of the university, and the next year admitted fellow of Eton college. In 1618 he went as chaplain with sir Dudley Carleton, the English ambassador to the Hague, and was present at the synod of Dordt, of the proceedings of which he wrote to his patron an impartial account, published in his golden remains. In 1638 he was by the friendship of Laud, made canon of Windsor, but the disorders of the times did not permit him to enjoy long these honors, and when he refused to take the engagement, he was stripped of his Eton fellowship, and of his other preferments, and reduced to the greatest distress, which he bore with christian fortitude. He died 19th May 1656, and was buried in Eton college church yard. This worthy man, so much admired for his wit, his learning, and his politeness, wrote several works which appeared after his death in 3 vols. 12mo. or 8vo.

HALES, Stephen, a native of Kent, educated at Bennet's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow 1703. He early devoted the great powers of his mind to botany, and experimental philosophy, and was the ingenious inventor of a machine which displayed the various motions of the heavens similar to a modern orrery. His learning and virtues recommended him to the great and the powerful; he enjoyed the esteem of Frederic prince of Wales, and was almoner to the princess, but satisfied with the rectory of Teddington near Hampton Court, he disregarded the higher preferments which the partiality and influence of friends might have procured. He died after a few days illness, 4th Jan. 1761 aged 84 universally respected. He published in 1741 his invention of ventilators; and wrote besides four volumes of statistical essays, &c. and contributed some valuable papers to the philosophical transactions.

HALI-BEIGH, a native of Poland. His original name was Bobowiki. He was when very young sold by the Tartars to the Turks, and educated in their religion. He was acquainted with 17 languages, and became dragoman or interpreter to the grand signior. He translated the English catechism into the Turkish language, and also the bible. His chief work is a treatise on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, &c. published in Latin by Thomas Smith, Oxford 1691. He had formed the design of returning to the Christian faith, when he died 1675.

HALKET, Lady Anna, was born in London 1622, and married 1656 sir James Halket, by whom she had four children. Her father Robert Murray was preceptor to Charles I. before he ascended the throne. She died 1699, and from her MSS. was selected a volume of meditations, printed at Edinburgh 1701.

HALL, Joseph, an eminent divine, born July 1st 1574, at Bristow park, Leicestershire. He entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and he distinguished himself in the university by his wit and learning. His "Virgidemiarum" or satires, in six books, appeared in 1597, and were again edited at Oxford 1753. The friendship of sir Robert Drury gave him the living of Hawstead, Suffolk, where he married, but in consequence of some dispute with his patron he resigned it, and was soon after presented by lord Denny to the donative of Waltham Holy Cross, Essex. Though he remained in possession of this preferment 22 years, his income was encreased by a prebend in Wolverhampton collegiate church; and in 1616 by the deanery of Worcester. His learning had recommended him to prince Henry, to whom he was some time tutor, and to the king; and his abilities appeared so respectable, that he was one of the divines sent 1618 to the synod at Dordt, from which however he soon returned in consequence of ill health, though not without the respect and gratitude of that dignified assembly. In 1624 he refused the see of Gloucester, but three years after he accepted that of Exeter, and in Nov. 1641 he was translated to Norwich. The following December however he was sent to the tower by the parliament, with the rest of the bishops who protested against the exclusion of the spiritual peers from the upper house; and though released six months after by giving 5,000l. bail, he was still exposed to the persecution which in those turbulent times, attended the clergy. Stripped of his dignities, and with all his revenues sequestered, he retired with difficulty to the obscurity of a little farm which he rented at Heigham near Norwich, where the last nine years of his life were spent. He died 8th Sept. 1656 aged 82: and as he said in his will that "God's house was not a fit repository for dead bodies," he ordered himself to be buried in the church yard of his parish. To wit, learning, and judgment, this prelate joined the virtues of private life. He was pious, unaffected, and moderate in his religious opinions; and while he wrote against popery, he was equally severe against those who separate from the church from motives of party or innovation. Besides his satires, he wrote—Meditations,—Miscellaneous Letters,—Mundus idem & alter, a satirical piece, &c. His works, says Bayle, abound with fine thoughts, excellent morality, and a great deal of piety; so that he is not improperly called the English Seneca. They were in 5 vols. folio. His meditations on the histories of the Old and New Testament, have been modernized by Mr. Glasie of Hanwell, 4 vols. 12mo.

HALL, John, an English lawyer and poet, born at Durham, Aug. 1627, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, which he left to study the law at Gray's Inn. He was called to the bar, but his celebrity as a political writer recommended him to the parliament, and he was sent to Cromwell to Scotland, but he fell a sacrifice to his licentious intemperance, and died at Durham 1st Aug. 1656. During his short life he gave strong proofs of his genius and abilities by the publication of "Horæ vacivæ or essays"—a translation of Longinus,—some poems, &c.

HALL, Henry, an English divine, born in London 1716. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1738. In 1748 he was appointed librarian at Lambeth by Potter, and he was continued in his office by the next primate, Herring, who rewarded his merit by the rectory of Harbledown, the vicarage of Herne, and the sinecure of Orpington. In 1756 he exchanged Herne for East Peckham, and at the death of his patron in 1757, he resigned the place of librarian, and being appointed treasurer of Wells cathedral, he retired to Harbledown, where he died a bachelor 2d Nov. 1763, after a short illness. This respectable man, beloved as a pastor for his benevolence, meekness, and exemplary conduct, published some occasional sermons, &c.

HALL, John, a surgeon of Maidstone, Kent, who flourished in the reign of Elizabeth. He published a compendium of anatomy and other surgical works, besides hymns with musical notes, 1565.

HALL, Jacob, a rope dancer in the age of Charles II. so graceful in his person, and so pleasing in his address, that he captivated several of the ladies of that licentious period, and especially the duchess of Cleveland, who granted him a pension.

HALL, Richard, an English popish priest, who left England under Elizabeth to avoid the penal laws against his religion. He became divinity professor at Douay, and canon of St. Omer's, and wrote several theological books, especially the history of the troubles of his times, and died 1604.

HALLE, Peter, a French civilian and poet, born at Bayeux in Normandy, 8th Sept. 1611. He was educated at Bayeux and Caen, and by his merit was raised to the office of rhetorical professor in the latter university. His eloquence in the delivery of an oration so pleased Segurier the chancellor, that he presented him with a doctor's cap 1640, and carried him with him to Paris. Here his abilities were displayed to such advantage, that he was offered the headship of five colleges, and was at last appointed poet to the king, and in 1646 reader of the Greek and Latin tongues in the royal college. In 1655 he began as professor of canon law to raise the character of that much neglected science, and by his "canonical institutions," published 1685, and other treatises on law, acquired a high reputation for learning, application and judgment. He published also 1655, a collection of Latin poems, and died Dec. 27, 1689.

HALLE, Antony, a good Latin poet, professor of eloquence at Caen. He published a Latin grammar,—some treatises,—poetry, &c. and died at Paris 1675 aged 83.

HALLE, Claude Guy, director of the Paris academy of painting, was distinguished as a painter, and by his genius adorned several of the churches of the French capital, especially Notre Dame. He died highly respected 1736 aged 85. His son Noel was member of the academy of painting, and obtained the order of St. Michael for his services in reforming and improving the academy of painting at Rome. He died 1781 aged 70.

HALLED, Albert, an eminent Swiss physician, professor of medicine, chemistry, &c. at Gottingen. Scarce inferior to Boerhaave, his abilities adorned the university and raised it to celebrity. Besides medical tracts, such as disputationes anatomicæ, 8 vols. 4to.—disputationes de morbis, 7 vols. 4to.—elementa physiologiæ, 8 vols. 4to. &c. he wrote moral essays, religious pieces, and a few odes much admired in Germany for poetry, elegance, and sublimity. In 1760 he retired to his native city Berne, where, after enjoying the respect of his country as a senator and magistrate, he died 12th Dec. 1777, aged 75. His son, who died 1786, was equally eminent as a scholar and as a man of merit, and wrote biographie littéraire de la Suisse.

HALLEY, Edmund, a celebrated English philosopher, born 29th Oct. 1656, in St. Leonard's parish, Shoreditch. He was educated at St. Paul's school under Gale, and in 1673 became a commoner of Queen's college, Oxford, where he early devoted himself to those astronomical and geometrical studies which have rendered his name immortal. His first attempt was to correct the errors of Tycho Brahe, and to ascertain the place of the fixed stars; but finding that those of the northern hemisphere already engaged the attention of Flamsteed and Hevelius, he set out under the protection of Charles II. and of the East India Company to St. Helena, where he formed a catalogue of those bodies which never appear above the horizon of Greenwich or Dantzick. After two years' residence there, he returned in 1678 to England, and his planisphere was so well received by the learned, that he was honored with the degree of M. A. at Oxford by royal mandamus, and was admitted fellow of the Royal Society. In 1697 he visited Hevelius at Dantzick, at the request of the Royal Society, to adjust the dispute between that great philosopher and Hooke in England, concerning the preference of plain or glass lights in astroscopical instruments. On his return he went upon a tour in company with his school-fellow the learned Nelson, and in his way to Paris, he first observed that remarkable comet which at that time soon engaged the attention of the philosophers of Europe. After finishing his observations on this wandering body in the Paris observatory, with the kind assistance of the great Cassini, he passed to Lyons, and thence to Italy, where, upon his return to England in 1681, he left his friend Nelson. He now settled at Islington, after his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Tooke, the auditor of the exchequer, and devoted himself ardently to his favorite pursuits. In 1683 appeared his theory of the variation of the magnetical compass, and by his acquaintance with the great Newton, whom he visited at Cambridge to consult him on philosophical subjects, he had the opportunity of recommending, by an elegant copy of verses, the principia of the illustrious astronomer which were then first presented to the world. In 1698 he obtained from king William the appointment of a vessel to enable him to improve and to mature his philosophical observations on the variations of the needle, and after proceeding as far as the line, he returned home with the intention of pursuing discoveries in another voyage. The next year with bold zeal in the cause of science, he crossed the Atlantic ocean, and penetrated towards the south pole till the ice stopped his progress, and returning to England in 1700, he published the following year his general chart, showing the variations of the compass in those seas frequented by European navigators. In a third voyage, he examined the course of the tides in the various parts of the English channel, and accurately ascertained the longitude and latitude of each headland, which he published in an elegant chart in 1702. At the request of the emperor of Germany he was sent by queen Anne to examine the coast of Dalmatia, where two convenient harbours were to be formed under his auspices for the reception of the commerce of the Mediterranean. Though the design failed through the jealousy of the Dutch, Halley was honorably treated by the emperor, who presented him with a golden ring from his own finger, as a mark of respect. On his return to England in 1703, he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and honored with the degree of LL. D. In 1713 he was appointed secretary to the Royal Society, which he resigned in 1719, when he succeeded Flamsteed in the Greenwich observatory, and in reward of his services he received by the intercession of queen Caroline, the allowance of half pay as a captain of the navy. This great and good man, who had done so much for science and philosophy, was in 1737 attacked by a paralytic stroke, which gradually weakened his constitution, though it did not totally extinguish the powers of his mind. He expired easily and without a groan, as he sat in his chair, 14th Jan. 1741-2, in his 86th year. Besides the works already mentioned, astronomical tables, and several valuable papers in the philosophical transactions, Dr. Halley, at the request of his friend Aldrich, edited and translated the works of Apollonius.

HALLIFAX, George Saville, marquis of, vid. SAVILLE.

HALLIFAX, Samuel, an English bishop, eldest son of an apothecary at Chesterfield. He was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Trinity hall, where he took the degree of LL. D. 1764. As professor of civil law in the university, he gained great reputation by his "analysis of the civil law." In 1775 he was created D. D. by mandate, and became afterwards chaplain to the king, rector of Worship, Notts, master of the faculties in Doctors' Commons, and master of his college, which he resigned in 1781, when made bishop of Gloucester. In 1787 he was translated to St. Asaph, and died 1790 aged 60. He was a man of great erudition, commanding eloquence, and of amiable manners. His sermons at Warburton's lectures were much admired, and also his judicious analysis of Butler's Analogy. He was for some years Arabic professor at Cambridge.

HALS, Francis, a portrait painter of Mechlin, much admired, and considered inferior only to Vandyck. He died 1666 aged 82.

HALS, Dirk, brother to the above, was also a painter, whose genius led him to the humorous representation of festive and low scenes. He died 1656 aged 67.

HAMBERGER, George Albert, an eminent mathematician of Franconia, author of some valuable works on optics, hydraulics, and other philosophical subjects. He died at Jena 1726.

HAMBERGER, George Christopher, a learned German, of the university of Göttingen. Besides other voluminous works he published Orpheus with the assistance of Gesner. He died 1773 aged 47.

HAMEL, John Baptiste du, a French divine, born 1614, at Vire, in Normandy, and educated at Caen and Paris. At 18 he published a tract on trigonometry with Theodosius' three books on spherics, and the next year he was admitted into the congregation of the oratory, where he continued 10 years, till he became curate of Neuilli on the Marne. In 1666 he was appointed secretary to the newly established academy of sciences, and he afterwards accompanied Colbert de Croissy, the French ambassador, at Aix la Chapelle and in England, where he gained the friendship of Boyle, Ray, and Willis. He returned to France through Holland, and in 1678 published his "philosophia vetus & nova," a valuable work, reprinted in 6 vols. 1681. In 1698 appeared his "Regiæ scientiarum academix historia," 4to in four books, to which two were afterwards added. He also published 1706, Biblia sacra vulgatæ editionis cum selectis notis, &c. besides other theological works. He died 6th Aug. 1706, of old age. To the character of a scholar he united that of a pious and worthy man, esteemed not only by the great and powerful, but by the poor, especially at Neuilli, where his annual visit, after he had quitted the cure, was regarded as a day of festivity.

HAMEL, du Monceau, Henry Lewis du, a native of Paris, inspector of the marine, and eminent for his knowledge of mechanics, agriculture, and commerce. He wrote treatises on trees, naval architecture, agriculture, and other subjects, and died 1782 aged 82.

HAMILCAR BARCAS, the father of Hannibal, was distinguished as a general in Spain, where he founded Barcelona. He fell in battle B. C. 237.

HAMILTON, Patrick, a Scotch divine, related to James V. by whom he was made abbot of Ferne. His further advancement in the church was prevented by his adherence to the tenets of Luther, which so offended the catholic clergy, that at the suggestion of cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, he was tried as a heretic, and condemned to the flames. He endured the cruel sentence with the most astonishing fortitude, 1527, aged only 23. His confession of faith was published by John Frith. He was not only pious, but learned and polite.

HAMILTON, Antony, count, a native of Ireland, of Scotch extraction. He followed the fate of the second Charles, and returned at the restoration, but was banished at the revolution. His genius, vivacity, and wit, rendered him the companion of the great, and the ornament of every society. His works consisted of poems,—fairy tales,—and "Memoirs of the Count de Grammont," which developes the licentious characters of the court of Charles II. He died at St. Germain's 1720, aged 74.

HAMILTON, James, first duke of, son of James marquis of Hamilton, was educated at Oxford, and succeeded to his father's titles, 1625. With a mind ardent after adventures he went in 1631 with an army to the assistance of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and returned the following year. Distinguished at the English court by the favor and good opinion of the monarch, he was named a commissioner to settle the disputes which the presbyterians excited in Scotland on the subject of episcopacy, and for his services he was created duke of Hamilton and earl of Cambridge. After seeing the ruin of his master's armies in England, he still maintained his cause in the north, but the superior power of Cromwell prevailed against him, and he was unfortunately defeated at Preston. Though promised that his life would be spared, the perfidious conqueror still treated him as an enemy and caused him to be tried and to be beheaded, 1649, in his 43d year.

HAMILTON, William, duke of, born in 1616, was secretary of state for Scotland, and exerted himself zealously in the royal cause. He died 1652 of the wounds which he had received at the battle of Worcester, aged 36.

HAMILTON, George, earl of Orkney, was fifth son of lord Selkirk. He distinguished himself at the battle of the Boyne, and on other occasions, for which he was raised to the peerage by William 3d. His valor was equally displayed under Marlborough at Blenheim and Malplaquet. He died 1737.

HAMILTON, William, a poet, born at Bangor, who died 1754, aged 50. His works were printed at Edinburgh, 12mo, 1760.

HAMILTON, sir William, a Scotchman of the noble family of that name, after receiving a liberal education improved his narrow circumstances by his marriage with a lady of fortune 1755. He was sent as ambassador to the Neapolitan court in 1764, and continued in that capacity till the year 1800, during which time he devoted himself ardently to the cultivation of science, and to the improvement of the fine arts. With the eye of a philosopher, and the taste of a man of genius, he visited and examined the wonders of Etna and Vesuvius, and not only collected from their volcanic eruptions the most valuable curiosities, but composed an interesting and admired performance. He also published Campi Phlegrei 2 vols. folio, a curious and splendid work, and encouraged and contributed to the compilation of the Antiquités Étrusques, Grecques & Romaines, edited from his cabinet by D'Hancarville. The philosophical transactions were also enriched by his learned commentaries, and the British Museum can boast of his valuable presents of antiquities and other curious donations. This active antiquarian whose researches were so much applauded by all men of science, was honored with the ribbon of the order of the Bath, while at Naples, and he received from the Sicilian king and his court every mark of attention and respect. Some years after the death of his first wife he married Miss Hart, who survived him. He died in London in May 1803.

HAMLET, prince of Denmark, is immortalized in English literature by the pen of Shakespeare, who drew his materials from the relation of Saxo Grammaticus the Danish historian.

HAMMOND, Henry, an English divine born at Chertsey, Surrey, 18th Aug. 1605. He was educated at Eton, and Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1625. In 1633 he was presented to the living of Penshurst, Kent, by Robert earl of Leicester, who accidentally heard him in the pulpit, and thus nobly rewarded his eloquence and piety. He continued in this peaceful retirement, the zealous minister of his parish, till 1643, when his zeal in the royal cause rendered him obnoxious to the parliament, and rool were set upon his head. He fled in disguise to Oxford, and in 1644, at the request of his friend Dr. Potter of Queen's college, he published his "practical catechism" which gave offence to those who in the business of salvation regarded faith alone without works. He however defended himself against the attacks not only of Cheynell, but of 52 ministers in the province of London, and he continued to serve the cause of religion by other valuable tracts. At the treaty of Uxbridge he was appointed on the part of Charles I, and he displayed to great advantage his learning and eloquence in a dispute with Richard Vines a presbyterian minister delegated by the parliament to meet him. To the archdeaconry of Chichester to which Duppa had presented him in 1643, the king in 1645 added a canonry of Christ church, and soon after he was chosen public orator to the university. He afterwards attended the king as chaplain during his confinement at Woburn, Caversham, Hampton Court, and the Isle of Wight, till he was dismissed in 1647 by the parliament and permitted to return to Oxford. He was in 1648, stripped of his honors, and with Dr. Sheldon, confined a prisoner in Oxford by the parliamentary delegates, and ten weeks after conveyed to the house of sir Philip Warwick at Clapham, Bedfordshire. When liberated in 1649 he retired to the seat of sir John Packwood, Westwood, Worcestershire, where the second Charles saw and commended his loyalty, and his firm adherence to the religion of his country. In 1653 he published his "paraphrase and annotations on the new testament," which he had begun during his confinement at Oxford, a work of great merit, and general utility. He began afterwards "a paraphrase and commentary on all the books of the old testament," but his infirmities prevented his completing more than the psalms and the 3d part of proverbs. He fell a martyr to the stone, accompanied by those other dreadful maladies the gout, the cholic, and cramp, 25th April 1660, at a time when the king, restored to the throne of his ancestors, was meditating to reward his meritorious services by raising him to the bishopric of Worcester. His works are collected into 4 vols. folio.

HAMMOND, Anthony, an English poet whose family had long been settled at Somersham-place, Huntingdonshire. He was born 1668, and was educated at St. John's, Cambridge. He became commissioner to the navy, and was so eloquent in parliament that Bolingbroke called him the silver tongued Hammond. Distinguished as a wit, and as a man of fashion, he was equally known as a poet and an author. He wrote the life of his friend Moyle, besides poems. He died about 1730.

HAMMOND, James, second son of the above, is distinguished as a poet. He was born in 1710, and educated at Westminster school, but he did not it seems enter at the university. He was early made equerry to the prince of Wales, and thus moving in the sphere of fashion he became the friend of Lyttelton, Cobham, and Chesterfield. His income was increased in 1733 to 400l. a year by the liberality of a dying relation, and in 1741 he was elected member for Truro, yet in the midst of pleasures and business he did not forget the calls of the muse, but often withdrew from festive scenes to the tranquillity of retirement and the meditations of literary life. His "love elegies" are elegant, and valuable specimens of his poetical powers, and also his prologues, &c. He died at Stowe, the seat of his friend Cobham, June 1742. His cruel mistress survived him till 1779, and died unmarried, bed-chamber woman to the queen. The elegies appeared after his death, recommended, says Dr. Maty, by the elegant pen of Lord Chesterfield.

HAMON, John, a French physician of Cherbourg. He wrote on religious subjects and in a style much admired, and deserving the high commendation of Boileau. He died 1687 aged 69.

HAMPDEN, John, the illustrious patriot, was born of a very ancient family in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. From the university he went to the inns of court in London and was afterwards chosen in parliament. In 1636 he had the boldness alone and unsupported to resist the royal authority in levying ship money, and though he lost his cause he gained more admirers by the firmness and modesty of his conduct than the king obtained advantage by the successful issue of the trial. Thus proclaimed by the public voice a patriot, Hampden was now regarded as the leader of the popular party in the House of Commons against the king, and when the civil war broke out, he took up arms to defend what he considered as the rights of the people. In the field he showed himself courageous, intrepid and active, but his career of glory was cut short by a fatal wound which he received in Chalgrove field, Oxfordshire, when fighting against prince Rupert 18th June 1643. The bone of his shoulder was shattered by two bullets, and after suffering great pain from the wound, he expired six days after, to the universal regret of his party. This very extraordinary character, who, in every contest in the parliament and in the field, evinced such steadiness and perseverance in what he regarded as the cause of his country, is described by Clarendon as a great rather than a good man, and the noble historian applies to him what was applied to Cinna, that he had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute any mischief.

HANSA, a Mahometan doctor, known for his extravagant attempt to eradicate the tenets of Mahomet, and to establish a new religion of his own. His book in opposition to the alcoran was translated into French and is called "evidences of the mysteries of the unity." It is written with great purity and elegance. He flourished about 1020.

HANDEL, George Frederic, a celebrated musician born at Hall, Upper Saxony, 24th Fev. 1684. His father who was a surgeon intended him for the profession of the law, and that he might check his strong inclinations for music he prevented his access to all musical instruments. The son however in spite of his father's prohibitions, obtained a small clavichord, with which he amused himself every evening, at the top of the house, after the family had retired to rest. His accidental visit with his father to the court of the duke of Saxe Weissenfels where his brother-in-law was valet of the household, enabled him at last to follow the bent of his genius. He played the church organ after the morning service, with such effect that the duke, who happened to be present, sensible of his promising powers, expostulated with his father, and obtained from him the permission of his being instructed in music. Under the care of Zackaw at Hall, young Handel began to display that musical genius which marked him for immortality. At the age of nine he composed the church service for voices and instruments, and after equalling his master at Hall he passed to Berlin where the king of Prussia witnessed and rewarded his astonishing powers. From Berlin he went to Hamburgh where he was greatly noticed, but the honors which he received, excited the envy of other musicians, and one of them, as he was returning from the orchestra made a violent push at him with a sword. The wound would have proved fatal had not Apollo, says his historian, interposed, and by means of a music book which he accidentally carried in his bosom, Handel was not mortally stabbed to the heart. It was at Hamburgh, where at the age of 14, he produced Almeria, his first opera, with such effect that it was repeated 30 successive nights; and after staying here about five years he visited Florence. Here his Rodrigo was produced with universal applause; but not attached to any particular place, and too independent in spirit to be gained by the most liberal promises of patronage he next went to Vienna, where his Agrippina, finished in three weeks, was performed for 27 successive nights. Afterwards he again visited Italy, and then returned to his native country, and from thence he passed through Hanover to England in 1710. His fame procured him here friends and admirers, he was flattered by the queen and nobility, and his Rinaldo, which he produced here, showed how well he was entitled to the public favor. After visiting the elector of Hanover he again returned to England, and that he might be induced to devote his services to the musical entertainment of the nation, not only a pension of 200l. a-year was settled on him, but he was appointed composer to the Haymarket theatre. On the accession of George I. his pension was doubled by the monarch, who forgot the offence which Handel had offered to him by not settling at Hanover; but after presiding nine years at the musical academy of the Haymarket, supported by the nobility, he found that his quarrels with the Italian singers who performed under him, rendered him unpopular, and by degrees his audience sunk away from him. Though he attempted to recover his popularity by visiting Italy, and introducing new singers, he found still that his opponents were too powerful; but after some time malice and jealousy ceased, and his merits were again permitted to shine in full splendor. In 1742, on his return from Dublin to London, he was invited to Covent garden, and here his oratorios were continued with increasing popularity till within eight days of his death. He expired the 14th April 1759, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a handsome monument, at his expence, was erected to his memory. His works, which are truly valuable, have been well edited by Dr. Arnold.

HANGEST, Jerome de, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who distinguished himself by his writings against Luther. He died at Mans 1538.

HANISAH, a saint, among the Mussulmans, regarded as the head of the most ancient of all their sects. The other sects are those of Schiass, of Malik, and of Hambel. He died at Babylon.

HANKINS, Martin, was born at Breslaw 1633, where he became professor of history, politics, and eloquence. His works evince the scholar and the critic. The best known of these is his book, "De Romanarum Rerum Scriptoribus," to which was added de Byzantin. Rerum Scriptor. Græcis. He died 1709.

HANMER, Meredith, D. D. a native of Flintshire, who became treasurer of Trinity church Dublin, and died there of the plague 1604. He translated into English the ecclesiastical histories of Socrates, Eusebius, and Evagrius.

HANMER, for Thomas, a statesman born 1676, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. He was for 30 years member of parliament as representative of either Suffolk, Flintshire or Thetford, and in 1713 he was chosen speaker, an office which he adorned by dignity of deportment, commanding eloquence and great impartiality. He retired from public life and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published an edition of Shakespeare, in an elegant and magnificent style, which he presented to the university of Oxford, in 6 vols. 4to. He died at his seat, Suffolk, 5th April 1746.

HANMER, Jonathan, a nonconformist divine, born at Barnstable, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. He was ordained by bishop Field, and was made rector of Bishop's Tawton, and lecturer of Barnstable, from which he was ejected 1662. He is the author of a view of ecclesiastical antiquity,—of a discourse on confirmation,—and other works. He died 1687.

HANNECKEN, Mennon, a historian and divine, born at Blaxan, Oldenbourg. He was professor of morals, theology, &c. at Marburg, and died at Lubeck 1671, aged 76. He wrote a Hebrew grammar,—an exposition of St. Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, &c.

HANNEKEN, Philip Lewis, eldest son of the preceding, was professor of eloquence and Hebrew at Gießen, and died at Wittenberg 1706. His works were chiefly on theological controversy.

HANNEMAN, John, a painter at the Hague, known for historical pieces, and portraits, and as an excellent copyist of Vandyck. He was patronized by Mary princess of Orange, daughter of Charles I. and died 1680, aged 69.

HANNIBAL, a celebrated Carthaginian. At the age of nine he swore to his father eternal enmity to Rome, and through life he evinced how much he adhered to the solemnity of an oath. After taking Saguntum and thus beginning the second Punic war, he crossed the Alps, and defeated the Romans at the great battles of Trebia, the Trasymene lake, and Cannæ, with such terrible carnage that during 16 years no general had the boldness to face him in the field. By invading Africa, the Romans forced the victorious Hannibal to come to the defence of his country, and at the battle of Zama he was defeated by Scipio. He afterwards led a wandering life at the courts of Antiochus and Prusias in Asia, and at last destroyed himself by poison when he was going to be betrayed into the hands of the Romans, B. C. 182.

HANNIBALIANUS, Flavius Claudius, nephew of Constantine was murdered by Constantius, A. D. 338.

HANNO, a Carthaginian general who made some curious discoveries in Africa, of which he wrote an account still extant.

HANNSACHS, a German poet, born at Nuremberg. His works are swelled to 5 folio vols. but possess little to recommend them either in elegance or genius. He died 1576.

HANRIOT, Francis, a native of Nanterre who during the revolution obtained the confidence of Marat and Robespierre, by the atrocity of his character, and the active part which he performed in the murder of the priests at the Carmes in Sep. 1792. By surrounding the convention with armed men, he obtained the decree of accusation against the Girondists, but though thus triumphant, the fall of Robespierre was but the forerunner of his own. He was guillotined 28th July 1794, aged 33, execrated for his cruelty, rapine, and insolence.

HANWAY, Jonas, a benevolent character, born at Portsmouth 1712. He was early engaged with a merchant at Lisbon, and afterwards was connected with a house at Petersburg, in the business of which he travelled into Persia. On his return to London, in the retirement of private life he employed his large and honorably-acquired opulence to the purposes of benevolence and humanity, and to his liberality and public spirit, among other institutions, the Marine society, and the Magdalen charity owe their origin. His services in the cause of philanthropy were such that several British merchants applied to lord Bute to distinguish him by some marks of public esteem, and he was accordingly made commissioner of the navy, and when after 20 years he resigned the office he was honorably permitted to retain the salary. His exertions to relieve the distresses of the chimney sweepers, deserve also the highest praise, and to his humane intentions the establishment of Sunday schools in is some degree to be attributed. At his death which happened 1786, a public subscription of several thousands was contributed to erect a monument to the memory of a man, who above all others had shone as a pattern of benevolence, virtue and philanthropy. His publications are said to have amounted to nearly 70, the best known of which are an account of his travels through Russia, Persia, Germany and Holland, &c. published 1753, 2 vols. 4to. and domestic happiness promoted. He is said to be the first who used an umbrella in the streets of London.

HARCOURT, Harriet Eusebia, a lady born at Richmond, Yorkshire. She travelled with her father over Europe, and at his death at Constantinople in 1733, she returned to England, and as she inherited a large property she began to establish a female monastery on her Yorkshire estate, and another in the western isles of Scotland. These institutions which were composed chiefly of foreign females, restrained by neither vows nor austere forms, were dissolved at the death of their patroness, which happened 1745, in her 39th year.

HARDER, John James, a native of Basil, who studied medicine at Rome, and in France. On his return to Basil he became professor of rhetoric and afterwards of medicine and anatomy, and was three times rector of the university. He was highly esteemed for his learning and abilities, and besides the honors bestowed by several princes, he was raised to the dignity of a count by the emperor Leopold. He wrote prodomus physiologicus, &c.—apiarium—examen anatomicum cochleæ terrestris, &c. and died 1711 aged 55—His brother James was professor of oriental languages at Leyden, and a learned divine. Before he took possession of his professional chair he travelled through Europe and died at Constantinople.

HARDEBY, Geoffrey, an Augustine monk, confessor to Henry II. and professor at Oxford. He died in London 1360, author of some lectures on the old and new testament,—history of his order,—tract on evangelical poverty, &c.

HARDIME, Peter, a painter of Antwerp who died 1748, aged 70. His four designs representing the four seasons with appropriate fruits, are much admired in the monastery of the Bernardines at Antwerp. His brother Simon excelled as a flower painter, and died at London 1737.

HARDING, John, author of an English chronicle, died 1461.

HARDING, Thomas, an English divine, born at Comb Martin Devonshire 1512. He was educated at Winchester and New college Oxford, where he became fellow 1536. He was made Hebrew professor of the university by Henry VIII. and when chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, he was concerned in the education of his daughter the lady Jane Grey. From a protestant under Edward he became a strong catholic under Mary, and at the accession of Elizabeth, he lost his preferment and retired to Louvain where he became, says Wood, the target of popery. He entered the lists of controversy with bishop Jewel, against whom, during 13 years, he wrote seven pieces in support of the catholic faith. He died about 1570.

HARDINGE, Nicolas, an eminent English scholar, born at Canbury near Kingston, Surry, and educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He was clerk to the house of commons, and afterwards member for Eye, and secretary to the treasury. He died 9th April 1758, leaving by his wife, lord Camden's sister, the present eminent counsel, G. Hardinge, &c. His Latin poems were much admired, and two of them are preserved in the musæ Anglicanæ. He wrote besides "Denhill Iliad," a poem, and other things. To an extensive knowledge of history, law, and the English constitution, he united a correct taste formed by an intimate acquaintance with classical literature. His valuable library was sold by auction 1759.

HARDION, James, member of the academy of inscriptions, was born at Tours. He died at Paris 1766, aged 80. He published "universal history," 18 vols.—a treatise on French poetry and rhetoric, 3 vols. and other works.

HARDOUIN, John, a French jesuit, born at Quimper in Brittany 1647. He distinguished himself for his criticism and extensive erudition, as well as by the singularity city of his opinions. He published in 1684 "nummi antiqui populorum & urbium illustrati," and afterwards was engaged in the edition of the classics, for the use of the Dauphin, especially Pliny, 5 vols. 4to. He next attempted religious subjects, and in 1693, came out, in 2 vols. 4to. his "Chronologiæ prolusio, &c." in which he maintains that the many authors which the moderns regard as antient, are only impositions upon the credulity of the world by the artifice of the monks of the 13th century. Homer therefore and a long list of literary heroes are hurled down from their height of antiquity, and Cicero alone, with Pliny's natural history and Virgil's Georgics, and Horace's satires and epistles, are permitted to retain the reverence paid to them through successive ages. His learning was thus lost in wild reveries, and while he wished to prove that the Aeneas of Virgil is no other than Jesus Christ, and the Lalage of Horace, the christian religion, he imposed upon his own understanding, and gave way to the greatest absurdities, which public authority at last was called upon to repress. His opinions were ably opposed by La Croze, by Le Clerc, and others; but though he pretended to make a recantation of his errors, he yet continued to maintain them. With the approbation of some of the French clergy by whom he was assigned a pension, he prepared a new edition of the councils, in 12 vols. folio, which however was prohibited by the parliament. This extraordinary character died at Paris 3d Sep. 1729, aged 83, and after his death appeared some of his posthumous works. De Boze wrote his epitaph, and after mentioning his learning he concludes by describing him as a man, "qui Scepticum pie egit, credulitate puer, audacia juvenis, delirius senex."

HARDUIN, Alexander Xavier, a native of Arras, secretary to the academy of his country. He was also an advocate and a poet, but he is better known as a grammarian. He died 1788, aged 70. He wrote dissertations on vowels and consonants, and other works.

HARDWICKE, Philip Yorke earl of, an eminent English lawyer, born at Dover, 1st Dec. 1690, and educated under Mr. Samuel Morland of Bethnal green. He studied law in the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in 1714, and in 1718, was chosen member for Lewes. His great abilities and the friendship of Parker the chancellor, raised him in 1720, to the office of solicitor general, and four years after he was appointed attorney general. In the trials of Laver, of Kelly, and others, he displayed great eloquence, extensive knowledge of law, and honorable candor and lenity. Upright in his conduct and biased by no influence of favor or of party, he acted up to the impartial dictates of his conscience, and in some cases even voted against those friends to whose favor or kindness he owed his elevation. In 1733 he was made chief justice of the King's bench, with a double salary of 4000l. and soon after a baron of the realm, and on the death of lord Talbot he was appointed lord chancellor, Feb. 1736-7. In 1754 he was raised to the dignity of an earl, and two years after he resigned the high office which for 20 years he had supported with honor, with impartiality, and with general approbation. During these times of public danger and official embarrassment only three of his decrees were questioned, and on examination they were affirmed by the lords. To his great knowledge of law, he joined a high respect for the constitution of his country, and while he was eager to dispatch the often protracted business of chancery, he applied his commanding talents to the relief and the comforts of the subject, in the planning, and improving the bills introduced to the legislature. This excellent character, pious as a christian, eloquent as an orator, dignified as a judge, well informed as a politician, as much beloved in private as he was honorably respected in public life, died 6th March 1764, at his house in Grosvenor square. He was buried at Wimpole, Cambridgeshire, near his wife, daughter of Charles Cocks, brother of lord Somers. His son and successor in the title distinguished himself while at Cambridge as the author of Athenian letters, in which he was assisted by his brother Charles. He also published sir Dudley Carleton's correspondence while ambassador from the first James, to the States General, and some other state papers. He died 1790, aged 70.

HARDY, Alexander, a French dramatic writer, whose plays it is said amounted to six hundred, of which however only 41, in 6 vols. 8vo. were printed. With great facility of composition he often wrote 2000 lines in 24 hours, and completed his play in three days. He was the first French dramatist paid for his pieces. He died at Paris 1630.

HARDY, sir Charles, an able officer, grand-son of a distinguished naval commander under queen Anne. He was commander in chief of the western squadron in 1779, and died that year at Spithead of an inflammation in his bowels.

HARE, Francis, an English prelate bred at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he was fellow. He became tutor to lord Blandford, son of the illustrious Marlborough, and by his friendship rose to the office of chaplain general to the army, and afterwards of dean of Worcester, and bishop of Chichester, with the deanery of St. Paul's till his death 1740. He has been accused by some of scepticism, but falsely, though he treats in a manner more ludicrous than dignified the study of scripture, in his "difficulties and discouragements, &c." He opposed Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy, and published other works, besides Terence with notes in 4to.—the psalms in the Hebrew in the original metre, a work censured by some learned men and especially by Lowth in his lectures.

HARIOT, Thomas, an English mathematician, born at Oxford 1560. He was educated at St. Mary hall there, where he took the degree of B. A. He went over to America with sir Walter Raleigh, whom he instructed in mathematics, and at his return he gave to the public an account of Virginia, reprinted in Hackluyt's voyages. He was afterwards patronized by Henry earl of Northumberland, who liberally allowed him an annual pension of 120l. and who, when confined in the tower, forgot the horrors of imprisonment and persecution, in his interesting conversation. He lived for some time at Sion college, and died at London July 21st 1621, of a cancer on his lip. His "ephemeris chryrometrica," is preserved in Sion college in M.S. and from his "artis analyticae praxis," published after his death, it is said Descartes drew many of his improvements in algebra. Wood has impeached his character as to his religious principles; but while he describes him as a deist, others regard his attachment to the doctrines of the church, and his veneration for the holy scriptures as incontrovertible.

HARIRI, an Arabian author born at Barfa in the kingdom of Babylon. He wrote Almakamah or 50 assemblies, that is, conferences, &c. published by Golius in Arabic and Latin, Leyden 1656, six of which were translated into English by Chappelow, Arabic professor at Cambridge 1767. He died 1122.

HARLAY, Achille de, a learned president of the parliament of Paris, after De Thou. During the commotions of the league he maintained with firmness and dignity his attachment to the king, and without yielding to the intrigues of the factious and the disloyal, he supported with increasing reputation the upright conduct of the magistrate. He died universally respected, at Paris 23d Oct. 1616, aged 80.

HARLAY de Saucy, Nicholas de, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and afterwards ambassador of France in England; was very zealous in the service of Henry III. On the accession of Henry IV. he changed his religion to please his master, to whom he endeared himself by his attention and his obsequiousness. He died 13th Oct. 1629, aged 84.

HARLAY, Francis de, archbishop of Rouen, and afterwards of Paris, was the favorite of Anne of Austria, and afterwards of Lewis XIV. though little entitled by his private manners, say some historians, to the notice of the great. He died 6th Aug. 1695, aged 70. His life has been written by Le Gendre.

HARLAY, Achille de, first president of the parliament of Paris, was an upright magistrate, and a respectable subject. In his conversation he was particularly jocose, and often forgot the dignity of his rank or situation to indulge his inclination for a witty or severe allusion. He died 23d July 1712, aged 73.

HARLEY, Robert, earl of Oxford, was eldest son of sir Edward Harley, and was born in Bow street Covent garden, 5th Dec. 1661. He was educated at the private but respectable school of Mr. Birch at Shilton near Burford, Oxon, and there he laid the foundation of that extensive knowledge, and that general information which raised him to the highest honors. At the revolution he levied a troop of horse in favor of William, and soon after was chosen member for Tregony in Cornwall, and then for Radnor which he represented till he obtained a seat in the upper house. In Feb. 1701-2 he was chosen speaker of the house of commons, and continued in that high office that and two successive parliaments. In 1704 he became one of the privy councillors, and the same year was made secretary of state. In 1706 he was one of the commissioners to settle the union with Scotland, and in 1710, he was raised to the office of one of the commissioners of the treasury, and of chancellor of the exchequer. In March that year his life was attempted by the marquis of Guiscard, a French papist who, when examined before the privy council, stabbed him with a penknife, for which offence he was sent to Newgate where he died soon after. The danger thus incurred increased the popularity of the secretary, who after some weeks' confinement was on his appearance in the house, handsomely congratulated by the speaker. In 1711 he was raised to the peerage by the queen, and the same year appointed lord high treasurer of Great Britain, an office which he resigned in 1714, four days before the queen's death. In 1715 he was impeached by the commons of high crimes and misdemeanors, and after two years' confinement he was tried and acquitted by his peers, July 1st, 1717. He died 21st May 1724, aged 64. Though abused and vilified by his rival in power, Bolingbroke, not only in the senate but in a letter to sir William Windham, he possessed great talents, and was not devoid of those amiable virtues which attend and support the good man, and which have been deservedly illustrated by the immortal pen of his contemporary, Pope. As a patron of learning the public respect his character, and the valuable collection which he made of MSS. and of rare and curious books, after being augmented by his son, now adorns the shelves of the British museum.

HARMER, Thomas, a dissenting minister of Waterfield in Suffolk, born at Norwich. He is author of "observations on passages of scripture," 4 vols. 8vo. a valuable work often edited. He wrote also notes on Solomon's song, and other works, showing in the most respectable light his extensive learning and his perfect acquaintance with oriental literature. He died 1788 aged 73.

HARMODIUS, vid. ARISTOGITON.

HARO, Don Louis de, nephew and heir of Olivares the famous Spanish minister, was equally celebrated as the favorite of Philip IV. He was not only prime minister, but a negociator, and had a long conference with Mazarin to settle the peace with the Low Countries, and with France in 1659. He was as respectable in private life, as he was distinguished in the cabinet. He died 17th Nov. 1661, aged 63.

HAROLD I. king of England, was son of Canute. The interference of Alnot archbishop of Canterbury, who considered him as illegitimate, and who would consecrate none but the son of queen Emma, proved the source of civil discord. Harold however possessed power and influence, and by seizing the throne, he became master of his half-brother Alfred, whom he confined in a monastery after putting out his eyes. He died the 5th year of his reign in 1039 and without issue.

HAROLD, II. son of earl Godwin, took possession of the English crown on the death of Edward the confessor. His claims to the sovereignty were opposed by his brother, but after defeating him in the north with great slaughter, he found that another competitor, William of Normandy, had invaded the kingdom. He marched bravely to repel this formidable invasion, and fell, nobly fighting at the head of his troops, 14th Oct. 1066, the first year of his reign. Though Harold must be considered in some degree as an usurper, yet his bravery, his wisdom, and his virtues, exhibit him to the view of history in the most amiable light. Had he defeated the Normans in the field of Hastings he might have adorned his reign by the arts of peace, and endeared to his people by the intrepidity with which he exposed his life in the defence of his native country, he might have given birth to a new era of national prosperity, political justice, and honorable industry, and prevented that tyranny, and that devastation which ever attends the steps of a foreign, arrogant, and suspicious usurper.

H A R

HARPALUS, a Grecian astronomer, inventor of the cycle afterwards improved by Meton, B. C. 480.

HARPALUS, an officer entrusted by Alexander with the treasures of Babylon. The trust was too tempting for the avidity of Harpalus, who plundered the treasury and fled away.

HARPE, John Francis de la, a French writer of great eminence. He was of Swiss parentage, and was born at Paris 20th Nov. 1739, and educated in the college of Harcourt. He began early the profession of writer, and his earl of Warwick, a tragedy, in 1764, procured him great applause and some money. He published various other dramatic pieces, besides poems rewarded with prizes from different learned bodies, elegies of Fenelon, Catinat, Charles V. &c. highly and deservedly admired. His chief work is a complete course of literature 12 vols. 8vo. As a critic, his powers were advantageously displayed in his lectures at the Lyceum, and his abilities, his taste and genius as a poet, a philosopher, and as a man, are sufficiently displayed in his writings. During the revolution he, like other literary characters, supported the principles of republicanism; but when he saw terror prevail, and religion degraded, his sentiments were seriously changed. Though condemned to be deported, he escaped from his persecutors, and died at Paris 1803. His other works are very numerous.

HARPOCRATION, Valerius, a rhetorician of Alexandria, A. D. 180, author of a lexicon, on the 10 orators of Greece, published by Aldus 1603, and by Gronovius 1696.

HARPSFIELD, Nicholas, an English divine, archdeacon of Canterbury. His attachment to the popish religion under Elizabeth, exposed him to persecution: he was imprisoned for some years, and died 1572. He wrote an history of Wickliffe's heresy — an ecclesiastical history of England, &c.

HARRINGTON, John, an English poet, born at Helston near Bath. As his father was imprisoned for holding conference with Elizabeth in Mary's reign, the princess stood godmother to his son in proof of her patronage, and his learning and acquirements proved him not unworthy of royal favor. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and before he was 30 he published a translation of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. He was knighted on the field by the earl of Essex, and under James he was created a knight of the Bath. He drew upon himself the attack of the clergy, by writing, for the use of prince Henry, a tract against married bishops. His works were published by the Rev. H. Harrington under the title of "Nugæ antiquæ," and contain a miscellaneous collection of curious pieces in verse and prose. He had formed the plan for an history of his own times which he did not execute. He died 1612 aged 51.

HARRINGTON, John lord, eldest son of lord and lady Harrington, to whose care James I. entrusted the education of his daughter Elizabeth, afterwards the wife of Frederick king of Bohemia, was early distinguished by his talents, and his genius, and by his intimacy and correspondence with Henry prince of Wales. When at Rome he as well as his tutor Tovey was strongly solicited by the Jesuits to abandon his religion, but when entreaties were unavailing, it is said that the holy fathers artfully administered poison to them, in consequence of which the tutor soon after died, though the pupil's stronger constitution struggled longer against the deleterious effects. This promising youth however died some time after his return to England 1613, aged 22. His Latin letters to the prince are extant.

HARRINGTON, James, an eminent political writer, born Jan. 1611, at Upton, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he had Chillingworth for his tutor, and after three years' residence, on his father's death, 1622, he set out upon his travels. In Holland he served for some time in lord Craven's regiment, and afterwards travelled through Flanders, Germany, France, and Italy. His time mean while was usefully employed in making deep and important observations on the manners and the government of the nations which he visited, and while he refused to pay homage to the pope of Rome by kissing his toe, he cultivated the friendship of men of letters, and in considering their various advantages in the cultivation of science, he regarded Venice by her situation and constitution superior to the rest of the world. After his return to England, Harrington sided with the parliament, but he never could obtain a seat in the house. His independent spirit, however, was admired and respected, and when the commissioners removed the captive king from Newcastle nearer London, he was selected to attend upon his person. The unfortunate monarch was pleased with his conversation; he parted with him at Hurst castle with bitter concern by the rude interference of the republicans, and when led to the scaffold he again distinguished his favorite, and rewarded him on that awful occasion with a token of his esteem. The death of Charles affected deeply Harrington, but while his friends attributed his retirement to melancholy or discontent, he silenced their reproaches by producing his celebrated work "Oceana," which at first was regarded as a severe satire on Cromwell's usurpation, but was afterwards permitted to appear dedicated to the protector by the interference of lady Claypole his favorite daughter. The work was read but not approved by Cromwell, who disdained to resign the power acquired by his sword to the visionary dreams of new politicians. Harrington in the mean time found his labors attacked by various pamphlets, which he boldly answered, and to prove the practicability of his republican plan he established a society at Miles's coffee-house, Palace yard, where the public regulations he proposed were fully debated before crowded audiences. Principles which favored the establishment of a republican government upon a broad basis could not be agreeable to the royalists, and therefore at the restoration, Harrington was regarded as a secret enemy, and though living in retirement he was in Dec. 1661 seized by order of the king and committed to the tower, as guilty of treasonable practices. These accusations, though supported by the authority of chancellor Hyde, may be considered as founded on imaginary grounds, while the criminality of Harrington may be viewed in his severe reflections against the royal family. With unfeeling bitterness he not only decried the character of Mary queen of Scots, and treated her son James as a worthless impostor, but he loaded the memory of Charles with every foul epithet; thet; and forgetful of his former attachment, he described him as a tyrant at last cut off by God's avenging hand. After some time he was removed from the tower to St. Nicolas's island, opposite Plymouth, and afterwards to Plymouth, where by the advice of his physician Dunstan he mixed improperly too much guaiacum with his coffee for the cure of the scurvy, and brought on a gradual delirium. As his relations had given bail for his appearance he was liberated from confinement, and as he had some intervals of reason, he was permitted to retire to Scotland, where he married the daughter of sir Marmaduke Dorrell of Bucks, a lady to whom he had formerly paid his addresses, and with whom he spent the remainder of life. He died of the palsy at Westminster, 11 Sep. 1677, and was buried in St. Margaret's church, near the remains of Raleigh. There were not wanting some who attributed his disorder to political causes, and who considered his delirium as occasioned by the malice of his enemies, who dreaded the satire of his pen. His works were collected by Toland, 1700, in 1 vol. folio, but Dr. Birch's edition of 1737 is more full and correct. Besides his Oceana which, as mentioned already, contained the visionary plan of a pure and independent republic, he attempted poetry, but with no creditable success.

HARRIS, Walter, an English physician, in the reign of William III. He wrote some well esteemed books on the diseases of children.

HARRIS, Robert, a native of Broad Camden Gloucestershire, educated at Oxford. During the rebellion he opposed the king, and was made by the parliament rector of Petersfield, and president of Trinity college Oxford, where he died 1658 aged 80. He wrote sermons—remedium contra avaritiam—tractatus de novi testat. fœdere—epistolæ apologeticæ, &c.

HARRIS, William, a dissenting minister, who resided at Honiton, where he died 4th Feb. 1770. He was an able scholar, and was honored in 1765 by the Glasgow university with the degree of D. D. He wrote though not very accurately an account of the lives of James I. Charles I. Oliver Cromwell, and Hugh Peters, in 5 vols. 8vo. He prepared also materials for an account of James II. which he did not complete.

HARRIS, John, secretary to the royal society, translated Pardie's elements of geometry, and died 1730. He was an able mathematician, and good divine, and first projected the plan of a Cyclopædia or dictionary of sciences, which appeared in 2 vols. folio, 1710, under the title of Lexicon Technicum, to which a supplement was added in 1736. The works of Chambers, and the improvements of Dr. Rees and others have superseded this now obsolete performance.

HARRIS, William, author of sermons on the principal representations of the Messiah in the old testament,—of funeral discourses and other religious tracts, was for 40 years minister of a dissenting congregation at Crutched-friars, and died 1740, aged 65.

HARRIS, James, Esq. an eminent scholar, son of a sister of Shaftesbury, the author of the characteristics. He was born in the close, Sarum, 1709, and after an education at the grammar school there, he entered at Wadham college, Oxford, but took no degree. He was member for Christ Church in several parliaments, and in 1763 was made one of the lords of the admiralty, and soon after removed to the treasury, and in 1774 he was appointed secretary, and comptroller to the queen, which office he retained during life. He died after a long illness 21st Dec. 1780. His works are three treatises concerning art; music, painting and poetry; and happiness, 8vo. 1745,—Hermes, or a philosophical inquiry concerning universal grammar, 1751, 8vo. an able composition, commended by many, and particularly by Lowth, philosophical arrangements, and philosophical inquiries, 2 vols. 8vo. published after his death. His works have been edited by his son lord Malmesbury, with an elegantly written account of his life.

HARRISON, William, an ingenious youth, fellow of New college Oxford. He was tutor to one of the duke of Queensbury's sons, and was recommended by his wit, genius and learning to dean Swift, who procured for him from St. John the respectable office of secretary to the English ambassador at the Hague, lord Raby, and afterwards lord Stafford. Under the expectation of higher appointments, he was unfortunately carried off by a short illness, in London, 14th Feb. 1712-13. He wrote some elegant poetical pieces, many of which are preserved in Nichols's and Doddsley's collections. Not only Swift, but Young, Tickel and others, have spoken with great respect and affection for the amiable character which he supported.

HARRISON, William, an English writer, author of the pilgrim, or the happy convert, a pastoral tragedy, 1709.

HARRISON, John, an eminent and well known mechanic, born at Foulby near Pontefract, 1693. His father was a carpenter, and he was brought up to his business, but he was doomed to extend his reputation beyond the limits of an obscure village. He had early a strong propensity to wheel machinery, and as his father was occasionally employed in repairing clocks, he improved in his knowledge of the power of movements. In 1700 his father removed to Barrow, Lincolnshire, and there he obtained from a neighbouring clergyman a MS. copy of Sanderfon's lectures, which he transcribed, and from which he drew a hitherto unknown fund of knowledge. He made some ingenious experiments, and in 1726, produced two clocks, chiefly of wood, with the compound pendulum, which were so accurately constructed that they varied scarce a second in one month. He visited London 1735, and by the kindness of Dr. Halley was recommended to that ingenious artist G. Graham, who admired and encouraged his great talents, and advised him to complete his machines to present to the board of longitude. In 1735 his first machine was approved by the board, and he was sent to Lisbon to try its accuracy and its properties. Thus patronized he produced another more simple machine in 1739, and again a 3d, in 1749, but while he considered his labors as arrived to the highest degree of perfection, he discovered that greater accuracy might still be obtained, and a 4th time his machine, six inches in diameter, and in the shape of a watch, was constructed. The correctness of this machine was ascertained by the author's son in a voyage to Jamaica, and in another to Barbadoes, and as his discovery came within the meaning of the act of the 12th of Anne, he claimed, and obtained, though with with some trouble, the liberal reward of 20,000*l.* from parliament. These four curious machines were deposited in the observatory at Greenwich, where it is said they are now buried in oblivion. A time piece on the same principles was constructed by Mr. Kendal for Cooke's voyage, and was found extremely accurate. The last time piece made by this ingenious artist erred only four seconds and a half in ten weeks. After a life thus devoted to the service of the public, this worthy character died 1776 of the gout at his house Red-lion square aged 80. Though ingenious as a mechanic, he was very incorrect as a writer, and never could express himself in a clear and simple style. He was also an excellent musician, and he is said to have constructed a curious monochord.

HARRISON, John, colonel in the parliament army, was son of a butcher, and one of the judges of the unfortunate Charles. He was employed to lull into security the unsuspecting Fairfax, and was with him on his knees in the hypocritical semblance of prayer till the execution was over. He was tried and executed for his perfidy after the restoration.

HARTE, Walter, a native of Marlborough, Wilts, known as a poet and historian. His poetical pieces called Amaranth, were published in 8vo. besides a history of Gustavus Adolphus, 2 vols. 4to. and essays on husbandry 8vo. He died 1773.

HARTLEY, David, an English physician, son of a clergyman, born about 1704, and educated at Jesus college Cambridge, of which he was a fellow. He practised physic at Newark, afterwards at St. Edmundsbury, and then in London, and lastly at Bath, where he died 30th Sep. 1757. His chief work is observations on man, his frame, his duty, and his expectations, 2 parts, 1749, 2 vols. 8vo. besides some letters in the philosophical transactions. He also wrote about Mrs. Stevens' quack medicines as a solvent for the stone, which procured her from parliament 5000*l.* The doctor died of the stone at last, though it is said he had taken to remove it above 200*lbs.* weight of soap.

HARTMAN, John Adolphus, a native of Munster, who from a Jesuit became a Calvinist, and was appointed professor of philosophy and poetry at Castel, and afterwards historical professor at Marburg, where he died 1744, aged 64. He wrote Historia Hæsiaca, 3 vols. — vita pontific. Roman. &c. — Harangues &c.

HARTSOEKER, Nicolas, a native of Gonda, son of the minister of the place. He laboriously devoted himself to mathematics and natural philosophy, and became professor of philosophy at Heidelberg and mathematician to the elector palatine. He wrote besides some small pieces. — natural philosophy in 4to. and died 1725, aged 69.

HARTUNGUS, John, a native of Millenberg, professor of Greek at Heidelberg where he was educated. He for some time bore arms against the Turks, and died 1579. He wrote some notes on the three first books of the Odyssey, besides a Latin translation of Apollonius.

HARVARD, John, founder of a college at Cambridge in North America, which bears his name, was a nonconformist divine who died at Charlestown in New England 1688.

HARVEY, William, an English physician, celebrated as the first discoverer of the circulation of the blood.

He was born at Folkestone 2d April, 1578, and educated at Canterbury school, and Caius college Cambridge. At the age of 19 he travelled through France and Germany, to Padua where he studied medicine under some eminent masters and where he took the degree of M. D. in 1602. On his return to England he was incorporated to his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and then came to settle in London where he married. In 1604 he was admitted candidate of the college of physicians, three years after fellow, and in 1615 lecturer of anatomy and surgery. In 1616 he laid open his discovery of the circulation of the blood, in his lectures, the M. S. of which is preserved in Sir Hans Sloane's papers. It was published in 1628 and dedicated to Charles I. after the ingenious author had in his lectures for nine years confirmed and illustrated it, by reasons and arguments the most convincing and satisfactory. This curious and important discovery produced an astonishing revolution in the practice of physic, and it is not to be wondered that so many laid claims to the honors and celebrity which belonged to Harvey alone. Not only father Paul vindicated the merit of the discovery, but Hippocrates was asserted by his editor Vanderhinden, to be the original author of this newly revived opinion. In 1632 Harvey was made physician to the king, and he shared his dangers at the battle of Edge-hill, and in consequence of his loyalty, he was incorporated M. D. at Oxford, and in 1645 made warden of Merton college, which the following year he resigned, on the surrender of the city to the parliament. In 1651 he published his "exercitationes de generatione animalium, &c." which might have been rendered more valuable by some important additions and anatomical observations, had not the papers of the author been profanely plundered and destroyed in London by the republicans during the civil wars. In 1654 he was chosen president of the college of physicians, but his infirmities were so great that he recommended Dr. Prujean for his successor. As he had no family he honorably made the college his heirs, and after he had built them a combination room, a library and a museum, he presented them with the deeds of his estates, and founded the commemoration which annually on the 18th of Oct. records the liberality of its benefactors, and the meritorious services of its founder. This great man died 3d June, 1657, and was buried at Hempsted, Herts. Under his picture in the college, on a brass plate is a long but nervous inscription which commemorates his services and his virtues. His works were edited by Dr. Lawrence, with a life prefixed, in 2 vols. 4to. 1766.

HARVEY, Gideon, an English physician, born in Surrey. After studying the languages in the Low Countries he was admitted of Exeter college Oxford 1655, and then he applied to physic at Leyden under some eminent masters. He was physician to Charles 2d in his exile and also to the English army in Flanders. He afterwards travelled through Germany, Italy, and Switzerland, and on his return to England was made physician in ordinary to the king and also to the tower. He died 1700, but he derived little fame, and less profit from his publications. He was perpetually at war with the college of physicians, whom he attempted to ridicule in a piece, 1683.

HARWOOD, Edward, a dissenting minister, born in Lancashire.

Lancashire. He died 1794 aged 65. He wrote various works, but he is best known as the author of a "view of the various editions of the Greek and Roman classics," which has passed through several editions, and has appeared in almost every European language. After presiding over a congregation at Bristol he came to London where he lived by correcting the press, by teaching the classics, and by his various publications. It is said that he refused very liberal patronage to join the church of England.

HASE, Theodore, professor of Hebrew at Bremen, his native town, died 1731. He was a man of extensive learning, and published some valuable "dissertations," &c.

HASE, James, brother of the preceding, was also a man of classical knowledge, and author of some elegant tracts. He died 1723.

HASSELQUIST, Frederic, a learned botanist, born 1722 at Tournalla in East Gothia. The early death of his father left him in indigent circumstances, but he maintained himself at the university of Upsal by instructing some of his fellow pupils, and he displayed so much diligence in the study of physic that he received a royal stipend. He published an "essay on the virtue of plants," and was encouraged by his friend and master Linnæus to undertake a voyage to Palestine to examine its natural history. He was conveyed by the Levant company to Smyrna, and for two years was engaged in making a most valuable collection of curiosities. When on his return in 1752 he was overpowered by the heat of the climate and by fatigue, and died near Smyrna. His curiosities were seized by his creditors, but the queen of Sweden discharged his debts, and Linnæus arranged the publication of his papers.

HASTINGS, Elizabeth, daughter of Theophilus earl of Huntingdon, was celebrated for her personal accomplishments, but more for her private and public acts of charity which were never exceeded by any female in the kingdom. The distresses of the poor and unfortunate in every place and situation were her peculiar care, and a splendid fortune was appropriated solely to their relief far and near. This virtuous and amiable character is well depicted under the name of Aspasia by Congreve in the 49th number of the Tatler. She died 1740 most universally and deservedly lamented.

HATTON, sir Christopher, chancellor under Elizabeth, was a man of learning and great integrity, but it is remarkable that though placed in so high a situation he had not been bred to the law. His decisions however were never impeached, as he was guided by justice and impartiality. It was by his advice that the unfortunate Mary submitted to her fatal trial. He was born at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, from an ancient Cheshire family, and died 1591.

HAVERCAMP, Sigebert, an eminent critic, professor of history, eloquence, and Greek at Leyden. His editions of Josephus, Sallust, Eutropius, Tertullian, &c. are considered by learned men as very valuable. He died at Leyden 1742, aged 58.

HAVERS, Clopton, an English physician, who published in 1691, a curious treatise on the bones. He died in the beginning of the 18th century.

HAUSTEAD, Peter, a comic writer, author of the "rival friends," acted before Charles I. and his court at Cambridge. He was in orders and published some sermons in London 1646.

HAUTE-FEUILLE, John, an ingenious mechanic, son of a baker, was born at Orleans 1647. He was the inventor of the steel springs in pendulum watches, afterwards improved by Huygens. He was an ecclesiastic and held some preferment. He also wrote some curious pamphlets on clocks, &c. and died 1724.

HAUTEROCHE, Noel le Breton de, a French dramatic poet, and actor, who died at Paris 1707, aged 90. His pieces are numerous and possess some merit.

HAUTETERRE, Anthony Dadine de, professor of law at Toulouse, was a native of Cahors, and died 1682, aged 80. He wrote Gesta regum et ducum Aquitanix, 2 vols. 4to.—a treatise on monastic life, &c.—and various other works which display great erudition and a deep knowledge of jurisprudence.

HAWES, Stephen, a native of Suffolk, educated at Oxford, and made groom of the privy chamber to Henry VII. He was well skilled in French and Italian poetry, and wrote the temple of glass, copied from Chaucer's house of fame,—the pastime of pleasure, completed 1506, and eleven years after printed in 4to. by Wynbyn de Worde with wooden plates.

HAWKE, Edward lord, son of a barrister, entered early in the naval service to which he was to add so much glory. In 1734 he was made captain of the Wolf, and he soon distinguished himself under the English admirals, Matthews, Lestock, and Rowley, off Toulon, and took a Spanish ship of superior force, the Pader of 60 guns. In 1747 he was made rear admiral of the white, and that year he defeated a French fleet, and took two 74, one 70, two 64, and one 50, for which he was honored with the ribbon of the Bath. In 1748 he was made vice-admiral of the blue, and two years after of the white, and in 1757 he assisted on the expedition against Rochfort. In 1759 he was sent off Brest, from which the French fleet escaped, but he pursued them and attacked them off Belleisle and totally defeated them, for which he received a pension of 2000l. from the king. In 1765 he was appointed vice admiral of Great Britain, and first lord of the admiralty, and in 1776 raised to the peerage. This heroic commander who ranks so high in the annals of his country died at his house at Shepperton, Middlesex, Oct. 14th 1781.

HAWKESWORTH, John, an eminent English writer. He was born 1715 at Bromley in Kent, and bound to the business of a watch maker, which he early abandoned for public life and literary pursuits. His wife it is said kept a boarding school at Bromley, and by the means of a lady of some influence and consequence in Indian affairs he became known to the commercial world, and was elected a director of the East India company. His "adventurer," was so popular a performance that archbishop Herring conferred upon him, though a dissenter, the Lambeth degree of LL. D. He was appointed to digest the narrative of the South Sea expeditions, a labor for which say some critics, he was not adequate, as his talents tended more to influence the passions in animated descriptions, than interest the heart in the cold detail of a journal. Though he received the high sum of 6000l. for his trouble it is asserted that he died of chagrin for the unfavorable reception of his narrative, though some say he died of high living. He died 16th Nov. 1773, aged 58, and in Bromley church, Kent, where he was buried, is an elegant monument which records his services, in appropriate language borrowed from the last adventurer.

HAWKINS, sir John, an English admiral, born at Plymouth. He was for seven years in the merchants' service, and signalized himself under Elizabeth, especially against the invincible armada, when he was rear admiral, and in several expeditions to the West Indies, where he died, 1595.

HAWKINS, sir John, a native of London, who acquired some eminence in the law as an attorney, and became known as the friend and companion of Dr. Johnson. He commenced author by publishing in 1760, an edition of Walton's angler, besides various communications to the gentleman's magazine, and other periodical works, and in 1761 he was made justice of peace for Middlesex, and in 1772 knighted for dispersing some rioters in Moor-fields. The greatest of his works is his history of music in 5 vols. 4to. which contains very useful and curious particulars. His life of Johnson is not a very creditable performance, as it was hastily finished to gratify the wishes of the bookfellers. Sir John died 1789, aged 70.

HAWKSMOOR, Nicolas, an architect, pupil to sir Christopher Wren. Though he possessed genius he did not much improve on the principles of his illustrious master, but frequently deviated from them. He was clerk of the works at Greenwich, under William and his two successors, and had other places of trust and emolument, he was also employed as surveyor of the new churches built by queen Anne's act. Among others the church of St. George's, Bloomsbury, is particularly censured, as it exhibits an irregularly absurd steeple, with the statue of George I. elevated to the top, with the lion and unicorn as supporters. He planned several private mansions, and gave the design of the Radcliffe library at Oxford. He died 1736.

HAWKWOOD, sir John, an English general in the service of Edward III. He was born at Sible Hedingham in Essex, where his father was a tanner, and he was for some time apprentice to a tailor, but he soon, says Fuller, turned his needle into a sword, and his thimble into a shield, at the sound of Edward's wars. He signalized himself so much under the king and the black prince, that from a private soldier he became a captain, and was knighted; but at the peace of Bretigni in 1360, he found himself too poor to maintain his dignity, and therefore he associated with others into a corps called "les tard venus," whose employment was to gain support by plunder as a marauding party. With these desperate followers, whose numbers daily increased, sir John penetrated into Italy, and enriched himself by the plunder of the clergy. In 1364 he entered into the service of the Pisan republic, in which he behaved with great bravery. In 1387 he armed in defence of the Florentines, and his masterly retreat from the superior forces of his able antagonist Venni, and a difficult and dangerous country, is celebrated as exhibiting the most heroic courage, with coolness, judgment, and perseverance. Though at the peace of 1391 the Florentines disbanded all their forces, yet they retained still Hawkwood at the head of 1000 men. He died in Florence 1393, 6th March, at an advanced age, and his funeral was celebrated with unusual magnificence, and his remains deposited in the church of St. Reparata. A cenotaph was erected in the church of his native town, which still perpetuates his memory, as an able and heroic general, whose character, if taxed with ferocity or with the unprincipled passions of a lawless freebooter, must be defended by the barbarity of the times, which regarded valor, however disgraced by bloodshed and rapine, as one of the noblest virtues of man. As a proof of his charity it may be mentioned, that he founded an English hospital at Rome for the entertainment of poor travellers.

HAY, James, came to England with the first James, and was the first Scotchman raised to the English peerage, successively by the titles of lord Hay, viscount Doncaster, and earl Carlisle. He was employed by his master in various embassies, and went to France to negotiate a marriage between the prince of Wales and Henrietta Maria of France. He died 1636.

HAY, William, an English writer, born at Glenburne, Suffex, about 1700, and educated at Headley school. In 1734, on lord Hardwicke's promotion, he was elected member for Seaford, which he represented till his death. He espoused the cause of sir Robert Walpole, whom he defended in some pamphlets, and by whom he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of the victualling office. He died 19th June 1755. He wrote "religio philosophi," &c.—a translation of Hawkins Browne's de immortalitate animæ,—the epigrams of Martial modernized, &c. besides an essay on deformity, in which he descanted with humor and liveliness on his own personal imperfection, observing that of the 558 members of the commons' house, he was the only man of bodily deformity. His son was equally deformed, and was cruelly put to death by Cossin Ally Kawn, at Patna 1762. Hay's works were published by his daughter, 2 vols. 4to. 1794.

HAYER DU PERRON, Peter le, a native of Alencon, born 1603. He distinguished himself by his poems, odes, songs, and sonnets, which possess merit.

HAYER, John Nicholas Hubert, a French ecclesiastic, born at Sare-Louis, 15th June 1708. He displayed his zeal and learning by his able works—on the immortality of the soul, 3 vols. 12mo.—on the existence of God. He died at Paris 16th July 1780.

HAYES, Charles, an ingenious author. He was of such a timid and modest disposition, that he prefixed his name to none of his many valuable publications, except to his treatise on fluxions, in folio 1704. He was for many years deputy-governor to the royal African company, and on its dissolution in 1752, he retired to solitude and study at Down in Kent. He died 18th Dec. 1760, at Gray's inn, where two years before he had taken chambers, in his 82d year. His works were "the moon, a philosophical dialogue,"—a new and easy method to find the longitude, and other works.

HAYMON, a native of the Tyrolese in the 15th century, remarkable for his gigantic stature, said to have been 16 feet in height, with proportionable strength. His tomb is to be seen at Inspruck.

HAYNES,

HAYNES, Hopton, assay master of the mint, and tally writer of the exchequer, was a man of great integrity, and distinguished as the author of "the scripture account of the attributes and worship of God, and of the character and offices of Jesus Christ," published after his death. He died 19th Nov. 1749.

HAYNES, Samuel, son to the above, was tutor to lord Salisbury, who rewarded his services with the living of Hatfield, and afterwards that of Clothall. He was also canon of Windfor. He died 9th June 1752. He published in 1740 "a collection of state papers," in folio.

HAYWARD, sir John, an English historian, doctor of laws in the university of Cambridge. He is the author of "the lives of the three Normans, kings of England, William I. and II. and Henry I." dedicated to Charles prince of Wales, of the first part of "the life and reign of Henry IV." dedicated to Robert earl of Essex, for which he suffered imprisonment, on account of some offensive passages about hereditary right, of "the life and reign of Edward VI. with the beginning of Elizabeth's," and of other works, especially on divinity and pious subjects. He was made historiographer of Chelsea college 1610, and knighted by James 1619. He died 27th June 1627.

HAYWOOD, Elizabeth, vid. HEYWOOD.

HAZAEI, servant of Benhadad king of Syria, was sent by his master in his illness to inquire of Elisha the prophet, concerning the issue of his complaint. On his return he murdered his master, and ascended his throne, B. C. 889.

HEAD, Richard, author of "the English Rogue" — "the art of wheedling" — "the humors of Dublin," comedies and other dramatic pieces; was a native of Ireland, and after being at the university of Oxford, became a bookfeller in London. He was drowned when going to the isle of Wight 1678.

HEADLEY, Henry, a native of Norwich, educated there under Dr. Parr, after which he went to Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree in arts. He married early, and fell a victim soon after to a rapid consumption 1788, aged only 23. He possessed genius and talents, which he displayed in his volume of poems. He wrote some of the papers of the Olla Podrida; and besides various communications to the Gentleman's and European magazines, under the signature of T. C. O. he published select beauties of ancient English poetry, with curious and interesting remarks, 2 vols. 8vo.

HEARNE, Thomas, a learned English antiquary. He was born 1680 at White Waltham, Berks, where his father was parish clerk, and as he displayed early proofs of genius and application, he was noticed by Mr. Cherry of Shottesbrooke, and by the advice of Mr. Dodwell, then resident there, he was taken into his patron's family, and liberally and honorably treated as one of his sons. After a previous good education, he entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, under Dr. Mill the editor of the Greek testament, and soon distinguished himself as an accurate collator of MSS. and as an indefatigable antiquarian. In 1699 some of his friends wished to send him as missionary to Maryland, but he preferred the learned retirement of Oxford and the valuable stores of the Bodleian, to difficulties and fame abroad; and after being for some years one of the librarians of that noble collection, he was appointed in 1715 archetypographer of the university, and squire beadle of the civil law. These offices however he soon after resigned, as he refused to take the oaths; and though preferment was offered to him, he declined it from the same delicate scruples of conscience. He died at Oxford 10th June 1735 aged 55, and was buried in St. Peter's churchyard, where his epitaph by himself says, "he studied and preserved antiquities." By a life of economy he saved about 1300l. which were found among his papers, and distributed among his poor relations. With the most indefatigable application, but often without taste and judgment, he sent a great number of publications to the press, not less than 38. The majority of these, were editions of different authors; but they generally appeared accompanied with long-labored prefaces and miscellaneous observations, often not relevant to the subject. Among the best known of his works are, "Reliquiæ Bodleianæ," — "Ductor Historicus," — "Leiland's Itinerary," 9 vols. — "the history of Glastonbury," — "Spelman's Alfred," — "Camden's Annales," &c. He wrote besides indexes to several works, as Clarendon's history, &c.

HEATH, James, an English historian, born 1629 in London, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, of which he was a student. He was ejected in 1648 for his loyalty, and by his imprudence, and a foolish marriage, he soon reduced his patrimony, so that he maintained himself by correcting the press, and by his pen. He died of a dropsy and consumption, Aug. 1664, leaving several children to the parish. He is author of a brief chronicle of the late intestine war in the three kingdoms, 1661, 8vo. afterwards improved and republished, and again continued to 1675 by Philips, Milton's nephew, — of a new book of loyal martyrs, &c. — of the glories of Charles II.'s restoration, — of a brief and exact survey of the Netherlands.

HEATH, Benjamin, town clerk of Exeter, is known as an able scholar. He published an essay to prove the divine existence and attributes, 1740 — the case of the county of Devon, with respect to the duty on cyder and perry — a revival of Shakespeare's text, 1765 — and notæ, five lectiones ad tragicorum Græcorum veterum, Æschyli, &c. 4to. 1752, a work which displays great critical knowledge. He was created LL. D. at Oxford, 31st March 1762. The time of his death is not mentioned. His brother, Thomas, alderman of Exeter, wrote an essay towards a new version of Job, 1755.

HEATH, Nicholas, archbishop of York, and chancellor of England in Mary's reign, was born in London, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge. He was deprived of his offices for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, and died at Cobham 1560.

HEATH, Thomas, brother of the archbishop, was a Jesuit, sent by his order as missionary to England in 1568. As he was disguised as a puritan, he was permitted to preach in Rochester cathedral, but whilst inveighing against the liturgy, he dropped by accident a letter from his pocket, which being carried to the bishop, proved him to be a Jesuit and occasioned his imprisonment, and his exposure on the pillory. He died soon after in confinement.

HEATHCOTE, Ralph, D. D. at Cambridge, was author of sylva—a sketch of Bolingbroke's philosophy—a tract against the Hutchinsonians, and other works. He died 1795 aged 74.

HEBENSTREIT, John Ernest, an eminent physician, born at Nevenhoff 1702. He was educated at Jena, and afterwards removed to Leipzig, where he spent much of his time, and died 1756. He wrote various tracts, and among them—Carmen de usu partium—de homine sano, &c.—oratio de antiquitatibus Romanis, &c. His brother, John Christian, was an able divine and a very learned Hebraist. Both brothers are mentioned with great praise by Ernesti.

HEBER, son of Saleh and father of Pheleg, died at the age of 464, B. C. 817. From him the Jews derive their name of Hebrews.

HEBERT, James Rene, a native of Alencon, whom the French revolution raised to consequence. As the writer of the Pere Duchesne, an abusive paper, he acquired popularity among the terrorists, and by bitterly inveighing against the unfortunate queen, he maintained the character of brutality, violence, and cruelty, which had encouraged and defended the horrors of the 10th of August, and the murders of September. By attempting to oppose the power of the commune of Paris to the authority of the convention, he drew upon himself the vengeance of Robespierre, and was guillotined 24th March 1794. This worthless character, who had organized the feasts of reason in contempt of religion, and of another life, died like a coward.

HECATEUS, an historian of Abdera, at the court of the Ptolemies. He wrote commentaries on Hesiod, Homer, &c. besides a valuable history of the Jews.

HECHT, Christian, a native of Hall, minister of Es-sen, East Friesland, died 1748 aged 52. He wrote commentaria philologico-critico-exegitica—and antiquitas Haræorum inter Judæos in Polonia, besides some German tracts.

HECK, Nicholas, a Dutch painter, born 1580, well acquainted with the powerful effects of the chiaro oscuro. His landscapes and historical pieces are much admired.

HECK, Martin Hemskirk, son of the preceding, was eminent for the beauty and correctness of his landscapes.

HECK, John Van, a painter of Oudenard, who studied at Rome, and became known for the delicacy and correctness of his flowers, and his Roman landscapes. He died about 1689 aged 64.

HECQUET, Philip, a French physician, born at Abbeville. He practised there, and at Port-royal, and afterwards at Paris, where he died in the Carmelites' convent, 11th April 1737 aged 76. He was a great friend to bleeding and to the good effects of warm water; and this opinion has tended to immortalize him in the page of Gil Blas under the name of doctor Sanguado. He was a man of great abstemiousness, and exemplary piety, and published some medical works, especially on the indecency of men-midwives—and in favor of mothers suckling their own children—on digestion—on the plague, &c. Le Fevre de St. Marc has written a prolix account of his life.

HEDELIN, Francis, an advocate, afterwards abbé of Aubignac and Meimac, was born at Paris. The favor of Richelieu, two of whose nephews he educated, raised him to consequence, so that he aspired to the name of scholar, poet, antiquarian, and preacher. He was of such a haughty temper, that he was embroiled in various quarrels, especially with Corneille, Menage, Mad. Scuderi, &c. He died at Nemours, 1676 aged 72. His chief works are, "Pratique du Theatre," a book of no great merit, but censorious, and such as to have passed to a fourth edition,—"Zenobia," a tragedy in prose, and a very dull performance, according to the prince of Conde's remark, and other works of little consequence.

HEDERICUS or HEDERICH, Benjamin, author of the well-known Greek lexicon, first published at Leipzig in 8vo. 1722, and republished in England by Young and Patrick, was born at Grossen-hayn in Misnia, 1675. He published besides an edition of Empedocles de sphaera, and "notitia auctorum." Ernesti, who improved his lexicon 1767, speaks of him as not a profound Greek scholar. He died 1748.

HEDLINGER, John Charles, a Swiss engraver, whose medals are much admired. He was member of various learned academies, and died 1771 aged 80.

HEEDE, William, and Vigor Van, two brothers, painters, born at Furnes. They painted historical pieces with great success. William, whose works are most esteemed, died 1728 aged 68; and the other 1708 aged 49.

HEEM, John David de, a painter of Utrecht, whose fruits and flowers were greatly admired. He died 1674 aged 74. His son Cornelius rivalled him in the beauty and correctness of his pieces.

HEEMSKERK, James, a Dutch admiral, born at Amsterdam. He was sent in 1596 under Barentein, to discover a north-east passage to Asia, and brought back his ships safe, after the death of the commander of the squadron. He was in 1607 sent as vice-admiral against the Spaniards, but fell in the battle after defeating a superior force in the Mediterranean, and capturing the enemy's admiral John Alvarez Davila.

HEEMSKIRK, Martin, vid. HEMSKIRK.

HEERE, Lucas de, an admired painter of Ghent, whose historical pieces are said to be in a very superior style. He died 1584 aged 50. His father was a good statuary, and his mother excelled as a painter.

HEGESIPPUS, a Jew who became a Christian at Rome, 157, and wrote an history of the church to his own times, some fragments of which are preserved. He died 181.—Another of the same name wrote an account of the destruction of Jerusalem.

HEIDEGGER, John Henry, a protestant divine, born at Urfevellon near Zurich. He was professor at Heidelberg, afterwards at Steinfurt, and then at Zurich, where he died 1698 aged 65. He published "Exercitationes selectæ de historiâ sacrâ Patriarcharum"—"de ratione studiorum"—"tumulus Tridentini concilii"—"historia papatus," &c.

HEIDEGGER, John James, a native of Zurich, son of a clergyman. He married in Switzerland, but in conseconsequence of an intrigue left the country, and when 50 years old, came to England on a negotiation for the Swifs. His embassy failed and with it his resources, so that he engaged as a private foldier in the guards for protection and support. His conduct and address however were such, that he soon gained the attention of his superiors, and obtained the appellation of the Swifs count. By means of his friends who were numerous in the fashionable world, he raised a subscription in 1709 to furnish the opera of Thomyris, which was performed at the Haymarket, and with such success, that he not only gained 500 guineas, but recommended himself to the public notice by his taste and judgment in the management and decorations of the theatre. George II. who was fond of operas patronised him, and he soon obtained the management of the opera house in the Hay-market, and presided over the masquerades, and was made master of the revels. Thus patronised by the king, flattered by the nobility, and courted by all, he contributed to the amusement of the public, as the arbiter elegantiarum, but while he thus raised an annual income of 5000*l.* he did not accumulate property, but expended his money in the luxuries of his table, and in honorable acts of extensive charity. His memory was so retentive that he once walked from Charing-crofs to Temple-bar, and back again, and at his return wrote down every sign on either side of the Strand. When discoursing on the most ingenious nation in Europe, he claimed the merit himself, and said, I was born a Swifs, and came to England without a farthing, where I have found means to gain 5000*l.* a-year and to spend it. Now I defy the most able Englishman to go to Switzerland and either to gain that income, or to spend it there. He died 4th Feb. 1749 aged 90, and was buried at Richmond, Surrey. He left a natural daughter, married in 1750 to captain, afterwards admiral, Denis.

HEIL, Daniel Van, a painter of Brussels, born 1604. His houses on fire are much admired.

HEIL, John Baptist, brother to Daniel, was born at Brussels 1609, and became eminent as an historical and portrait painter.

HEIL, Leonard Van, brother of the preceding, was also born at Brussels, and evinced a superior genius in the painting of flowers and insects.

HEIN, Peter, a Dutchman, who from obscurity rose to the command of the fleets of his country. He defeated the Spaniards on the coast of Brazil, 1626, and was killed off Dunkirk in a battle against the French, 1629. The state of Holland honored his memory with great respect, and consoled with his mother who coolly observed, I always said that Peter was an unlucky dog, and would come to an untimely end.

HEINECCIUS, John Gottlieb, a German lawyer, born at Eifenberg 1681. He was counsellor and professor of philosophy, and afterwards of law at Hall, from whence he removed to Franeker in 1724, and three years after, at the request of the king of Prussia to Frankfort on Oder. In 1733 he resumed his former engagements at Hall, where he died 1741. His works are numerous and respectable, on jurisprudence, logic, and morality. They were collected at Geneva in 8 vols. 4to. 1744.

HEINECKEN, Christian Henry, a remarkable child, born at Lubeck 6th Feb. 1721, and died there 27th June 1725. At 10 months' old he could talk, and before he was 12 months he knew the principal facts mentioned in the five books of Moses, and in another month he gained a complete knowledge of the rest of the old testament, and in an additional month of the new. His mental powers continued to increase so that at the age of four he could prove the doctrines of divinity from the bible, was acquainted with ecclesiastical history and could repeat 80 psalms, 200 hymns, &c. and understood and spoke perfectly the German, Latin, French, and low Dutch. These astonishing abilities were just shown to the admiration of the world, and then snatched away. Martini of Lubeck has published a dissertation on him.

HEINSIUS, Daniel, an eminent scholar born at Ghent, May 1580. After studying at the Hague, in Zeland, and at Franeker, where he displayed great abilities he came to Leyden, and at the age of 18 he was seated in the chair of Greek professor, and afterwards succeeded his friend and instructor Joseph Scaliger in the professorship of politics and history. He died 25th Feb. 1655. He was distinguished as a man of extensive learning, and great application, and possessed of a correct taste and sound judgment. He not only enriched by his labors Silius Italicus, Theocritus, Hesiod, Seneca, Homer, Theophrastus, Hesychius, Livy, Ovid, Terence, Horace, &c. but he wrote also some prose works abounding with wit, and chaste satire. He was honored and respected not only by the learned but even by princes, and especially Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, the republic of Venice, and Pope Urban VIII.

HEINSIUS, Nicholas, son to the preceding, was born at Leyden 1620. He was eminent as a poet and critic, and deserved the flattering appellation of the "swan of Holland." Though employed in the affairs of the state, he devoted much of his time to the muses, and edited several classical authors, Virgil, Ovid, Valerius Flaccus, Claudian, &c. His poems were often reprinted, but the best edition is that of Amsterdam 1666. He died at the Hague 1681, respected at home and abroad.

HEINSIUS, N. grand pensionary of Holland, died at the Hague 3d Aug. 1720, aged 87. He was in the service of William prince of Orange, and distinguished himself as a negociator in France, against the destruction of whose power he afterwards directed all the energies of his country. During the 30 years in which he was grand pensionary, he displayed great vigor of mind, but in his views of humbling the pride of Lewis XIV., he brought great difficulties and immense debts upon Holland, so that the people saw his retirement from power with pleasure and exultation.

HEISS, N. a German author who published an indifferent history of the German empire in 1684, in 2 vols. 4to.

HEISTER, Lawrence, a native of Frankfort on the Maine, professor of medicine at Altorf, and afterwards at Helmstadt where he died 1758 aged 73. He was the learned author of "Compendium anatomicum" — "institutiones chirurgicæ" — "de medicamentis German. indigenis" indigenis suffic." — "compendium institutionum medicarum," &c. — His son Elias Frederic published "Apo-logia pro Medicis Atheismo accusatis," and died at Leyden 1740.

HELE, Thomas, a native of Gloucestershire, who served in the army, especially in Jamaica, and at the peace of 1763, travelled through Italy, and in 1770 settled at Paris. He became so well acquainted with the French language, that he wrote some plays, which were received with great applause on the Paris theatres, and highly admired. His comedies, it is said, are full of plot, lively and interesting, and the dialogue is pleasing and expressed with neatness and elegance. He died of a consumptive disorder at Paris Dec. 1780 aged about 40. His "Jugement de Midas," and his "Amant Jaloux," are particularly esteemed by French writers.

HELENA, St. wife of Constantius Chlorus, and mother of the great Constantine, was born of obscure parents in Bithynia. When divorced by the marriage of her husband with Maximilian's daughter, she retired with resignation from the court, but the elevation of her son to the throne restored her to the dignity of her rank, which she adorned by devotion and christian charity. She was the founder of various churches, and in her travels into the Holy Land she is said to have discovered the true cross. She died in the arms of her son, 328, aged 80.

HELIODORUS, bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, in the fourth century, was the author of the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea condemned by a synod of bishops.

HELIOGABALUS, M. Aurel. Antonin., succeeded to the Roman empire after the death of Macrinus, though only 14. Though popular in the beginning of his reign, he became cruel, vindictive, and licentious, and was assassinated A. D. 222.

HELLENICUS, a Greek historian who died B. C. 411.

HELLOT, John, author of l'art de la teinture des laines & cloffes de laine, 12mo.—and other works of merit on philosophical and chemical subjects, was member of the Paris academy of sciences and of the London royal society. He also conducted for some time the Gazette of France, and was distinguished as an able chemist. He died at Paris 15th Feb. 1766 aged 80.

HELMBREKER, Theodore, a painter born at Haerlem 1624. He was pupil to Peter Gribber, and studied in Italy, and after being sometime resident at Haerlem he returned to Rome where he died 1694. His pieces, especially in history and landscape are much admired.

HELMONT, Matthew Van, a painter of Antwerp happy in the representation of shops, chemical laboratories, markets, &c. He died 1726.

HELMONT, John Baptist Van, a learned scholar and physician, born at Brussels 1577. He studied at Louvain, but after refusing to devote himself to divinity, he turned his attention to medicine and took his degrees in that science. His application to chemical experiments, and to the investigation of the power of herbs and plants led him to superior practice, and so extraordinary were some of his cures considered that he was brought before the inquisition as a magician who removed human diseases by more than human art.

He succeeded however in clearing himself from the imputation, and retired to the greater freedom of Holland, where he died Dec. 30. 1644. He was, says Lobkowitz his biographer, pious, learned, famous, a sworn enemy of Galen and Aristotle. The sick never languished long under his hands, being always killed or cured in two or three days. He was sent chiefly to those who were given up by other physicians, to whose great grief and indignation the patients were often unexpectedly restored to health. His works chiefly against the Peripatetics and Galenists were published in folio by his son, who acquired some fame as a physician and was falsely called in his epitaph, "nil patre inferior." He died 1699 aged 81.

HELOISE, the mistress of Abelard is celebrated for her beauty and her misfortunes. She died 1163. Vid. ABELARD.

HELISHAM, Richard, M. D. professor of physic and natural philosophy in Dublin college. He was author of 23 very popular lectures on natural philosophy published after his death by Dr. Robinson, and frequently reprinted.

HELST, Bartholemeew Van der, a painter of Haerlem who died 1670 aged 57. His representation of the train bands of Amsterdam was much admired by sir Godfrey Kneller, and is preserved in the town house of the capital.

HELVETIUS, Adrian, a Dutch physician born 1656. He was by accident at Paris when a violent dysentery prevailed there, and his remedies proved so successful that Lewis XIV. presented him with 1000 louis d'ors for the discovery of his potent medicine. He declared it to be ipecacuanha. He afterwards settled at Paris and was made physician to the duke of Orleans, and inspector general of the military hospitals. He died 1721. He left some works, the best known of which is a treatise on the most frequent maladies, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.

HELVETIUS, John Claude, son of the preceding died 1755 aged 70. He was first physician to the French queen, counsellor of state, and member of several learned academies. He cured Louis XV. of a dangerous disorder, and gained the confidence and good opinion not only of the court but of the poor, by his skill, attention, and great humanity. He published "L'idée generale de l'economie animale" 1722 8vo. — "Principia Physico-medica, in tirorum medicinarum gratiam conscripta," 2 vols. 8vo.

HELVETIUS, Claude Adrian, son of John, was born at Paris 1715, and educated with great attention under father Poree. He had a strong desire to appear as an author, but his first production "de l'esprit" in 1 vol. 4to. and afterwards in three, 8vo. 1758, exposed him to the censure of the parliament who condemned his publication as calculated more for the encouragement of vice than an incitement to virtue. Thus disgraced he came to England in 1764, and the next year visited Prussia, where the king honorably received him. On his return to France he retired in privacy to his estate at Voré, in the bosom of his family. As he was rich, he showed himself charitable to the poor, and benevolent to all. He died of an attack of the gout Dec. 1771. Besides his atheistical book "de l'Esprit" he published

"le Bonheur," a poem in six cantos, written in an affected style, — "de l'homme," 2 vols. 8vo. a work as dangerous as unphilosophical, and as impious as the first, — and the "Child of nature improved by Chance," a licentious romance. As Helvetius was a man of mild manners, and of a benevolent disposition it may surprise us, that books so little calculated to improve humanity should proceed from his pen.

HELVICUS, Christopher, professor of Greek and eastern languages, and of divinity, at Gießen university, was born 1581, at Sprendlingen near Frankfort. He was educated at Marburg, and early displayed a poetical genius, and at 20 was capable of teaching Hebrew and Greek, two languages which he spoke with great fluency. He died in the flower of his age 1617, and his immature death was deplored with feeling and sorrow by all the German poets of the Augsborg persuasion. Besides poetry he published Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee and Syriac grammars, — a Hebrew and Latin lexicon, — and some chronological tables.

HELYOT, Peter, an ecclesiastic of English extraction. He was of the order of Picpus near Paris, which was a branch of the Franciscans, and after 23 years' labor, he published in 8 vols. 4to. a history of the monastic orders, religious and military, &c. a work full of learned research and general information. He died 1716 aged 56.

HEMELAR, John, a learned man, born at the Hague, of so amiable a character for probity and disinterestedness as to deserve to be compared, says Gronovius, with the Roman Atticus. He resided six years at Rome, and preferred to the office of librarian of the Vatican a canonry in the cathedral of Antwerp. He devoted himself much to polite literature and the science of medals, and he lived in friendly intimacy with Grotius, Lipsius, and other eminent men. He published valuable commentaries on the medals of the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to Justinian, from the cabinet of Archot and Rocoxius. Besides this work which is now rare, though three times printed, he wrote poems and orations, and died 1640.

HEMMERLIN, or MALLEOLUS, Felix, a canon of Zurich in 1428. He is author of "Opuscula varia, scilicet de nobilitate et rusticitate dialogus," &c. — "variarum oblectationis opuscula," &c., comprised in a folio volume, and full of coarse humor.

HEMMINGFORD, Walter de, a canon of Gisborough abbey in Yorkshire, author of a history of England from 1066 to 1308. The work is respectable for accuracy and exactness. He died at Gisborough 1347.

HEMSKIRK, or HEEMSKIRK, Martin, a peasant's son, born in a village of that name in Holland 1498, and distinguished as a painter. After studying three years at Rome he settled at Haerlem, where he died 1574 aged 76. His pieces were admired by Michael Angelo, by Vasari and others, but though he possessed great merit, his figures show that he did not understand the chiaro oscuro.

HEMSKIRK, Egbert, a Dutch painter, known for his success in delineating droll subjects and grotesque figures.

HEMSKIRK, Egbert, called the younger, son of the preceding, united to great abilities, a lively imagination and a humorous taste. Some of his pieces in which he represents devils and witches are admired. He died 1704 aged 59.

HEMSTERHUIS, or HEMSTERHUSIUS, Tiberius, a learned critic, born at Groningen, 1st Feb. 1685, son of a physician. He studied at Groningen and Leyden, and at the age of 19 was appointed professor of mathematics and philosophy at Amsterdam. In 1717 he removed to Franeker, where he succeeded Lambert Bos as Greek professor, and in 1740 he was appointed to the chairs of Greek and of history at Leyden, where he died 1766. He published the three last books of J. Pollux's onomasticon 1706, for which he was complimented by Bentley, select colloquies of Lucian, and his Timon, 1708, — the Plutus of Aristophanes, with the scholia 1744, — part of an edition of Lucian, — notes and emendations on Xenophon Ephesus, and other equally learned works. He is praised by Ruhnkenius as a critic of very superior powers.

HEMSTERHUSIUS, Francis, son of a physician of Groningen, and grandson of Tiberius, was in the service of the United States, and died 1790. He was an able author, and wrote œuvres philosophiques, translated into French, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1793, and other works.

HENAULT, John d', a French poet, son of a Paris baker. He travelled into Holland and England, and was patronized by the superintendant Fouquet, by whose means he obtained the receivership of taxes at Fores, and other employments. He became a man of celebrity by his poetical pieces, and proud of his distinction he affected the fashionable debauchee and the impious atheist as the friend of Spinoza, but after a life of dissipation and profaneness, the approach of death seemed so terrible that he became a coward, and renounced with sorrow and deep contrition the follies and wickedness of his prosperous days. He died 1682. His best pieces are said to be his sonnet on the miscarriage of Mad. de Guerchi, and his satirical poem on Colbert, in consequence of the fall of his patron. He printed at Paris, his "œuvres diverses" in 12mo. 1670. He translated the three first books of Lucretius, but by the advice of his confessor he destroyed them. Only 100 lines copied by his friends were preserved, which are much admired by Voltaire.

HENAULT, Charles John Francis, a celebrated historian, born at Paris, 8th Feb. 1685. He early discovered a sprightly and benevolent disposition, but after being two years at the congregation of the oratory, he quitted it for the more gay society of the wits of the age. The dispute between Rousseau and De la Motte however gave him a disgust for the fallacious intimacies of the learned and the great; and devoting himself more particularly to his own improvement, he obtained the prize of eloquence in the French academy 1707, and another the following year. In 1713 he produced on the stage a tragedy, under the disguised name of Fuselier, but though it was received with indifference by the public, he regarded it as a valuable composition, and as such permitted Horace Walpole, with whom he became acquainted in 1768, to print it at Strawberry-hill. Though unsuccessful as a poet, he rose to honor as a politician. He became counsellor of parliament 1706, president of the first chamber of inquest 1710, and in 1718 he accom-accompanied the French ambassador Morville to Holland, where his abilities were respected by the Dutch, and particularly by the pensionary Heinsius. In the midst of his political occupations, Henault paid deep and lasting attention to history, and at last published his history, the result of 40 years' laborious reading and study under the modest name of "an essay" in 1744. It met with astonishing success, and not only became popular in France in nine editions, but was translated into English, German, Italian, and even Chinese. This valuable work raised him to the honor of a seat in the academy of belles lettres at Paris, and other learned societies, and he was afterwards appointed superintendent of the queen's house. He was now courted by the wit and fashion of the court, and his house was the receptacle of whatever was innocently gay, pleasing and agreeable. For the entertainment of the queen and her court he wrote three lively comedies, one of which, "le Reveil d'Epimenides," who is said to have slept 27 years, proved particularly agreeable, and he produced at the queen's request, a fourth piece called Hebe. This most respectable character died 24th Dec. 1771 aged 86. In the midst of prosperity he practised benevolence and charity, he was pious and resigned under afflictions, grateful to providence for the blessings which he enjoyed, and his manners and devotion were truly exemplary. His wife, to whom he was married 14 years, died 1728, leaving no issue. He adopted as his own children, his sister's three sons and two daughters, and had the happiness to see them form respectable connections.

HENDERSON, Alexander, a Scotchman, who acquired some celebrity at the head of the presbyterian party. He was one of the divines sent to meet Charles I. at Newcastle 1646, but though he possessed eloquence and abilities, it is said that in disputing with the monarch about episcopacy, he found his arguments too futile to resist the superior reasons of his unfortunate master. This it is said had such effect upon his spirits, that he died soon after, and in his last moments, expressed great contrition for the severity and rancor with which he had opposed the king's measures in Scotland.

HENDERSON, John, an English actor of eminence, born in London. He at first learnt painting under Fournier, an able artist, but he quitted him to work in the shop of a silversmith, and after his death he appeared on the stage at Bath 1772, in the character of Hamlet, under the assumed name of Courtney. The opinion which he had formed of his theatrical powers, was greeted by the applauses of crowded audiences, and after acquiring celebrity in provincial companies, he for the first time, presented himself before a London audience, at the Hay-Market, under Coleman as Skylock. The approbation with which he was received excited him to greater exertions, and he soon became the popular representative of Falstaff, Richard III, Pierre and other difficult characters at Drury Lane. He died suddenly 25th Nov. 1785, of a spasmodic affection in the brain, aged 38. His life has been published by Ireland.

HENDERSON, John, an extraordinary character, born at Ballegarance in Ireland 1757. He was educated in the principles of his father who was an itinerant preacher of Wesley's persuasion, and who for some time settled near Bristol as a schoolmaster, and under him he made such astonishing progress, that he taught Latin in Kingwood school at the age of eight, and Greek in lady Huntingdon's college in Wales, when he was no more than 12. These extraordinary powers were seen and encouraged by dean Tucker, who sent him to Pembroke college, Oxford, where he staid long enough to take his first degree, but was not admitted to orders though his friends wished to see his oratorical abilities exerted in the pulpit. These brilliant parts were unfortunately clouded by great and often offensive singularities. In his person, he affected great negligence, his long unpowdered hair gave him an air of religious melancholy, he never wore a neckcloth, his buckles on his shoes were of the most diminutive size, and the rest of his dress exhibited him particularly hostile to the reigning fashions of the times. Though eagerly courted in the university for his great fund of knowledge, and the inexhaustible resources of his mental powers, he at length rendered himself disagreeable by the lateness to which he protracted his visits. Seldom in bed before the dawn of day, he rose late in the afternoon, and as if setting at defiance the powers of nature, he would often go half naked to the pump and desire the college servants to pump over him for several minutes, and then in that condition he retired to his bed. Those who frequented his company have often been astonished at the vastness of his powers, which adorned with all the flowers of oratory and elegant language the most abstruse and barren subjects. Though well skilled in general knowledge, he was particularly attached to physiognomy, alchemy and the occult arts, and in some instances he has been known to prostitute his great talents in diving into futurity, and anticipating the mournful accidents of life. This eccentric genius died in Pembroke college 2d Nov. 1788, and was carried by his father to Bristol to be there interred.

HENGIST, a Saxon chief who came to England at the request of king Vortigern, whom he assisted in repelling the Picts. The British monarch married Rowena, the daughter of his ally, and Hengist, in reward for his services, obtained the kingdom of Kent, and died 489.

HENLEY, Anthony, an English senator, born of a respectable family in Hampshire. He was educated at Oxford, and early distinguished himself for his classical taste. In London he gained the friendship and familiarity of the great, and as the associate of Dorset and Sunderland he figured on the circles of fashion, and passed at Will's and Tom's as a man of wit and facetiousness. As his affections were benevolent and his heart generous, he was addressed by the poets and writers of the age as a patron and a guide, and the command of an independent fortune of upwards of 3000l. a year was in the midst of mirth and gallantry, liberally applied to the remuneration of the flattering muse. In 1698 soon after his marriage with the daughter of the Hon. Peregrine Bertie, he was elected member for Andover, and in succeeding parliaments for Weymouth. He was in his political career, a firm and eloquent whig, and he drew upon himself the persecution of the tories by moving the house to address the queen to confer some ecclesiastical dignity on Mr. Ben.

Howdly,

Hoadly, whose attachment to the revolution was then publicly known. As a writer he distinguished himself by various anonymous publications, and in the Tatler and Medley, appeared many of his pieces, remarkable for their wit, ease and fluency, and for that genius and vivacity with which he assumed the character and language of masters and servants, peasants and tradesmen, parents and children. He was very fond of music, and in his summer recreations he had a private theatre at Southwick, where Betterton, Booth, Mrs. Barry, and other great performers were generally invited to exhibit and join their abilities to his exertions, for the amusement of his friends. He died 1711, universally lamented. His second son became Lord Northampton, and chancellor of England.

HENLEY, John, well known by the appellation of "orator Henley," was born at Melton Mowbray, 3d Aug. 1692, where his father was vicar, and after receiving instruction in the grammar school of his native town, and that of Oakeham, Rutland, he entered at the age of 17 at St. John's college, Cambridge. When he had taken his bachelor's degree he was invited by the trustees of Melton school to take care of that foundation, and he raised it from a languishing to a flourishing state. He now courted the public approbation by the appearance of his Esther, a poem, and when he had entered into orders he left the country for fame and preferment in the capital. Followed as a preacher determined to create public notice, he introduced regular action into the pulpit, and courted popularity a thousand ways, but when disappointed of the preferment he expected, he formed a plan for lectures and orations. Every Sunday he discoursed on theological subjects, while Wednesday was reserved for political subjects, into which he poured much of the gall of satire against the great, the powerful, and the learned. To this acrimonious spirit he indeed owes the distinguished place which he holds in Pope's Dunciad, as "the zany of his age." Admission was procured to his oratorial theatre by the payment of a shilling, and as the lowest of the people formed the most numerous part of his audience, the daily advertiser generally announced the topics which were to be discussed on each day, by this artful and commanding preacher at his oratory near Lincoln's Inn fields. He died 14th Oct. 1756. He published an account of himself and his adventures, and it is easily discovered that to personal vanity he added effrontery, and obtained popularity by bold invectives and satirical censoriousness. The medals which he struck for admission to his lectures represented a star rising to the meridian with "Inveniam viam aut faciam." Hogarth has immortalized his name by introducing him into two of his humorous pieces, in one of which he is christening a child, and in the other he appears on a scaffold with a monkey by his side with the motto "amen," and with other appropriate figures. Henley it is said gained 100l. a year by editing a periodical paper called the Hip Doctor, which was a farrago of nonsense. On one occasion he filled his oratory with shoemakers, by announcing to them he would teach a new and short way of making shoes, which was by cutting off the tops of boots.

HENNINGES, Jerome, a German historian in the 16th century. He devoted himself much to genealogical history, and his "Theatrum Genealogicum" 6 vols. folio, 1598, is a valuable work, containing the account of several of the chief families of Germany, &c.

HENNUYER, John, bishop of Lisieux, is justly celebrated for his great humanity at the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholemew. He boldly opposed the king's orders to assassinate the protestants, and instead of violating their persons, he openly protected them; yet from this opposition to tyranny, he was never censured by the monarch; so great was the respect paid to his persevering virtue and dignity. He died 1577, universally lamented, and revered for his mildness, humanity and piety.

HENRIOT, Nicholas, a native of Troyes, in Champagne, member of the academy of inscriptions. He was engaged in composing a work on the weights and measures of the ancients, of which his death in 1720, at the age of 50 prevented the completion. With an extravagant imagination he described Adam as 132 feet 9 inches high, and Eve 118 feet 9 inches, but gradually reduced the size of his gigantic heroes, and made Abraham 27 feet, Moses 13, Hercules 10, and Alexander only 6.

HENRY I. surnamed the Fowler, emperor of Germany, was son of Otho duke of Saxony, and elected to the throne 919. He was a brave and politic prince, he exerted his influence among the princes of Germany to restore union; and to render the country more powerful, he built and fortified towns to withstand the attacks of the barbarians. He confirmed his regulations by the establishment of wise and salutary laws, and the introduction of the patrician order for the distinction and encouragement of merit. In war he was successful against the duke of Bavaria, he conquered the Bohemians, Slavonians, and Danes; and invaded the kingdom of Lorraine, and defeated the Hungarians at the famous battle of Mersburg. He died 2d July 936, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son Otho.

HENRY II. emperor of Germany, surnamed the Lamé, was grand-son of the preceding, and ascended the imperial throne 1002. After defeating the duke of Bavaria, he re-established Benedict VIII. in the Holy see, and was crowned by him at Rome 1014, with great solemnity. He also drove the Greeks and Saracens from Calabria, and after restoring tranquillity over Italy and Germany, and every where leaving marks of his great generosity, and extensive benevolence, he died 13th July 1024, aged 47.

HENRY III. emperor of Germany, succeeded his father Conrad in 1039. After making war in Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia, he passed into Italy, and expelled from the papal throne Benedict IX. Sylvester III. and Gregory VI. and in their room elected Clement II. by whom he was crowned. He died at Botfeld in Saxony, 5th Oct. 1056, aged 39, and was buried at Spire.

HENRY IV. the aged or great, emperor of Germany after his father Henry III. though only six years old, was governed during his minority by the wisdom of his mother Agnes. When grown up to manhood, Henry displayed ability in opposing the insurgents of Germany, and Saxony, but when he supplicated the interference of pope Gregory VII. to restore order by his spiritual but Robert was defeated in Normandy, and dragged a prisoner to England, where the last years of his life were past in close confinement in Cardiff castle. In his government Henry was wise and moderate, though he exercised absolute power. He opposed the encroachments of the church of Rome; he not only patronized learning, and restored the university of Cambridge, but deserved the name of Beau Clerc from his intimate acquaintance with literature. He was severe against robbers, but he had the good sense to abolish the curfew bell so galling to the English, and he established an universal standard of weights and measures. While he watched over the prerogative of the crown, he had respect for the liberties of the people, and from the charters which he granted may be derived the freedom of which the nation is now so deservedly proud. Henry died in Normandy 1185, aged 68, and was buried in Reading abbey. As his only son had been drowned in crossing from Normandy, he left his possessions to his daughter Matilda, but Stephen usurped the crown at his death.

HENRY II. king of England, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, duke of Anjou, by Matilda, daughter of Henry I. was born 1132. In 1150 he was made duke of Normandy, and the next year married Eleanor the heiress of Poitou and Guienne, and in 1153 on the death of Eustace, Stephen's son, he was acknowledged successor to the English throne, which he ascended the next year. To his extensive possessions in France he added Britany by conquest, and he afterwards conquered Ireland, which since that time has formed part of the British dominions. Though wise in his government, Henry had to struggle with the clergy, whose ambition, it was his wish to repress. The murder of Thomas à Becket, the primate, which was falsely attributed to the king, tended however to increase rather than diminish the power of the church, and the monarch could reconcile himself to the offended pope only by solemnly exculpating himself on oath of the alleged crime, and by submitting patiently with every mark of penance and contrition to the discipline inflicted on him by the monks of Canterbury. Though respected at home and abroad, and successful in his expeditions against France, and against Scotland, Henry did not however find that happiness at the close of life which he might deserve. His children, excited by the arts of the French king, rebelled against him, and their ingratitude proved so grievous that it is said he died of a broken heart, when he found his favorite son John in the number of his enemies. He expired at Chinon in Touraine 6th July 1189. The reign of Henry was marked by the striking character of firmness, wisdom, valor, genius and popularity. He reformed abuses, corrected the laws, repressed the power of the barons, and advanced the interests and the consequence of the people. Unfortunately however these high qualities were obscured by excessive pride, boundless ambition and an unceasing propensity to sensual pleasures, which not only revolted the affections of his queen from him, but tended to embitter the close of his life.

HENRY III. was son and successor of John on the English throne 1216. He lost by his ill conduct the provinces of Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Maine and Touraine, which were conquered by the king of France, and after a disgraceful campaign he retired to England, where the barons, headed by Montfort made war against him and took him prisoner at the battle of Lewes. The valor of his son Edward again set him at liberty, at the battle of Evesham, but Henry was not become wiser by adversity, and instead of devoting himself to the prudent and impartial government of his people, he gave loose to every base and intemperate pleasure; and while he could levy money to satisfy his favorites and parasites, he permitted the pope to plunder the clergy, and to impoverish the kingdom. This worthless monarch, to whose weakness indeed the people of England may be said to owe the establishment of their democratic government, died after a long reign of 56 years, 15th Nov. 1272, aged 65.

HENRY IV. king of England, son of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, the third son of Edward III. ascended the throne after the deposition of Richard II. 1399. This usurpation excited the civil wars between the two roses, or the houses of York and Lancaster. Henry, after an useful rather than a splendid reign, died 20th March 1413, aged 46, and was succeeded by his son.

HENRY V. son and successor of Henry IV. was remarkable in his youth for his debauchery, and the wildness of his conduct. Better reflection however produced the happiest reformation, and when raised to the throne, he bid adieu to the companions of his licentious hours, and displayed the great and virtuous monarch. He formed the resolution of conquering France, and after taking Harfleur, and ravaging Normandy, he fought the celebrated battle of Agincourt, in which his 15,000 men obtained the victory over 52,000 French men. Three years after he again visited France, and every where proved victorious, so that he was received at Paris as the future master of the kingdom. He married Catherine of France, and was declared heir to the kingdom after the death of Charles VI. the reigning monarch: but whilst these successes promised stability and security to his power, the sudden attack of a fistula, at that time considered as incurable, proved fatal. Henry died at Vincennes 31st August 1422, aged 36, highly respected for valor, prudence, benevolence, and the regular observance of every religious and moral duty.

HENRY VI. son of Henry V. was only ten months old when he succeeded to his father on the English throne. The death of his grandfather Charles VI. soon after, left him also the title of sovereign of France; but a rival arose in the duke of Orleans to dispute his title under the name of Charles VII. Though the young king was crowned with every appearance of popularity at Paris, and though his cause was ably supported by the valor of his uncle the duke of Bedford, yet the English affairs began to decline at the appearance of Joan of Arc. This famous heroine relieved Orleans, which the English were besieging, and inspiring courage in her countrymen, and superstitious terror in her enemies, she recovered with astonishing rapidity, the vast territories which had cost so much English blood to acquire. The death of Bedford hastened also the downfall of the English power in France, and Henry when come to years of manhood, did not display those powers of mind, and that decision of character, so necessary in times of danger and civil war. Though his wife Margaret of Anjou possessed great talents, and even the valor which distinguished the heroes of those days, he was nevertheless unsuccessful in the battles between the two roses. He was taken prisoner, and led about as a captive; but though he recovered his liberty by the fall of Richard duke of York, his opponent, it was only to be exposed to fresh insults. The fallen duke's son Edward laid claim to the crown, and had abilities and troops to support those pretensions, and after various battles he at last prevailed in the fight of St. Alban's, and was proclaimed king. Henry, who had remained a passive spectator of the ambition and of the courage of his wife, and of the slaughter of his people, was sent to the tower, where he was soon after murdered, as it is supposed, by the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. 1471. There was such mildness and moderation in the character of the unfortunate Henry, that in private life he would have been a most amiable man.

HENRY VII. son of Edmund, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret, of the house of Lancaster, was enabled by the assistance of the duke of Brittany, and of Charles VIII. of France, to invade England and to defeat the usurper Richard III. The battle of Bosworth field, and the death of Richard 1485, left Henry in peaceful possession of the throne. He was crowned on the field of battle, and devoted himself to improve and to protect those dominions which his valor had acquired, and his prudence merited. His tranquillity however was disturbed by the arts of two impostors, one of whom, Lambert Simnel, son of a baker, assumed, at the instigation of the lady Margaret, sister of Edward IV. the title of Richard the duke of York, who had been murdered in the tower by the duke of Gloucester. The imposture for a while succeeded, but Henry at last obtained possession of the person of his ignoble rival, whom in derision he made a scullion in his kitchen. The other impostor was Perkin Warbeck, the son of a Jew, who personated young Edward V. and after he had for some time alarmed the kingdom, he was taken and executed at Tyburn. The reign of Henry formed a new era in the English history. The happiness of his people was the guide of his conduct, and though he loved money, it is certain that no monarch ever contributed more to the establishment of commerce, to the encouragement of industry, and to the protection of arts. He had discovered how dangerous the overgrown power of the nobles is to the monarch and to the people, and wise laws therefore were enacted to curb their ambition, and to treat them as subjects and no longer as petty sovereigns. This great and good king died 22d April 1509, aged 52. He had married Elizabeth the daughter of Edward IV. and he thus united the claims of the two rival houses, which had so long deluged England in blood.

HENRY VIII. son and successor to Henry VII. ascended the throne 1509, at the age of 18. The salutary instructions which he had imbibed under his father, for a while guided the young monarch, whose reign was wise, popular, and useful. Arbitrary in his conduct and capricious in his opinions, Henry soon however showed himself a tyrant. He was persuaded by the emperor Maximilian, and by pope Julius II. to make war against France, and his invasion of that kingdom was attended with success; but pleasure and not military glory was the ambition of the monarch, and at the persuasion of his favorite, cardinal Wolsey, he soon made peace, to be enabled to dissipate in licentious enjoyments the money which he had acquired by conquest and by treaty. When the reformation was begun in Germany by the preaching of Luther, Henry, who was well skilled in school divinity, defended the papal power against the reformer, and with such effect, that the pope in flattery called him defender of the faith. His attachment to Rome soon after vanished, when the pope refused to grant him a divorce, and empower him to marry Anne Boleyn, of whom he was enamoured. Unable to prevail with the pope to separate him from his queen, with whom he had lived 18 years, but with whom he now scrupled to cohabit because she had been his brother's wife, he declared war against the church of Rome. He not only proclaimed himself head of the church, but he abolished all the monasteries over the kingdom, and seized the ecclesiastical funds, which were lavished wantonly on his favorites and parasites. Thus married to Anne Boleyn, he soon changed his affections to another object, and conducting the ill-fated queen to a scaffold, he took for his third wife Jane Seymour, who the next year died in childbed. His fourth wife was Anne of Cleves, whom he divorced as he found her more corpulent and less agreeable than he expected; and for his fifth he took Catherine Howard, who soon after expired on the scaffold on a charge of adultery. He afterwards married Catherine Parr, widow of lord Latimer, who survived him, and after a reign of turbulence, violence, and oppression, he expired 28th Jan. 1547, aged 57. Though Henry was the unworthy instrument of the introduction of the reformation into England, he must be detected in his character as a capricious, unfeeling, and licentious tyrant; of whom it was truly said, that he never spared a man in his anger, nor a woman in his lust. During his reign, Fisher, sir Thomas More, Cromwell, and other illustrious characters were sacrificed to the passions of the monarch, and no minister could ever be either so virtuous or so favored as to escape the resentment of a changeful despotic master. Out of the dissolved monasteries Henry founded six new bishoprics, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, and Westminster, the last of which has since been incorporated with that of London.

HENRY prince of Wales, eldest son of James I. was a most promising and amiable youth. He died 1612, aged 18, universally lamented by the nation, who viewed in him their future friend and common benefactor.

HENRY of Huntingdon, an ancient historian, whose history of England to the year 1154, was published by Saville 1576. He was archdeacon of Huntingdon and canon of Lincoln, in the 12th century, and wrote besides a Latin treatise on the Contempt of the World, &c.

HENRY, Philip, an English non-conformist divine, called by some of his party, "the good and the heavenly," was born at Whitehall 1631, and educated at Westminster school, under Busby. In 1648 he was admitted a student of Christ church, and after taking his master's degree he went into Flintshire, as tutor to the sons of judge Puleston, where he was ordained according to the forms of the presbytery, and where he married the heiress of Dan. Matthews of Broad-oak, Shropshire, and thus acquired independence and ease. At the restoration he refused to conform, and therefore was ejected. For the last 28 years of his life, he resided at Broad-oak, and there behaved with great moderation, benevolence, and in an exemplary manner; but still adhered to the dissenting principles by preaching to some few in a barn.

HENRY, Matthew, an eminent dissenting divine, son of the above, was born 1662. He was carefully instructed under the watchful eye of his father, and early initiated in classical literature; but though he entered at Gray's inn, and there for some time studied the law with zeal and assiduity, he had a strong predilection for divinity, and after his return into the country began to preach. He was invited to a congregation at Chester, where he was ordained, and where he lived 25 years. He was afterwards prevailed upon to remove to Hackney near London. He died of an apoplectic fit at Nantwich 1714, and was buried in Trinity church, Chester. His great worth was ascertained by the various funeral sermons which his death occasioned. As a writer his labors are highly valued, as the author of some sermons, and other theological pieces, and practical divinity, but especially his Expositions of the Bible, in 5 vols. folio, a valuable and most excellent performance.

HENRY, Robert, a Scotch divine, born Feb. 18, 1718, at Muir-town, St. Ninian's, where his father was a farmer. After being at the school of St. Ninian, and of Stirling, he completed his studies at Edinburgh, and became master of Annan grammar school. In 1748 he was invited to Carlisle by the presbyterians there, and was ordained their minister, and after 12 years' residence among them, he removed to Berwick-on-Tweed, where he married the daughter of Mr. Balderston, a surgeon. In 1768 he was appointed minister of the New Greyfriars at Edinburgh; and two years after the degree of D. D. was honorably conferred upon him by the university; and in 1776 he became colleague minister in the old church, where he continued till his death Nov. 1790. Dr. Henry is author of an history of England on a new plan, which he first conceived in 1763, but did not produce before the public till 1771. He arranges his materials under seven interesting heads, civil and military history, the history of religion, the history of the constitution and laws, the history of learning and learned men, the history of arts, that of commerce, money, &c. — and lastly, that of manners and customs. This laborious work, of which the second 4to. volume appeared in 1774, the third 1777, the fourth 1781, the fifth 1785, and the sixth, which is posthumous, 1793, has merited the public approbation by the large editions which have been printed in a 4to. and 8vo. form. The Scotch critics indeed at first censured the work; but the English regarded it with more propitious omens, and the author for 1000l. conveyed his property in his volumes to Messrs. Cadell and Strahan, and reflected with satisfaction that his history produced him altogether no less than 3300l. Dr. Henry in his private character, was an amiable man, fond of society, and in his clerical conduct, he was exemplary and devout.

HENRY, David, a respectable printer, born in Dec. 1710. He is particularly known as the conductor of the gentleman's magazine for above fifty years, in the management of which he succeeded the original proprietor, Cave, whose sister he married 1736. Besides valuable communications to his magazine, he published, a System of Husbandry 1772—an Account of the Voyages round the World, 4 vols. 8vo. 1774, and other smaller works. He died 5th June 1792.

HERACLITUS, a philosopher of Ephesus, 500 years B. C. called the mourner, from his weeping at the follies of mankind. He died aged 60.

HERACLIUS, son of Heraclius governor of Africa, dethroned Phocas, and ascended the throne of Constantinople 610. He defeated Chosroes the Persian king, who had laid waste Palestine, and he recovered the Cross, which he carried back to Jerusalem on his shoulders. In his reign there were severe theological disputes, and the Saracens began their hostilities against the Roman power in the east. He died 641, and was succeeded by his sons Heraclius, Constantine, and Heraclonas. Heraclius was poisoned a few months after by his mother-in-law Martina.

HERACLIUS, patriarch of Jerusalem, disgraced himself by his licentiousness and hypocrisy. He was greatly displeased with Henry II. of England, because, in consequence of his determination to do penance for Becket's murder, he did not undertake a crusade to Jerusalem.

HERALDUS, Desiderius, or HERAULT, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, author of several learned works, among which were, "Adversaria," 1599; besides notes on Tertullian's Apology, on Minutius Felix, Arnobius, Martial, &c. He died June 1649. His son was minister of the Walloon church in London, and fled during the civil wars to France, as a royalist; at the restoration he obtained a canonry in Canterbury cathedral. He published some sermons.

HERBELOT, Bartholomew, a well-known French orientalist, born at Paris 14th Dec. 1625. He applied himself assiduously to the oriental languages, especially Hebrew, and after visiting Rome and Italy for 18 months, he settled at Paris, where he became interpreter for Eastern languages. He again went to Rome in 1666, and was received every where with uncommon respect, not only by the learned, but by the duke of Tuscany, who liberally entertained him in his palace, and presented him with some valuable oriental manuscripts. The homage paid to his abilities abroad, rendered him more respected at home. Colbert recalled him to patronize him, and he quitted Florence to the great regret of the duke. While in Italy, he began his Bibliothèque Orientale, containing whatever related to the knowledge of the Eastern world, and he completed it in France. It was originally written in Arabic, bie, but he translated it into French. He died 8th Dec. 1695, before the printing of his work was finished, which was not indeed published before 1697, in a large folio. This learned man, respectable in the possession of all the virtues of private life, wrote also a Turkish, Arabian, Persian, and Latin dictionary, &c. which have never been published. The best edition of his Bibliothèque, is in 6 vols. 8vo. Paris 1782.

HERBERT, Mary, sister of Sir Philip Sidney, and countess of Pembroke, is known as the translator of Annius, a tragedy, from the French, in 12mo. 1595, and of the Psalms of David. She died at her house Aldergate street. London, 25th Sept. 1621; and this epitaph was placed on her grave by the pen of Ben Jonson:

Underneath this sable hearse,
Lies the subject of all verse,
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother.
Death! e're thou killest such another,
Fair, and good, and learned as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.

HERBERT, Edward, lord Herbert of Cherbury, Shropshire, was born at Montgomery castle in Wales, 1581. He was educated at University college, Oxford, and after travelling abroad, he was made a knight banneret, and counsellor to the king, and was afterwards sent as ambassador to Lewis XIII. of France, to interfere for the protestants of that kingdom. Though for a while disgraced, in consequence of a quarrel with De Luines, the French minister, he was restored to favor, and made an Irish peer in 1625, and a peer of England 1631. During the civil wars he forgot the kindness of his master, and sided with the parliament. He died at his house Queen street London, 20th Aug. 1648, and was buried in St. Giles's church in the fields. He wrote various books, the best known of which are, de Veritate, in which he supports the tenets of the deists, a work refuted by Gassendi — the History of the Life and Reign of Henry VIII. a performance of merit — de Religione Gentilium — memoirs, &c.

HERBERT, George, brother to the preceding, was born at Montgomery castle, 3d April 1593, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was in 1619 chosen orator of the university, in which office he continued eight years, and when he was disappointed in court favors, he took orders, and obtained a prebend in Lincoln cathedral, and Bemerton rectory in Wilts. He died about 1635, and left behind him an excellent character, not only as an exemplary divine, but as an elegant poet. His poems, consisting of the Temple — Priest to the Temple, &c. were published together in 12mo. and though now little read, were once highly esteemed.

HERBERT, William, earl of Pembroke, was born at Wilton house, and educated at New college, Oxford, and in 1601 succeeded to his paternal titles and estates. He was in 1626 elected chancellor of Oxford, and made steward of the royal household, and he died suddenly four years after. His poems were published in 8vo. 1660.

HERBERT, Thomas, a native of York, related to the Pembroke family. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford, from which he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, and then went abroad. After four years' absence he returned, and in 1634 published his interesting travels in Asia and Africa, in folio. During the civil wars he joined the parliament, but afterwards deserted a cause which he began to regard as violent and unconstitutional, and he was reconciled to his royal master, whom he attended in his captivity. He was at the restoration created a baronet. He died at York 1st March 1682. He wrote besides Threnodia Carolina, or the Historical Account of the two last Years of the Life of Charles I. 8vo. Several of his MSS. are preserved at Oxford, and at York.

HERBINIUS, John, a native of Bitchsen in Silesia, who was deputed by the protestants of Poland to those of Germany. His observations in his travels on cataracts and water-falls, were published in 1678 in 4to. called de Admirandis Mundi Cataractis, &c. He wrote also Terræ Motus Examen — de Statu Ecclesiarum Augustanæ Confessionis in Polonia, 4to. &c. He died 1676 aged 44.

HERISSANT, Lewis Anthony Prosper, son of a printer, was born at Paris, and died there 10th Aug. 1709 aged 24. He was eminent as a poet, and as a physician, and wrote l'Eloge de Gonthier d'Andernach, crowned by the faculty of medicine — l'Eloge de Ducange — poem on Printing — Bibliothèque physique de la France — Catalogue raisonné des Plantes.

HERITIER, Nicolas P. a French poet, nephew to du Vair keeper of the seals. He became by purchase treasurer of the French guards, and afterwards historiographer of France. He wrote two tragedies, Hercule Furieux, and Clovis, and other fugitive pieces, and died 1680.

HERITIER, Marie Jeanne P. de Villandon, daughter of the preceding, was born at Paris 1664. She was member of the academy of Jeux Floraux, and of the Ricovrati at Padua, and deserved the distinction which she received for her genius and abilities. Her works are both prose and verse. She wrote la Tour Tenebreuse — a tale, les Caprices du Destin, a novel — l'Avare Puni, in verse, and other poems, besides a translation of 16 of Ovid's epistles. She died at Paris 1734.

HERITIER DE BRUTELLE, Charles Lewis P. a native of Paris, eminent for his botanical knowledge. He published in London the Flora of Peru, from the valuable collection of plants, &c. brought from Peru and Chili by Dombey, in 1786, and on his return to Paris, he printed another work, called Flore de la Place Vendôme. This learned and ingenious man was assassinated on his return from the National Institute at Paris, 10th Aug. 1801, and his murderers were never discovered. He was then 56 years old. He wrote besides Stirpes Novæ, folio 1784 — Cornus Siftens, folio 1789 — Sertum Anglicum, &c.

HERLICIUS, David, a German astrologer, born 1557. He acquired celebrity and money by his almanacks, and pretended prophecies.

HERMAN, Paul, a botanist of Halle in Saxony, who was physician to the Dutch settlements at Ceylon, and afterwards became botanical professor at Leyden, where he died 1695. He wrote a catalogue of the plants in the public garden of Leyden, 8vo. — Cynofura Materia Medica.

medicæ, 2 vols. 4to. — Lugduno-Batavi Flores — Paradisus Batavus — Museum Zeylanicum, 1717.

HERMANN, James, a mathematician of Basle. He was for three years mathematical professor at Padua, and afterwards assisted the Czar Peter in the establishment of his academy, and then was appointed morality professor at Basle, where he died 1733 aged 55. He wrote several works on mathematics: — Responso ad Considerationes de Princip. Calculi Different. — de Phoronomia — de Nova Accelerationis Lege, &c. — Disquis. de Vibrationibus Chordarum tenfarum — Solutio Problematis de Trajector. curvar.

HERMANT, Godefroi, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Beauvais 1617, and patronised by the bishop of that see. He became rector of the university of Paris 1646, and died 1690. He possessed learning and application. His works are chiefly on theological subjects, besides the lives of St. Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, &c.

HERMAS, Pastor, or shepherd, one of the fathers, supposed to have died at Rome, 81 A. D. and to be the person mentioned in the epistle to the Romans. His "Shepherd" was translated into English by archbishop Wake.

HERMES, Trismegistus, an Egyptian priest, who instructed his countrymen in hieroglyphics, &c. He flourished A. M. 2076.

HERMIAS, a heretic of Galatia in the second century. He considered the soul as formed of fire and spirit, and asserted the materiality of God, and the eternity of the world.

HERMILLY, Vaquette d', author of the history of Majorca and Minorca, and of a translation of Ferrera's history of Spain, and of father Feijoo's Critical Theatre, was a native of Amiens, and died at Paris 1778, aged 71.

HERMOGENES, a rhetorician of Tarsus in the second century, whose works are edited, Geneva, 1614, 8vo.

HERMOGENES, a heretic of Africa in the second century. He was of the Stoic sect, and regarded idea as the mother of all the elements.

HEROD the great, was born at Ascalon in Judæa, and made tetrarch or king by Anthony. He died three years after the birth of our Saviour, aged 70.

HEROD ANTIPAS, son and successor of the great Herod, repudiated his wife to marry Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, and put John the Baptist to death. It was before him that our Saviour was made to appear by Pilate.

HERODIAN, a Greek historian, A. D. 247. His History of Rome in eight books, was elegantly translated by Politian.

HEROBOTUS, an historian of Halicarnassus, called the father of history. He wrote an account in nine books, of the wars of Persia against Greece, till the reign of Xerxes, and received the universal applause of the Greeks at the Olympic games. He flourished 444 B. C. The best edition is Wesseling's 1763.

HEROPHILUS, a physician of Chalcedon 570 B. C. He was an able anatomist, and is said to have discovered the lacteal vessels.

HERRERA TORDESILLAS, Antonio de, a celebrated

Spanish historian. He was at first secretary to Vespasian Gonzaga, viceroy of Naples, and afterwards historiographer of India, with a pension, in which honorable office he published his general history of India, from 1492 to 1554, in 4 vols. folio. He died 1625 aged 60; and a little before his death, he had been made by Philip IV. secretary of state. His Indian history is a most valuable performance, very accurate, though the style is now and then too inflated. He wrote also an history of Spain, three vols. folio, not equally esteemed.

HERERAS, Ferdinand de, a poet of Seville, who published some elegant lyric and heroic poetry, 1582. He wrote also in prose a Life of sir Thomas More — an Account of the War in Cyprus — and the Battle of Lepanto, &c.

HERRING, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born 1693 at Walsoken, Norfolk, where his father was rector. He was educated at Wisbech school, and in 1710 entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was elected fellow of Corpus Christi in 1716, and became tutor there, and when in orders, minister of Great Shelford, &c. In 1722 he was made chaplain to Fleetwood, bishop of Ely, and four years after, chosen preacher at Lincoln's inn, about which time he took his degree of D. D. and was nominated chaplain to the king. In 1731 he was made dean of Rochester, in 1737 consecrated bishop of Bangor, and in 1743 translated to York. At the breaking out of the rebellion, the archbishop exerted himself actively to rouse the people in his county and around him to a sense of their duty, and by his eloquent appeal, procured a subscription of 40,000l. for the defence of the country, which was immediately seconded by the kingdom. These high services were rewarded by his elevation to the see of Canterbury, on the death of Potter 1747. A violent fever in 1753 shattered his constitution so much, that he afterwards retired to the privacy of Croydon, where he saw none but his immediate friends. He died after a languishing illness of four years, 13th March 1757, and was privately buried in Croydon church, according to his desire. Herring was as amiable in private as he was respected in public life. He liberally expended 6000l. in the repairs of Lambeth and Croydon palaces and gardens, and was a noble contributor to several charities. In 1763 his sermons on public occasions, were published, and a volume of his letters has been presented to the world by the reverend Mr. Duncombe.

HERSENT, Charles, or Herfan, a French divine, known by his severe satire against Richelieu, whom he accused, in his book called, "Optati Galli de cavendo Schismate," of intentions of separating the Gallican church, like the English, from the see of Rome. The book was answered by three or four writers at the suggestion of the cardinal, but the writer escaped his pursuit by flying to Rome, where he drew the vengeance of the inquisition upon him, by his opinions on the doctrine of grace. He was excommunicated for contumacy, and returned to France, where he died 1660. He wrote besides a paraphrase on Solomon's Song, &c.

HERTZBERG, Ewald Fredericbon, a native of Pomerania, merania, raised by his abilities to a high situation in the office of secretary of foreign affairs at Berlin, and afterwards employed as ambassador at Vienna. His knowledge of political affairs was eminently displayed in his essay on the Population of the Marche of Brandenburg, which was in 1752 rewarded with the prize of the Berlin academy of sciences, and in consequence of his experience in diplomatic affairs, and his deep acquaintance with the interests of states, every paper of importance, and every memorial of communication with foreign powers was submitted to his enlightened mind. He was thus raised to the highest offices in the kingdom, and ennobled. He died 1795 aged 70.

HERVEY, James, an eminent divine, born at Hardington, Northamptonshire, and educated at Northampton grammar school, and Lincoln college, Oxford. In 1736 he served the curacy of Weston Favel for his father, and afterwards removed to Biddeford, and in 1750 succeeded on his father's death to the livings of Weston and Collingtree. In the discharge of his pastoral duties, he was zealously active and vigilant, in his conduct exemplary, and in his manners pious, humane and charitable. His heart was so warmly actuated by benevolent motives, that he expressed a wish to die "even with the world," and therefore his income and the profits which he derived from his popular and valuable publications were carefully devoted to the comfort and support of the poor and wretched in his neighbourhood. This good and benevolent character, whose constitution was undermined by a slow consumption, died on Christmas-day 1758 aged 44. As a scholar, his abilities were respectable, he was well skilled in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and in his compositions he aimed not so much to be polished and sublime, as to be plain and useful. His Meditations among the Tombs, and Reflections in a Flower Garden, were first published 1746, and as they were well received by the public, he added another volume, and Theron and Asaph, or Dialogues and Letters on the most important subjects, 3 vols. 8vo. appeared 1755. a work strongly supporting the doctrines of Calvin. — He wrote besides sermons — letters to J. Wesley — letters to lady Frances Shirley — an edition of Jenks' Meditations, &c. His works have been edited in 7 vols. 8vo. 1796, with his life prefixed.

HERVEY, Augustus John, earl of Bristol, was early engaged in the navy, and in 1744 married Miss Chudleigh, afterwards better known as duchess of Kingston. He was in 1747 made post captain, and served with credit in the Mediterranean. He was in 1763 groom of the royal bed-chamber, and in 1771 was made a lord of the admiralty, and three years after succeeded to his brother's title and estates. In 1768 his wife had her marriage annulled in the commons, but the proceedings were reversed by the house of lords 1775, and she was declared guilty of bigamy. The earl died 1779, and was succeeded by the bishop of Derry his brother.

HERWART, or HERVART, John Frederic, of Augsburg, chancellor of Bavaria, at the beginning of the 17th century, was author of some curious and extravagant publications. He wrote Chronologia Nova et Vera, two parts 4to. 1622 and 26. — Admiranda Ethicæ Theologicæ Myſteria Propalata, de Antiquissimâ Veterum Nationum Superſtitione, quâ Lapis Magnes pro Deo habitus colebatur, &c.

HESHUSIUS, Tillemannus, a German divine, born at Wesel, dutchy of Cleves 1526. He taught theology in various parts of Germany, but was every where disliked in consequence of his turbulent and restless spirit. He died 1588. He wrote Commentaries on the Psalms — on Isaiah — on St. Paul's epistles — a Treatise on Justification and the Lord's supper, &c.

HESIOD, a celebrated Greek poet of Aſcra in Bœotia, wrote, the Works and the Days, a poem on agriculture — Theogony, an interesting account of ancient mythology — the shield of Hercules, a fragment. He lived according to the best account in Homer's age, B. C. 907.

HESSE, William prince of, was illustrious for the patronage which he extended to learning, and for the judgment and success with which he cultivated literature. He built an observatory at Cassel, and was assisted in his observations on the heavenly bodies by Juste Byrge and Christopher Rothman. He died 1597. His observations were published at Leyden, 1618.

HESSELS, John, or Hesselius, theological professor at Louvain, was born 1522. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, by his eloquence and erudition, and by a perfect knowledge of the works of Austin and Jerome. He died of an apoplexy 1566, and was buried in St. Peter's church, Louvain, where he was a canon. He wrote various controversial works against the protestants.

HESYCHIUS, a grammarian of Alexandria, author of a valuable Lexicon of Greek words, published 2 vols. folio 1766.

HETZER, Lewis, a German socinian. His translation of the Bible into German, printed at Worms in folio 1529, was suppressed, and few copies can now be found. He died 1540.

HEVELIUS, John, or Hevelke, a celebrated astronomer, born at Dantzic 28th Jan. 1611. As his parents were respectable in rank and fortune, he received a very liberal education, but his attention was particularly bestowed upon natural philosophy, and under the care of Crugerus, his friend and preceptor, he made a most rapid progress in mathematics. He spent four years in travelling over Holland, England, France and Germany, and at his return home he was engaged in civil affairs, till Crugerus, who knew his abilities, prevailed upon him to devote himself fully to astronomy, as a science by which he might obtain distinction and fame. The more conveniently to pursue this study he built an observatory at the top of his house, and as he had learned to work in wood, and metals, he constructed his own mathematical instruments. His observations were first directed towards the moon, and in 1647, he published at Dantzic his Selenographia, five Lunæ Descriptio, &c. in which he gave an accurate account of its appearance and spots, and also of the phases of the other planets. Flattered with the applause of the learned on his labors, he continued his astronomical obser-observations, and published various tracts, on the heavenly bodies. In 1668 appeared his "Cometographia," a book which he made known in England by sending a copy of it to Hooke, of the London royal society. This literary intercourse, however, was not productive of great service to science, but rather of abusive language; and while Hevelius asserted that distances and altitudes could be taken with plain sights nearer than a minute, Hooke denied it; and thus each defended with unpardonable acrimony his position and the goodness of his particular telescope. In 1673 the first part of his "Machina Cœlestis" appeared, which, as it supported his former assertions, was attacked by Hooke with such virulence that in 1679 Dr. Halley, at the request of the royal society, examined the instruments of both the disputants, and made a favorable report of both, though later experiments have given the preference to Hooke. The second part of the Machina Cœlestis was published 1679, in which year he suffered a most irreparable loss by the destruction of his house, of his instruments, and astronomical apparatus, &c. by fire. This learned man died on his birth day 1687. To the reputation of a great astronomer he added the character of an upright magistrate, as he was raised by the voice of his fellow citizens to the office of burgomaster of Dantzic, which he discharged with fidelity and applause. Many of the letters which he received from learned men, and also from princes and potentates, were published after his death 1682, all expressive of the high respect in which he was held in the republic of letters.

HEVIN, Prudent, an able surgeon, author of Pathologia Chirurgica, 2 vols. 8vo. — Memoir on Strange Substances in the Oesophagus, &c. died at Paris 1789 aged 74.

HEURNIUS, John, a physician, born at Utrecht 1543. After studying in foreign universities, he became medical professor at Leyden, where he died of the stone 1601. He is said to have been the first who lectured at Leyden on human bodies. He published Hippocrates in Greek and Latin, and wrote several works, the best known of which is his treatise on the Disorders of the Head. His works were published folio, Leyden 1658. His son Otto became eminent as a medical man.

HEUSCH, William de, a landscape painter of Utrecht, who studied under John Both at Rome, and died at the end of the 17th century. His nephew Jacob, was equally eminent, and died 1701 aged 44. Another of the same family, of the name of Abraham, was also eminent as a painter of insects, flowers, and plants.

HEUSINGER, John Michael, a Saxon divine, born at Sunderhausen, Thuringia, Sept. 1690. He studied at Gotha, Halle, and Jena, and in 1715 he settled at Gießen, where he took pupils. In 1722 he went to Laubach, and in 1730 was made professor at Gotha, and in 1738, he removed to the same but more lucrative situation at Eisenach, where he married, and where he died March 1751. He is eminent for his piety, good temper, and sound judgment; and of his learning the best proofs are, his valuable editions of some of the classics, and various philological treatises.

HEUSINGER, James Frederic, nephew to the preceding, was born 1719 at Usingen in Wetteravia, and educated at Gotha under his uncle. After teaching philology for some time at Jena, he removed in 1750 to Wolfenbüttel, as second master of the school there, in which he succeeded as head master 1759. He supported the character of an able preceptor, an acute critic, and a polite scholar, and died 1778, well known by some learned observations on the Ajax and Electra of Sophocles, and other tracts.

HEWSON, William, an able anatomist, assistant and afterwards partner to Dr. William Hunter. An unfortunate dispute separated these able men, and Hewson read anatomical lectures in his own house. He died 1774 aged 35. He wrote Inquiries into the Properties of the Blood, and the Lymphatic System, 2 vols. 8vo. — He maintained also for some time, a literary dispute with Dr. Abraham Monro, about the discovery of the Lymphatics in the vessels of oviparous animals.

HEXHAM, John of, an English Benedictine, whose historical works in the 12th century, possess great merit.

HEYDEN, John Van der, a landscape painter, born at Gorcum in Holland. He died 1712 aged 75. His pieces, representing buildings, &c. are much admired.

HEYLIN, Peter, a native of Burford, Oxfordshire, born 29th Nov. 1600. He was educated at Hart-hall, and afterwards elected fellow of Magdalen college, where he read lectures on cosmography. He published, in 1621, his Microcosmus, or description of the world, which became very popular, and procured him great celebrity. In 1629 he was made chaplain to the king, by the recommendation of Laud, and of lord Danby, and in 1631 he was promoted to the rectory of Hemmingford, a prebend of Westminster, and the living of Houghton, Durham. In 1633 he took his degree of D.D. and in 1637 he was made rector of Islip, Oxfordshire, which the next year he exchanged for South-Warborough, Hants; but while he expected higher preferments, he found his hopes shattered by the violence of civil war, and he was, therefore, not only stripped of his benefices and property, but declared a delinquent by parliament. He fled from the fury of his persecutors, and concealed himself for some time at Winchester, then at Minster-Lövel, Oxfordshire, and afterwards at Abingdon, where he devoted himself to literature. At the restoration he was reinstated in all his ecclesiastical honors, but while he expected in higher dignities the reward of his faithful services in favor of royalty, he sunk under a severe disease, 8th May 1662, and was buried in Westminster abbey. This able and indefatigable writer whom Wood declares to have been endowed with singular gifts, of a sharp and pregnant wit, solid and clear judgment, published besides a history of the reformation in England — history of the Presbyterians, fol. — Life of archbishop Laud, fol. &c. His description of the world from a small 8vo. originally, was swelled in subsequent editions, under the name of Cosmography, to a large folio.

HEYWOOD, John, an English poet and jester, born in London, and educated at Oxford. He was one of the first who wrote English plays, but the brilliancy of his wit, and the liveliness of his disposition, rendered him him better known to his cotemporaries than the effusions of his pen. He was particularly noticed by sir Thomas More, and by Henry VIII. and he was equally the favorite of queen Mary, whom it is said he entertained and amused even upon her death bed. As he was a bigoted papist, he left England on the accession of Elizabeth, and retired to Mechlin, where he died 1565. Besides his plays, he wrote 500 epigrams, the Spider and Fly, a parable, in 77 chapters, at the beginning of each of which appears the figure of the author near a window hung with cobwebs, flies, and spiders. He had two sons, the eldest of whom was Ellis, fellow of All-Souls, Oxford, 1547, and so perfect as an Italian linguist, that he wrote a book called "Il Moro." He became a Jesuit at Louvain where he died 1572.

HEYWOOD, Jasper, youngest son of John, was born in London 1535, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, and from which he was expelled for immorality 1558. He was next fellow of All-Souls, but soon after left England, and in 1562 became a Jesuit at Rome. He was provincial of the Jesuits in England, and died at Naples 1597. He wrote besides three tragedies of Seneca translated, various poems — and the "Paradise of Dainty Devices," 1573, 4to.

HEYWOOD, Thomas, an actor and writer of plays, under Elizabeth and her two successors. Out of the 220 plays which it is said he wrote, only 24 remain, but of no great reputation. The time of his death is unknown. He was a good linguist if we are to judge from his translations from Lucian, Erasmus, &c.

HEYWOOD, Oliver, a native of Bolton, Lancashire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was ejected in 1662 from his living of Coley, Yorkshire, for nonconformity, and he afterwards continued to preach privately, for which he was excommunicated. He died 1702 aged 73. He wrote Heart's Treasure, 12mo. 1667 — Closet Prayer 12mo. — Meekness for Heaven — Life of Angier, 8vo. — &c.

HEYWOOD, Eliza, a voluminous female writer, born in London. Her abilities were displayed in novel writing, but her "Court of Arimania" and "New Utopia" do not show her in a favorable light as a moralist, and in consequence of the licentious tendency of her works, though some say from personal motives, Pope gave her a distinguished place in the Dunciad. Her other works were more in favor of virtue, and deserve commendation, especially the Female Spectator, 4 vols. — Epistle for the Ladies, 2 vols. — Betsey Thoughtless, 4 vols. — Husband and Wife, 2 vols. &c. She attempted dramatic poetry, but without success, and her appearance on the stage was equally unfavorable. Though thus licentious in some of her writings, she has never been accused of immorality in her conduct, but she is described as modest, affable and virtuous, and of a very lively disposition, and unusual gaiety of spirits.

HEYWOOD, Nathanael, a native of Bolton, Lancashire, deprived of his living for nonconformity in 1662. He published some sermons, and died 1677.

HICETAS, a philosopher of Syracuse, 340 B.C. He supposed that the sun and the stars were fixed, and he gave to the earth a circular motion.

HICKES, George, an eminent English divine, born 20th June 1642 at Newsham, Yorkshire, and educated at North Allerton school, and in 1659 admitted at St. John's college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Magdalen college, and Magdalen hall, and in 1664 was chosen fellow of Lincoln college, where he became an able and active tutor for seven years. In 1673 he accompanied his friend and pupil, sir George Wheeler on his travels, but left him in France, as he was obliged to return to Oxford to take his degree of B.D. At Paris he became acquainted with Henry Justell, a man of consequence and information, who entrusted him with some MSS. to present to the university of Oxford. In 1676 he was made chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, whom he accompanied the next year to Scotland, where his grace was high commissioner for the king. He was honored, at the request of Dr. Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrew's, with the degree of D.D. from that university, which was confirmed at Oxford in Dec. 1679. After obtaining various pieces of preferment, he was made dean of Worcester 1683, and the next year the vacant bishopric of Bristol was marked for him, but the king's death prevented his elevation, as his zeal against popery was far from recommending him to the favor of the successor on the throne, James II. He afterwards accepted from the bishop of Worcester the rectory of All-church near that city, but at the revolution he was ejected from all his ecclesiastical honors, as he refused to take the oaths of allegiance. When Talbot, afterwards bishop of Oxford and of Durham, was nominated in the gazette, dean in his room, he boldly claimed his right, and affixed a paper to that purpose on the entrance into the choir of the cathedral. This step of course exposed him to the resentment of government, and therefore to avoid persecution he left the kingdom, till some years after, in 1699, the chancellor, lord Somers, out of respect for his great abilities obtained an act of council to stop all proceedings against him. After his deprivation, Hickes was sent by his fellow-sufferers to James into France, and in 1694 he was, on his return, with the approbation of the exiled monarch, consecrated suffragan bishop of Thetford, by the bishops of Norwich, Ely and Peterborough. Though some have accused him of a wish to take the oaths of allegiance, to preserve his preferments, his known integrity and undaunted firmness forbid the belief of it. After being grievously afflicted with the stone, he died 15th Dec. 1715 in his 74th year. Dr. Hickes was a man of very extensive erudition, well acquainted with the fathers, and with the doctrines of the primitive church, but it is to be lamented that his great powers were engaged chiefly, only in controversial pamphlets which are forgotten as soon as read. His principal works are on the old northern languages, and their antiquities, besides some sermons, and treatises, &c. amounting to 26 in number.

HICKES, John, brother to the preceding, was ejected

ed from the living of Stoke in Devonshire 1662, for refusing to take the oaths. He joined in 1685, the duke of Monmouth's rebellion, and for this disloyal act he was seized and executed.

HICKMAN, Henry, fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity. He died about 1688, minister of the English congregation at Leyden in Holland. Besides other works he attacked Heylin's quinquarticular history, &c.

HIERO I. king of Syracuse, after Gelon his brother, B.C. 478. He is immortalized by the pen of Pindar for his victories at the Olympic games.

HIERO II. king of Syracuse, B.C. 268, was the enemy, but afterwards the friend, of the Romans.

HIEROCLES, an enemy and persecutor of the Christians in the fourth century. He not only exercised cruelty, but wrote some books, against the Christians, mentioned by Lactantius and Eusebius.

HIEROCLES, a platonic philosopher of Alexandria in the 5th century, author of seven books on providence, &c.

HIFFERMAN, Paul, an author, born in the county of Dublin 1719, and educated for a popish priest at Dublin and in France. He however preferred the study of physic, and for some time practised in Dublin, but his indolence was such that he relinquished the profession for the laborious life of an author, and came to London 1753. He recommended himself by some of his pieces to the learned and witty of the times, and by the effusions of his pen, and the contributions of his friends, he contrived to live. Though acquainted with Foote, Garrick, Goldsmith, Murphy, Bickerstaff and others, he yet seldom appeared decently respectable. His resources indeed were not always very honorable, and so great were his eccentricities, that he never would mention where his lodgings were. He died June 1777, and it was then discovered that he lodged in one of the obscure courts near St. Martin's lane. Dr. Hifferman, as he was called, wrote "the Ticklers" a set of political papers in Dublin 1750 — "the Tuner" another political paper, London 1753 — Miscellanies in prose and verse — the Earl of Warwick, a tragedy from La Harpe — and other trifles neither elegant nor popular.

HIGDEN, Ralph, an early English chronicler, who died 1363. He is author of Radulphi Higdeni Polychronici Libri VIII. &c. the best edition of which is that of 1642. It extends from Adam to 1357, and though only the last is original, the whole is respectably written and often quoted.

HIGGINS, or HIGINS, John, an English divine educated at Oxford, and engaged in the instruction of youth at Winham and Ilminster in Somersetshire. He published "Flosculi of Terence" — Holcot's Dictionary — and other school books, besides controversial tracts concerning Christ's Descent into Hell, and an edition in 1587, of the Mirror for Magistrates. He died it is supposed after 1604.

HIGGONS, sir Thomas, an English writer, born at Westburgh, Shropshire, where his father was rector, and admitted at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, where however he took no degree. He married the much defamed widow of Robert earl of Essex, at whose funeral he pronounced an oration 1656, afterwards published. He next married the sister of John Greenville earl of Bath, and in 1658 and 1661 was member for Malmesbury and Windfor, and such were his services to the crown considered, that he received a pension of 500l. a year, besides handsome presents, and the honor of knighthood. In 1669 he was sent as envoy to invest the duke of Saxony with the order of the garter, and four years after he was ambassador to Vienna, where he remained three years. He died of an apoplexy in the court of King's Bench, where he was summoned as a witness, 24th Nov. 1691, and was buried in Winchester cathedral near his first wife. He wrote a panegyric to the king 1660 — the History of Hoof Bassa 1684 — the Venetian triumph translated into English, besides his oration on his wife, which did as much honor to his sensibility, his affection and the goodness of his heart, as it rescued from infamy, the character of an injured and innocent wife. That oration was seen and highly approved by Mr. Granger.

HIGGONS, Bevil, younger son of the preceding by his second wife, entered 1686 at the age of 16 at St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Cambridge, and then to the Middle Temple. He wrote the Generous Conqueror, or the Timely Discovery, a tragedy, acted at Drury-lane, and published 1702 — a poem on the Peace of Utrecht. — Remarks on Burnet's History of his own Times — a View English History, with reflections political, &c. to the revolution of 1688. He was a firm adherent to the house of Stuart, and he accompanied James II. in his exile, and died in France 1735.

HIGHMORE, Joseph, an eminent painter born 13th June 1692 in the parish of St. James Garlick-hithe, London. He early showed a strong inclination for painting, but his father bound him as clerk to an attorney, and for a while he was withdrawn from his favorite pursuits. Nature however prevailed over parental authority, and young Highmore guided by his own genius and instructed by such rules as he found in books, gradually distinguished himself, and became a professed artist in 1715 at the expiration of his clerkship. In 1716 he married the daughter of Mr. Hiller, and as his reputation increased he removed from the city in 1724 to a house in Lincoln's inn fields. His engagements now grew upon him; he was employed in drawing the knights of the Bath, on the revival of the order, and afterwards he painted the portrait of the duke of Cumberland, and some time after of the prince and princess of Wales, and of the chief nobility. In 1732 he visited Holland, and examined the valuable picture gallery of Dusseldorf, and in 1734 he made another excursion to Paris, where he saw, by the favor of cardinal de Polignac, the famous group of the court of Lycomedes, which was afterwards destroyed by the Russians at Charlottenburg in Prussia. In 1744 he painted a set of paintings on the history of Pamela, just published, and thus became acquainted with the excellent author, Samuel Richardson. In 1753, at the institution of the academy of painting, he was appointed one of the professors, and he deserved the honor not only as an artist, but as an elegant writer. He published "an Examination of Rubens' Ruben's two paintings in the banqueting house" in 4to. — Practice of Perspective on the principles of Dr. Brook Taylor, &c. 1763, — essays moral religious, &c. with a translation of Browne's Latin poem on the immortality of the soul, 1766, 12mo. — Observations on Dodwell's Christianity not founded on argument, &c. His paintings during a practice of 46 years are numerous, the best known of which are Hagar and Ishmael, now in the Foundling hospital, the good Samaritan, the finding of Moses, the Harlowe family from Clarissa, the Graces unveiling Nature, on memory, from Rubens, &c. On the marriage of his daughter in 1761 to Mr. Duncombe he retired from business, and after selling his collection of pictures, he went to settle with his son-in-law at Canterbury. Here he spent his life in ease and literary employments, and often contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine. An even temper, and a most benevolent disposition lent their aid to support a constitution naturally strong and vigorous, and he lived to his 88th year. He decayed gradually, and as if falling asleep gently expired 3d March 1780. He was buried in the fourth aisle of Canterbury cathedral. Besides his daughter, he had one only son Antony, of his own profession.

HIGHMORE, Nathaniel, an eminent anatomist born at Fording-bridge Hants. He is the first Englishman who wrote a systematical treatise on the structure of the human body, and he was indefatigable in the pursuit and improvement of anatomical science. He died 21st March 1684 aged 71. His works are "Corporis Humani Disquisitio Anatomica, folio 1651 — the History of Generation — de Passione Hyfterica, 8vo. 1660.

HILARION, a native of Gaza, who after seeing the anchorite St. Anthony in Egypt, laid the foundation of a similar order of monastic life in Palestine. He died in Cyprus 371 aged 80.

HILARIUS, a Romish saint, bishop of Arles. He died 449 aged 48. He wrote Homilies — the life of St. Honoratus, his predecessor in the see of Arles, and other smaller works.

HILARIUSE, Joseph, a native of Enzesfeld, educated among the Jesuits, and made teacher of grammar and rhetoric at Vienna where he was appointed præfectus rei nummarie. He renounced the order of the Jesuits 1770, and became director of the imperial cabinet of medals, &c. and dean of philosophy. As a medallist and antiquarian he was particularly eminent. He died 1798 aged 61.

HILARY, St. a native of Poitiers in France who was late in life converted to christianity, and was in 355 made bishop of his native town. He ably defended Athanasius at the council of Beziers against Saturninus, and for his zeal was banished by the emperor Constantius into Phrygia. He died 367. His works have been edited Paris 1693.

HILDEBERT, bishop of Mans, and then archbishop of Tours, was born at Lavardin. Though according to Bayle, he is accused by Yvo, bishop of Chartres, with licentiousness and intemperance before he was admitted into the church, yet he became one of its brightest ornaments for piety, learning and holiness. He was very severe against the vices and the corruptions of the court of Rome, in a letter which he published in lively, elegant, and animated language. He also wrote a Description of Rome in Latin verse. He died before the middle of the 12th century.

HILDESLEY, Mark, an English bishop, born at Marston, Kent, 1699, and educated at the Charter house, London, and Trinity college, Cambridge of which he became fellow 1723. In 1731 he obtained the college living of Hitchin, and four years after that of Holwell in Bedfordshire, where he zealously devoted himself to the spiritual care and instruction of his parishioners. On the death of that amiable prelate Dr. Wilton, bishop of Sodor and Man, the duke of Athol fixed upon Hildesley as a successor, and for piety, goodness and exemplary morals, a better choice could not be made. The new prelate took leave of his Hitchin congregation with affectionate tenderness, and when he revisited them afterwards with friendly humility, he was greeted with the respect and homage of crowded multitudes. In his diocese he was enabled to see the completion of his worthy predecessor's translation of the bible into the Manx language, in 1755. He died of a paralytic stroke, Dec. 7th, 1772, and was buried near bishop Wilton.

HILL, Joseph, an English divine born at Leeds 1624, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and Magdalen, of which he became a fellow. As he was strongly attached to the doctrines of the puritans, he was ejected at the restoration for non-conformity, and went over to Holland. He was in 1667 pastor of the English church at Middleburg, and at last settled at Rotterdam where he died 1707. He is chiefly known for his edition of Schrevelius' Greek Lexicon improved with 8000 new words 1676. He wrote also dissertations on the antiquity of temples, and churches.

HILL, William, an English scholar, fellow of Merton college, Oxford, and afterwards master of a school in Dublin, where he died 1667. He prepared an edition of Dionysius Periegetes, with learned and critical annotations, which was published 1688, in London.

HILL, Aaron, a poet, born 10th Feb. 1685, in Beaufort buildings, London, of a respectable Wiltshire family. He was educated at Westminster school, but the ruin of his father by mismanagement, left him in 1669 in distressful circumstances, but the next year he determined to go to Constantinople, to see his relation lord Paget the English ambassador there. The visit was not unwelcome to lord Paget; by his friendship young Hill was enabled to travel over Egypt and part of the east, and on his return to England with him he was presented to many of the courts on the continent. Some time after he accompanied sir William Wentworth in the tour of Europe, and was absent for three years. On his return he claimed the public notice by the publication of his "Camillus" a poem on lord Peterborough the general in Spain; and about that time, 1709, being made manager of Drury lane theatre, he wrote his first tragedy, "Elfrid or the Fair Inconstant" finished at the request of Booth in little more than a week. In 1710 he was master of the Opera house, Hay market, and wrote the opera of "Rinaldo" the first piece set to music by Handel, in England. A quarrel however with the lord chamberlain, put a speedy end to his theatrical career, and in 1715, as appears from his letter preserved in the Harleian MSS. he undertook to extract from the beech nut, an oil as sweet as that of olives; but though he obtained a patent, and promised an annual million to the nation, his prospects vanished, and his hopes were disappointed. He therefore again wrote for the stage "the Fatal Vision, or the Fall of Siam," and in 1718 published "the Northern Star" a poem on the Czar Peter, which was some time after handsomely rewarded with a gold medal from the empress Catharine. In 1728 he engaged in a contract to supply the navy with timber from Scotland, but his schemes like the former proved abortive, and after travelling into the north of Scotland he retired to York, where he published "the Progress of Wit" against Pope's Dunciad. In 1731 he had the misfortune to lose his wife, after an happy union of 20 years, and the birth of nine children. He survived her till 1750 and expired 8th Feb. in the very minute, it is said, of the earthquake, and was interred in Westminster abbey by the side of his beloved wife. Four volumes of his poems have appeared since his death, in which is Merope, a tragedy borrowed from Voltaire, and introduced at Drury-lane, by Garrick. Though possessed of good natural talents, he never rose to great celebrity as a writer. His thoughts were always expressed with affectation, and by attempting too much, he never effected any thing with complete success. He is now known as a writer cotemporary with Pope, but his poetical effusions have sunk into oblivion.

HILL, sir John, an indefatigable English writer born 1716, son of a clergyman at Spalding or Peterborough. He was bred an apothecary, and for some time practised in St. Martin's lane Westminster, but an early marriage accompanied with no fortune obliged him to apply to other resources besides the medical profession. As he knew something of botany he turned his thoughts to that science, but though patronised by the duke of Richmond and lord Petre, he found the success of his project inadequate to his expectations, and indeed to his indefatigable exertions. He next applied to the stage, but after some exhibitions at the Hay-market and Covent-garden, he was convinced that nature had not formed him for a theatrical hero. By the friendship of Folkes, and Baker, respectable members of the royal society, he was introduced to the notice of literary men, and in 1746 he published by subscription a translation of Theophrastus' treatise "on gems" which increased his fame, his friends and his resources. Flushed with his literary labors, he began to compile a general natural history in 3 vols. folio, and next undertook with G. L. Scott, a supplement to Chambers' Dictionary. Besides these his attention was engaged in the publication of the "British Magazine" and of "the Inspector" a periodical pamphlet, which he rendered palatable to the public by the little anecdotes, the private scandal, and the public intrigues with which his attendance at different places of general amusement made him acquainted. Success now rendered him vain, and with the diploma degree of M. D. from the university of St. Andrew's he assumed the character, the language, the dress and the equipage of a man of fashion. As his publications were numerous, he acquired a large and regular income but the freedom with which he treated public and private characters, often exposed him to personal violence, so that in one instance he was caned at Ranelagh by an Irish gentleman who considered himself as ridiculed by him. Thus by degrees he exposed himself to the contempt of the world, and by a paper war with Woodward, with Fielding, and others, he rendered himself obnoxious to the malevolence of all, and sunk in the general estimation. From a writer he became an empiric, and by the preparation of the essence of waterdock; of tincture of valerian; of the pectoral balsam of honey, and other simple medicines, he again procured a comfortable income. The patronage of the earl of Bute also was extended to him, and with his approbation he undertook that pompous and voluminous work, called "a System of Botany," and by presenting a copy of it and of some of his other works to the king of Sweden, he was in return invested with one of the orders of knighthood, and assumed the title of sir John. This extraordinary character died Nov. 1775, of the gout in his stomach. He possessed great natural talents, but the rapidity with which he wrote, and the wish of obtaining popularity, prevented that elegant polish, and that highly finished diction, which entitle the labors of genius and perseverance to more than temporary fame. It is said, though scarcely credible, that from the variety of subjects which his prolific pen treated, he gained an income of 1500l. a-year, an enormous sum for compositions which were mostly compilations, and depended chiefly on the fashions, the prejudices, or the frailties of the times. His novels, as filled with personal abuse on the well-known characters of those times, possess little merit; his three dramatic pieces, Orpheus, the Critical Minute, and the Rout, rise not above mediocrity, but his "Essays," and some of his philosophical treatises, are entitled to greater praise. By his dispute with Garrick he drew upon himself the severe reflections of that keen satirist, and of other poets. In an epigram, Garrick says of him,

For physic and farces, his equal there scarce is,
His farces are physic, his physic a farce is.

HILL, Robert, an extraordinary character, born 11th Jan. 1699, at Milwell near Tring, Herts, by profession a taylor and stay maker. In the midst of his obscurity and poverty, he aspired after fame, and by great labor and perseverance, he made himself a perfect master of several languages by books only. He became known to the public by means of Mr. Spence, who in 1757, published a comparison between him and Magliabecchi, and endeavoured to raise a subscription in his favor. He was seven years in acquiring a knowledge of Latin, and 14 in learning Greek, but he made himself master of Hebrew in a little time. He wrote Remarks on Berkeley's Essay on Spirit — the Character of a Jew — a Criticism on Job. He died after a confinement of 18 months to his bed, July 1777, at Buckingham.

HILL, Thomas Ford, an English antiquary and philologist, who died 1795.

HILLEL, the elder, a Jewish doctor of the Mishna, born about 30 years B. C. He was president of the Sanhedrim Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, an office which remained in his family for six generations. He defended the oral traditions of the Jews, and reduced them into six treatises.

HILLEL, the prince, great-grandson of Judas Hakkadosh, was one of the writers of the Gemara. He flourished in the middle of the fourth century.

HILLIARD, Nicholas, a native of Exeter, goldsmith, carver, and portrait painter to queen Elizabeth. He drew the queen's whole length sitting on her throne, and acquired also much celebrity by a highly finished portrait, in water colors, of Mary queen of Scots, in her 18th year. His pieces were so much admired, that Donne said in his "Storm," a hand, an eye, by Hilliard drawn, is worth an history. He died 1619 aged 72.

HIMERIUS, a Greek grammarian, born at Prusias in Bithynia, in the age of Constantius and Julian. He kept a school at Athens, and was a violent opponent of the Christians.

HINCKLEY, John, a native of Warwickshire, educated at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of D. D. 1679. He was vicar of Colehill, Berks, and rector of Drayton, Leicestershire, by the patronage of his friends the Purefoy family, and afterwards became rector of Northfield, Worcestershire. He died April 13th 1691. He published some assize sermons, preached at Reading and Abingdon — a Persuasive to Conformity, in a Letter to his Dissenting Brethren — Fasciculus Literarum, or Letters on several Occasions, 8vo. 1680, &c.

HINCMAR or HINCMARUS, archbishop of Rheims, 685, was a zealous supporter of the Gallican church, but too severe against a monk called Godescalcus. He was driven from his bishopric by the incursions of the Normans, and died at Epernay 882. His works were published 1645, by Sirmond, in 2 vols. He wrote on theology and history with great spirit, though in barbarous language.

HIPPARCHIA, a woman who lived for some time with Alexander the great, and afterwards married the stoic Crates. She was eminent as a philosopher, and wrote some treatises.

HIPPARCHUS, son of Pisistratus, was slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton, B. C. 528; and the tyranny of his family was soon after abolished at Athens by the banishment of his brother Hippias.

HIPPARCHUS, an astronomer of Nicæa in Bithynia, celebrated for the catalogue of stars which he made, preserved in Ptolemy's Almagest. He died about 125 B. C.

HIPPOCRATES, a native of Cos, celebrated for his knowledge of medicine, of which he is properly called the father. He died about 361 B. C. His works have been edited Vienna, 2 vols. folio 1740. The modern inhabitants of Cos show still with pride the spot where he once resided.

HIPPONAX, a Greek satirist, known particularly for the severity of the lampoon with which he lashed two brothers, sculptors, who had ridiculed his deformities, and with such effect, that they hanged themselves. He flourished 540 B. C.

HIRAM, king of Tyre in the reign of David and Solomon. As he was at peace with the Jewish nation, he supplied Solomon with timber, gold, and other ornaments, which he wanted for the completion of the temple. He died 1000 B. C. in the 60th year of his reign. It is said that the letters which passed between him and Solomon are extant. — The architect who superintended the building of Solomon's temple at the request of the Tyrian king, was also of the name of Hiram, and a native of Tyre.

HIRE, Laurence de la, a French painter, born at Paris 1606. His landscapes were much admired, though he was deficient in the rules of perspective. He died 1656.

HIRE, Philip de la, a painter, son of the preceding, born at Paris 1677. He imitated the manner of Watteau, and was admired for his landscapes and portraits. He died 1719.

HIRE, Philip de la, a celebrated French mathematician, born at Paris 18th March 1640. His father, Laurence who as mentioned was a painter, educated him in the principles of his art, but his deep application to mathematics and geometry marked him early for astronomical fame. After his father's death, he resided four years in Italy for the benefit of his health, and soon after his return to Paris he was elected member of the academy of sciences 1678. He was employed with Picard and Cassini, under the liberal patronage of Colbert, to make observations for the improvement of the map of France; and for this important purpose he visited with the eye of a philosopher, Bretagne, Guienne, Calais, Dunkirk, and Provence in 1679, and the three following years. He was after Colbert's death engaged in taking levels for the grand aqueducts projected by the munificence of Lewis XIV. but besides these public employments, and the labors which devolved upon him as professor of the royal college, and of the academy of architecture, he devoted himself to other scientific pursuits. While the day was employed in study, the night was frequently passed on astronomical observations, and painting occasionally amused a vacant hour. This great and good man died April 21st 1718, aged 78. He was twice married and was father of eight children. Fontenelle wrote an eulogium upon him. His works are numerous, the most valuable of which are Nouvelle Methode en Geometrie, &c. 4to. — De la Cycloide, 12mo. — Nouveaux Elements des Sections Coniques, &c. — La Gnomonique, 12mo. — Sectiones Conicæ, in IX. libros, &c. folio, a most valuable work — Tabulæ Astronomicæ, 4to. — Veterum Mathematicorum Opera. Gr. and Lat. folio 1693. Besides several pieces in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

HISCAM, or HISJAM, 15th caliph of the Omniades, and fourth son of Abdamelech succeeded his brother Jezid II. 723. He conquered Khacam of Turkestan, and made war against Leo the Maurian. He was always attended with 600 camels to carry his splendid wardrobe. He died 743.

HOADLY, Benjamin, a learned prelate, born Nov. 14th 1676 at Westerham in Kent. His father was for some time master of Norwich grammar school. Young Hoadly entered at Catharine hall, Cambridge, 1692, and became afterwards a fellow of the society. In 1706 he began his literary career by an attack on Atterbury's terbury's sermon at Mr. Bennet's funeral, and two years after he attacked another sermon of the same author, on the Power of Charity to cover Sin. His "Measures of Obedience," on the doctrine of non-resistance, so pleased the Commons in 1709, that they petitioned the queen to reward his services in the cause of civil and religious liberty, by some honorary preferment. He was however neglected, though made rector of Streatham, Surrey, by Mrs. Howland, till the reign of George I., when he was in 1715 raised to the see of Bangor. Party disputes, however, and the fear of his personal enemies, detained him in the metropolis, so that he never visited his bishopric. At this time his sermon on the words "my kingdom is not of this world," produced a violent dispute for many years, known by the name of the Bangorian controversy, which, though at first it attacked the temporal power only of the clergy, soon extended to the rights of princes. In this controversy he had for opponents, Dr. Snape, and the still more formidable William Law, who in some points triumphed in the general opinion over him. He afterwards opposed Hare on the nature of prayer, and asserted that a calm, dispassionate, and rational address was the most acceptable to heaven, while his opponent recommended a warm, enthusiastic zeal. From Bangor he was translated to Hereford, and afterwards to Salisbury, and lastly to Winchester, where he continued 26 years. He died 17th April 1761 aged 85, and was buried in Winchester cathedral, where a neat monument, with a Latin inscription, drawn by himself, records the events of his life. He was twice married, and by his first wife had two sons, Benjamin and John, the last of whom survived him. As a writer he possessed great abilities; he was a keen disputant, but his style was inelegant, and his periods, as Pope observes, "were of a mile." In his religious opinions he was a great latitudinarian, so that it has been wondered on what principles he continued through life to profess conformity, as on several occasions he seemed far from strictly adhering to the tenets of the Anglican church, and regarded reason more as the guide of the Christian, than the pure precepts of the gospel. His writings, which are numerous, are enumerated in the Biographia Britannica, on the authority of his son. They have appeared in 4 vols. folio. Aken-side, among other poets, has paid a handsome tribute to his memory. His brother John died archbishop of Armagh 1746.

HOADLY, Benjamin, M. D. eldest son of the bishop of Winchester, was born 10th Feb. 1705-6, in Broad street, and educated at Newcome's school, Hackney. He entered at Benet college, Cambridge, 1722, under Herring, afterwards primate. He studied mathematics under the blind professor Saunderson, and then took his degree in medicine. When the king visited Cambridge in 1728, Hoadly's name was on the list of those who were to be presented to the degree of M. D. but it is supposed that he was omitted by the illiberality of Dr. Snape, who hated his father, and he was admitted about a month after by mandamus. He was made registrar of Hereford by his father, and appointed physician to the king's household in 1742, and to the prince of Wales 1746. He died 10th Aug. 1757, at Chelsea. He was twice married, but his only child, by his first wife, died an infant. He distinguished himself as the author of three letters on the Organs of Respiration, read at the college of physicians 1740 — Oration Anniversaria, &c. 1742 — Observations on Electrical Experiments, 1756, 4to. and the Suspicious Husband, a comedy of great merit and popularity.

HOADLY, John, LL. D. youngest son of bishop Hoadly, was born in Broad street 8th Oct. 1711, and educated at Hackney school, where he acted with great applause Phocylas in the Siege of Damascus. He entered in 1730 at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and soon after at the Temple, but he abandoned the profession of the law, and took the degree of LL. B. in 1735, and the same year was appointed chancellor of Winchester by his father, and admitted into orders. He was then made chaplain to the prince of Wales' household, and held the same office with the princess dowager 1751. Preferments crowded afterwards thick upon him, the most valuable of which were a prebend of Winchester, the rectory of St. Mary, near Southampton 1743, that of Overton 1746, and the mastership of St. Cross in 1760. He received the degree of doctor from Lambeth, and it was the first honor of that nature conferred by Herring the primate. He died 16th May 1776, and with him the name of Hoadly became extinct. He wrote five dramas, the Contract, a comedy — Love's Revenge and Phoebe, two pastorals — Jephtha, and the farce of Truth, two oratorios, — besides some other dramatic works, left in MSS., among which was a tragedy on lord Cromwell. He also wrote some poems, preserved in Doddsley's collection, and at all times showed himself so fond of a theatrical life, that he seldom had any friends in his house, whom he did not solicit to undertake a character in some interlude at his own private theatre. He published also his father's works in 3 vols. folio.

HOBBS, Thomas, an eminent philosopher, born 5th April 1588, at Malmesbury, Wilts, where his father was minister. He entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, in 1603, and five years after he went to reside in the family of the earl of Devonshire as tutor to his son, with whom he made the tour of Europe. By the friendship and kindness of this illustrious family, he was introduced to persons of rank and literary fame; he was noticed by the great lord Bacon, by lord Herbert of Cherbury; and Ben Jonson with fond partiality, revised his translation of Thucydides, which he published to warn his countrymen against the dangers of civil dissensions. In 1626 he lost his patron the earl of Devonshire, and two years after his pupil, and so severely did he feel the affliction, that to disperse his grief, he travelled with sir G. Clifton's son over the continent. His abilities and his character were so well known, that lady Devonshire insisted on his superintending the education of the young earl, and in the confidence of this illustrious family, he visited again the continent with his pupil, and at Paris was introduced to the society of Merenne, and other learned men, and at Pisa he had frequent intercourse with the celebrated Galileo. On his return to England, he published his book called de Cive, and he afterwards made his political and moral opinions public in his Leviathan, viathan, but the tumults of civil war were too violent for him, so that he retired to Paris, to live in the society of the learned. His intimacy with Descartes was interrupted by a controversial dispute, but Gassendi remained his friend to the latest period of life. In his controversy with Cavendish about the quadrature of the circle, Hobbes showed such abilities that he was recommended to instruct the prince of Wales, afterwards the second Charles, in mathematical knowledge, and so zealous and so important were his services considered, that at the restoration the monarch treated his preceptor with marked respect. The public opinion, however, soon after represented Hobbes as a dangerous man; and when the House of Commons censured his treatise de Cive, and his Leviathan, as intended to subvert religion and civil government, Charles reluctantly withdrew his patronage from him. In his old age he was visited not only by men of eminence and dignity in foreign countries, but by princes and ambassadors, who were anxious to pay respect to a man whose writings and opinions were so celebrated in Europe. He was attacked by a suppression of urine in Nov. 1679, while at Chatsworth, the seat of his patron the earl of Devonshire; and soon after a stroke of the palsy came to increase his sufferings, under which he sunk the 4th of December following, aged 92. In his character, Hobbes exhibited the profound reasoner, the erudite philosopher, and the refined writer. His abilities were of a superior order, and therefore it is to be lamented that such powers of mind should be directed to unworthy purposes. While in the family of the earl of Devonshire, where he lived the best part of his life, as in his own house, he frequently attended the chapel, and received the sacrament, yet he occasionally turned his back upon the preacher, observing that he could teach him nothing but what he knew before. That presumption which trusts to itself, without the assistance of a superintending Providence, is not only irreligious, but dangerous to society; and while Hobbes affected at one time to respect the institutions of his country, he would at another disregard as futile and incongruous those laws which bind man to man as dependent on the will of an over-ruling Providence. His purpose was to strike at the root of all religion, natural and revealed, and while he pretended to represent the scriptures as derived from mere human tradition, he endeavoured to destroy God's moral government of the world, and to reduce man to the degraded state of animal nature, which views a rival and a foe in every face, and elevates force and cunning into the room of benevolence, and the mildest and most humane virtues of the heart. The principles of Hobbes were confuted by many able and learned opponents, especially by Harrington, Tenison, Filmer, Parker, Henry More, Cumberland, Cudworth, and others. His other works were, a treatise on Human Nature — de Corpore Politico, or the Elements of Law — de Mirabilibus Peci, or the Wonders of the Peak, a poem — Homer translated into English verse — Letter on Liberty and Necessity — Elements of Philosophy — six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematics — Marks of absurd Geometry, &c. — One of his maxims was, that bad means might be applied to procure a good end; for, says he, if I were cast into a deep pit, and the devil should put down his cloven foot, I would readily lay hold of it to get out. In spite of all his philosophy, it is said, that he was childishly afraid of apparitions, and that he would never remain alone in a house if he possibly could prevent it.

HOBIMA, Minderhout, a painter, born at Antwerp 1611. He studied nature, and his landscapes had peculiar beauty and grace. They are now very scarce.

HOCHÉ, Lazarus, a native of Versailles, son of a hostler, made, upon the early death of his father, a chorister in the church of St. Germain-en-laye, by the kindness of the rector. He was afterwards a helper in the royal stables, and at the age of 16 he enlisted in the army, and became a corporal. The revolution came to raise him from obscurity; he was by courage and coolness distinguished in several engagements, and soon rose to the highest rank in the army. Though imprisoned for some time under the tyranny of Robespierre, he was restored to liberty, and passed a glorious campaign against the Austrians in Alsace, and afterwards went to La Vendée, and to Quiberon, where he behaved with great cruelty towards the emigrants, and put to death the heroic Charette. He was intrusted with the command of the troops which were to invade Ireland at the end of 1795, but the expedition failed after attempting to land in Bantry bay, and Hoche, though for a while regarded with coolness, was sent to the armies of the Sambre and Meuse. In this new scene he displayed great bravery and address against the Austrians on the Rhine, but died suddenly at Wetzlar in 1797, aged 30, in consequence of a cold caught in the midst of his military exertions. His life has been published by Rouffelin, 2 vols. 8vo.

HOCHSTETTER, Andrew Adam, a protestant divine, born at Tübingen 1668, where he became professor of eloquence, philosophy, and divinity, and at last rector of the university. He died there April 1717. His chief works are, Collegium Puffendorpianum — de Feste Expiationis & Hirco Azazel — de Conradino, ultimo ex Suevis duce — de Rebus Elbigenfibus.

HODGES, Nathaniel, an English physician, son of the dean of Hereford. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered as student at Christ church 1648. In 1659 he took the degree of M. D. and settled in London, where he remained during the prevalence of the plague, and thus acquired an extensive practice and a great reputation. Misfortunes however succeeded prosperity, and he was thrown for debt into Ludgate prison, where he died 1684. He was buried in St. Stephen's church, Walbrook. He wrote Vindicæ Medicinæ & Medicorum, 1660 — Loimologia, or a Latin account of the plague of London 1665, printed 1672, and translated into English by Dr. John Quincy 1720. This account is considered as very valuable from the diligence and accuracy of the author.

HODY, Humphrey, an English divine, born 1st Jan. 1659, at Odcombe Somersetshire, where his father was rector. He entered at Wadham college, Oxford 1676, of which he became fellow, eight years after. At the age of 21 he published his Dissertation against Aristot.

teas' History of the 72 Interpreters, which was received with general applause by the learned world, though Vossius alone who had embraced a different opinion loaded it with abuse, and ridiculed the author, contemptuously calling him Juvenis Oxoniensis. To this attack from Vossius, inserted in an appendix to his Pomponius Mela, Hody did not deign to give an answer till more than 20 years after. In 1704, therefore, he published his book "de Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus," &c. in which he refuted the objections of Vossius, and proves that the Septuagint was translated not by order of the Ptolemies, though in their reign, but by the Hellenist Jews, for the use of their countrymen. In 1689 he published his Prolegomena to Malela's Chronicle, and the next year he was made chaplain to bishop Stillingfleet. In consequence of the deprivation of the bishop for refusing allegiance to king William, he was engaged in a controversy with his friend Dodwell. The spirit and abilities which he displayed in this war of pamphlets, so pleased Tillotson that he made him his domestic chaplain 1694. He was equally patronized by the next primate Tenison, at whose request he wrote Animadversions on Collier's Pamphlets, who had with two others pronounced absolution, in a solemn manner, on Perkins and Friend when executed for the assassination plot. In 1698 he was made regius professor of Greek at Oxford, and 1704, was nominated archdeacon of Oxford. He died 20th Jan. 1706, and was buried in the chapel of Wadham college, to which he was a great benefactor by the foundation of 10 scholarships of 10l. each for the cultivation of Hebrew and Greek. He left a MS. account of the learned Greeks who had fled into Italy by the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, which appeared in 1742 under the care of Dr. S. Jebb. He had published in 1701 a History of English Councils and Convocations, and of the English clergy's sitting in Parliament.

HOE, Matthias de Hoenegg, a German divine, born at Vienna, Feb. 24, 1580. He was preacher to the elector of Saxony at Dresden, where he died 4th March 1645. He was an able and a zealous Lutheran, and he wrote with great spirit against both calvinists and papists. His writings are chiefly controversial.

HOECK, John Van, a painter, born at Antwerp 1600. He studied under Rubens and visited Rome, where the pope and cardinals highly favored him. He was afterwards patronized at Vienna by the emperor Ferdinand II. His portraits and historical pieces are much admired. He died 1650.

HOECK, Robert Van, a painter of Antwerp, who died in the middle of the 17th century. His best performances are military pieces, in which his figures appear with great judgment and advantage.

HOEL, Gerard, a painter, born at Bommel 1648. He was director of the academy of painting at Utrecht, and distinguished himself by the superior interest of his historical pieces and of his landscapes, some of which are preserved in the house of lord Albermarle, and in the palace of Stargenberg. He died 1733.

HOELTZLINUS, Jeremias, a philologist, born at Nuremberg. He settled at Leyden, and published there a very learned edition of Apollonius Rhodius 1641, the year of his death. Ruhnkenius, however, censures him as an editor.

HOESCHELIUS, David, a learned German, born at Augsburg, 1556. After teaching long in the college there, he was appointed principal of the society, and also librarian. He was a judicious and indefatigable collector of MSS. and he evinced his learning by his publication of some of the fathers, of Origen, Basil, Philo Judæus, &c. — besides Appian, Procopius, Anna Commena, &c. He died at Augsburg 1617, universally lamented. As a proof of his attention and discipline at the head of his college, it is mentioned that he furnished to the bar 1000 of his pupils, and 2000 to the church.

HOFFMAN, Maurice, a physician, born at Furstenwalde, Brandenburg 20th Sep. 1621. His fondness for literature, and his indefatigable application surmounted all the opposition which his parents made against his studious pursuits, and in 1637 he was permitted by his father to improve himself in the college of Cologne. The death of his father now left him his own matter, and he came to Altdorf the next year, where his mother's brother was professor of physic, and after profiting by his advice and instruction he went to Padua, where by the dissection of a turkey-cock he discovered the pancreatic duct, from which his friend Versungus ascertained the same vessel in the human body. Hoffman after three years' residence at Padua, returned to Altdorf, where he began to practise as physician. In 1648 he was made professor of anatomy and surgery, the next year of physic, and 1653 of botany, and director of the physic garden. His abilities and reputation were such that many of the German princes, appointed him their physician. He died of an apoplexy 1698, aged 76. He had 18 children by three wives. He wrote Altdorfi Deliciæ Hortenses, 4to. — Appendix ad Catalogum Plantarum Hortens. 4to. — Deliciæ Sylvestres, 4to. — Florilegium Altdorfinum, 4to.

HOFFMAN, John Maurice, son of the preceding by his first wife, was born 1653 at Altdorf. After studying at Hertzpruck, Altdorf, and Frankfort on the Oder, he went to Padua for two years, and then making the tour of Italy he returned home and took the degree of M. D. In 1677 he was made professor extraordinary in physic, and increased so much in reputation that the margrave of Anspach in 1695 appointed him his physician. He travelled with his illustrious patron into Italy, and after his death in 1703 he held the same honorable rank with his successor at whose strong invitations he removed to Anspach 1713, and died 1727. He had succeeded his father as botanic professor and director of the physic garden at Altdorf 1698. He had five children by his wife. He published some valuable botanical works, and de Differentiis Alimentorum, 4to. 1677.

HOFFMAN, Frederic, an eminent physician, born at Hall near Magdeburg 1660, where he became professor of physic 1693, and where he continued till his death 1742. He visited Holland and England, where he became acquainted with the learned men of the times, especially Paul Herman, and Robert Boyle. He took no fees, but was supported by an annual stipend. His works in six large folios, Geneva, 1748-54, contain much much valuable matter, with some frivolous, and puerile conjectures.

HOFFMAN, Daniel, a Lutheran divine, professor at Helmstadt, at the end of the 16th century. He engaged in the popular and theological controversies of the times, and opposed Beza on the subject of the Eucharist. He was censured by an assembly of divines 1593, and threatened with excommunication if he did not subscribe to the opinions of his persecutors, against whom he published a labored apology.

HOFFMAN, Gasper, a professor of physic at Altdorf, born at Gotha 1572. He died 1649, leaving behind him some valuable medical works.

HOFFMAN, John James, a laborious compiler, born at Basle. Few particulars are known of this indefatigable man. He published at Geneva 1677, in 2 vols. folio, his great work, "Lexicon Universale, Historico-geographico-poetico-philosophico-politico-philologicum," to which he was induced by success to add a supplement. The Leyden booksellers in 1698, having been favored with all the improvements and corrections of the author, published the work in 4 vols. folio, with a new preface by the author. He died, Greek professor at Basle 1706, aged 71.

HOGARTH, William, a celebrated painter, born in the parish of St. Martin Ludgate, London, 1697. His father who was a school master, and occasionally a corrector of the press, bound him apprentice to an engraver of arms on plate, but his genius led him to cultivate painting. The first piece by which he distinguished himself was a representation of Wanstead assembly, about 1720, and he was now engaged on his own account in engraving arms and shop bills, and in designing plates for bookfellers. His cuts for Hudibras, for Apuleius' Golden Ass, and other works, are still preserved as curiosities, but his powers were exerted with singular effect, not only in portrait painting, but in whimsical and humorous representations. By degrees he thus rose from obscurity to fame, and in 1730 married fir James Thornhill's daughter. Though the match was altogether against the knight's consent, yet they were reconciled, and the father-in-law afterwards had reason to be proud of the connection which his daughter had formed. During his residence at South Lambeth, soon after his marriage, he contributed largely to the embellishment of Vauxhall gardens, and for his pieces the proprietor, Tyers, complimented him with a golden ticket of admission, with this honorable motto, "In perpetuum beneficii memoriam." In 1733 his Harlot's Progress recommended him powerfully to the public notice, and thus by the most striking scene in conveying a simple girl through all the horrors and vicissitudes of the wretchedness of a prostitute to a premature death, he exhibited a lesson to the understanding, and most sensibly touched the heart. Thus successful in a new mode of conveying moral instruction, he devoted himself to the delineation of other equally interesting and appropriate characters, and to the accuracy of his figures must be added the faithful representation of the dress, the manners, and the particularities of the age. The Midnight Conversation, the Rake's Progress, the Marriage a-la-mode, the Happy Marriage, and other works succeeded each other, and ensured to the artist the high and undisputed character of great genius, strong originality, and successful delineation. After the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, he visited France, and while taking a drawing of the gates of Calais, he was arrested as a spy, but soon liberated, a circumstance which he has beautifully recorded in his "O the roast beef of Old England" 1749. In 1753 he appeared before the public as an author, and in his Analysis of beauty, he made many sensible and original remarks on his profession. He first asserted that a curve is the line of beauty, and that round swelling figures are most pleasing to the eye, and the opinion has been supported by other eminent writers, as the language of truth and nature. In his conduct Hogarth was a very absent man. One of his letters to Dr. Hoadly was directed "to the Doctor at Chelsea," and it reached his friend to be preserved as a monument of his singularity. When he set up his carriage he paid a visit to Beckford the lord mayor, and being let out by a different door from the mansion house, he hastened to his apartments in Leicester square through a violent shower of rain, and never recollected that he had left his coach behind, till his wife inquired for it. Though he possessed in an incredible degree the powers of bringing his rivals or enemies to ridicule or infamy, yet Hogarth never used the dangerous talent in a vindictive degree, though perhaps his representation of Churchill as a canonical bear, and his portrait of Wilkes may be said not highly to reflect on his judgment or good sense. He expired at his house Leicester square 25th Oct. 1764, in consequence of an aneurism, and was buried in Chiswick church-yard, where an inscription by his friend Garrick marks his grave. Great as an artist, Hogarth was respectable as a private man; he was liberal, generous and hospitable; and had education, and an earlier acquaintance with the polite world worn away some of the asperities of his character he might have been regarded as an amiable man. A very entertaining account of the life and labors of Hogarth has appeared by the pen of John Ireland, called "Hogarth illustrated," 1792, and "Graphic Illustrations &c." an additional work has been published by Samuel Ireland.

HOHENLOHE, Prince de, general of artillery in the imperial army, distinguished himself against the Turks in Transylvania in 1788, and against the French in the battles of Famars and Marmal in 1792. He was entrusted with the command of the army on the Rhine, and died whilst in that office, Aug. 1796.

HOLBACH, Paul Thierry, baron de, an eminent mineralogist, born in the Palatinate, and for his learning made member of the academies of Manheim, Paris, Petersburg, Berlin, &c. He wrote L'Art de la Verrierie de Neri—Mineralogie de Wallerius, 2 vols—Elements de la Morale Universelle, ou Catechisme de la Nature—Introduction à la Mineralogie, &c.—and died at Paris 1789, aged 66.

HOLBEIN, John, better known by the German name of Hans, a celebrated painter born at Basil, Switzerland, 1498, or three years earlier according to Charles Patin. He studied under his father who was a painter, but soon eclipsed him. He painted our Saviour's passion in the town house of Basil, and in the fish-market, ket, a dance of peasants, and death's dance. These pieces gained him much celebrity, and also the friendship of the great Erasmus, who pitied and in vain endeavoured to reform his roughness of manners, and his culpable partiality for low company and for drinking. He was invited by an English nobleman who saw him at Basil to visit England, and at last in his eagerness after fame, and in his wish to avoid the ill humor of a termagant wife, and by the advice of Erasmus, he began to travel towards England, and almost begged his way on his journey. He was received with great friendship by the lord chancellor, sir Thomas More, in whose house he resided nearly three years while employing his pencil in drawing the portrait of his patron and of his friends. When asked the name of the nobleman who had accidentally promised him protection in England, he said he had forgotten it, but added that he remembered his features, and immediately drew a likeness so correct, and so accurate that the noble stranger became known to the chancellor and his friends. Some time after sir Thomas exhibited the productions of Holbein accidentally to Henry VIII. who was so pleased with them that he took the illustrious painter under his immediate patronage, and sent him to draw the picture of the dutchess dowager of Milan, whom he designed for his fourth wife, after the death of Jane Seymour. He was afterwards employed to draw the portrait of Anne of Cleves, which proved too flattering to engage the fastidious affections of Henry. Holbein after giving the world a great number of valuable portraits of the personages of the court, and of various noblemen, unfortunately died of the plague at his lodgings in Whitehall 1554. This excellent artist, says Du Fresnoy "was wonderfully knowing and had certainly been of the first form of painters, had he travelled into Italy, since nothing can be laid to his charge but only that he had a Gothic gusto." He performed indeed better than Raphael, and with some of his portraits, none of Titian's could come into competition. Henry VIII. was so sensible of his merit that in defending him from the vengeance of an offended nobleman, he said to his persecutor I can, when I please, make seven lords of seven ploughmen, but I cannot make one Holbein even of seven lords.

HOLBERG, Louis de, a Danish writer, born at Bergen, Norway, 1685. He rose from obscurity by his application and diligence, and after travelling over Europe supported merely by his own personal exertions; he returned to Copenhagen, where he became assessor of the consistory court. He gained great celebrity by his works which were a valuable history of Denmark, 3 vols. 4to. — some comedies, — 2 vols. of Moral Thoughts, — the Danish Spectator, — and a satirical romance, like Gulliver's Travels. By economy and by his literary labors he acquired a handsome fortune, and was a great benefactor to the university of Zealand, and also gave 16,000, crowns to portion a number of Danish young women. He died 1754.

HOLDEN, Henry, an English divine, of great erudition, and strict integrity. He was a Roman catholic, and settled at Paris, where he died 1662. His works are, Analysis Fidei, reprinted by Barbou 1766 — Marginal Notes on the New Testament, 2 vols. 12mo. 1660.

— a Letter concerning White's Treatise de Medio Animarum Statu, 4to. 1661.

HOLDER, William, an English divine, born in Nottinghamshire, and educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. In 1642 he was made rector of Blechingdon, Oxfordshire, and in 1660 he took the degree of D. D. He was afterwards canon of Ely and St. Paul's, fellow of the royal society, subdean of the royal chapel, and subalmoner to the king. He died at Amen Corner London 24th Jan. 1696-7, and was buried in St. Paul's. He was well skilled in music, and wrote a treatise on the principles of harmony, and also a discourse concerning time, with application to the natural day, lunar month, and solar year. He gained some credit by teaching Popham, a man of some distinction, who was deaf and dumb, to speak, but as the pupil forgot what he had been taught, and again recovered it by the instruction of Dr. Wallis of Oxford, a controversy on the subject between these two learned men arose, and was conducted in some pamphlets with more acrimony than moderation.

HOLDSWORTH, Edward, an elegant scholar, educated at Winchester school, and admitted of Magdalen college, Oxford 1705. After being some time tutor, he refused, when elected fellow in 1715, to take the oath of allegiance to the Hanoverian succession, and returning from Oxford, spent the rest of his days in travelling with pupils of distinction. He died of a fever at lord Digby's at Colehill, Warwickshire, 30th Dec. 1747. He was author of that elegant poem "Muscipula," translated by Dr. J. Hoadly in Doddsley's Miscellanies, and wrote also a dissertation on the Pharsalia and Philippi mentioned in the Georgics, besides remarks on Virgil, published by Mr. Spence 1768. He understood Virgil, says Mr. Spence, "better than any man I ever knew."

HOLE, Richard, a native of Exeter, educated there and at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL. B. 1771. In 1792 he succeeded to the living of Farrington, Devonshire, on the presentation of the bishop of Exeter, besides which he afterwards obtained Inwardleigh vicarage. He published Ossian in a poetical dress, — Ode to Imagination, — Homer's hymn to Ceres, translated 1781. — Arthur an Epic Romance, with notes, — Remarks on the Arabian Nights Entertainments, &c. 1797, 12mo. — besides odes in the Devonshire collection of poems, and Essays in the Exeter society publications, &c. He died 1803.

HOLINGSHEAD, Raphael, an English chronicler descended from a family which lived at Bolesey, Cheshire. Few particulars are known respecting him, but he appears before the public as author of "Chronicles" first published 1577, 2 vols. folio, and in 1587 in three. The second edition contained some passages offensive to Elizabeth, and therefore they were cancelled in the second and third vol. though afterwards printed separately. In these chronicles, which gave an interesting account of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland, Holingshead had for coadjutors, Hooker, Harrison, Stanhurst, Boteville, and others, who at that time were respectable writers, and like himself, well versed in antiquarian history. The work was afterwards continued by Stow, Thin, Fleming, and others, from 1577 to 1586. The time of his death is uncertain, but from his will, prefixed by Hearne to Camden's Annals, he died between 1578 and 1582.

HOLL, Francis Xavier, a jesuit, born at Schwandorf. He was professor of belles lettres, and of ecclesiastical law in several of the German universities, and died at Heidelberg 6th March 1784, aged 64. He wrote Statistica Ecclesiæ Germaniæ, 8vo. an useful work.

HOLLAND, Philemon, a native of Chelmsford, educated at Cambridge under Dr. Whitgift. He was elected master of Coventry free school, but besides the duties of this station, he practised physic, and with some degree of success and celebrity. He was a good scholar, and increased his reputation by his translations of Livy, of Xenophon's Cyropædia, of Pliny's Natural History, and of Camden's Britannia. He died at Coventry 1636, aged 85.

HOLLAR or HOLLARD, Wenzel or Wenceslaus, an eminent engraver, born at Prague, Bohemia, 1607. He was intended for the law, but the ruin of his family by the sacking of Prague in 1619, rendered his subsistence precarious, and he left home in 1627, determined to support himself by his own exertions. In several towns of Germany, he devoted himself attentively to drawing and design, and in taking geometrical and perspective views of fortresses and buildings, so that he acquired early eminence, and at the age of 18 was known as an able artist. He chiefly employed his powers in copying heads and portraits from the best painters, and in delineating with great beauty and accuracy, small and delicate views of some of the cities on the banks of the Rhine. His reputation, acknowledged by his countrymen, became known to lord Arundel, the English ambassador at the court of Ferdinand II. who, in 1636 noticed him by every mark of kindness, and took him in his retinue. Hollar accompanied his noble patron to England, and soon engaged in the service of the print-sellers. His first work in England was a view of Greenwich, published 1637. His abilities were afterwards engaged in taking different views, and in 1640, he was introduced to the royal family, to instruct the prince of Wales in the art of designing. That same year appeared his "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus," representing the dress of English women of various ranks, a work greatly esteemed among connoisseurs. The breaking out of the civil wars proved unfortunate to his labors, and after his patron lord Arundel had returned to the continent, he grew obnoxious to the parliament as the friend of the royal family, and chiefly for employing his graver to preserve the portraits of so many of the loyalists. He was taken prisoner at the surrender of Basing-house 1645, but afterwards escaped and went over to Antwerp, where lord Arundel had fixed his residence. In this retirement he employed himself in etching the portraits of some of the great men of the times, but without the wish or the means of improving his fortune. In 1652 he was persuaded to return to England, where with fresh assiduity he devoted himself to labor, and with such perseverance that he never would be interrupted till his hour glass was exhausted. It is said that he suffered greatly in his property by the fire and the plague of London 1665. About 1669 he was sent by the king to take a view of the garrison, town, and neighbouring landscapes of Tangier, on the coast of Africa, and after his return, he in 1672 went into the northern counties, to draw representations of the principal cities, churches, &c. of that part of the kingdom. This illustrious artist, whose labors were so numerous and so varied, was never free from the persecutions of creditors, so that after exerting himself to give celebrity to others, he found that independence could never be in his power, either for want of economy, or more probably the illiberality of his employers. He had, it is said, in his 70th year an execution in his house in Gardiner's lane Westminster, and begged only the liberty of dying on his bed, without being conveyed to any prison but the grave. He died 28th March 1677, and was buried in the new chapel yard St. Margaret's Westminster. It is impossible to enumerate all his works in etching, which embraced not only the noble collection of his friend lord Arundel and the choicest pieces of Titian, Durer, Holbein, Vandyck, Breughel, Teniers, and many others, but also the heads of the most eminent men in church and state, in the army, in literature, and every department of science and of fame, besides landscapes, views, &c. of the most capital places of Europe. He was very exact in affixing his cypher, and the date to his pieces, which has proved of great service in ascertaining historical facts.

HOLLIS, Thomas Pelham, succeeded his father as baron Pelham, and in 1711, his uncle John, as duke of Newcastle. His attachment to the house of Hanover was rewarded by various honors and high offices. He retired from administration soon after the accession of George III. and was succeeded by lord Bute. He died 17th Nov. 1768, aged 75.

HOLLIS, Denzil, lord, one of the five members whom Charles I. went to the house of commons personally to accuse, and to arrest. This weakness on the part of the king, greatly increased his popularity, but he was not successful in his opposition to the independents and to the ambitious views of Cromwell. Though he favored the cause of the presbyterians, he was deemed worthy to be noticed by the second Charles, and to be raised to the peerage. He died 1680, aged 83.

HOLLIS, Thomas, an English gentleman, born in London 14th April 1720. At the age of 14 he was sent to Amsterdam, to acquire the French and Dutch languages, and after 15 months' residence, he returned to England, and after his father's death in 1735, he was placed by his guardian under the tuition of professor Ward. In 1740 he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and became a law student, but he never made the law his profession. In 1748 he travelled with his friend Mr. Brand, through Holland, the Netherlands, part of France, of Switzerland and Italy, and again in 1750 he made another tour and visited the chief places in the north of Germany, with the rest of Italy, Sicily, Malta and France, of which travels the journal is said to be extant in MS. He attempted at his return to get into parliament, but his views were disappointed, and he went to reside on his estate of Corfcombe, Dorsetshire.

fetshire. He was in his principles a dissenter, and a warm advocate for the liberty of the subject, so that he not only made a collection of books and medals to illustrate and uphold his favorite system, but he presented anonymously, as an Englishman, two large and choice collections of books to the public library of Bern, as a lover of liberty, of his country, and of its excellent constitution as established at the revolution. His liberality was extended to other countries, to Genoa, Venice, Sweden, Leyden, Russia, &c. as well as to his own countrymen. He died suddenly of an apoplexy on new year's day 1774. He is described by his contemporaries as a man of large fortune, above half of which he devoted to charitable purposes. His property he left to his friend Brand, who consequently took the name of Hollis, and was as zealous a friend of liberty, as his departed benefactor. Mr. Hollis, to spread more widely his principles, published at his own expence, new editions of Toland's life of Milton, of Algernon Sydney's discourses on government, and meditated an edition of Andrew Marvell's works. When his house in London was on fire in 1761, he calmly walked out, only taking under his arm an original picture of Milton.

HOLMES, George, born at Skipton in Craven, Yorkshire, was clerk to the keepers of the records in the tower for nearly 60 years. His abilities were employed by lord Halifax to methodize the valuable records deposited in the tower, and he received for his trouble an annual salary of 200l. He was also barrack-master of the tower. He died 16th Feb. 1748-9 aged 87. His son and only child died long before him, at the age of 25. Mr. Holmes republished the 17 first volumes of Rymer's Fœdera. His valuable collection of books, prints, coins, medals, &c. was sold by auction 1749. His portrait was engraved by the society of antiquaries with every mark of respect and commendation bestowed on his indefatigable labors. His widow received from government 200l. for his papers which were deposited as a sacred pledge in the tower.

HOLMES, Dr. Nathaniel, a learned hebraist, author of the Resurrection Revealed, fol. 1654, in defence of the Millennium. He was ejected from the living of St. Mary Staining, London, in 1662, for nonconformity, and died 1678.

HOLMES, Robert, a native of Hampshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He devoted himself early to biblical criticism, and in the beginning of the French revolution went to Paris, to examine the manuscripts and versions of the scriptures preserved in the public libraries of France. His services to sacred literature were honorably rewarded, and he became successively canon of Salisbury, of Christ-church, and then dean of Winchester, which last preferment he enjoyed not two years. He died at Oxford 12th Nov. 1805, aged 56. He published the Bampton Lectures in 1782. — Divinity Tracts, 8vo. 1788 — Alfred, an ode, with six sonnets, 1778 — An Ode for the Duke of Portland's Installation, 1793 — a Latin Letter to the Bishop of Durham respecting his Collation of the Septuagint, fol. — The Prophecy of Daniel according to Theodotian, and the LXX, 4to. — besides single sermons on the resurrection another preached before the house of commons, &c. Dr. Holmes took his degree of D. D. in 1786, and in 1790 he succeeded Thomas Warton as poetry professor. Of his Collation of the Septuagint MSS. 5 vols. in folio, have appeared, and reflect highly on his industry, great perseverance, and solid judgment.

HOLSTEIN, Cornelius, a painter of Haerlem, brought up by his father, who was of the same profession. The ceiling of the treasury at Amsterdam, and other pieces, are proofs of his superior abilities. He died about the end of the 17th century.

HOLSTENIUS, or HOLSTEIN, Lucas, a German divine, born at Hamburg, 1596, and converted from protestantism to the catholic religion by the Jesuit Sirmond. He studied at home and Paris, and went afterwards to Rome, where he was patronized by cardinal Barberini, and Urban VIII. and his two successors. He was made a canon of St. Peter's, and librarian of the Vatican, and in 1665 went as ambassador from the pope to Christina queen of Sweden, whose profession of the catholic faith he received at Inspruck. He died at Rome 1661, aged 65. Though very learned he published only a dissertation on the life and writings of Porphyry, besides some notes on the Argonautica of Apollonius — on the Fragments of Demophilus, &c.

HOLT, Mr. John, lord chief justice of the king's bench, was born at Thame, Oxfordshire 1642. He was educated at Abingdon school, where his father was recorder, and afterwards entered as gentleman commoner of Oriel college, Oxford. In 1658 he entered at Gray's Inn, and when called to the bar, he distinguished himself as an able counsellor. In the reign of James II. he was elected recorder of London, from which, 18 months after, he was removed for opposing the abolition of the test act. In 1686 he was made serjeant at law, and at the revolution he was elected to the convention parliament, and soon after his services in the cause of loyalty were rewarded with the first seat in the court of king's bench, and a place in the privy council. In 1700 he declined succeeding lord Somers as chancellor, and remained in the king's bench, where he presided with firmness, patience, and dignity, and maintained the honor of his situation even in opposition to the two houses of parliament. Impartial and unbiassed as a judge, he watched with jealous care over the privileges of the people, and deserved by his uprightness and integrity the high character of Verus, applied to him in the 14th number of the Tatler. While in office he was solicited to support with his officers, a party of the military, which was sent to disperse a riot, occasioned in Holborn by the frequent and violent practice of decoying young men for the plantations. Suppose, said the judge to the messenger, that the populace should not disperse at your appearance, what are you to do then? Sir, replied the officer, we have orders to fire on them. Have you, sir, said the judge, then take notice of this, if there be one man killed, and you are tried before me, I will take care, you, and every soldier of your party shall be hanged. Sir, added he, go back to those who sent you, and tell them that no officer of mine shall attend soldiers, and let them know at the same time, that the laws of this kingdom are not to be executed by the sword, these matters belong to the the civil power, and you have nothing to do with them. The chief justice immediately, with his tipstaves and a few constables repaired to the spot, and after addressing the populace, and promising the punishment of those who had excited the public indignation, he dispersed the mob quietly. This great and upright judge, died after a lingering illness, March 1709, leaving no issue. He published 1708 a Report of Cases in Pleas of the Crown in the reign of Charles II. &c.

HOLWELL, John Zephaniah, an Englishman, governor of Bengal, and one of those unfortunate men confined in the black hole of Calcutta 1756, of which he published an interesting narrative. He wrote also several pieces on East India affairs, and died 1798.

HOLYDAY, Barten, an English divine, born at Oxford 1593, son of a taylor. He was educated at Christ-church, where he was student, and in 1615, he took orders. In 1618 he went as chaplain with sir Francis Stewart to Spain, and on his return was made chaplain to the king, and archdeacon of Oxford. In 1642 he was made D.D. and during the civil wars he remained concealed in the neighbourhood of Oxford, but afterwards he submitted to the parliament, and under their regulations took the living of Chilton, Berkshire. At the restoration he came to settle at Illey, Berks, and was restored to his former preferments. He died at Illey 2d Oct. 1661. It is said his temporising manners prevented his elevation to a bishopric. He published twenty sermons, besides some poems, and "the Survey of the World," a poem in 10 books, 1661, and also a Translation of Juvenal and Persius, not very poetical, says Dryden, but very faithful, and accompanied with valuable notes.

HOLYOAKE, Francis, a learned scholar, born at Nether Whitacre, Warwickshire, about 1567. He studied at Oxford, and in 1604 became rector of Southam, Warwickshire. He suffered greatly during the civil wars, for his attachment to the royal cause, and died 1653, and was buried at Warwick. He published an etymological dictionary of Latin words, first printed 1606, 4to. and edited the fourth time 1633.

HOLYOAKE, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Southam 1616, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was captain in the king's army, and for his services was made D.D. For some time he practised physic, and then took orders, and had some valuable livings. He died 1675, leaving a dictionary English and Latin, and Latin and English, published 1677, and borrowed from his father's labors.

HOLYWOOD, John, called also Sacrobosco, of Halifax, a mathematician, born at Halifax, Yorkshire, though said by some to be an Irishman, and by others a Scotchman. He was educated at Oxford, and then went to Paris, where he died 1256. He wrote De Sphæra Mundi — de Anni Ratione — de Algorismo.

HOMBERG, William, an eminent chymist born at Batavia in Java, 3d Jan. 1652, where his father was arsenal governor. Returning with his father to Europe, he entered into the army, and afterwards studied at the universities of Jena and Leipzig, but the sciences had greater attraction for him than the law, for which he was intended. Botany, chymistry, and medicine, were his favorite pursuits, and he was encouraged in his designs by the friendship of Otto de Guericke. To improve himself he travelled to Italy, Hungary, Bohemia, Sweden and France, and under the patronage of Colbert, determined to settle at Paris, where he renounced the protestant for the catholic religion in 1682. The death of Colbert, altered his resolution, and he retired to Rome, where he began to practise physic. In 1690 he again returned to Paris, and had the good fortune to be appointed chymist, and then physician to the duke of Orleans the regent. He died of a dysentery, Sept. 1715, at Paris, seven years after he had married the daughter of the physician Dardart. The writings of Homberg are chiefly preserved in the memoirs of the academy. He is known for his successful experiments, and for his discoveries in chymistry, especially that of the properties of the Bologna stone, and its phosphoric appearances after calcination. He was a frequent correspondent on scientific subjects with Boyle, and other learned men.

HOME, David, a Scotch divine, educated in France. He was employed by James I. to reconcile the differences between Tilenus and Du Moulin, on the subject of justification, and thus to introduce an amity of sentiments on religion throughout Europe. The time of his death is not recorded. He wrote Apoloogia Basilica, seu Machiavelli Ingenium examinatum, 4to. — L'Assassinat du Roi, ou Maximes du Vieil de la Montagne pratiquées par le defunt Henri le Grand 1617 — and some pieces in the Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum.

HOME, Henry, lord Kaimes, a learned Scotch judge, known also as an elegant writer. After being long eminent as a lawyer, he was in 1752 raised to a seat among the lords of session, and while he faithfully discharged his duty to the public, he devoted usefully his time to literature. He died 26th Dec. 1782, after having been several years senior lord of session. His writings are, essays on several subjects concerning British Antiquities, &c. 1746 — Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion 1751, 8vo. — Historical Law, 1759 — The Principles of Equity, folio, 1760 — Elements of Criticism, 3 vols. 8vo. 1762, a valuable book, often re-edited — The Gentleman Farmer, 1777 — Loose Hints upon Education, 1781 — The History of Man, or Sketches, 4 vols. 8vo. 1782.

HOMER, the father of poetry, is supposed to have flourished about 907 B.C. His history is so obscurely known, that not less than seven cities disputed the honor of giving him birth. Besides his two immortal works, the Iliad, and the Odyssey, he wrote Batrachomyomachia, or the battle of the frogs and the mice, and Hymns to the Gods.

HOMMEL, Charles Frederic, a writer of Leipzig, who died 1781, aged 59. He wrote, De Legum Civilium & Naturalium Natura — Oblectamenta Juris Feudalis, five Grammaticæ Observationes Jus Rei Censualis, & Antiquitates Germanicas variè illustratæ — Literaturæ Juris — Jurisprudentiæ Numismatibus illustratæ, &c. — Corpus Juris Civilis cum notis Variorum, &c.

HOMMOND, Charles Francis P., a native of Chaulnes, near Noyon, who devoted his life to the instruction of of youth at Paris, and in the provinces. He died at Paris 31st Dec. 1794, aged 66. He wrote, De Viris Illustribus Urbis Romæ — Epitome Historiæ Sacræ — a Grammar, &c.

HONDEKOETER, Gilles, a painter, born at Utrecht, 1583. His landscapes and flowers were much admired.

HONDEKOETER, Gysbrecht, son of Gilles, was born 1613, and excelled in the lively and natural representation of fowls.

HONDEKOETER, Melchior, a painter, son of Gysbrecht, born at Utrecht. He died 1695, aged 59. His landscapes introduced, especially in the back of his pictures, possess great elegance and beauty.

HONDIUS, Abraham, a painter, born at Rotterdam. He died 1691, aged 53. His best piece is the burning of Troy, in which he has introduced a great variety of figures, with boldness and exquisite judgment.

HONDIUS, Jeffé, a native of Wackerne in Flanders, who died 1611, aged 48. He was eminent as an engraver on copper and ivory, in which he was self-taught, and as a letter founder. In 1607 he published, Descriptio Geographica Orbis Terrarum, folio, besides, Theatrum Artis Scribendi — Gerhardi Mercatoris Atlas — & Italiæ Hodiernæ Descriptio. He constructed two globes in London, remarkable for beauty and size, and settled in Amsterdam.

HONE, George Paul, a lawyer, born at Nuremberg 1662. He was counsellor to the duke of Meiningen, and bailiff of Coburg, where he died 1747. He wrote Iter Juridicum per Belgium, &c. — Lexicon Topographicum Franconiæ — History of the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg, &c.

HONESTIS, Petrus de, or Petrus Damiani, an Italian, born at Ravenna 1006. His great piety recommended him to pope Stephen, by whom he was made bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1059 he was employed by pope Nicolas II. to reduce the church of Milan to the observations of celibacy, which he effected with difficulty. In 1061 he abdicated his bishopric and retired to a cell, but the next year the pope called him away, and sent him as his ambassador to France. In 1072 he reconciled the see of Ravenna to the pope, and died the same year, aged 66. His works are numerous, chiefly consisting of epistles addressed to the clergy, little esteemed now.

HONORIUS, second son of the great Theodosius, was emperor of the west, while his brother Arcadius sat on the throne of Constantinople. He disregarded the ravages of Alaric the Goth in the indolence of his palace at Ravenna, where he died 423, aged 39.

HONORIUS I. pope, after Boniface V. 626, died 12th Oct. 638. He presided over the church with great zeal and wisdom, though he is blamed for yielding to the artful insinuations of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, on some controversial points.

HONORIUS II. Lambert, bishop of Ostia, was made pope 1124, after the death of Callixtus II. though at the same time, and in the same church, another party elected Theobald, under the name of Celestinus. The influence of Honorius however prevailed, and Celestinus yielded to his rival, who died 14th Feb. 1130.

HONORIUS III. Cenfo Savelli, was elected after Innocent III. He confirmed the order of St. Dominic, and that of the Carmes, and preached without effect, a crusade to the Holy Land. He died 18th March 1227. A work called, Conjuraciones, &c. has appeared under his name.

HONORIUS IV. James Savelli, was elected pope 2d April 1285, and died 3d April 1287. He ably defended the rights of the Roman church, and supported the crusades.

HONTAN, Baron de, a native of Gascony, in the 17th century, known by his travels in North America, which he published in a barbarous style, and filled with disguised facts, and many improbabilities. He was originally a soldier in Canada, and after rising to the rank of an officer, he was broke for quarrelling with the governor of Newfoundland, and then went to settle in Denmark. An edition of his travels is from Amsterdam, 2 vols. 12mo. 1705.

HONTHEIM, John Nicholas de, author of Historia Trevisensis Diplomatica & Pragmatica, 5 vols. folio — De præsentis Statu Ecclesiæ, 5 vols. 4to. a work which excited some controversy, was suffragan to the archbishop of Treves, and died 1790, aged 90.

HONTHORST, Gerard, a painter of Utrecht, who studied under Bloemart. His night pieces are much admired, especially his Christ brought before Pilate, in which the light from the torches is made to illuminate the whole piece with astonishing effect. He died 1660, aged 68. His brother William was equally eminent as an historical and portrait painter, and died 1683.

HOFFT, Petrus Cornelius Van, a poet and historian, born at Amsterdam 1581. He was made knight of St. Michael by Lewis XIII. and died after a short illness, as he was going to attend the funeral of Fred. Henry prince of Orange 1647. He wrote epigrams, comedies, and other poems — A History of the Low Countries from Charles V.'s Abdication, to 1598, 2 vols. folio — A Latin History of Henry IV. of France — A Dutch translation of Tacitus, highly esteemed, as the author read the original 52 times, to understand more perfectly his meaning.

HOOGVEEN, Henry, a Dutch philologist, born at Leyden, Jan. 1712. Though his parents were poor, yet his education was liberal, and at the age of 15, he began to teach others to support himself, and his parents. In 1732 he was elected under-master of the school of Gorcum, and nine months after went to settle at Woerden, where he married. In 1738, the year he lost his wife, by whom he had three sons and two daughters, he removed to the school of Culemburg, where he took a second wife. In 1745, he was invited to Breda, but for a while the fears of invasion, and of a French army, disturbed his residence, though at last he lived there 16 years, and in 1761 he removed to Dort, and three years after to Delft, where he died Nov. 1, 1794. His works were, an edition of Vigerus de Idiotismis Lingux Græcæ — An inaugural speech at Culemburg — An elegiac poem and other poetical pieces — and Doctrina Particularum Lingux Græcæ, 2 vols. 4to. 1769, a work of great learning, and universally applauded, besides a posthumous work, Dictionarium Analogicum Græcum, printed at Cambridge, bridge, with an account of his life, by his son, his successor at the school of Delft.

HOOGSTRAETEN, Theodore Van, a painter of Antwerp. His landscapes were much admired. He died 1640, aged 44. His son, Samuel, was equally eminent for his skill, not only in landscapes but in portraits. He died 1678, aged 51.

HOOGSTRAETEN, James, a Dominican, and inquisitor-general, is known by the virulence with which he wrote against Luther, Erasmus, Reuchlin, and others. He died at Cologne 1527.

HOOGSTRATEN, David Van, professor of belles lettres at Amsterdam, was born at Rotterdam 1658. In a thick fog, Nov. 13th 1724, he lost his way, and fell into a canal, and in consequence of the accident, he died eight days after. He wrote Latin poems — Flemish poems — Notes on Cor. Nepos and Terence — a Flemish and Latin Dictionary, &c.

HOOGVE, Romain de, a Dutch engraver and designer. His principal works are, Plates for the New and Old Testament, published by Bafnage, folio, 1704 — Plates for the Egyptian Hieroglyphics, Amsterdam, folio — Plates to Fontaine's Fables, 2 vols. 8vo. 1685 — to Boccace — to the Tales of the Queen of Navarre, &c. His pieces are greatly esteemed, and bear a high price.

HOKE, Robert, was born 18th July 1735, at Freshwater, in the isle of Wight, where his father was minister. He was intended for the church, but the weakness of his constitution prevented it, and after being for some time left to his own amusement, he was placed under the care of sir Peter Lely, but the smell of oil colors increased those violent head-aches to which he was liable, and rendered his improvement as a painter impossible. He next was taken into the house of Dr. Busby, and there gradually acquired a perfect knowledge of the learned languages. About 1653 he went to Christ-church, and soon after his introduction to the philosophical society at Oxford enabled him to display and to cultivate his mechanical abilities. He assisted Willis and Boyle in their chemical experiments, and improved himself in astronomy under Seth Ward, and soon became eminent for his inventions and improvements in mechanics, and in astronomical instruments. In 1662 he was unanimously appointed curator of the experiments of the Royal society; and when the charter of institution was granted to that learned body, his name was inserted among the council. He was in 1664 made professor of mechanics to the Royal society by Cutler, and the next year he was elected to the geometrical chair in Gresham college. Upon the destruction of London by fire, he produced an ingenious plan for the re-building of the city, but though it was not adopted, he was so far complimented by the lord mayor and corporation as to be appointed one of the surveyors. In 1668 he was engaged in a warm dispute with Hevelius of Dantzic, with respect to the dioptric telescopes, which he regarded as superior to those with plain sights; but though he was blamed for his assertions, it is now proved that his opinion was the more correct. In 1671 he attacked Newton's theory of light and colors, and with some degree of success; but when in 1686 he laid claim to the discovery of the force and the action of gravity in preference to the great philosopher, his pretensions were regarded with indifference, and considered as the effects of arrogance and ambition. He was in 1691 created M. D. by Tillotson; but the wishes of his friends that he might be enabled to complete a description of the various instruments which his ingenuity had discovered, proved unavailing, as a gradual decay rendered him unfit for laborious exertion. He died at his lodgings, Gresham college, 3d March 1702, and was buried in St. Helen's church, Bishopsgate street. Though possessed of such mental powers, Hooke was in his temper penurious and mistrustful, unsociable and suspicious, and in his person he was uncomely and vulgar, short of stature, and of a pale and meagre aspect. In his religious character however, he was very devout and humble, and nothing fortunate or pleasing ever happened to him without drawing from him ejaculations of gratitude and thanks to the divinity, as his diary every where mentions. He wrote Micrographia, or Philosophical Descriptions of Minute Bodies made by magnifying glasses, with Observations and Inquiries, folio 1666. His posthumous works appeared 1705, folio, under the care of R. Walker, secretary to the Royal society, to whom the MSS. had been referred.

HOKE, Nathanael, an English historian, of whom few particulars are known. He was one of the many who suffered in the South Sea scheme, but he afterwards was patronized by the duchess of Marlborough, who gave him 5000l. to assist her in the arrangement and digestion of her papers, for an history of her conduct at court till the year 1710. The work was finished 1742, 8vo. but the historian quarrelled with the duchess, and was dismissed. As he was a mystic and quietist, and strongly attached to the tenets of Fénélon, he was the friend of the catholics, and it is said that he introduced one of his priests to Pope's bedside to receive the confession of the dying poet, a circumstance which highly offended Bolingbroke. Hooke is particularly known as the historian of Rome, in 4 vols. 4to. from the foundation of the city to the end of the republic. The first volume appeared in 1733, the second 1745, the third 1764, and the fourth 1771. He wrote besides Observations on the Roman Senate, and a translation of Ramfay's Travels of Cyrus. He died 1764.

HOOKER, John, an eminent antiquary, born at Exeter 1524, and educated at Oxford. He travelled into Germany, and on his return settled at Exeter, which he represented in parliament 1571. He died 1601. He was author of a Description of Exeter, and of some part of Holinshed's Chronicle.

HOOKER, Richard, nephew to the preceding, was a celebrated divine, born at Heavitree, near Exeter, 1553. His great abilities were early observed by the schoolmaster under whom he studied at Exeter, and by the kindness of his uncle he was introduced to bishop Jewell, who with uncommon liberality sent him as clerk to Corpus Christi, Oxford, and settled a pension upon him. The death of his patron for a while obscured his prospects, but he found a friend in Dr. Cole, the president of his college, and in Sandys, bishop shop of London; and in 1577 his merits recommended him to a fellowship in his college. He took orders in 1581, and soon after formed an imprudent marriage with a woman who without personal accomplishments and without fortune, rendered his life, by her peevish manners, painful and uncomfortable. In 1584 he obtained the living of Drayton Beauchamp, Bucks, where the following year two of his pupils, Sandys, the son of his patron, and Cranmer, the nephew of the great Cranmer, visited him with marks of sincere respect, and heartfelt commiseration. Sandys reported to his father the indigent circumstances of his learned tutor, and the bishop, in return for the attention paid to his son, procured for this neglected man the mastership of the Temple, 1585. In this new situation Hooker had to struggle with Travers, the afternoon lecturer, who through disappointment so far forgot his duty, as to attack his coadjutor in the pulpit, and it was pleasantly observed by some of the congregation, that the forenoon sermon spake Canterbury, and the afternoon, Geneva, alluding to the principles to which the two rivals were attached. After defending himself with vigor and dignity against his opponent, Hooker obtained permission from Whitgift to exchange his preferment, and in 1591 he removed to the rectory of Boscomb, Wiltshire, to which was added the prebend of Nether-haven in Sarum church. In 1595 he was presented by the queen to Bishop's Bourne rectory in Kent, and here he passed the rest of his life, and completed his great work, Ecclesiastical Polity, which he had begun at Boscomb. In crossing between London and Gravesend by water, he unfortunately caught cold, which brought on a severe illness, which proved fatal 2d Nov. 1600, in his 47th year. The fame of Hooker rests upon that incomparable work the Ecclesiastical Polity, in eight books, a work admired not only in England, but on the continent. It is said that the pope, Clement VIII. who declared that he knew no English writer who deserved the name of author, no sooner heard the contents of this immortal work, than he exclaimed, there is no learning that this man hath not searched into. His books will get reverence by age, for there is in them such seeds of eternity, that they will continue till the last fire shall devour all learning. Besides his answer to Travers' Supplication, Hooker published some sermons. His works have been edited folio, and also in an 8vo. form at Oxford.

HOOKER, Charles, a native of Wakefield, Yorkshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford. He was elected master of Rotherham school, but during the civil wars he came to London, and acquired some celebrity as a public teacher. His services to literature and to education, were acknowledged by the gratitude of bishop Saunderson, who gave him the rectory of Stock in Essex, and a prebend in Lincoln cathedral. Besides a translation of Terence's plays, he published a good edition of the Greek Testament, and wrote also various useful school books. He died 1666.

HOOKER, John, a native of London, son of a watch maker, whose mechanical genius was much admired in the construction of the machinery of the scenes in Covent-garden. The son received a good education under Mr. Bennet, known to the public by his edition of Ascham's works; but when admitted clerk at the India house, at the age of 18, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and to the study of modern languages, especially Italian. Besides three tragedies, Cyrus, acted at Covent-garden 1768, Timanthes, acted 1769, and Cleonice, acted 1775, he published spirited and much admired translations, in English metre, of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, and Tasso's Jerusalem. He wrote besides some original poems, and published the life of Mr. Scott of Amwell. This ingenious poet died 1803, aged 76.

HOOPER, George, an English prelate, born at Grimley, Worcestershire, about 1640, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he went to Christchurch as student, 1656. Highly distinguished as a scholar, he in 1672, was made chaplain to Morley, bishop of Winchester, and soon after to Sheldon, the primate, who gave him the rectory of Lambeth, and the precentorship of Exeter. In 1677 he became D. D. and the same year was made almoner to the princess of Orange, whom he attended in Holland. He refused in 1680 the divinity professorship at Oxford, and in 1691 was made dean of Canterbury. In 1701 he was offered the primacy of Ireland by lord Rochester, the viceroy; and soon after Anne's accession, he was nominated bishop of St. Asaph, and half a-year after, removed to Bath and Wells, where he continued to preside for 24 years. He died at Barkley, Somersetshire, 1727, and was buried in the cathedral of Wells. Besides three sermons, he published various tracts on theological and other subjects, — a Latin tract on Divorce — an Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures, the Attic, Roman, and especially the Jewish, with an Appendix concerning our old English Money and Measures of Content, 1721. A beautiful edition of his works appeared at Oxford in 1757, folio.

HOOPER or HOPER, John, an English bishop and martyr, born in Somersetshire, and educated at Oxford. He was for some time of the fraternity of the Cistercian monks, but disliking their principles he returned to Oxford, and became a convert to the tenets of Luther. Upon the enacting of the statute of the six articles, he fled for safety, and after various escapes in France, in England, and in Ireland, he settled in Switzerland, and married, and then devoted himself to the study of Hebrew. On the death of Henry VIII. he returned to London, where he became a popular preacher, and distinguished himself as the accuser of Bonner. By the interest of his friend lord Warwick, he was nominated bishop of Gloucester 1550, and he was consecrated, though he refused to wear the canonical habits as approaching too near to popish forms, and two years after he obtained besides the see of Worcester in commendam. This worthy prelate, under the bloody reign of Mary, was marked for destruction. Neither his popularity as a preacher, his hospitality and benevolence as a prelate, nor his exemplary manners as a man, could save him from the flames. He was condemned to be burned, and he suffered the execution of the sentence at Gloucester, with becoming fortitude, 1555, in his 60th year. His writings, and especially his letters preserved in Fox's monuments monuments of the church, are excellent specimens of his learning, and of his mental abilities.

HOORNBECK, John, a Dutch divine, born at Haerlem 1617. After studying in his native city, and at Leyden and Utrecht, he entered into the ministry at Cologne 1652, and 11 years after returned to Holland. In 1644 he was raised to the chair of divinity professor at Utrecht, and appointed minister in ordinary in the church there, and after filling those two important offices with great ability and universal approbation, he was invited to similar employments at Leyden, 1654. He died 1666, aged 49. His works are various, on polemical, practical, historical, and other subjects; and throughout life he displayed, says Bayle, the complete model of a good pastor and divinity professor. He married 1650, at Utrecht, and left two sons.

HOPKINS, Ezekiel, a learned prelate, born at Sandford, Devonshire, where his father was curate. He was chorister of Magdalen college, Oxford, and at the age of 16 was made usher of the college school, and some time after its chaplain. He became a popular preacher among the presbyterians and independents, and therefore the bishop of London refused to admit him to one of the city churches, in consequence of which he went to settle at Exeter. Here he was seen and admired by lord Robartes, afterwards earl of Truro, who gave him his daughter Araminta in marriage, and when lord-lieutenant of Ireland, presented him to the deanery of Raphoe. The earl besides so strongly recommended him to lord Berkeley, the next viceroy, that he was in 1671 made bishop of Raphoe, and in 1681 translated to Londonderry. He left his diocese in 1688, when persecuted by lord Tyrconnel, and came to England, where he was elected minister of Aldermanbury 1689, where he died 19th June 1690. He was an able and interesting writer. He published five sermons, besides an Exposition of the ten Commandments, and an Exposition of the Lord's Prayer.

HOPKINS, Charles, son of the preceding, was born at Exeter, and educated at Dublin, and afterwards at Cambridge. During the Irish rebellion of 1688, he was a zealous partizan in favor of William, and at the end of the troubles he returned to England, and became the associate of men of wit and fashion. In 1694 he published some epistolary poems and translations, and in 1695 produced "Pyrrhus," a tragedy, with an epilogue by Congreve. He was also the friend of Dryden, and by his "Art of Love," gained the acquaintance of the earl of Dorset; but his intemperance and debauchery soon proved fatal. He died 1699, in consequence of his excesses, aged 36. He wrote besides a translation of Ovid's History of Love, two tragedies, Boadicea, and the Female Warrior, &c.

HOPKINS, John, another son of the bishop, born Jan. 1st, 1675. He had poetical powers, and published 1698, the Triumphs of Peace, or the Glories of Nassau—the Victory of Death—and also Amasia, or the Works of the Muses, a collection of Poems, 3 vols. 1700. The particulars of his life are unknown, but it is supposed that like his brother he was an unfortunate man.

HOPTON, Arthur, an able mathematician, son of sir Arthur Hopton. He was born in Somersetshire, and educated as a gentleman commoner at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he took his first degree, and then removed to the Temple, London. Though he died at the early age of 26, 1614, he wrote some valuable treatises, on the Geodetical Staff for Surveying, 4to.—the Topographical Glass, with the Uses of that Instrument, the Theodolite, Plain Table, and Circumferenter, 4to.—a Concordance of Years according to the English Account, 8vo.—Prognostications from 1607 to 1614, &c. He was the intimate friend of the great Selden.

HOPTON, Ralph, lord, an English nobleman, who distinguished himself by his valor in the Low Countries, and afterwards in the king's service during the civil wars. His troops were under the best discipline, and with them he defeated sir W. Waller at Stratton, 1643; but though victorious he was obliged to retreat before the superior numbers of general Fairfax. He died at Bruges 1652.

HOPTON, Susanna, a lady of Staffordshire, born of respectable parents. Though beguiled to conform to the tenets of the church of Rome by the arts of Turberville, a priest, she afterwards was reconciled to the protestant faith, and died at Hereford 1709, aged 82, after surviving several years her husband Richard Hopton, one of the Welch judges. She wrote Daily Devotions—Hexameron, or Meditations on the six Days of the Creation—and also corrected the devotions in the ancient way of Offices, published by her friend Dr. Hickeys.

HORAPOLLO, or HORUS APOLLO, an Egyptian grammarian in the age of Theodosius. His two books on Egyptian hieroglyphics, have been edited by Pauw.

HORATII, three brothers at Rome, who fought against the three Curiatii of Alba, B. C. 667, and conquered.

HORATIUS, Cocles, a Roman, celebrated for the valor with which he defended a bridge over the Tiber against the army of Porsenna. After the cutting down of the bridge, he swam across the river with his armour.

HORATIUS, Q. Flaccus, a celebrated Roman poet, whose great abilities recommended him to the notice of Mecenas, and of Augustus, with whom he lived in habits of intimacy and conviviality. He died eight years before Christ. His odes in four books, his epodes, satires, epistles, and Art of Poetry, are well-known.

HORMAN, William, a native of Salisbury, educated at Winchester school and New college, where he became fellow. He was in 1485 made master of Eton school, and also fellow, and afterwards vice-provost of the college. He died 1535. He was a good botanist as well as an able divine, and published Herbarum Synonyma—and also Indices to the writers de Re Rustica.

HORMISDAS, a pope and saint of the Romish calendar, elected to the papal chair 514. He assembled a council to condemn the tenets of the Eutychians, and died 523. Several of his letters are extant.

HORMISDAS II. king of Persia, succeeded his father the great Chosroes, 578. His subjects revolted against him at the instigation of Varanes his general, whom he offended by sending him a female dress because he had been defeated by the Romans. Hormisdas was deprived of his sight by the successful rebel, and died 590.

HORNE, George, a venerable prelate, born Nov. 1 1730 at Otham near Maidstone, where his father was rector. After being educated by his father, he was two years at Maidstone school, and at the age of 15 he was elected to a scholarship of University college, Oxford. On taking his bachelor's degree he removed to Magdalen college, where he was elected Kentish fellow. Here he devoted himself with unusual attention to Hebrew and sacred literature, and while he warmly embraced the principles of Hutchinson, and the philosophy of nature, as he regarded them deducible from the truths of scripture, he laid the foundation for controversy and metaphysical disputations. In 1753 he took orders, and soon distinguished himself as an able and eloquent preacher. In 1768 he was elected president of his college, and soon after took the degree of D. D. and was made chaplain to the king, and in 1776 he was made vice-chancellor, and for four years supported that office with great dignity. In 1781, he was made dean of Canterbury by lord North, and in 1789 succeeded Bagot in the see of Norwich. His elevation, unhappily for the church and for posterity was of short duration. His health had gradually been declining, and a paralytic stroke on his journey to Bath gave such a shock to his constitution that he never recovered, and died soon after 17th Jan. 1792, aged 62. He was buried at Eltham in Kent. Though censured by some writers for his philosophical sentiments as the friend of Hutchinson and the opponent of Newton, bishop Horne must rank very high as a sincere and exemplary christian, as a good scholar, an able divine, and a most benevolent and amiable man. By his wife, daughter of Mr. Burton of Eltham he had five daughters. His works, which are very valuable and display the man of information, judgment, and erudition, were the Theology and Philosophy of Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, explained, &c. 8vo. — a fair and impartial State of the Case between sir Isaac Newton and Mr. Hutchinson, 8vo. — Spicilegium Shuckfordianum, or a Noddy for the Critics, 12mo. — Christ and the Holy Ghost, Supporters of the Spiritual Life — and two sermons before the university, — an Apolo- gy for certain Gentlemen in Oxford, aspersed in a late pamphlet, 8vo. — a View of Mr. Kennicott's Method of Correcting the Hebrew Text, 8vo. — Considerations on the Projected Reformation of the Church of England, to lord North, — Considerations of the life and death of St. John the Baptist, 8vo. in sermons preached annually at Magdalen college, 8vo. — Commentary on the Book of Psalms, &c. 4to. 2 vols. — Letter to Adam Smith, LL. D. on the life, death and Philosophy of David Hume, 12mo. — Discourses on several subjects and occasions, 2 vols. 8vo. — Letters on Infidelity, 12mo. — Letters to Dr. Priestley, 8vo. — Observations on the Case of Protestant Dissenters, 8vo. — some volumes of sermons — Charge intended to be delivered to the Norwich Clergy at the Primary Visitation, 4to. 1791. — Papers signed Z in the Ollapodrida, by Mr. Monro. &c. His life has been written with pleasing minuteness by his early friend Mr. Jones.

HORNECK, Anthony, a divine born at Baccharack, in the lower Palatinate 1641, and educated in divinity at Heidelberg, under Spanheim. At the age of 19 he came over to England, and entered at Queen's college 1663, where, the same year, he was incorporated M. A. from the university of Wittemberg. He was made chaplain of his college and vicar of All Saints, Oxford, and two years after he went as tutor to the eldest son of the duke of Albemarle, by whom he was made rector of Doulton, in Devonshire, and prebendary of Exeter. After a visit of two years in Germany he was in 1671 made preacher of the Savoy, and afterwards he was very disinterestedly recommended by Ruffel, lord Orford, to the queen, and had the promise of a Westminster prebend which he obtained 1693. He took the degree of D. D. 1681, at Cambridge, and became afterwards chaplain to William and Mary, and in 1694 obtained a prebend in the church of Wells. He died of the stone Jan. 1696 in his 56th year, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Bishop Kidder who wrote his life describes him as a man of very extensive learning, well skilled in the learned languages, especially Hebrew, and in his duties of pastor unusually exemplary, so that he knew him sacrifice his hopes of preferment to the conscientious discharge of his duty. He published some sermons, and various other works, chiefly on theological subjects, much admired.

HORNIUS, George, historical professor at Leyden, where he died 1670, was born in the Palatinate. The loss of some property, it is said, in his old age, disordered his senses. He wrote Historia Ecclesiastica ad ann. 1666 — de Originibus Americanis — Geographia vetus & nova, — Orbis Politicus — Historia Philosophæ, 4to.

HORREBOW, Peter, professor of astronomy, mathematics, and philosophy at Copenhagen, and particularly known as the first who discovered the aberration of the light of the fixed stars. He published Copernicus Triumphant, and died 1764, aged 85.

HORROX, Jeremiah, an English astronomer born at Toxteth, Lancashire, about 1619. He finished his education at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and devoted himself most assiduously to the study of astronomy. He settled at Hoole near Liverpool, and had the good fortune of being the first person who observed a transit of Venus over the sun's disc 24th Nov. 1639. He was assisted in his astronomical observations and inquiries by his friend Crabtree of Broughton near Manchester, and he derived much information from the writings of Tycho Brahe, Kepler and others. This able and ingenious man was cut off, by a sudden death, in the midst of his observations, 3d Jan. 1640-1, and the value of the few things which he wrote, proves the irreparable loss which science suffered in his death. His "Venus in Sole visa" was preserved in MS. and published by Hevelius at Dantzick, 1662. He had undertaken some other works which he left incomplete. His "Opera Posthuma" appeared under the care of Dr. Wallis, 1673, but several of his papers were destroyed while in the hands of private persons, at the great fire of London, and from others Shakerly formed his "British Tables."

HORSLEY, John, author of Britannia Romana was a native of Northumberland. He was educated at Newcastle, and then passed to Scotland where he took the degree of M. A., and then settled at Morpeth, as teacher of a dissenting congregation. He died 12th Dec. 1731, a short time before the publication of the book on which his literary fame depends. His Britannia, divided into three books, is a most valuable composition, and gives a very accurate account of the different stations of the Roman legions and governments in the island, of the inscriptions and sculptures still preserved, and of the geographical divisions and names, with other particulars of the country. He was a fellow of the Royal society, and some of his letters to R. Gale are preserved in Hutchinso. His accuracy and learning are as much admired as the excellence of the plan of his great work.

HORSLEY, Samuel, a learned prelate, born in St. Martin's in the fields, where his father was clerk in orders, and educated at Trinity hall, Cambridge. He took his degree of LL. B. in 1758 and 10 years after attended lord Aylesford at Christ-church, Oxford where he proceeded to the degree of LL. D. In 1778 he succeeded on the death of his father to the living of Thorley, Herts, in the gift of the bishop of London to whom he was chaplain, and he held also the rectory of St. Mary, Newington, which he exchanged for that of South Weald, Essex, in 1782. He was for some years an active member of the Royal society and also their secretary, but after contributing much to their transactions, he retired in consequence of the dissensions which prevailed in that learned body, and in which he took a zealous part. When archdeacon of St. Alban's he directed his attention to the tenets of Dr. Priestley, and in his charge, and in some pamphlets he displayed so much ability, and refuted in so dextrous a manner, and with such unanswerable arguments this bold champion of materialism and philosophical necessity, as to gain the respect and the admiration of every friend of true christianity. He was afterwards presented to Aldbury rectory in Surrey by lord Aylesford, and Thurlow the chancellor was so pleased with his zeal and conduct in his late controversy that he gave him a prebend of Gloucester, and in 1788 procured his elevation to the see of St. David's. In his diocese the new prelate gained deserved popularity by increasing the stipend of curates, and promoting their comforts; and in 1793, he was translated to Rochester with the deanery of Westminster, and in 1802 passed to the see of St. Asaph. He died after a few days' illness, 4th Oct. 1806 at Brighton, where he had gone to pay a visit to his venerable patron Thurlow, whom on his arrival he found dead. His remains were interred in Newington church. He was twice married, and had one son by his first wife, and a daughter who died young, and by his second he had no family. Besides single sermons preached on public occasions, and controversial tracts in defence of the church establishment, and of the true principles of christianity, the bishop published editions of the Inclinations of Apollonius — of sir Isaac Newton's works 5 vols. 4to. — treatises on Virgil's two Seasons of Honey, — on the Properties of the Greek and Latin Languages, — critical Disquisition on the 18th Chapter of Isaiah, &c. As a speaker in the senate the bishop was eloquent, clear and argumentative, and on all important national discussions, and especially when the hierarchical establishment of the country was mentioned, he generally delivered his sentiments, and was listened to with deference and admiration. Against the French revolution he pointed out the vehemence of his oratorical powers, and he foresaw the calamities to which this country would be exposed if it did not resist the attempt of innovators and of anarchists. As a preacher Dr. Horsley was impressive, and though he was in his manner rather dictatorial, yet his delivery was pleasing and his enunciation distinct. His mind it may be said grasped all the learning of the ancient and the modern world, his heart was warm and generous, his feelings noble and patriotic, and his head capable and willing to serve the cause of virtue, morality, and religion. Though ridiculed by some for the zeal with which he opposed the revolutionary principles of France, he indignantly spurned at popularity which was to be purchased by bending to the vitiated politics of the time, and in supporting the cause of order and decency with consistency and spirit, he ably defended the measures of government and gained the approbation of every man of sound sense and true piety in the kingdom. In his private character he was highly respectable, though irascible he was benevolent and humane, and his deeds of charity have often proved burdensome to his income, and distressed him in his pecuniary affairs. With his intimate friends he was a pleasant, entertaining, and agreeable companion, and in upholding the character of the christian he showed that he was not insensible to the innocent pleasures, and the recreations of the man.

HORSTIUS, James, a physician born at Torgau 1537, created M. D. in the university of Frankfurt on the Oder 1582. After practising at Sagan Sudinitz, and Iglaw, he was elected medical professor of the university of Helmstadt in 1584. He long supported the character of a popular and able physician, and died 1600. By his first wife whom he married 1562 he had 10 children. She died 1585, and two years after he married another. He was a man of piety and called down the blessings of heaven upon his various prescriptions, a religious custom which he recommended to his medical brethren with little effect. With all his learning however he was imposed upon by the golden tooth of a child in Silesia, about which he wrote a dissertation before the deception was divulged. He wrote besides Compendium Medicarum Institutionum, — Herbarium, — De Noctambulis, — Epistolæ Philosophicæ & Medicinales, — Commentary on Hippocrates's Book on the Heart, — Disputationes Catholicæ, &c.

HORSTIUS, Gregory, nephew of the preceding was born at Torgau, 1578, and was made M. A. at Wittemberg, and M. D. at Basil. He was professor of physic in several places, but lastly at Ulm in Germany, where he died of the gout, Aug. 1636. His abilities were such that he obtained the title of the Æsculapius of Germany. He wrote de Tuendâ Sanitate — de Causis Similitudinis & Dissimilitudinis in Fœtu, &c. — de Naturâ Amoris, &c. — By his first wife who died 1634 after an union of 19 years, he left two daughters and four sons, three of whom were physicians, and two, John Daniel and Gregory, authors of Medical Tracts, &c. His second wife he married only 13 months before his death.

HORTE, John, an English divine. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters under Thomas Rowe, where he had Dr. Watts among his fellow students, but after officiating for some time at Marshfield in Gloucestershire he conformed to the church and was regularly ordained. He preached a visitation sermon at Aylesbury, in 1708, and was made by the lord lieutenant of Ireland, to whom he was chaplain, bishop of Leighlin and Ferns. He was afterwards translated to Kilmore, and in 1742 to Tuam where he died 1751. Besides a charge to the clergy of Tuam in 1742, he wrote a volume of sermons of great merit, 1738, Dublin, 8vo. and London 1757.

HORTENSIVS, Quintus, a Roman orator of great abilities and equal celebrity. He died very rich B. C. 49, and his daughter Hortensia it is said inherited all his oratorical powers.

HORTENSIVS, Lambert, a philologist, poet, and historian, who it is said assumed that name because his father was a gardener. He was born at Montfort, Utrecht, and studied at Louvain, and was for many years rector of the grammar school of Naarden where he died 1577, aged 76. He wrote besides satires, and other poems, seven books, De Bello Germanico, under Charles V. — de Tumultu Anabaptist. — Commentaries on the six first books of the Æneid — Notes on four Comedies of Aristophanes.

HORTENSIVS, Martin, an astronomer born at Delft. He died 1639, aged 34. He wrote de Mercurio sub Sole viso, et Venere Invisa. — de Utilitate & Dignitate Matheſeos — de Oculo, ejusque Præstantiâ.

HOSEA, the first of the minor prophets flourished from A. M. 3194 to 3219, under the reign of the second Jeroboam, and of Uzziah.

HOSIVS, Stanislaus, a cardinal born of poor parents at Cracow in Poland. By his abilities he gradually rose to distinction and became secretary to the king of Poland, bishop of Culm, of Warmia, and at last a cardinal. He was employed by Pius IV. to procure the continuance of the council of Trent, in which he presided with great eloquence and dignity. He died 1579, aged 76. He left by his will a library to Cracow. His works in 2 vols. folio, were popular, and in them he showed himself an able and zealous advocate of the see of Rome.

HOSKINS, John, an English portrait painter, who died 1664. He was eminent in his profession and took the portraits of the second Charles, his queen and family. He had the Coopers, Alexander and Samuel, for his pupils.

HOSPINIAN, Rodolphus, a Swiss writer born at Altdorf near Zurich 1547. He studied at Zurich and after visiting the universities of Marburg, and Heidelberg, he was admitted into the ministry 1568, and the next year married. In 1571 he was made provisor of the abbey school of Zurich, and in consequence of his services as a writer he was made in 1588, archdeacon of the Caroline church, and 1594 minister of the abbey church. After being blind in consequence of a cataract for about a year, he recovered his sight by couching 1613. For the last three years of his life he grew childish. He died 1626, aged 79. His abilities were so universally acknowledged that he was considered as the only scholar capable of refuting Baronius' Annals. He undertook a very celebrated and important work, "an History of the Errors of Popery" which he published at various times in different portions, and with universal applause. These and other works were re-published together at Geneva 1681 in seven thin vols. folio. By his first wife who died 1612 he had 14 children. He afterwards took a second wife.

HOSPITAL, Michael de P, chancellor of France, son of a physician, was born at Aigueperse, Auvergne 1505. After studying at the most celebrated universities of France and Italy, he was raised to distinction for his abilities, and successively became auditor of the Rota at Rome, counsellor of the parliament at Paris, ambassador to the council of Trent, and superintendant of the French provinces. In this last and difficult office he labored earnestly to restore the ruined finances of his country, but while he raised again the national affairs to prosperity he paid no regard to his own domestic concerns, so that after continuing six years at the head of a department where he might have appropriated millions to his use, he was found incapable of portioning out his daughter, and was therefore indebted on that occasion to the king's liberality. On the death of Henry II. he was introduced into the council of state, and in the midst of turbulence and faction he was raised to the high office of chancellor of the kingdom, to which his firmness, his integrity, and his virtues entitled him. He proved himself a determined friend in the cause of toleration, and in consequence of the mildness of his conduct he was suspected of favoring the cause of the protestants, so that the seals were taken from him, by the influence of Catharine de Medicis, and on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew he was marked for the general slaughter. A party of horse advanced against him, but while with unconcern he would not even shut his castle gates, or fly for safety, an order was sent, at the moment, from the king, to spare his life. This great man and most upright magistrate died 1573, aged 68. His features are said to have resembled those of Aristotle. He wrote Latin poems published Amsterdam 1732, 8vo. — Speeches, &c. — Memoires containing treaties of peace, &c. He left only one daughter.

HOSPITAL, William Francis Antony, marquis de P, an eminent French mathematician, born 1661. He was for some time in the army, but he left the military profession in consequence of his being very short sighted, and then applied himself with redoubled ardor to his favorite mathematical pursuits. At the age of 32 he gave a public solution of some difficult problems, proposed to mathematicians in the city of Leipzig. In 1693 he was made honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and distinguished himself by his work on Newton's Calculations, called "L'Analyſe des Infiniment Petits." He wrote also Les Sections Coniques — les Lieux Geometriques — la Construction des Equations — une — une Theorie des Courbes Mechaniques, &c. This amiable man died of a fever 2d Feb. 1704, aged 49.

HOSSECH, Sidronius, a Flemish jesuit, who died 1653, aged 57. He wrote some elegant Latin poems, published together, Antwerp 1656.

HOSTE, Paul P., a French jesuit, professor of mathematics at Toulon where he died 1700, aged 48. He was author of Traité des Evolutions Navales, folio, 1727, — Traité des Mathematiques les plus necessaires a un Officier, 3 vols. 12mo. translated into English by W. Webster. — Another mathematician of that name was author of treatises on the Artificial Sphere, — Practical Geometry, — Description and Use of Geometrical Instruments, &c. and died 1634.

HOSTUS, Matthew, a German antiquary, who died 1587, aged 78. He was author of treatises de Numeratione Emendatâ, Græcis and Latin. Utitatâ, — de Re Numerariâ, Gr. Rom. Hebr. &c. — Monomachia Davidis & Goliæ, — de Multiplici Affis Ufu, — de Sex Hydriarum Capacitate, — Inquisitio in Fabricationem Aræ Noë, &c.

HOTMAN, Francis, a French civilian, born at Paris 1524. He studied the civil law at Orleans, and at the age of 18 he became a doctor in that faculty, but the chicane of the law disgusted him, and he applied himself to polite literature, and began to read lectures in the public school at Paris. By embracing the precepts of Luther, he disobliged his father and retired to Geneva, and afterwards was made professor of belles letters at Bern. He afterwards was invited to Strasbourg to fill the chair of civil law, and so high was his reputation that he received very liberal offers from Prussia, Hesse, Saxony, and the queen of England to settle in their dominions. He next was professor at Bourges, by the invitation of Margaret of France, but after escaping with difficulty from the massacre of 1572, he left France determined never to return, and went to Geneva, and Basil, where he read lectures on civil law. He died at Basil of the dropsy 1590. During the six years of illness which preceded his death he revised his works which were edited, 3 vols. folio, 1599. His writings were chiefly on civil law, on the government of France, on Roman Antiquities, besides a treatise de Consolatione. He has been admired for his piety and firmness, though some have accused him of avarice. He like the rest of his learned contemporaries, lost much of his time and money in searching for the philosopher's stone.

HOTTINGER, John Henry, a learned Orientalist born at Zurich, 1620. He displayed such abilities in his younger years that his education was considered as a general concern, and therefore he was sent at the public expence to visit foreign countries, for the improvement of his mind. He studied at Geneva, under Spanheim, at Groningen, under Gomarus and Alting, and at Leyden, under Golius, and after visiting England he returned to Zurich where he was honorably appointed in 1643 to the chair of divinity and of the oriental languages. In 1655 he took the degree of D. D. at Basil, and by the permission of the magistrates of Zurich, he answered the invitation of the elector Palatine, to assist him for three years in restoring to its ancient fame the university of Heidelberg.

Thus honored with the friendship and confidence of the elector he engaged in the important work, and afterwards accompanied his patron to Frankfort, where he had a conference with Job Ludoff the celebrated Orientalist, and concerted with him measures for sending missionaries to explore the state of Ethiopia, and the progress of christianity in those remote countries. In 1661 he was recalled back to Zurich, and he obeyed the summons of his fellow citizens, honored with the title of ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector. The breaking out of a war in 1664 called his abilities into action, and he was sent as a negotiator to Holland; but while many universities solicited the honor of granting him a professor's chair, his countrymen refused to permit him to quit Switzerland. The entreaties of the Dutch at last however prevailed, but while Hottinger was preparing for this honorable appointment, he unfortunately was drowned in the river which passes through Zurich, 5th June 1667. He had indeed escaped to land, with two friends who were in the boat when it sunk under him, but seeing his wife and three children and servant in danger, he attempted their rescue, but perished in the stream. His wife, one of his friends, and the servant were saved, but the children perished with him. Four sons and two daughters survived him. It has been properly a matter of surprise that among his many avocations as public professor in various situations, and as the active correspondent of the learned of Europe, he could possibly find time to write so much. His works best known are Exercitationes Anti-morinianæ de Pentateucho Samaritano, 1644, 4to. against Morin a contemporary critic — Thesaurus Philologicus, seu Clavis Scripturæ, 1649, 4to. — Historia Orientalis quæ ex variis Orientalium Monumentis collecta agit, &c. 1651, 4to. — Promptuarium, five Bibliotheca Orientalis, &c. 1658, 4to. — Etymologicum Orientale, five Lexicon Harmonicum Heptaglotton, &c. 1661, 4to. the seven languages were Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, Ethiopic & Rabbinical, with which the author was most perfectly acquainted. Other works less important were published by Hottinger, mentioned in Bibliotheca Tigurina, and in Heidegger's life of him 1667. One of his sons, John James, was divinity professor at Zurich, and died 1735, aged 83, author of some theological works.

HOTZE, an Austrian general, born in Zurich. He served with great credit under Wurmser at the taking of the Weissenburg lines, and distinguished himself at the battles of Neumarch, and of Wurtzburg, for which he was made knight of the order of Maria Theresia. He commanded in 1799 the left wing of the Archduke Charles's army, and was killed some time after near Kaltenbrunn.

HOVARD DE LA MOTHE, Anthony, a native of Dieppe, who died at Abbeville 1803, aged 78. He was well skilled in law antiquity, and was member of the academy of inscriptions, and of the national institute, and wrote Anciennes Lois des Francois conservées dans les Coutumes Angloises, 2 vols. 4to. — Traité sur les Coutumes Anglo-normandes, &c. 4 vols. 4to. — He had 17 children by his wife, with whom he lived happy 54 years.

Hou-

HOUBIGOUT, Charles Francis, a papist of the congregation of the Oratory, was born at Paris 1686. As he was deaf he had recourse for consolation to study, and so great was his progress and his fame, that he was honored with the most flattering marks of approbation not only by his countrymen, but by pope Benedict XIV. This worthy man, who added to his extensive learning the most amiable character of private life, died 1783, aged 98. His works best known are an edition of the Hebrew Bible with a Latin version and notes, Paris 1753, 4 vols. folio, a most valuable work — a Latin Translation of the Psalter from the Hebrew 1746, 12mo. another of the Old Testament, 8 vols. 8vo. Racines Hebraïques, 8vo. — Examen du Psautier des Capuchins, 12mo. — Sherlock's Sermons translated, — Leslie's Work against the Deists and Jews translated, &c.

HOUBRAGEN, Arnold, a Dutch painter, born 1660 at Dordt. He studied literature as well as painting, and wrote the lives of the Flemish painters, printed 3 vols. folio 1754. His son Jacob was eminent as an engraver.

HOUGHARD, John Nicholas, a French general, born at Forbach. He raised himself to the highest ranks of the army, and after serving under Custines with credit, he accused him of losing Mayence by his misconduct. The accusation was believed, Custines was disgraced, and Houghard placed at the head of the army, displayed his abilities in the victories of Dunkirk, of Hondscoot, of Furnes, Menin, &c. His services however did not protect him, as he was treated by Hoche as he had treated Custines, and being arrested at Lille on a charge of treason he was hurried to Paris and guillotined 15th Nov. 1793.

HOUDARD DE LA MOTTE, Anthony, a French writer, vid. MOTTE.

HOUDRY, Vincent, a jesuit, born at Tours 22d Jan. 1721. He was eloquent as a preacher and possessed some merit as a writer. He published la Bibliotheque des Predicateurs, 22 vols. 4to. 1733 — la Morale, 8 vols. &c. He died at Paris 29th March 1730, expressing sorrow in his last moments that he was not permitted to reach his 100th year.

HOVEDEN, Roger de, an English historian in the age of Henry II. born at York. Like the clergy of his times he united the professions of divine and lawyer, and was, as it is supposed, engaged in the family of the king; but the time of neither his birth nor his death can be ascertained. He wrote annals which began 731 where Bede left off, and continued to the third year of king John. These annals were first published 1595, and reprinted at Frankfort, folio, 1601. He is deservedly praised by Leland, and by Saville his editor, for fidelity. According to Vossius he wrote an History of Northumbrian kings, and a Life of Becket.

HOUGH, John, bishop of Worcester, is celebrated for his opposition when president of Magdalen college, Oxford, to the arbitrary proceedings of James II. He was born in Middlesex 1650, and after receiving his education at Birmingham, entered at Magdalen college, 1669, where he became fellow. At the breaking of the popish plot, he was improperly suspected, and his papers were examined, but he did not lose his popularity, and he attended his patron the duke of Ormond to Ireland, and at his return in 1685, he obtained a prebend at Worcester. In 1687 he was elected president of his college by the fellows, who thus rejected the arbitrary mandamus of James in favor of Anthony Farmer, but he was soon after expelled by the king's commissioners, and Parker bishop of Oxford placed in his room. During this struggle with the court and with a popish party, Hough behaved with great spirit but becoming moderation and dignity, and at the approach of William of Orange, the college was restored to its rights, and the president to his office. In 1690 William nominated this faithful champion of protestantism to the see of Oxford, and in 1699 he was translated to Lichfield. On Tenison's death he through modesty declined the primacy, but two years after, 1717, accepted the see of Worcester where he continued upwards of 26 years. He was a liberal benefactor, and repaired with becoming magnificence the palaces of the sees to which he was promoted, at the expence, it is said, of not less than 7000l. This worthy, and venerable, prelate died 8th March 1743, in his 93d year, and the 53d of his episcopate.

HOULIERES, Antoniette de la Garde des, widow of William de Lafon, was born at Paris 1638. She was the pupil of Henault, and she imitated him not only as a writer of poetry but as a sceptic, and atheist. She was member of the academy of Ricovrati of Padua, and of Arles, and died at Paris 1694. She was flattered for the versatility of her muse at the court of Lewis XIV. and her odes, epigrams, tragedies, but especially her pastorals, possess great spirit and equal beauty. Her daughter, who bore her name, was also a poetess, and was not devoid of abilities since she obtained the prize of the French academy, against Fontenelle as her competitor. She died at Paris 1718. The works of these two poetical ladies were published 1747, 2 vols. 12mo.

HOUSEMAN, Cornelius, a painter of Antwerp, born 1648. He settled at Mechlin, and died 1727. His landscapes, exhibiting animals and trees in rich variety, are much admired.

HOUSEMAN, James, a painter of Antwerp, born 1656. His portraits and historical pieces were in high repute. He was in England where he completed that beautiful work, the altar piece of St. James' Chapel. He died 1696.

HOUSSAYE, vid. AMELOT.

HOUSTON, William, an English physician. He was a surgeon in the West Indies, and took the degree of M. D. at Leyden under Boerhaave. He was assisted at Leyden by Van Swieten in making some curious experiments on brutes, which were published in the philosophical transactions, vol. 39. He was fellow of the royal society, and died 1733 in the West Indies. His MS. catalogue of plants was published by sir J. Banks. Another tract of his is inserted in the philosophical transactions, 37th vol.

HOUTEVILLE, Claude Francis, member of the congregation of the Oratory, was born at Paris, and died there 1742, aged 54. He was secretary to the French academy, and also to cardinal Dubois who greatly esteemed esteemed his character and abilities. His chief work is, the Truth of the Christian Religion proved by Facts, 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 12mo.

How, William, a physician and botanist. He was born in London, and after being at merchant tailors' school, he was elected to St. John's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He was captain of a troop of horse in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined, he came to London, where he practised physic, and died 1656, aged 37. He wrote Phytologia Britannica Natales exhibens Indigenarum stirpium sponte emergentium, 12mo. and he edited also Lobel's Illustrations of Plants.

HOWARD, Thomas, earl of Surrey, and duke of Norfolk, distinguished himself by his bravery in the service of his country. He assisted his brother sir Edward, in his attack against sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate who in 1511 spread terror and devastation on the English coast, and after killing the leader and capturing the ships, he embarked for Guienne with the marquis of Dorset, and ably contributed in the conquest of Navarre by the arms of Ferdinand. Raised to the honor of high admiral after his brother's death, he next displayed his valor in the field, and ensured the defeat of the Scotch in the battle of Floddenfield, which proved fatal to James IV. He afterwards went to Ireland as viceroy, and after an absence of two years, during which he suppressed a rebellion, he returned to lead a fleet against the French. These high services were rewarded by the king, who created him earl of Surrey, and restored his father to the dukedom of Norfolk, but popularity was transitory under a capricious government, and the English admiral was accused of treason. He saw his son beheaded upon the false accusation and escaped the same fatal blow, only by the previous death of the king. He died 1554, aged 66.

HOWARD, Edward, a brave English admiral, younger brother to the preceding. He was knighted about 1494 for his services, and afterwards was placed at the head of a fleet to attack and destroy the French ships which infested the English coast. He had the good fortune to defeat the enemy's fleet off Brest, but the following year 1514, he was killed in boarding Pregant the French admiral's ship, and his body was immediately committed to the deep.

HOWARD, Henry, earl of Surrey, son of Thomas duke of Norfolk above mentioned, was born about 1520. He celebrated with all the powers of poetry, the personal charms of his mistress the celebrated Geraldine supposed by lord Orford, to be the lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, second daughter of lord Kildare, who afterwards married Clinton earl of Lincoln, and with such devotion did he profess his attachment, that he travelled over Europe in the true spirit of chivalry, and challenged every knight who might be inclined to dispute her superior beauty. His valor was also displayed and with the greatest effect at the famous battle of Floddenfield, but all his virtues and services were of no avail against the gloomy suspicions of Henry VIII. The capricious monarch, either jealous of Howard's prowess and popularity, or pretending that he aspired to the crown by soliciting the hand of the princess Mary, arraigned him as guilty of treason, and caused him to be beheaded on Tower-hill 1547. As a poet this unfortunate nobleman is very respectable, the harmony of his numbers, and the purity of his language have been deservedly commended by Pope, Warton and others; and he had the singular merit of being the first of the English nobility who courted the muses. His sonnets, &c. have been published in Anderson's collection.

HOWARD, sir Robert, youngest son of Thomas earl of Berkshire, was eminent for his learning. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and after the restoration was elected member for Stockbridge, and afterwards for Castle Rising, and was made auditor of the Exchequer. Though the favorite of the second Charles he showed himself a violent enemy to James II. and a firm supporter of the revolution. He died about 1700. He was author of the History of the Reigns of Edward, and Richard II. &c. 8vo. — a Letter to Johnson, — Virgil's fourth Eneid translated — History of Religion, 8vo. — Statius' Achilleis translated, — various poems and plays, &c.

HOWARD, Charles, earl of Nottingham, son of lord William Howard, was born 1536. He early devoted himself to a military life, and served under his father, and afterwards became general of horse, and distinguished himself against the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland and their rebel forces. In 1569 he escorted in an English fleet Anne of Austria, daughter of Maximilian from Zealand to Spain where she was married to king Philip. He succeeded his father in the title of Effingham in 1572, and soon after commanded the English fleet, which with such persevering bravery attacked and completely defeated the Spanish armada. For these services he was raised to the earldom of Nottingham by the queen; but in the next reign, though for a while ambassador at the court of Spain, he was dismissed from his offices and succeeded by the greater favorite Villiers duke of Buckingham. He died 1624.

HOWARD, John, a celebrated philanthropist, born at Hackney 1726. When very young he lost his father who was a carpet warehouse keeper in Long lane Smithfield, in consequence of which his guardians bound him apprentice to a grocer; but as his constitution was delicate and his property above mediocrity he purchased his indentures, and travelled over France and Italy. On his return to London he lodged for some time at the house of Mrs. Lardeau a widow, at Stoke Newington, and so great was the attention of this lady to him during a severe illness that gratitude produced affection, so that he married her though much older than himself. Three years after, 1755, he had the misfortune to lose her, and this melancholy event he deplored with all the sincerity of fondness and undiminished affection. The next year he set out for Lisbon to view the dreadful consequences of the earthquake, but the frigate in which he had set out was captured by a French privateer, and the severities of confinement which he endured in France exerted that sympathy for suffering captives which have rendered his name so illustrious. After his release he visited Italy, and on his return he settled near Lymington, where in 1758 he married, but in 1765 he lost his his wife in child bed. Afterwards he purchased an estate at Cardington near Bedford, and there employed himself in acts of benevolence among the poor and industrious cottagers who surrounded him. In 1773 he served the office of sheriff, and this, as he says, brought the distress of prisoners more immediately under his notice, and led him to the humane design of visiting the gaols of England to administer relief and to suggest improvement. In 1774 he stood candidate to represent Bedford, but notwithstanding his popularity he was unsuccessful; he had however the pleasing gratification of being examined before the House of Commons, and of receiving their thanks for his attention to the state of prisons. Encouraged by this honorable testimony, after visiting the prisons of England, he travelled on the continent with the same humane zeal, and three times passed through France, four through Germany, five through Holland, twice through Italy, once through Spain and Portugal, &c. between 1775 and 1787. In 1777 appeared his State of Prisons in England and Wales, with preliminary observations, and an account of some foreign prisons, 4to.—and in 1780 an appendix was added to it with an account of his observations in Italy, and of these in 1784 a new improved edition was published. His account of the principal lazarettos in Europe appeared in 1789, 4to. and in this work he intimated his intention of penetrating through Russia and Turkey, far into the East. On this occasion he observed that he was fully sensible of the dangers which must attend such a journey. “Trusting, however,” said he, “in the kindness of that providence which has hitherto preserved me, I calmly and cheerfully submit myself to the disposal of unerring wisdom. Should it please God to cut off my life, in the prosecution of this design, let not my conduct be uncandidly imputed to rashness or enthusiasm, but to a serious, deliberate conviction that I am pursuing the path of duty, and to a sincere desire of being made an instrument of more extensive usefulness to my fellow creatures than could be expected in the narrower circle of a retired life.” This unabated zeal in the cause of humanity proved at last unhappily fatal. While at Cherson he visited a patient who labored under a malignant epidemic fever, and catching the disorder he fell a victim to his compassion, 20th Jan. 1790. In his manners Howard was simple and unaffected, temperate even to abstemiousness, and unwilling to mix in the crowds of convivial life. His modesty was equal to his merits. When in 1785 in consequence of the recommendation of some anonymous friend in the Gentleman's magazine, a large subscription was rapidly filled to erect a statue in commemoration of his many services to the suffering captives, he peremptorily declined the honor, exclaiming, “Have I not one friend in England that would put a stop to such proceedings.” The nation has however paid a merited tribute to his memory. A statue by Bacon, erected in St. Paul's, represents him in a Roman dress, with a countenance of christian mildness, holding in one hand a scroll of writings for the improvement of prisons, &c. and in the other a key, whilst he tramples on chains and fetters. Thus he trod, says the simple but energetic inscription, an open but unfrequented path to immortality. In his religious sentiments Howard was a dissenter. It is remarkable that with all the benevolence of his character he was too rigid a father, and while he endeavoured to educate his only son in the paths of duty and rectitude he enforced his precepts with too much austerity, and rather terrified the mind, than drew it by gentle means to the admiration and to the practice of virtue.

HOWE, John, a nonconformist divine, born at Loughborough 1630. He was originally of Cambridge, but afterwards came to Oxford, and was elected fellow of Magdalen college. He was made by the presbyterians minister of Torrington, Devonshire, but was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He had been for some time chaplain to Cromwell, and after the restoration, he went over to Ireland, as chaplain to lord Massarene, and obtained the bishop's permission to preach while in the country. He returned to London where he died 1705. He was universally esteemed for his learning, moderation, and great virtues. His best known work is the Living Temple, 2 vols. 8vo. His works have appeared in 2 vols. folio.

HOWE, John, an English statesman born of a good family in Nottinghamshire. He was member for Cirencester, and sat in the three last parliaments of William, and the three first of Anne. He was considered as a man of great integrity and firmness, and by the weight of his representations the commons were induced to allow half pay to disbanded officers. During the agitation of the partition treaty he expressed himself against it with such virulent opposition that king William declared, that if it were not for the disparity of their situation he would fight him. Though he warmly espoused the revolution, he soon after was disgusted with William, and boldly opposed him the whole of his reign. On Anne's accession he was made a privy councillor, pay-master of the forces, and vice-admiral of the county of Gloucester. On George's accession he was succeeded as pay-master by Walpole. He died at his seat of Stowel, Gloucestershire in 1721, leaving an only son, created afterwards lord Chedworth, by Mary daughter of H. Baskerville and widow of sir E. Morgan. Some songs and poems by him have been published.

HOWE, Richard earl, an able English admiral. He early devoted himself to the sea service, and at the age of 20, as commander of a small sloop of war, he behaved with such bravery in beating off two French frigates, that he was made post captain. He afterwards took a 64 gun ship, with the Dunkirk of 60 guns, off Newfoundland, and in 1758 he was actively employed under the orders of lord Hawke to destroy some of the ships and magazines at St. Maloes, which he effected with great success and little loss. The next year on the 6th of August he made an attack on Cherbourg and destroyed the bason, and afterwards in the affair of St. Cas he exhibited all the coolness and humanity of true heroism in protecting the retreat of his men, at his own personal danger. In the engagement with the fleet of Conflans he took an active part, and contributed greatly to the victory. In 1763 he was made one of the commissioners of the admiralty, which he resigned resigned two years after, and in 1770 he was appointed commander in chief in the Mediterranean. During the American war he had the command of the vessels employed on the American station, and as far as his assistance could co-operate in that unfortunate contest, his judicious and matterly dispositions were of great service to the king's troops. His relief of Gibraltar in 1782, in sight of the combined fleets of France and Spain, was considered as a very bold manœuvre. In 1783 he was made first lord of the admiralty where after a short resignation he continued for some time. He took the command of the fleet in 1793, and after endeavouring for some time to find the French fleet, he had the good fortune to bring them to action and to obtain a most complete victory 1st June 1794. This glorious event was celebrated by the nation with the most enthusiastic applause: the gallant hero with his brave companions received the thanks of both houses of parliament, and the king and queen visited the victorious ships at Spithead, and presented the admiral with a gold chain and medal, and a most valuable sword. Lord Howe who had succeeded in 1759 to the title of lord Howe on his brother's death, and had been created an English earl in 1783, was further honored with the rank of general of marines in 1795, and two years after made a knight of the garter. He died Aug. 1799, universally respected by the nation, and sincerely lamented by the navy, where he was regarded with all the gratitude and devotion due to a father and a friend.

HOWELL, James, an English writer, born in Caermarthenshire, about 1596. He was educated at Hereford school, and at Jesus college, Oxford, where his brother, afterwards bishop of Bristol was then a fellow. After taking the degree of B. A. he went to London for employment, and became steward to a glass-house, belonging to sir Robert Mansel and company. His abilities greatly recommended him to his employers, by whom he was sent as a general agent in 1619, to provide materials and workmen, and in this business he travelled over Holland, Flanders, France, Italy, and Spain, and while he honorably served his employers, he improved his stores of general knowledge. He again went to Spain in 1622, and in his absence was chosen fellow of Jesus college. On his return he became secretary to lord Scrope, president of the north, and while with him in Yorkshire, he was chosen in a very honorable and independent manner, and without solicitation, member for Richmond, against several competitors. He was sent in 1632 as secretary to Robert earl of Leicester to Denmark, and was afterwards employed in several respectable offices, till 1640, when he was appointed clerk to the privy council. In 1643 his papers were seized by the commons, and he himself imprisoned in the Fleet, and though some attribute this violence to his attachment to the king, it is more probable that to his own extravagance and imprudent conduct he was indebted for his confinement. The tediousness of a long imprisonment was relieved by the employment of his pen, while he remained in prison, which was even after the king's death. He wrote several things to maintain himself, and though composed through necessity, they possess merit. Though attached strongly to the king, he yet disapproved of the measures recommended by Laud, Buckingham, and Strafford, but he was so great an enemy to republican oppression that he rejoiced at the monarchical power assumed by Cromwell, and even complimented him in a speech, which was published. At the restoration Howell was in reward of his services appointed historiographer royal, an honorable office, first erected in his person. He died Nov. 1666, and was buried in the Temple church. His publications are very numerous, amounting to nearly 50. They are chiefly on temporary and political subjects. The best known of these are his letters, which, as they contain an interesting account of the public affairs of the time, have gone through eleven editions.

HOZIER, Peter d', an eminent genealogist, born at Marseilles 1592. He was honored with the confidence of Lewis XIII. and XIV. and for his abilities was rewarded with the appointment of judge of arms, certifier of titles, and counsellor of state. He died at Paris 1660. He was author of an History of Brittany, folio, and of some valuable genealogical tables.

HUARTE, John, a native of French Navarre in the 17th century. He is the author of a curious and interesting book in Spanish, called, an Examination of such Geniuses as are fit for acquiring the Sciences, &c. with directions to discover the properties of each genius, &c. The work has been translated into Latin, Italian, French and other languages, and also, into English, under the title of Trial of Wits. Though commended however by many, Bayle censures him, and among other things, for publishing as genuine, the pretended Letter of Lentulus, from Jerusalem to the Roman senate, in which he describes the Saviour, his very hair, beard, shape, and stature, &c.

HUBER, Samuel, a native of Berne, divinity professor at Wittenburg 1592. He opposed predestination, and wrote an able explanation of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of the Romans.

HUBER, Ulric, a Dutch lawyer and philologist, born at Dorkum 1635. He was professor of law and history at Franeker, and afterwards at Lewarde, and died 1694. His publications are seven Dissertations, De genuina Ætate Assyriorum & Medorum — Tractatus de Jure Civitatis — Specimen Philosophiæ — Institutiones Historiæ Civilis, &c. — He was succeeded in his professorship by his son Zacharias, who died 1732, aged 33. After publishing a dissertation, De vero sensu atque Interpretatione Legis IX. D. De Lege Pompeia, &c.

HUBER, Mary, a female writer. She was born at Geneva, and died at Lyons 1753, aged 43. She wrote an Abridgment of the Spectator — Letters on Religion essential to Man — The System of ancient and modern Theologians, on the State of the Soul after Death — She was a protestant, and some of her works were violently attacked by the catholic divines.

HUBER, John Rudolph, a painter of Basil, who died 1748, aged 80. He painted 3065 portraits, besides historical pieces, and transfused the graces of the Italian school into his works.

HUBERT, Matthew, a priest of the oratory of Paris.

HUD

Paris. He was distinguished as an eloquent preacher, and inferior only to Bourdaloue. He died 22d March 1717, aged 77. His sermons which had pleased the congregations of the capital and of the provinces, were published 1725 in 6 vols. 12mo. and are highly esteemed.

HUBNER, John, a native of Lusatia or Torgau, in Saxony, who wrote some popular works in history and geography, in the form of question and answer. He was professor of geography at Leipzig, and rector of the school of Hamburg, where he died 1731, aged 63. The chief of his works which have been translated into various languages, are Genealogical Tables — Bibliotheca Historica Hamburgensis — Museum Geographicum — and a Genealogical Lexicon.

HUDDE, John, an able mathematician, burgomaster of Amsterdam, and known also as a politician. He died 1704, and left some mathematical works of great merit.

HUDSON, Henry, an English navigator who was for some time employed to find a north passage to China and Japan. The first voyage was in 1607, another was undertaken the next year, and a third in 1609, at the expence of the Dutch East India company. In these voyages little was discovered besides fields of ice, though the navigator entertains his readers with an account of a mermaid seen by his men. In 1610 a fourth voyage was undertaken, and the bold adventurer penetrated towards the north of America, and entered those straits which lead into the bay now bearing his name. After sailing above 100 leagues in expectation of having discovered the long sought passage, he found that he was at the bottom only of a deep bay, and after enduring great hardships from shortness of provisions, and from the rigor of the climate, he failed back on his return. Some of his men, however, were dissatisfied at his conduct, and rising against him, they fastened his arms behind him, and put him, his son, and seven men, the most infirm of the crew, into his small shallop, and turned them adrift. The shallop was never afterwards heard of, but the inhuman mutineers reached Plymouth, Sep. 1611. A company now exists which bears his name, and trades to that part of America which he discovered.

HUDSON, Dr. Johnson, an English critic, born at Wide-hope near Cockermouth, in Cumberland 1662, and entered at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. In 1686 he was chosen fellow of University college, and became a most able and active tutor, and in 1701 he was elected keeper of the Bodleian library, when he took the degree of D.D. In 1712 he was appointed principal of St. Mary-hall, through the interest of Dr. Radcliffe; and to his influence with that celebrated physician, Oxford, it is said, is indebted for the many noble benefactions which she received. A sedentary life brought on at last a dropsy, of which Dr. Hudson died Nov. 27, 1719, leaving one daughter by the daughter of sir Richard Harrison, an alderman and mercer of Oxford. The labors of Dr. Hudson were employed in the publication of Velleius Paterculus — Thucydides — Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores — Dionysius of Halicarnassus — Longinus — Æsop, &c. with short and valuable notes. His beautiful edition of Josephus, left unfinished, was completed and published 1720, in 2 vols. folio, by his friend Antony Hall, who also married his widow. It was his intention to publish a catalogue of the Bodleian library, which he had already transcribed in 6 vols. fol. He was the frequent and respected correspondent of the most learned men of Europe.

HUDSON, Thomas, an English painter, son-in-law of Richardson. He for many years painted portraits in London, but he is better known as being the preceptor of sir Joshua Reynolds. He died 1779, aged 78.

HUET, Peter Daniel, a learned French prelate, born at Caen in Normandy, Feb. 8, 1630. The early death of his parents left him at the mercy of guardians who neglected him, but the vigor of his mind prevailed over all opposition. By the direction of his tutor, Mamburn, a jesuit, he became well acquainted with literature, and particularly geometry, and by the assistance of Bochart, who was a protestant minister of Caen, he made himself a perfect master of the Greek and Latin classics. When of age he visited Paris to purchase books, and there became known to the politest scholars of France; and in 1652 he accompanied his friend Bochart, to the court of Christina, queen of Sweden. The queen wished Huet to settle at Stockholm, but after three months' stay, he took his leave of the fickle princess, and returned to Paris. In 1661 he published his well known book, De Interpretatione Libri duo, which drew upon him the applauses, and the thanks of the learned. His Origines Commentaria, of which he had obtained a copy from a MS. while at Stockholm, appeared in 1688 at Rouen, with a Latin translation and notes. In 1659 he was invited by Christina to Rome, where she had, after her abdication, retired, but he declined her liberal offers. He was afterwards appointed, with Bossuet, sub-preceptor to the Dauphin, an honorable situation to which his literary fame entitled him. In 1678 he was nominated by the king, to the abbey of Anay in Normandy, and in 1685 he was raised to the see of Soissons, which soon after he exchanged for that of Avranches. In 1699 he resigned his bishopric, and received in its stead the abbey of Fontenay, near his native place, Caen, but afterwards removed to the maison professée of the jesuits at Paris, where he spent the last 20 years of his life in devotion and in literary pursuits. He died 26th Jan. 1721, in his 91st year. The other works of this learned and amiable bishop were Demonstratio Evangelica 1679, folio, often reprinted — Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ, 1689, a book in which he ably attacked the doctrines of Des Cartes, which in his younger and more inexperienced years he had warmly embraced — Quæstiones Alnetanæ de Concordiâ Rationis & Fidei, 1690, an excellent and elegantly written work. He also wrote notes on the vulgar translation of the bible, for which purpose he read over the Hebrew text 24 times with great attention, and in 1718 he published an account of his life, the title page of which drew down down the censures of critics, as he used the words, Ad eum pertinentibus, for ad se. Besides these, he wrote several other things less known, but equally admired for elegance of style, and vivacity of expression. He was, says his biographer Olivet, the most learned man that any age has produced. It is to be mentioned that the publication of the classics, Ad Usum Delphini, originated in him, and the plan was enriched by some notes written by him, and printed at the end of Manilius. Some of his books have been translated into English — on the Origin of Romances — on the Situation of the Terrestrial Paradise — and the History of the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients — and the Weakness of the Human Understanding.

HUFNAGEL, George, a native of Antwerp, whose abilities were noticed and rewarded by some of the German princes, and by the emperor Rodolphus. Besides some poetical works in Latin and German, he wrote four books for the use of the emperor, containing an accurate description and elegant representation of quadrupeds, insects, birds and fishes. He died 1600, aged 55.

HUGH-CAPET, count of Paris and Orleans, was raised by his merits and courage at Noyon to the throne of France 987, and thus became the head of the third race of the French monarchy. He died 996, aged 57.

HUGHES, John, an English poet born at Marlborough, Wilts, 29th Jan. 1677. He was educated in private schools in London, but the delicate state of his health prevented his engaging in any laborious employment, and the milder avocations of poetry, music and drawing became by choice as well as necessity his pursuit. He obtained afterwards a place in the ordnance, and was secretary to the commissioners for the purchasing of lands for the royal dock yards. His first poem was on the peace of Ryfwick, which was well received, 1697, and two years after "the Court of Neptune" on William's return, met with equal applause. He afterwards published a Pindaric ode "of the House of Nassau," and another in praise of music, and by his poetical merits he gained the acquaintance and friendship of men of letters, of Pope, Congreve, Addison, Southerne, Rowe, and others. He was also honorably noticed by lord Wharton, and in 1717 lord Cowper, the chancellor, appointed him secretary to the commissions of the peace. His last work, written under the flattering hope of long enjoying his affluent independence, was the Siege of Damascus; but, such is the uncertainty of human affairs, he died the very night the play was presented to the public on the stage, 17th Feb. 1720. Before he expired, he heard that his performance was well received, but the intelligence did not disturb or divert his thoughts now fixed on another world. His memory was regretted by the pen of Steele in the "Theatre." His poems were collected and published in 2 vols. 12mo. 1735. Besides these he translated Fontenelle's Dialogues of the Dead, — Vertot's Revolutions of Portugal, and he contributed some papers to the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, and published an edition of Spenser's Works in 6 vols. 12mo. 1715. Swift in a letter to Pope, described him as a medio-crift in prose and in verse, and Pope in answer observed "that what he wanted in genius he made up as an honest man."

HUGHES, Jabez, younger brother to the preceding was an excellent scholar, and published a translation of Claudian's Rape of Proserpine — the Story of Sextus and Erietho from Lucan's Pharfalia — Suetonius' Lives of the 12 Cæsars — Novels from the Spanish of Cervantes, &c. He died 17th Jan. 1731, aged 46. His posthumous miscellanies in prose and verse were published 1737.

HUGHES, Jabez, fellow of Jesus college, Cambridge, was not related to the preceding. He made himself known as the editor of Chrysostom's treatise "on the Priesthood," a second edition of which appeared at Cambridge 1712.

HUGO, of Cluni, a saint of the Romish calendar, born in Burgundy 1023. At the age of 15 he abandoned the world for the abbey of Cluni, of which he was chosen abbot 1048. He was pious and exemplary, and introduced great reformation among the monks, 10,000 of whom he is said to have had under his direction at Cluni, and other places. He died 1608 or 9. Some of his epistles are preserved in Dacherius' Spicilegium.

HUGO, Herman, a Jesuit, born at Brussels. He died of the plague at Rhimberg 1629, aged 41. He wrote de Prima Scribendi Origine, 8vo. — Universæ Rei Literariæ Antiquitates, republished by Trotzius 1738 — Obfidio Bredana, Antwerp 1629 folio — Militia equestris antiqua & nova — Pia Desideria, a poem of which the versification though good, wants simplicity and sublimity.

HUGO, Charles Lewis, a French and Latin writer, abbe of Etival, and titular bishop of Ptolemais, died at an advanced age, 1735. He wrote Annales Præmonstratensium, 2 vols. folio, a curious work on his own order — Vie de Norbert Fondateur des Premontrés, 4to. 1704 — Sacræ Antiquitatis Monumenta historica, dogmatica, &c. 2 vols. fol. 1725 — Traité historique & critique de la Maison de Lorraine, 8vo. 1711: — a bold work censured by the parliament of Paris, in defence of which he wrote Reflexions sur les deux Ouvrages concernant la maison de Lorraine.

HUGTENBURGH, John Van, a Dutch painter who died 1733, aged 77. As he was particularly eminent in the delineation of battles, his pencil was engaged with great success in representing the battles of Marlborough and Eugene. His brother James was eminent as a painter of animals and of landscapes. He died 1696.

HULDRIC, John James, a native of Zurich, law professor there. He died at Zurich 1731, aged 48, deservedly esteemed as an able divine, and a benevolent man. He wrote a commentary on Puffendorf's Duty of Man — Miscellanea Tigurina, 3 vols. — and published an edition of Saphor Toledot Jeschu, 1705.

HULSEMAN, John, a Lutheran divine born at Esens, East Friezeland. He died 1661, aged 59. He travelled through several countries, and was at last professor of divinity at Leipzig, and wrote several books on theological subjects much esteemed in his age.

HULSIUS, Anthony, a native of Hida, who studied at Wesel, and Deventer, and afterwards visited the various universities of Europe to improve himself in oriental knowledge. He was for 25 years settled as minister nister at Breda, and then removed to fill the divinity chair at Leyden, where he died 1685, aged 70. He wrote Theologia Judaica — Opus Catecheticum Didacticum-polemicum — Non ens Præadamiticum, &c.

HULSIUS, Henry, author of Summa Theologiae — De Principio Credendi — De Vallibus Prophetarum Sacris, &c. died 1723, at Douisburg, where he was theological professor.

HULST, Peter Van der, a native of Dort, admired as an excellent painter. The introduction of insects, lizards, serpents, frogs, &c. among his flowers had a striking effect. He died 1708, aged 56.

HUME, David, a celebrated English writer born at Edinburgh 26th April, 1711. He was intended by his family for the profession of the law, but he had greater regard for Virgil and Cicero, than for Voet and Vinnius. At last however he was forced, from the narrowness of his fortune, to embark in a mercantile concern at Bristol 1734; but in a few months he quitted the place in disgust, and retired to France, determined with the most rigid economy to guide his expenditure by his income while he devoted himself to literary pursuits. Here, at Rheims, and at La Fleche in Anjou he wrote his treatise of Human Nature which he published in London 1738; but the work met with no success. In 1742 the first part of his Essays appeared with a little more success, but to support himself he was obliged to enter into the service of the marquis of Annandale, as an attendant, during the weak intervals of his lordship's intellects. He afterwards attended general St. Clair as his secretary, on the coast of France, and in his embassy at Vienna and Turin, and after the lapse of two years he congratulated himself on being master of independence and of 1000*l.* and retired to pursue his literary labors in Scotland. His Political Discourses, and his Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals appeared in 1752, but though he considered these works as highly finished compositions, they met little notice from the public. In 1754 he published his portion of English history from the accession of James I. to the revolution, and though the work was disregarded by the nation, he continued his labors, and in 1756 published another volume, which attracted some public attention and served, as he said, to buoy up its unfortunate brother. His Natural History of Religion about this time had appeared, and though it met with few readers, yet it was attacked by Warburton under the name of Hurd, as he sarcastically says, with all the petulance, arrogance and scurrility of the Warburtonian school. In 1759 the history of the house of Tudor was published, and in 1761 the more early part of English history, and thus the plan was completed, and the author, though he found cavillers and opponents in consequence of the partiality of his opinions and the licentious tendency of his principles, had the satisfaction to see his work grow popular, and thus ensure him a handsome reward from the bookfellers. While forming the plan of a literary seclusion from the busy world, in 1763, he was invited by lord Hertford to accompany him as secretary to his embassy at Paris, and the offer was too flattering not to be accepted. In the summer 1765 he was left there as charge d'affaires, and soon after on his return to Scotland he was persuaded to become under-secretary of state to general Conway. In 1769 he returned to Edinburgh, very opulent, as he observes, possessing a revenue of 1000*l.* a year, healthy, and though somewhat stricken in years, with the prospect of enjoying long his ease. In 1775 he was attacked with a disorder in his bowels, which though at first disregarded proved incurable, and at last fatal. He died 25th Aug. 1776. He has written an account of his life to the 18th April, 1776, prefixed to his works. His Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, appeared after his death, in 8vo. His works were corrected by himself, and were printed in 4to. and in 8vo. and they are now become universally popular. Though Hume possesses the deep research of the historian, the patience of the philosopher, and the subtleties of the metaphysician, he is to be read with caution, as his principles on religion and morality, are insidiously clothed in fallacious language, and would tend to undermine the salutary doctrines which teach mankind to reverence the divinity as a beneficent creator, an omniscient governor and a just and impartial judge.

HUMPHREY, Laurence, an English writer, born at Newport Pagnell, Bucks, about 1527. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he was elected fellow of Magdalen college. He took his master's degree 1552, and was then made Greek lecturer of his college, and soon after took orders; and in 1555 left England to travel into foreign countries. On Elizabeth's accession he returned to Oxford and was restored to his fellowship from which he had been expelled for being absent more than the limited time of one year, and in 1560 he was made queen's professor of divinity, and the next year elected president of his college. In 1570 he was made dean of Gloucester, and 10 years after removed to the deanery of Winchester, and he might have been raised to a bishopric, had he not been too much attached to the calvinists, and therefore inimical to the doctrines of the English church. He died Feb. 1590 leaving a wife by whom he had 12 children. He wrote Epistola de Græcis Literis, and Homeri Læctione & Imitatione, Basil 1558 — De Religione Conservatione & Reformatione deque Primatu Regum, — de Ratione Interpretandi Auctores — Optimates, sive de Nobilitate, ejusque antiquâ Origine — Life of Bishop Jewel, — sermons, and pieces against papists, &c.

HUNNERIC, king of the African Vandals after his father Genferic, is known for his severe persecution of the Christians. He was an Arian in principle, and died 484 after a reign of seven years.

HUNNIANES, John Corvinus, waivode of Transylvania, and general of the armies of Ladislaus king of Hungary, is famous for his defeat of the Turks under Amurath 1442, and 3. He obliged his enemies to raise the siege of Belgrade, but though unusually brave and fortunate he was yet defeated by the Turks 1448. He afterwards recovered his victorious fame, and again raised the siege of Belgrade against Mahomet II.; but unfortunately died the same year, 10th Sep. 1456. His loss was universally lamented, not only by the Christians, and by the pope, who is said to have shed tears at the intelligence, but the infidels and and Mahomet himself to whom he was become so dreadful a scourge.

HUNNIUS, Giles, a Lutheran divine born at Wittenberg, in Wirtemberg, 1550. He took his degrees at Tubingen, and in 1576 was in consequence of his great abilities made divinity professor at Marburg. He wrote with such force against the Calvinists that he was invited to reform the electorate of Saxony, and was made professor at Wittenberg. He was also engaged in a controversy with Huberus on predestination and election. He died of an inflammation caused by the stone, April 1603. His works are collected into 5 vols. and contain orations, colloquies, &c. His son Nicholas was also a man of merit, and died 1643, professor of divinity at Wittemberg and Lubec.

HUNT, Walter, an English carmelite at the council of Florence where he warmly opposed in his speeches and in his writings the meditated union between the Greek and Latin churches. He died 1470.

HUNT, Jeremiah, a native of London, educated for the ministry among the dissenters under Thomas Rowe. He was afterwards at Edinburgh, and also at Leyden, where he studied Hebrew and Jewish antiquities, and he first officiated before the English congregation at Amsterdam. On his return to England he settled at Tunstead in Norfolk, and in 1700 came to London, to become the minister of Pinner's hall congregation. He was made D. D. by the Edinburgh university in 1729, and died 1744, aged 66. He wrote besides sermons, an essay to explain the History and Revelations of Scripture, &c. — with a Dissertation on the Fall of Man, 8vo. 1738, &c.

HUNTER, Robert, an English gentleman, author of the famous "Letter on Enthusiasm," attributed by some to Swift, and by others to Shaftesbury. He was made governor of Virginia 1708, but taken by the French on his voyage, and in 1710 he was sent as governor to New York and the Jerseys, at the head of a colony of Palatines. He was in 1728 appointed governor of Jamaica, and died there 31st March 1734. His epitaph, in elegant Latin, was written by the Rev. Mr. Flemming. Hunter wrote also a farce, called Androboros, according to Coxeter.

HUNTER, Henry, a native of Culrofs, Perthshire, educated at Edinburgh, and made minister of Dumfermline 1764. Two years after he removed to South Leith, and in 1771 was invited to the care of the Scotch church, London wall. In this new appointment he continued till his death, and was respected for his learning, his piety, his eloquence, the mildness of his manners, and the liberality of his principles. A consumptive habit obliged him to retire to Bristol for the benefit of the air and the waters, and he died there Nov. 1802, aged 61. He published Sacred Biography, or the Characters of Scripture, 6 vols. 8vo. — Miscellaneous Sermons, 2 vols. 8vo. — and translated besides various authors from the French, Lavater's Physiognomy — Saurin's Sermons — St. Pierre's Studies of Nature, &c.

HUNTER, William, M. D. a famous physician and anatomist, born 23d May, 1718, at Kilbride, Lanarkshire. As he was the seventh of 10 children, he was intended by his father, who was a farmer, for an active situation in the church. He was for five years at Glasgow, but while he hesitated to subscribe to the articles of faith, he became acquainted with Dr. Cullen, and thus his future pursuits were diverted from their original intention. After remaining three years in the house of his friend, he came in 1740 to Edinburgh, and the next year visited London, where he was recommended to the notice of his countryman Dr. James Douglas. The zeal and knowledge which he showed in anatomical studies, soon endeared him to this new friend, who took him into his house, made him tutor to his son, and enabled him to improve himself by attending various lectures on philosophy and medicine. The death of Dr. Douglas in 1742, left him his own master in his anatomical pursuits; and the next year he presented to the Royal society his essay on the Structure and Diseases of articulating Cartilages, and now acquired such reputation that he succeeded Mr. Sharpe as lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent-garden, in 1746. The next year he was admitted member of the corporation of surgeons, and by degrees acquired high reputation in midwifery. In 1750 he obtained his doctor's degree from Glasgow, and in 1764, in consequence of his high celebrity, he was appointed physician extraordinary to the queen. His practice was now so extensive that he took Mr. Hewson as his assistant lecturer and partner, but in 1770 this connexion was dissolved, and Hewson gave way to Mr. Cruikshank, a man of great acknowledged abilities. In 1767 he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and the next year he was admitted into the Antiquarian society, and appointed by the king anatomical professor. In 1781 he succeeded Dr. J. Fothergill as president of the London college of physicians, and was complimented with the honor of being elected member of several foreign societies. Thus distinguished, and thus respected as a medical man, he soon acquired an ample fortune, but with a commendable ambition he wished to apply it to the noblest and most beneficial purposes, the establishment of an anatomical school in London. Though in some degree thwarted in his application to government for a piece of ground in the Mews, he purchased some ground in Wind-mill street, and there erected a spacious house, where he removed in 1770 from Jermyn street. Here not merely private conveniences were the object of his wishes, but a spacious amphitheatre was built for the delivering of lectures, and a magnificent room was set apart for a museum. This museum was soon enriched not only with his own valuable preparations, but the presents of his friends and pupils, and all other curiosities in the animal and fossil kingdoms, which either favor or money could procure. Besides a cabinet of ancient medals, and a curious collection of shells, corals, &c. he placed there the most magnificent treasure of Greek and Latin books accumulated by any living person since the days of Dr. Mead. Of this most valuable museum, which it is said cost above 20,000l. the use was permitted for 30 years to his nephew Matthew Baillie, and Mr. Cruikshank, and afterwards to become the property of the university of Glasgow. Dr. Hunter, besides the labors which he bestowed in the collection and arrangement of his museum, and in his lectures,
